in a little time, it was the interest of Rome to oppose his prosperity. That the uniting so many warlike Nations under a Captain already so renowned, was a thing to be look'd after by all the Monarchs of Europe. That the Prince of Armorica's Renown carried a loud report of Fame through both the Empires. That the Britains have that Royal Name in a particular Veneration; and believ'd that the Great Constantine, who was born among them, was to revive again in the person of the Son of Aldroec. At length Geronces assures them, that if the Romans did not suddenly deprive him of a good part of that large extent of ground which was to fall under his power, their Empire would be less powerful and majestic than what the Dominion of the Britains would be in a short time. He offers at length to support and forward the pretensions of Maximus to the Princess of Albion, and so well makes it out of what importance this Island was to the Romans, that Honorius is very willing to reduce it once more under the obedience of the Roman Empire, and to declare a war that would secure the peace of the West, without troubling the quiet which Italy began to enjoy by the retreat of the Goths. Stilicor also more overjoyed than the Emperour, willingly embraces an opportunity so favourable to that unjust design which he had already contriv'd, and which afterwards cost him his life, as all the world knows; for he had hopes that in disposing the military employments, he should increase the number of his Favourites, and reinforce the Arms which he had gain'd to his party. He also thought that by his diligence and experience in warlike affairs he should render himself more considerable among the Romans, and that at the same time the peaceable and sluggish Honorius would appear less worthy to be their Emperour. To this purpose he loses no time, he gives out Commissions to levy Soldiers; he sends also into Gallia to the Governour as ample orders as Maximus could require, as well for recruits as for providing all sorts of Ammunition; and in the mean time that Roman himself, who had a more particular interest in the weighty enterprize, acts with all the vigour that love and ambition could infuse into him.

At the same time Geronces infligated by the same passions to pretences little different, and to remove the Britains, whose virtue was terrible to him, perswades Gratian to send Lenox to seize the Island of Monz, as belonging to the Crown of Britain. The Britains, the Picts and the Hibernians had often disputed their claim to that Island with considerable losses. However their mutual jealousy had still preserv'd it in an entire liberty, by the same way that those Neighbouring Nations had sought to subject it. Geronces therefore made it so well appear, that the war between the Picts and Hybernians was then an infallible opportunity for the Britains to make themselves masters of that Island, and urg'd his arguments so forcibly, that it was not convenient to lose so favourable an occasion, that Gratian followed his counsel, and gave Lenox the command of his Forces to attempt the conquest. The Britain departed from Troynovant with the principal persons of his party, so that Geronces seeing himself rid of those Grandees whom he most feared, sent presently for such Soldiers into the City as he knew were faithful to him, and whose courage he had tryed upon several occasions. Having thus got the strongest party in Troynovant, he wrote both to Constantine and Maximus, admonishing the latter that it was not convenient for him to set footing in Albion, but that it was better to return into Gallia, and to carry the war as far off as he could from a Country the Heirefs whereof he pretended to espouse; and at the same time advertising my Master, that Maximus had taken away Ocïavia by force, continually cruising in the narrow Sea between Albion and Gallia, and seizing upon all Vessels in general that sail'd between the two Countries. He assured him likewise that the Romans were about to invade the Territories of the Nantois, that they rais'd Levies on the other side near Armorica, by order of the Emperour; and that the Romans grew jealous of the growing power of the Britains under so famous a Prince.

Constantine receiv'd this news after he had gain'd a great victory, and regain'd many Towns which the Hybernians had taken from the Picts. But, Madam, since it is not necessary for me to particularize every Battel, nor every Siege, I will say no more, but that fortune having afflicted Constantine in the midst of Shouts and Triumphs with these conceited pranks of hers, by informing him that the Princess was in the power of his Rival, seem'd to make a shew of comforting him with the acquisition of a new Kingdom: for in short, the Valour and Justice of Constantine, the effects of his Magnanimity and Justice grew to be so universally famous, that the King of the Hybernians falling under the same fate as the King of the Picts, his people followed the example of their Neighbours, and put themselves also under the protection of my renowned Master, Nevertheless while all things submit to the powerful Genius of Constantine, or rather range themselves under the support of his Heroick Virtues, the enamoured Prince takes only care for that which he had lost in Climates far more happy, and at the same time that he holds three Scepters, believes Himself robb'd of all his whole substance. He could not brook that the Sea or wide Provinces shou'd separate him from his Princess, while the too fortunate Maximus had the happiness to see her every moment, conceiving an insupportable grief, and beyond measure tormented, when he came to examine with himself how his Rival carried himself towards her: Oh, Maximus, said he, if thou art so barbarous as not to respect the divine Octavia, because she has a kindness for me, there is nothing that defend thee from my just anger, for the provok'd Constantine, from whom thou hast taken the person whom he adores, will come and punish thy cruelty in the very midst of thy Army, and rend thy heart from thy breast, maugre all the Forces of the Empire arriv'd in thy defence: For shall my Princess whom I never behold but with veneration, shall she undergo the hardship of unkind usage? But why, (replied he presently after) wouldest thou have thy Rival have a respect for her, which might perhaps move her heart? Chuse unhappily in if thou canst, and determine thy desire, that thou mayst be the less disturbed in going to deliver thy Princess. Wish that Maximus may love Octavia, that he may attend her with all reverence and true respect. But more ardently desire that the services of that Roman may not be acceptable to thy Princess, but that she may faithfully preserve her innocent affections for thee.

He was so perplex'd with those thoughts, that he resolv'd to pass over into Gallia, where the charming Daughter of Gratian seem'd to require his aid, desiring however before he left his own Territories to reconcile the Picts and Hybernians with several strict alliances, for the better establishing peace in those Countries. But because such weighty affairs as those could not be dispatch'd in a short time, he left me behind with instructions to conclude what was begun, giving me a power as absolute as could be desired, had I car'd to have had the command of many nations, far absented from my Master, or could I have preferr'd that sad advantage above the satisfaction of being inseparable from my illustrious Prince. Thus Constantine departed to the great grief of his Subjects, taking along with him four thousand Horse to guard his person, and to reinforce his Army: and to please his Subjects, he chose out as many Picts, and as many Hybernians to attend him, who were overjoyed to march under the conduct of so great a personage, and to fight in the view of their King. While my Master was upon his march toward the Army, I laboured with so much pains and diligence, that finding it not to the purpose to make any new alterations, nor to leave Garrisons in those Cities where the love which the people bare to their Sovereign was a sufficient Guard, I was soon after ready to follow my Master: for I had nothing to do, but only to rely upon the care of the Governours and Magistrates, and the vigilancy of Lenex, who was then in the Island of Mona, where the people of that Island considering the present conjuncture of affairs, receiv'd him kindly.

But Constantine, in regard the Army march'd but slowly, and were many times forc'd to rest themselves, left that part which he led, and while they advanc'd to joyn with their fellows that were encamped upon the Banks of the Thamesis, strikes away for Troyonant, to give a visit to the Princess's Father; so that I was joyn'd with the Body of the Army as soon as he arriv'd, and mustering altogether I found them to be above seventy five thousand men. Constantius, a Britain Prince of the Blood, brought with him ten thousand Foot; Antenor and Dagober, who to this hour serve the King, came with an addition of six thousand Horse, and the Picts, Britains and Hybernians made up about sixty thousand more: as for our parts we were forc'd to set sail with all the speed that might be, understanding that Honorius had declared war against the King of Armorica, and that Maximus at the head of twenty six thousand men was ready to enter Aldroec's Dominions.

Never did a fire more warlike enflame my valiant Master's Breast, the power and Dignity of his Enemy, the defence of a Father so infinitely dear to him, and the desire of rescuing his Princess, kindled such martial heat within him, that he appeared like another Mars by his looks and by his actions, infusing into the most cowardly hearts that noble courage which they saw triumphing in his countenance. Before we could set foot in Gallia we were forc'd to encounter the Enemy by Sea: but the great King of the Picts being no less invincible upon the Waves than upon the most solid of all the Elements, we put them to flight, took Ships, and chased the rest to the very coasts of Spain. After this successful beginning we landed without any resistance; and my Master leaving the conduct of the Army to Prince Constant, he went to pay his Duty to the King his Father, then in the Territory of the Rennais: I will not enlarge upon the mutual expressions of love between those two great Princes, since their joy was so immediately interrupted by the fatal news that came from Troyonant, by which they were inform'd, that Gerances finding himself to be the most powerful, through the absence of Lenex and all his party, and having no reason to be afraid of Constantine, for whom he thought he had cut out work enough in Gallia, had put to death such of the Britains as were suspected by him: And openly Airing all things by the order of Gratian, he had so incens'd the people against their good King, that they rose all up in rebellion against him. That in conclusion he had put himself at the head of the Mutineers, had forced the Palace, had embred his Murderous hands in the blood of his Prince, and usurp'd the Supreme Authority: That he had received Loecmia into Troyevant, with a most magnificent Train, that he had publicly declar'd his purpose to espouse her, and that by his liberality, his promises and his threats, he had caus'd the insolence of his claim to be allowed. That he had hopes his faction being now grown potent, that it would be sufficient, and as ready to maintain his boldness, as well as there in the crime, so that all his care was to get the good will of the Queen, and fortify Troyevant.

Aldroec and Constantine exceedingly compassionating the sad end of Gratian immediately devis'd how they might revenge his death: But my Prince being more afflicted, and more zealous than the King his Father, suffer'd himself to be transported beyond his ordinary moderation, while he threatn'd Geronces as if he had been present. Barbarian, thou shalt dye, (said he being alone in his Chamber:) And thy abominat'd blood shall satisfy for these precious tears, which thou drawest from the fair Eyes of my Princess. Tremble, perfidious Traitor, tremble, for the justice of heaven reserves thee for torments proportionable to thy fact: and that Constantine whom thou knowest, loves the divine Octavia too well, to suffer that thy unpunish'd cruelty should cause her to mourn in vain. After these expressions of transportment, his anguish augmented when he consider'd, how infinite must be the Princess's grief upon so dire an Accident: And believing that the death of the King of Albion might be advantageous to Maximus, he felt a double measure of anger and hatred, reigning in his Soul against his Rival: so that he resolv'd not to stay in Armorica, but to depart the next morning. The Evening before, Aldroec was advertis'd that Altoruna or Melusina was newly arriv'd, so that the greatest part of the Court were overjoyed, out of a curiosity which is natural, to know what fortune has reserv'd for them of good or evil in future events. You know Madam, that Melusina was perfect in many Sciences, and being endued with a knowledge of several things, above the capacity of her sex, she pass'd for a Magician in all Countries where ignorance yet reigns. The King of Armorica was very glad of the Arrival of that famous female Gaul, and being that he had already advis'd with her concerning Constantine, and had intrusted her in what was requisite for her to know before hand, to the end she might speed according to Art, he had some hopes that he might learn in some measure, what would be the destiny of that Prince. Not that he gave an over-nice credit to such kind of predictions, but considering the power of the Celestial influences, over human Temperaments, he did not despise the judgment of so knowing a person, as Altoruna: Besides that, to his experience, she had before told Marcomire, Pharamond's Father, of many things which that valiant Prince should perform in Germany, some of which are already come to pass. But as for Constantine's part, whom Love and Ambition easily excus'd for being curious, he would not change his resolution which he had taken to depart, hoping more from the grandeur of his own courage, than from all Melusina's skill. Nevertheless not being willing to lose the opportunity, of seeing a woman so extraordinary nor to neglect any thing wherein he might serve the Princess, he stay'd by the King his Father when they brought Altoruna into the Chamber, yet with some unwillingness to discover himself presently, that he might not accuse himself of too much eagerness. Aldroec knew his intention, and therefore letting him alone to stand among the rest of the Croud for some time, he entertain'd Altoruna with all the civility that was due to a person of her merit. But soon after the impatience of a Father urging her to look upon his Son. Melusina beheld those Britains which appeared to be most considerable, and immediately taking notice of my Master above all the rest, she looked very stedfastly in his face. No sooner did she apprehend the truth, but she presently fell to examine what she could find in that Phytlognothy which she carefully observ'd: And then revolving in her mind what the Heavens promised from thence, she there met with so just an account, that now no longer doubting but that the Prince whom she beheld, was the great King of the Picts; Prince too renowned to be conceal'd, (cried she with a kind of prophetick spirit) Pursue this generous enterprise, vanquish Maximus and deliver this Princess: then repass into Albion, revenge the death of Gratian, and receive his Crown. After that return to extend thy Conquests, from one Sea to another and beyond the Pyrenian Mountains: But when in the midst of so prosperous a career, thy love and thy forces shall oppose themselves to thy glorious designs, yield to a famous Enemy without repining, to whom however thou shalt not be inferior in Experience or greatness of courage. That great personage shall put a stop to the torrent of thy victories: but if he causes thee to sigh after so much prosperous success, he shall at length change thy misfortunes into an accomplished fidelity.

After

After these words which she could not but pronounce aloud, her countenance that before was strangely alter'd, came again to it self: and by the behaviour wherewith she received my Master's civilities, she made us know, that had she not set her self to observe the carriages of men, generally practis'd in the world; her great Application to study had never rendred her wild wit, fit for civil conversation. But her converse with the King and Prince was very pleasing, for as she had been a great Traveller, and carried in her memory the rarities of several Climates, she entertained the two Kings with several discourses, where she made it appear that she had not been more than a Student, in the Abstruse and notional part of Natures knowledge. The Night preceding Constantine's departure, that Prince made several reflections upon what Altoruna had foretold him. And though his humour did not carry him to a light belief, however he was not a little melancholy, resolving to dye before he would yield to that Enemy, which he had spoken of. There shall never live that person in the world, cryed he, who shall be the Victior over Constantine, without triumphing over his life: And Melusina knows me not, if she think that force can make my Courage bend.

No sooner day appear'd, but the first beams of light in some measure, appeas'd my Master's disturbances, at the same time increasing his desire to be gone to the Army. Being ready to depart, the Father embrac'd his dear and beloved Son, with all the tenderness and affection imaginable; though with such a generous tenderness, as had in it nothing of effectminacy, though Constantine were then going to fight a Roman Army, much more numerous than his own. The Evening before my Master had taken his leave, both of Altoruna and all the principal Ladies of the Court, so that he had nothing to do but to take horse: And he was no sooner mounted, but he was followed by fourscore or a hundred Volunteers of the Nobility, who left their homes to try their first fortunes under so great a Prince. We travelled through Aldroec's Territories, and crossing the Line entred into Pictavia, where the Rendezvouz of the whole Army was appointed. Being come thither he made a general Muster, found them all lusty and couragious, and near the number which I have told you, the Britains after our landing, having recruited their loss of men at Sea. The next morning certain Gauls having quitted the Imperial Army, came over to us: and the most considerable among them told my Master, that Maximus was much terrified with the loss he had received at Sea, and that he was retreated into the Country of the Lemovices, where he intended to encamp under the protection of certain Hills, the narrow passes whereof he intended to defend. But (said the enamoured Constantine impatiently interrupting him) have you not seen the Princess of Albion, and do you bring me no tydings of her? Sir, replied the Gaul, she has been gone from the Army ever since your landing in Britain: for Maximus, who passionately loves her, would not hazard the loss of her in the loss of a Battel, should fortune that attends your courage, still favour you with your wonted success. Do you not know, said my Master, what way she is gone? Into the Province of the Romans, replied the Gaul, whence it is reported, that she is to be conveyed into Italy, and that Honorius is resolv'd to hinder your espousing of her, lest you should thereby become too potent. Ah! Honorius, replied the passionate King of the Picts, restore me Octavia and peaceably enjoy thy Empire: But if obstinately thou detainest that fair Princess from me, prepare to feel the effects of that power which thou tremblest at.

Instead of saying any more, he returns back to the Officers that were retired out of respect, and gives them order to march toward that place, where the Enemy lay intrenched with an intention to surprize them, before they could fortifie those advantageous Posts, of which they were Masters. Anger and indignation then joyning their force to the love we bare to Constantine, incited us to second the resolutions of a Prince that was so dear to us: so that we made such speed, that Maximus was asham'd to avoid the Combat, though he daily expected fresh recruits. The Roman therefore, who wanted neither courage nor experience, fortified with his Love and an Army in good heart, issues out of his Trenches, and shews himself before his Rival in good order of battel. Constantine overjoyed with that resolution of his Enemy, puts his men in Array: And he had no sooner given the Vanguard to Comtant, but that young Prince fiercely marched toward his Enemies, and begun the fight with a courage, worthy the noble discent from whence he sprang. Castinus, to whom Maximus had given the same charge, vigorously sustained the first onset: so that the Britains were forced to retire more than once. But the impatient Prince not enduring that delay, falls upon Castinus hand to hand: And having dangerously wounded him, forced the Body which he commanded to give way: and we no sooner began to see them totter, but the King, who led the right wing of his Army, advancing with the flower of the nobility, of several Kingdoms, thrust himself into the midst of his Enemies, with such a transcendent valour, valour as posterity well may wonder at. He fought out Maximus, he call'd to him aloud, and defied him in fierce language, and every where opening for himself a passage with an impetuosity that met with no sufficient resistance, he caus'd terror and disorder in all places where he fought. At length, Madam, the Roman haughtiness gave way to the invincible Son of Aldric: for that great Soldier, as amorous as valiant, obtain'd a victory, that made him Master of the Field, of Bag and Baggage, and a great number of prisoners.

The ground was covered with dead bodies, for the Romans lost thirty thousand men upon the spot, the darkness of the night favouring the rest. Eleven thousand of our Britains fell in this bloody slaughter; neither my Master nor Constant escap'd without wounds, no more than Dagobert and Antenor, who signaliz'd themselves with an extraordinary courage. The next morning Maximus rallied together the reliques of his scattered Troops, and crossing a River that was hardly fordable, he broke down the Bridges after him: so that the King not being able to follow him, and having nothing but Octavia in his thoughts, did but imperfectly taste the pleasure of so favourable a success, and notwithstanding all the advantages, he appeared melancholy in the very field of triumph, yielding the conquest to his vanquish'd enemy that kept possession of his fair Princess.

While Love thus in a manner blasts the fruits of his victory; and the passionate Constantine knows not where to repose, he goes forth in a languishing posture out of his Tent, and as he was walking he saw two Britains quarrelling, and just ready to fall to blows, immediately he causes them to be sent for, and demands the reason of their difference, when the most violent of the two taking upon him to speak, Sir, said he, the Officer whom you see has always been my Friend, and we resolv'd to share whatever we got in the Battel: however, he would fain break an agreement which we concluded since, though it were made altogether as he would have it. He has given me his part of a rich Head piece, and I have given him my share in a very considerable prisoner. I confess it, replied the other Britain, but you must acknowledge withal, that we neither knew the price of the Helmet, nor of the wounds which the prisoner had, and that friendship requires more fidelity than you have shewn me; for in short, you did not know that the Roman of whom I might have expected a considerable ransom could not live above five or six days. Continue friends as you were before, replied the King, and to preserve that kindness between you that first united your love, bring me hither the two subjects of your difference.

The Britains, who knew well the Generosity of Constantine, were over-joyed with his proposal, and loving the Prince even to veneration they obeyed his commands, and receiv'd in lieu thereof rewards far more costly and magnificent than they expected. As for the prisoner, my Master having heard him prais'd for his valour, adding certain thoughts of esteem to those which his compassion inspir'd, ordered great care to be taken of the Roman, and the most skillful Chirurgions to attend him. A while after not being able to qualify his amorous impatience, he sent to offer Honorius a peace, on condition that he would restore him Octavia. While he stay'd in expectation of the return of his Deputies, he employ'd himself as much as his melancholy would give him leave, in exercising the Soldiers, in providing Ammunition, and taking care for provision, and in making alliances between the Vandals and the Alains, who threaten'd to invade the Empire. But so soon as he understood that Honorius was resolv'd to maintain Maximus in his pretences, and to oppose the union of the two Britains, he prepar'd for his revenge, and to overturn a haughty power that pretended to limit his, on purpose to keep it in subjection: wherefore he concluded a Treaty with the Vandals and Alains, and engag'd them to make an invade into Spain, while he on the other side made himself Master of the greatest part of Gallia.

In short, Madam, that formidable confederacy made no delay to shake the Empire of the West, insomuch that my Master had no sooner cut in pieces in a second Battel the rest of Maximus's Troops, but all the Soldiers proclaim'd him Emperour: but Constantine modestly refus'd that Title, telling all them that had the honour to be about his person, that he would by no means accept of that Addition. However, as the whole Army was not apprehensive of his moderation, he let them alone to act according to the extent of their zeal, not judging it material to stop the stream of a popular affection, the advantageous effects whereof he had time enough to attend. On the other side, the King not willing to let this passionate heat of affection die, turn'd toward Aquitain; and because he knew that the people of that Country could not endure Honorius, for having promis'd their Country to the Goths, he was in hopes they would make the less resistance, and therefore he sent thither only a part of his Army, under the command of Prince Constant, to whom Antenor and Dagobert were Lieutenant Generals. As for his own part, he laboured with all diligence to get ready a Fleet to transport his Army over into Albion, to punish Cerences, and revenge the injuries done to his Princes, sending orders at the same time to Lenox, to advance toward Troynovant with all the Forces he was able to assemble together. But while the Ship-Carpenters and Seamen are continually at work upon the coast of Britain, and that Constantine not having any means to see Octavia, burns with impatience to sacrifice to her just anger the murderer of her Father, an unknown Knight pretends himself before him, approaching him with an aspect that drew the Prince to fix his eyes upon him. The Stranger appeared with a haughty carriage, though his countenance were pale, and he seem'd to be very feeble in body; yet in that weakness he made a low obeysance to the King, and finding him dispos'd to hearken to what he had to say, Sir, said he, I come to offer your Majesty a life which I owe to you as its preserver, and to tell your Majesty that the marks of your Generosity which you have manifested, have made me so sensible of your kindness that I know nothing which I can do, sufficient to testify my acknowledgment; yet the first proofs that I shall give you thereof, may not be perhaps the least acceptable: for in short, Sir, I believe I can help you to the sight of the Princess of Albion, if you can but have so much confidence in a person whom as yet you know not; but a person who is absolutely devoted to your Majesties service, and whose heart is above all thoughts that so much as border upon treachery.

The enamour'd Prince not being able then to refrain from embracing the Knight: What is there can more deeply engage me, generous Stranger, replied the Prince in an extasie of joy, if ——— But is it possible, (said the Prince, mov'd with a sudden passion usual upon occasions of the like nature) to be in your power to procure me so great a happiness? It is too much for an unfortunate Prince; and whatever inclination I have to give credit to persons of your quality, give me leave at this time to question the truth of your offer: nor do I suspect you can have any thoughts which are contrary to the laws of honour; for I wish to Heaven that my heart were as capable to entertain those hopes you would infuse into it, as I am ready entirely to give my self up to rely upon your conduct in this affair, you have no more to do then, but to tell me the place where I may find the Princess of Britain, and how I may get thither. Neither difficulties nor dangers, nor assured death it self shall hinder me from observing that course which you shall instruct me to take. I will make use of stratagems and cunning, if you think it to the purpose; or if open force be more convenient, I will look upon all the power of the earth assembled against my love but as obstacles too feeble to frustrate my designs. You must know then, Sir, replied the Stranger, that the Princess Octavia is in the Country of the Cavarians, and that they who have the charge of conducting her to Rome, have receiv'd orders to stay at Avignon, a fair City seated upon the River Rhosne. For Maximus, who had given command that she should be convey'd into Italy, soon chang'd his resolution, and fearing lest the Emperour should espouse her to Constance, or to the Son of his Favourite Stilicon, thought it better to keep her still among the Gauls, whether it were that he thereby labour'd to draw to his party those two Rivals, or that he might appear before his Princes in greater lustre, being far remote from Honorius. But, Sir, in regard that Maximus never discovered his mind to me, as not being born a Subject to the Romans, and for that I am so infinitely oblig'd to your goodness, I cannot only without scruple endeavour your satisfaction in this particular, but rather think my self engag'd to seek out all opportunities to serve you. Be pleas'd to mind then what I am about to propose and promise to effect; and if a person that owes you all that is precious, can claim a right to demand any recompence, I beseech you to suffer me henceforward to remain in your Army, and in all encounters to expose for your interest a life which you your self have preserv'd. It is a long time since that I prefer'd your interest before the Romans; but understanding that Dagobert had put himself into your Army, many considerations made me side with your enemies.

He had no sooner made an end of speaking, but he sigh'd, and having easily obtain'd the Prince's ear for some time, he related to him a good part of his Adventures, and how he came to have the knowledge of Octavia in the Province of the Romans, with what facility he could conduct my Master into the Country of the Cavarians, and introduce him into the presence of the Princes.

My Master had no sooner heard Gildon's relation, for so was the Stranger called, but he redoubled those thoughts of value and esteem which he had already conceiv'd for him, resolving to follow him whatever course he took. In short, Madam, an amorous design prevailing in the mind of a passionately engag'd King, transported him beyond the care of a grand preparation for war, above the pursuit of his victories which he intended to follow to the utmost, and above the revenge of Gratian's Blood. So fully were the thoughts of Constantine taken up with the Idea's of his Princes; for so absolutely did that fair person reign in his heart, that I may say my Master only lov'd Octavia, or at least, that there was nothing which he lov'd, but only for her sake. His conquest pleas'd him no otherwise but only that he thereby aim'd to enlarge the power of that divine Princess. Nor did honour it self, how glittering soever it appear'd, move him in the least, but only as it render'd him more worthy to serve the illustrious Daughter of Gratian. So that, Madam, you need not wonder, if instead of pursuing his design to repass into Albion, he delayed his journey that he might go to that only place where he was sure to find his certain happiness. This was the reason that he did no sooner send new orders to Lenox, for having put on only an ordinary Suit of Armour, he set forward upon his journey toward the Roman Province with a satisfaction not to be imagined. And therefore, though he was to travel through a great part of Gallia, his journey was not tedious, for in six days the impatient Prince reach'd the Banks of the River Rhofne: where he was no sooner arriv'd, but his faithful Guide carried him to the House of a certain Gaul that was his particular Friend; and having recommended his illustrious Guest, without letting him know however who he was, to his care, he went to Oſavia to advertiſe her of the arrival of the King of the Piſts. There he presently learn'd that the Princess was not ignorant of the fatal murder of her Father; but he saw withal that she appear'd more lovely in her mourning than when she departed to meet Maximus; whether it be that a mourning Habit seems like a cloud to set off the lustre of that brightness which breaks through it, or whether it heighten the Beauty of complexion by a favourable contrariety, Gildon condol'd with her in few words for the loss which she had sustain'd: and after he had given her leisure to sigh, and to bedew her cheeks with certain fresh tears, he began insensibly to enter upon the discourse which he had to make, and from thence to speak something of my Master's grief, of the violence of his passion, and how he had stollen from his victorious Army to throw himself at the feet of his Princess, and offer her his Dominions, his Forces and his life. At those words Oſavia seem'd surpris'd. At first she could hardly give any credit to Gildon. But so soon as she was convinc'd that Constantine was so near her, she moderated her grief, being without question satisfied with that evident proof of his love, which a Prince for whom she had no unkindness, came to give her, and with whom she only could be happy. Therefore it was not without some kind of delight that she gave Gildon leave to bring Constantine to her; and after that sending for the particular Virgin in whom she most confided, and who had likewise a great esteem for my Master's interest, she told her the news which she had receiv'd, to the end she might share in her occasions of gladness, as well as in her misfortunes. While Gadena was extolling the King of the Piſts, and was overjoyed that her fair Mistress had now so true a cause to give some respite to her melancholy, the passionate Constantine enters; but the mourning habit wherewith the Princess was clad, being the first object of his sight, recalls to his mind the memory of Gratian, and renews more than one sort of sorrow in his Soul; so that he drew near the Princess in such a manner, not so conformable to his love, as to the affliction of that fair Princess, for kneeling upon one knee before her, Great Queen, said he with a sigh, I am come to mingle my tears with yours, I have had a loss as well as you in the person of Gratian; and I wish to Heaven that you would repair the loss which you have sustain'd, as soon as might be, in the person of Aldroec: that the King of Armorica might once be satisfied, fair Queen, that the Glory which Constantine has won, was at length sufficient to make him worthy all that is good or great upon the earth.

He could say no more he was so turmoil'd with differing passions, while he beheld the countenance of Oſavia, which made the Queen of Albion her self sometimes keep silence; for she felt her grief augmented by the sight of the Prince, who had been so dear to the King her Father, so that the tenderness which she had for Constantine, coming to mix with the charms of a sweet melancholy, she seem'd in the Prince's eyes to be adorn'd with new allurements, and incomparably more lovely than ever she had been. He greedily overrun all the Beauties of that young Wonder, while his Soul instigated by new motions of love, still violently eager after that divine object, seem'd ready to leap out at the eyes of the passionate King. But grief in an instant lock'd it up a close prisoner again, and then the usual effects of sadness putting a restraint upon it, soon stopp'd the violence of his extasie. Oſavia observ'd those various thoughts in Constantine, notwithstanding all the sorrow that had prepossess'd her; and out of an acknowledgment which it no ways displeas'd her to make, she not only treated that great Prince with all the civility that his Royal Dignity could require, but also after such a certain obliging manner, as the extraordinary services which that Generous Prince had done her truly deserv'd. Yet could she not shew those signs which Constantine might have expected at another time; for although she had understood the crime that Gerouces had committed some time before, yet she was constrain'd to mention it at this first interview, inſomuch that she could speak without tears and sighs; and for that reason looking upon my Master with a languishment that would have mollified the hardest heart that ever was: Alas, Sir! said she, it is too true that you have had a very great loss; it is too true that Gratian— At the sound of that name, her fair lips not able to continue her discourse, gave passage to several sighs: And the afflicted Queen not having strength enough at that time, to express what she was about to say, was content to conclude in few words, what the violent texture of her grief had interrupted. Yes Sir, (said she in pursuit of what she begun) the affection which Gratian had for you, was not much inferior to the tenderness of your own Father. I wish to heaven, replied my Master, you had known what honourable proofs thereof his goodness gave me, greater than I could expect. The Letter which he wrote to me upon my departure from Sofimbra, replied me, inform'd me of it: For the report of what passed in the Assemblies at Troynovant, spread itself farther than only to reach my Ear. But, Sir, (said she beholding him, with a sweetness altogether charming) If the King of Albion, promised you his daughter and his Crown, Maximus has secured himself of the One, and Geronces possesses the Other. Ah! Madam, (replied the fierce Constantine interrupting her, with something of discomposure) What opinion have you of a Prince that adores you? Do you think they shall snatch from me my divine Queen? Shall Geronces, Maximus, or the two Emperours themselves, both united together against me, be sufficient to limit me from delivering you out of their hands? No Madam, no, it is not yet come to that pass, nor shall all the power of the Earth detain you from me, if you your self fair Queen, oppose not the will of Gratian, and the just pretences of your faithful Constantine.

This transportation of his mind no way displeas'd Octavia, and as she was about to have spoken, to give him some evident sign thereof; news came that Maximus was arrived, and desired to see her. She was surpris'd and troubled, while the Amorous Prince, keeping his eyes stedfastly fixed upon her countenance, took notice of every little motion, and was not a little pleas'd to observe a discontent, which he interpreted to his Advantage. He had the happiness also to see, that Octavia would not presently admit the visit of the Roman: True it is that she had afterwards a respect to his birth and quality, when she consider'd that he made that visit, only as he pass'd through the Town to go for Vienna: that she could hinder both him and Constantine from quarreling in her presence, and that the latter after all, would not be less powerful than he, in a City where Gildon, who was faithful to him, had so great a command of friends. Thus not finding it material to turn Maximus back, he entred, and perceiving that the Queen had been weeping; Is it possible, Madam, said he, that your grief should endure so long, and that you should abandon the most noble heart in the whole world, to the most irksome of all the passions. Rather tell me, (answered the Queen with less moderation than was usual) when you will put an end to this sadness, by applying a remedy to some part of my evils, that have been the cause of them all? You took me away by force, you detain me here in a foreign Country far from my own dominions: And you may well think that I cannot look upon the Banks of Rhosne, without longing after the Streams of Thameis. You mean the streams of the Loire, said he, for I suppose, Madam, 'tis in Armorica where you would fain be, if my love had not forced me to tie you to a more happy Rival. I confess, replied she being somewhat nettled, that the River of which you speak, does no less please me than that which runs by Troynovant, and were I near the banks of that River, I should be satisfied at least, in being within the Territories of a King, our Confederate and Ally, and among the Britains. But Madam, replied he, when you are among the Romans, and that you are serv'd and attended with all the respect, that is due to your Quality: have you any reason to complain, or can you be ignorant what is the difference between the two Nations. The King of the Picts, (said she with some signs of discomposure) I think has shew'd you the difference—— Good Madam, said he, don't praise your great Constantine so much, He will not be always fortunate, nor Maximus peradventure always unfortunate. It is true, replied my Master very coldly, that the brisk valour of some Barbarians, may have been too hard for the nimble, courageous, and well disciplin'd Romans: But Madam, the capricious humour of fortune, cannot long continue to favour to the damage of the Romans, a wild and savage Nation separated from the rest of the world, as unworthy humane society. At these words, Maximus calling a fierce look upon my Master, and taking up the dispute with a shrill voice; I am much surpris'd, said he, to hear you talk in that manner. Sir, answered my Master, it is according to the nature that your nation, the chiefest in the world, speaks most commonly of the British Islanders. I never heard any such discourse in Rome, (replied the other with a disobliging Aspect.) That may be, (said Constantine, without being any way moved) because they stand in such fear of you, as not daring to speak to the disadvantage of a Country, where your Ancestors were born, the Scepter of which Kingdom you would be glad to wield, were it offer'd you by the fairest Queen in the world. Yes Madam, (said he addressing himself to Octavia) Maximus would condescend to a marriage with your self, notwithstanding he is a Citizen of Rome, and perhaps by his care and diligence he might procure you the priviledge to be made free of the City, and the honour sometimes to fawn upon the daughter of Stilicon. Ab! Madam, this is too much, cryed Maximus: But as he was growing into a rage, the Queen taking up the dispute, turn'd the subject of the discourse; so that the two Rivals were more quiet and moderate. She requited them both severally not to break forth into passion, which they had no sooner promised to do, but Maximus went his way, not caring to stay, where persons seem'd to Act by consent, and shew'd but little kindness to him. But Constantine remained sometime after with the Queen, so that he related to her all that had happend to him, since his departure from Sosimbra: and beholding her with a tenderness, that plainly testified the tenderness of his heart; Fair Queen, said he, seeing that Gildon is my friend, and that in a manner he absolutely governs this City, he pleas'd to permit me to reconduci you back into Armorica. It is not my request, said she, that you should there make me happy. No Madam, replyed he, I require no such thing as yet, it behoves me first to revenge the death of the King your Father, it behoves me to establish you in his Throne, and that I act for your interest, before I think of my own. These obliging words were accompanied with looks, more than ordinarily passionate: However the scrupulous Octavia would not yield, giving my Master for answer, that she durst not undertake a journey with a Prince, whose passion for her was known over all the world. Could Maximus then have that advantage, said the Prince sighing, which you deny to Constantine? I never granted willingly, said she, to the Roman whom you speak of, that which you call an advantage: nevertheless he might sooner obtain it than the King of the Picts. For in short I am of opinion, that without a prejudice to the laws of civil manners, and hazarding my reputation, I might better travel a hundred Climates with a person, for whom I was never suspicied to have any kindness. But, said the blushing, I should not be so careful or cautious in Constantine's company: so that how innocent soever my intentions were, I should always fear lest the world might interpret things to the prejudice of my honour. Those last words rather rejoiced than disturb'd my Master, which made him bow with all respect in returning thanks to the Queen: However, not being yet entirely satisfied; Is it impossible, said he, for us, pursuing his first design, to take different roads to the Court of Aldrocc? No, no, Sir, said she, it cannot be, a resolution taken by consent, would be a perpetual trouble to me: For I should never think upon that secret intelligence, without disturbing my rest. Ab! Princess too severe, (cryed he, beholding her with eyes full of love and grief) how ingenious you are to torment your self, and render me unhappy. But after all this if we conceal our departure, and that no person in the world know of our designs, but our selves, can you find any reason then to be troubled? Yes Sir, replyed she, since I cannot be ignorant of it myself, and that it becomes me to fear the reproaches of my own heart, as much as the accusations of a thousand witnesses.

Constantine would no longer obstinately pursue a request, which he saw so unlikely to be obtain'd, nor durst he tarry longer with Octavia, for fear the persons of the house, to whom he was altogether unknown, might have any suspicion, should they remain together later than was convenient for Visitants to be in her chamber. Thereupon he went his way very melancholy, after he had conjur'd her to consider better than she had done, the proposal which he had made her to set her at liberty, out of a City that depended upon the Empire, to the end that the next day, she might be prepared with a more favourable answer. As he came a horseback, by reason that the Gaul's house was at a good distance off, he return'd in the same manner, being only attended by one Squire which Gildon had provided to shew him the way. As he rode back my Master ruminated all the way, upon those cruel scruples of the fair Queen, when of a sudden calling to mind the predictions of Altoruna; Ab Melusina, cryed he, I must but too plainly acknowledge that the obstinacy of the severe Octavia, is too powerful to be mov'd by the rules of your Art: You promised me that I should beat the Romans, and if I am not deceived, according to the order of things as you rehearsed them, I was to set my fair Queen at liberty, before I went to revenge the death of the King her Father: Yet for all that I am unhappily constrained to leave her in a City, under the power and command of my Rival. For in short, it neither behoves me, nor can I persuade her to return with me into Albion, and I tremble when I consider that the divine Octavia, will have no person to defend her from her Enemies. And therefore, said he, pursuing his discourse to himself, it will be better to forsake the Conquest of Aquitain, to delay the punishment of Geronces, rather is it far better that all things should go to wrack; than that the fair Princess should suffer any outrage. Let us renounce our enterprises and our anger, let us renounce our advantages and our honour, let us inziely sacrifice our interests to the interests of Octavia: and provided she be at liberty, provided she be happy, let us never take care for Constantine's happiness, let us never take care for a Prince, that lives in the world, but to serve that fair Queen whom he adores. But, said he, will the Romans stay till thou comest, at the head of a potent Army to the banks of the River Rhosne, without removing Octavia from the Country of the Cavarians? Then (cryed he sitting up his eyes to Heaven) to what extremities do I find my self reduc'd? So that if the Supreme Deity of afflicted innocency afflict me in any extraordinary means, into what an abyss of misfortunes shall I infallibly tumble headlong. With these thoughts was his mind busily employ'd, when the noise of several Horses awaked him out of his deep study, at what time he saw Maximus accompanied with five or six other persons directly coming to meet him, whether by accident, or out of any premeditated design he could not tell.

At the sight of Octavia's Ravisher, Constantine felt a fire which he had much ado to moderate, nor could the inequality of number have hinder'd him from assailing his enemy, had he not call'd to mind the request which the Queen had made him, and that that request had not taken place in his Soul as an inviolable command. His Rival less reserv'd, beholding him with a haughty pride, agreeable to the fierceness of his native Country, and to his high Dignity, I find thee to be a Stranger, said he with a lofty utterance, and thou hast but little knowledge of Maximus, when thou didst with so much presumption lose the respect which is due from thee to persons of his Rank and Birth. The provok'd Prince impatiently taking hold of his words, I know well enough, answered he with indignation, the person whom Pharamond and Constantine have displayed to all the world: and for the respect which you talk of, without examining which of us two is most oblig'd to pay it each to other: See here, (said he, laying his hand upon his Sword) that which shall soon decide the difference, without being compell'd to have recourse to any further illustration of the point.

Concluding those words, and encouraging his Horse with his voice and his spur, he flew upon Maximus like an impetuous whirlwind; immediately the violence of the Assaultants made the Stones and their Armour strike fire, so that the best part of the assistants were not a little terrified. The Roman, who was both active and courageous, sustain'd my Master's first onset with bravery enough; and that which became the ancient Gallantry of his Country was this, that the Knights in company with him, never stirr'd to assist him. And though the undaunted Constantine did not well know their number, yet he had taken so much notice of it, that being resolv'd to punish the Ravisher of the Queen of Albion, before he was environ'd on every side, or overwhelm'd by the multitude likely to come to Maximus's assistance, he redoubled his strength, and making a violent thrust at his enemy, he run his adversary quite through the right Arm: nor did the combatants thus leave off, the Street being large, and no person daring to come near them, so that they had both room and liberty enough to continue the dispute; whereupon the valiant King of the Picts, disdain'd to find so tedious a resistance, let drive so furiously at his enemy, that with the weight of the blow he struck Maximus's Buckler out of his hand, which falling heavy upon his Horse's head, made a deep and large wound. The fierce Beast exasperated with his hurt, stood an end, and finding himself ill at ease by reason of the blood that trickled down his eyes, he kick'd and flung; and at last throwing Maximus, that could no longer rule him, to the ground, fell backward upon his Rider. By reason of that fall, Maximus lay at the mercy of his generous enemy, but the Prince seeing his adversary no longer able to make any defence, forbore all further pursuit of his victory. And notwithstanding the hatred men have for their Rivals, Constantine had certainly succour'd his Competitor, but that he saw several people ready to help him, while others ran with their Swords in their hands to revenge his quarrel; yet this fresh danger no otherwise mov'd the haughty King, but only that it reinforce'd his strength, but darting looks of terrour at the multitude that advanc'd toward him, he beheld his inevitable ruine with a fearless constancy. Instead of considering what resolution to take, he left himself to be wholly guided by the motions of his own great heart, chusing rather to seek an honourable, though present death, than to wait for it by protracting his life for some few moments; covering himself therefore with his Shield, he flew upon the multitude with so much violence, that like thunder he spar'd none but those who made no resistance, overturning all that withstood his fury. While he kills, falls to the ground, receives wounds without feeling them; while he drives back his enemies, not desisting to gain one of the Gates of the City, he finds himself all in an instant in a place where the people throng'd together, and environ'd him on every side: then the image of a fair Queen from whom he was to be for ever separated, hovered before his thoughts, and notwithstanding the rudeness of the Combat, and his own fury, he could not forbear to sigh, feeling his Soul oppress'd with grief and tenderness. But notwithstanding the motions of his love, and to leave Octavia without support, and Gratian unreveng'd, he loses no time, takes no rest, while at the same time his valour burning with a brighter flame, shews it self more surprising and more formidable. Gildon's Esquire, who would have spoken in the behalf of that great King, though he knew not who he was, not being able to make the people heedless to his admonition, had fought for him; and he fell at his feet run through through and through at the very time that the second Troop of Cavarians were running against my Master.

Thus Constantine, Madam, the illustrious Constantine, alone, far from his Dominions, absent from his Arms, after so many Victories, so many Conquests, and so many fair hopes is just upon the very brink of perishing. But, Madam, he meets his death unknown, overwhelm'd by a mutinous multitude, nor does he fall but in the defence only of his life. He knew the greatness of the danger, he beholds a thousand Arms lifted up against his life, yet far from being astonish'd; he kills, terrifies; nor was he at the same time without some kind of pleasure, so fierce was his Soul, finding now that he had an opportunity to fight at the full extent of his courage, and without having any partner in the honour of his great Actions; and in the mean time that the blood trickled down from all parts under his Armour, he perceives that his Horse, quite tired and wounded in five or six parts, was almost ready to die; and at the same instant he discovered a new reinforcement coming to his enemies: seeing all this, he took no farther care but how to end his days with some more than ordinary Action, that might maintain the honour of his renowned name: wherefore observing that the fresh Cavarians that were coming seem'd to be more considerable in their quality than the former, he makes toward them, seeking for objects more worthy of his anger. Though he had no sooner made his passage toward them, but instead of a reinforcement of enemies he saw Gildon, who being followed by fifteen or twenty of the principal Officers of the City, cleft their way through the crowd to come to his succour. He perceiv'd that they prayed, promised, threatened, laid on; and in short, that they did all things that lay in their power to make the people keep off and retire, and to save the life of a generous Prince to whom he owed the preservation of his own: Cavarians, stupid Cavarians, he cry'd, what does your fury transport ye? Maximus is not dead, and though he had fallen by the hand of this invincible Soldier whom you assail, will you punish the Victor because he was the more valiant? Are ye so far the enemies of Virtue? Must a Stranger of necessity perish in your City, either by the hand of him that assaults him, or afterwards for defending his life against a multitude.

He held up his Sword ready to strike, and pronounc'd those words with so much vehemency, that the people of that Country, who love reason when it is made out to them, presently chang'd their minds, turning their hatred into an extraordinary admiration of that great personage, whose death they had but a little before resolv'd. The chief Leaders of the multitude declared to Gildon, that at first they only set upon that valiant person to have taken him, and sent him to Honorius, apprehending, that in letting him escape, the Emperour might lay the death of Maximus to their charge, and otherwise take all for falsehood and supposition that they should say for themselves. But Gildon urging his argument a little farther, How! said he, my Friends, with a very loud voice, will you be guilty of a fear so servile? Will you renounce for the Romans sake the dictates of humanity? Will you to please them assail the life of a valiant person, who has committed no other crime but that he defended himself by force against force? Forgo a complaisance so dishonourable: imitate the example of those generous Nations who have thrown off the yoke of a proud and haughty people. The Franks are ready to pass the Rhine, and Pharamond is coming to fix himself in those pleasant Countries that have lately call'd him to the Throne of his Ancestors. On the other side, the Burgundians cry for liberty; so that Gondioch carries that enchanting charm in his Standards; and while the Vandals are fallen into Betic Spain, the Goths threaten Italy with a second invasion: nor is this all, the famous Constantine has sent an Army into Aquitain, sufficient to make himself master of that Province, while he himself at the head of another Army more potent, lays claim to Gallia Narbonensis, being ready to come without resistance to the Banks of your River. Require the protection of that King, who can do you an injury while he defends you? Can the Romans do it, whom he has overthrow'n in two great Battels? Or can Stilicon do it, who has now lost his former vigour, and his power over his Master, who is now reported to be jealous of him? Shall it be the good Honorius, whose softness and sluggishness render him incapable of military Renown? Or at last, shall Constance do it, who is deeply engag'd in Spain, and whom the valiant Gonderic keeps in full employment upon the River Betis with a puissant Army of Vandals? No, no, my Friends, you need not be afraid of the Romans; if you doubt of the truth of my words, I will not leave ye, and my life shall answer for them: I will also farther undertake, that the noble person whom you have so unjustly assaulted, shall pardon the injury which he has receiv'd in this Town, and shall fight himself in your defence. What have you to fear, if this invincible Soldier shall take up your interest?

At those words the people, who were already repent of their violent proceedings, mov'd with his promises, interposed no objection; and all went over to him, committed to him the conduct of all things, and cryed out for liberty. Their new Captain went immediately and embrac'd the knees of his illustrious Benefactor, and having testified that it was to a great Prince that he payed all that respect, the most considerable among the multitude did the same, and every one prest'd to shew their diligence, for my Master's ease and refreshment. But the Amorous Constantine, instead of suffering his Arms to be taken off, presently prepared to speak: testifying in the first place his acknowledgments, to those that were most forward to assist him, and pursuing his harangue in the following words; "Generous Citizens, as I do not refuse your Aid, so I promise you my Assistance, but after I have assured you that you will not find it altogether unprofitable, it behoves me to let you know something more Advantageous. I will procure you the most honourable protection in the world: You have within these walls the young Queen of Albion, that Admirable Stranger; with whom it is reported you are also charm'd. Away then, let us go set her at liberty from the Tyranny of the Romans, who took her by force out of her own dominions: Let us go and demand the very support of your City, you know what are the King of the Pisirs's pretentions, that fair Princess and you need not doubt, but upon that confidence he will defend you against your Enemies. He will not only preserve your liberty entire, but he will also lade you with other large immunities. He will protect you with his Arms, and suddenly procure you a solid peace: Run and embrace this happiness, make haste to a fair Queen, to whom you may pay your homage without any contradiction, being a submission by which you will reap a hundred Advantages.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but finding that the people approved them by their loud shouts and cries, and were ready to follow him, he marched together with Gildon, directly toward the Palace where Ostavia resided. Entering into her Apartment he took notice, that all her Attendants were fear'd: And he had no sooner put his foot in the chamber, but he saw the charming Ostavia lying in a swoon upon her bed; while the Virgins that waited on her stood round about her, endeavouring to recover her out of her fit by all sorts of remedies. All they that followed Constantine retir'd out of respect, while the enamour'd Prince being only accompanied with Gildon, was so Amaz'd that he remain'd like a meer Statue: And by and by shewed no ordinary Symptoms of that despair that seized him. The Affectionate Gadens no sooner perceived him, but she appear'd extremely surprized, and seeing no person to be suspected near her; "Ah Sir, said she, for Heaven's sake draw neer, and since that Heaven has preserv'd you contrary to all hope, come here and cure an evil, of which you are the innocent cause; and recover the Queen from a weakness, whereinto the false news of your death has cast her.

Upon these words my Master came to himself, he felt at the same time joy and grief, so humourfome was the passion that reigned in his soul: And if he were glad to see that effect of kindness, in the divine person whom he ador'd, he could not but with an extreme affliction behold, that the proof of her Affection should prove injurious to her health. He ran toward her, he called her several times, leaning his head neer her fair cheeks which he bedewed with tears. But his voice more powerful than they, soon penetrated with a secret charm Ostavia's heart, and presently enlivened her. When Constantine's passion perceiv'd that the Queen began to come to her self; he was overjoyed in such a manner, that not being able to moderate his Extasie, he became more venturous than ever he had been. But though he were never so much overcome by his Passion, he durst not for all that presume to kiss those charming lips, which seem'd to be neither shut nor open, only to receive some part of his flame, but contented himself to take that liberty, upon one of her fair hands. He prested that white hand so Amourously hard: that the Princess began to open her eyes, yet instead of taking notice of my Master's presumption, as not having recover'd the freedom of her senses, she presently believed that she saw the shadow of her lover, so deeply was her imagination prepossessed, with the news of his misfortune. The Anticipation of that sad thought made her sigh, and while the tears fell from her fair Eyes; "Alas, cryed she, and was it so decreed, that I must be the unfortunate cause of his death? When Constantine interrupting her to clear her mistake; "I live fair Queen, he cryed, and you Advance me to an honour so high, that I can never dye till you cease to live. "How! do you live, Sir, (said she turning her fair Eyes, with a sweet and languishing aspect upon the Prince's face?) "Are you alive, and has Heaven, mov'd with my tears, delivered you from the Grave, that I might once more see your face? "Could you think Madam, replied he, that Heaven could consent to my death, or that it had so little care of a Princess altogether divine; as to deprive you of that Arm, that may one day establish you in your throne? I live Madam, and I owe my Life to your prayers and Gildon's friendship, I live to bring you tidings of your liberty, which the inhabitants of the City are coming to Assure you: And that they

“they are ready to shew you all the proofs of their Affection and fidelity, that you can stand “in need of, during your residence in their Country.

This familiar converse was so obliging, and enlivened with so much passion, that Celtor and Gadens apprehending that it was not very profitable, toward the recovery of both their healths, made hast to interrupt them. Gildon represented effectually to the King of the Picts, that it was very necessary for him to retire to his bed, and to have his wounds lanced, and the Princess joining her prayers to so just an Admonition, with much ado he was constrained to leave her. So soon as the Cavarians had delivered their message, in order to their design in hand, they behaved themselves with a becoming grace, and the Queen accepted of their submission with an extraordinary goodness. They went away to well satisfied, that they resolved to expel all the Romans out of their City: so that it was not without great favour shewed him, that Maximus notwithstanding his dignity and his wounds, obtained leave to stay there till he were perfectly cured; he obliging himself to depart, as soon as he should be able to sit a Horse. My illustrious Master had then the pleasure to see, that his Rival was forc'd to give way to him in all places; but he found a more exquisite content, in the daily visits of the Queen of Albion, and the observance of her care and diligence. For that diligence of hers more powerful than the Chirurgeon's Art, produced so good effects, that the King did not keep his Chamber above fifteen days: And after that he thought of nothing else but of revenging Gratian's death, and reestablishing Ostavia. Not but that he was very unwilling to leave that fair Princess, but knowing the separation was only for her interest, at length he determin'd to be gone, having before he went made it his request, that she would leave the Province of the Romans. But she would not consent, her mind not being yet cured of those former scruples, beside that the people of Avignon testified so much zeal to guard her, that Constantine was constrained to leave her in their Country. Nevertheless before he stirr'd, he saw Gildon made Governour of the City and Territories belonging to it. And yet notwithstanding all this prevention and wariness, he had not absented himself from Ostavia, had he not observed that the Romans were not very strong in that Country, either to march against the Cavarians, or to besiege their Capital City. And so believing that he should as soon be in a condition to defend Avignon, as Honorius should be to Assault it, he was the less grieved when he took leave of the Queen. And that which gave him something more of consolation, was that she permitted him to write to her. Most of the young Gentlemen of noble Families, resolv'd to follow him, being overjoyed that they had taken that resolution, especially when they knew the real quality of the personage, whose valour they before admir'd. My Master was unwilling that so many brave Cavaliers, should leave a City where he left his Ostavia: but when he considered that they would be as so many hostages, to answer for the fidelity of their parents, he no way oppos'd their intention. That noble Troop thus upon the way, us'd all possible diligence and wariness in their march: And being come within the Territories of Armorica, Constantine dispatch'd a Courier to Ostavia, to give her an Account of his journey, and to entertain her with that passion, of which Lovers think they can never talk enough. At length he went to the King his Father, to whom he gave an extraordinary satisfaction, nor did the divertisements at that time, solemniz'd at Court upon the return of the Prince, hinder the vigilant Constantine from minding the Affairs of a Queen, whose image was always present in his mind.

He sent orders to Lenox to advance toward Troynovant, and to Constant to enter Gallia Norbonensis, and to draw toward the Country of the Cavarians. As for himself he stay'd as little as might be in Armorica, for no sooner had the generous Aldroec given him his consent to cross into Albion, but the Ships which he had Appointed for that service being ready, he set sail with a wind very favourable for his passage. At the same time also, he had received a very obliging Answer from the Queen, so that he did not at all question the fortunate issue of an enterprize, which he had so luckily begun. Geronces however expected him with a greater force and a more resolute power of Souldiers, than in justice ought to have Attended a person so criminal: So that my Master could not land his men till after a bloody fight, wherein he obtained at length a very Advantageous Victory, more then three Thousand of the Rebels were slain. Geronces whose fury led him where-ever his presence was necessary, received a wound from Constantine's own hand, insomuch that not being able to withstand that Valiant Prince, he fled with the best part of the Cavalry, and gained Troynovant, which opened her Gates to him, by reason he had there left the principal of his Accomplices in Command. The King was incens'd, and not being willing to lose the least moment of time, nor to give Geronces leisure to settle the peoples minds, he march'd without delay toward the Rebels sanctuary: Yet being loth to destroy Celtor's subjects, he sent his Heralds to the Troynovantines, to invite them to peace, requiring only, that to signalize their fidelity to their Queen, instead of giving protection to the Rebels, they would surrender them up to the Law. The mad Geronces perceiving that the admonitions of Constantine began to make some impression, caused the Messengers to be cruelly murthered, and cast their mangled Bodies from a high Tower, in sight of his Army. For he violated the Law of Nations, by committing that new crime, to shew that he made little reckoning of a Prince to whom he durst offer such an affront, besides that, he thereby thought to engage the Citizens of Troynovant more strongly to his interests, causing them to despair of pardon, by an action so opposite to the answer which they ought to have given. The King enrag'd at so abominable a piece of villany, was resolv'd to die, or carry the place, and that speedily. He exhorts his men, and gives orders to his Ships to attacke the Post.

Then it was, Madam, that the valiant Prince of Suevia came and admitted himself into Constantine's Army, where he perform'd a hundred Actions worthy of eternal memory. But as it is not his History that I now repeat, it shall suffice to say, that my Master and Viridomar signalized themselves in such a heroick manner, that they immediately had a reciprocal esteem one for another, and entred into a strict league of mutual friendship. But to return to Constantine, you must know that they were to mine on the one side, and to raise their Battering Rams on the other; and being resolv'd to mount the Walls himself, he took a Ladder, and followed by all the Voluntiers together with some of the nimblest and stoutest of his Soldiers, covered with his Buckler, and having only his Sword in his hand, while our Archers and Slingers continually plyed those that defended the Walls. Nor could it be avoided, but that a prodigious Shower of Stones and Arrows slew many of the Assailants, overturn'd many of the Ladders, and many times made that shake upon which the hardy Constantine stood; nevertheless, being one of the most vigorous men in the world, besides that his anger reinforc'd his strength, at last he got quite up, by such prodigious performances as seem'd almost supernatural, and leaping nimbly upon the Wall, he continued there for some time alone, and among a great number of his Enemies. But far from losing his courage or his reason, he made so good use of his Sword and Buckler, that not only he made a stout resistance till others came to his assistance, but kill'd several with his own hand, who were so rash as to cope with him. He was no sooner aided by those who were most diligent and fortunate to follow him, but he forc'd a good part of the Rebels to leap off the Walls into the City, while others felt the fury of his blows, till Lenox appear'd with the Body of the Army, and that the Rams had beat down a part of the Wall. Then the people cryed for Quarter, then they cryed out that one Britain should not fight against another, that they would revenge Gratian's death, punish his Murtherers, and receive Constantine for their King. The Prince, who by the Laws of War might have put all to the Sword, caus'd his men to enter the Breach, to terrifie the Troynovantines, and to make himself Master of the City; and notwithstanding his clemency, finding himself obliged to shew some severity to satisfie his other virtues, he commanded a diligent search to be made after the Murtherers of Gratian, and promised rewards to those that should apprehend them. And it being the humour of the common people to be fickle, the Britains not having more constancy than other people, now fell upon those whom a little before they acknowledged for their Leaders, so that many were slain, and most of the principal Officers of the Sedition being taken, were laden with Fetters, and cast into prison. Geronces, with some few of his Confidants sav'd himself through a Vault which he had caus'd to be made under ground, and posted to Locrinia, who, under another name without any attendance, was fled to a House which being neither strong nor guarded, nor in a good situation, would not in all likelihood be much suspected. Constantine chiefly desired to sacrifice to the memory of Gratian that Victime which had escap'd him, and to that purpose resolving to pursue him, sent away part of the Cavalry with orders to search every where that they could apprehend or imagine he might have taken Sanctuary. In the mean time, after he had appeas'd the troubles of the City, he caus'd Geronces's House to be pull'd down, and laid level with the very foundations, and not contented that it should be a spectacle of ruine and desolation, he made it a place of ignominy, where afterwards all the most criminal Malefactors among the prisoners were executed; causing a Pyramid to be erected, with an Inscription of their names and crimes, for a memory to posterity. After that he applied himself to the regulation of the Government, making all the other Cities after the example of Troynovant to acknowledge Ostavia's Sovereignty. Nevertheless the people ceased not to beseech him to accept of the Crown himself, and without delay to take possession of a Kingdom that Gratian had bequeath'd to him. But Constantine, who came to fight under Ostavia's Banners, and who only liv'd for her sake, far from any pretence of enlarging his Dominions, missions began to be angry with those that press'd him to it. And when he wrote to the said Queen to give her an account of his Transactions, it was in these following expressions, if I am not very much deceiv'd.

Constantine to the Queen of Albion.

TROYNOVANT, Madam, is reduc'd; the King your Father's death is reveng'd; and his Throne, if it be not the chief Throne of the world, will not be the less renowned and flourishing when the most happy nation upon earth shall be overjoyed to see the fairest Queen in the world seated under its Canopy. When will it be my fortune to be inseparably tyed to that incomparable Queen? When shall I continually admire her Beauties, and sigh out my affections at her feet? Alas, for all other happinesses are of little value in respect of that. My Victories and my Conquests please me not in this Island, when my divine Princess is in Gallia; and the most happy success of my Arms will never move me, unless it may serve to reestablish you in your Kingdom, and render me worthy of those honourable claims which I make to your person. In short, Madam, methinks I do not live but for you. In your presence I find my heart entirely satisfied. But depriv'd of your sight I am nothing but melancholy it self, and my Soul is disturbed in the midst of my Triumphs. The most favourable success of all my enterprizes makes a far less impression upon my Soul, than my misfortune; and should you question the truth of what I say, I should be yet far more miserable.

He was going to give this Letter to one of his Esquires; but, as Lovers always thinks they have never said enough, the King of the Picts saw that he had not written with that exactness which he intended. And for that reason he added this Postscript, where however his love ceased not to predominate, so absolutely was that passion Mistress of his Soul.

You are earnestly expected, Madam, in your Dominions, every one prepares to receive you; and I am unfortunately constrain'd still to tarry here, to keep your subjects in subjection. I yield to Constant the honour to attend you upon the Banks of the Rhosne, and thence to conduct you into your own Kingdom. But, my fair Queen, when you think upon the magnificent preparations which they are making for your reception: for Heaven's sake think upon your Constantine, nourish in your heart a disposition never to forget him. Let not the acclamations of your Subjects, the pomp that they will display at your return, hinder you from casting your eyes, those fair eyes that command my destiny, upon the most humble, the most faithful Captive that ever followed the Chariot of his Vanquisher.

Thus Constantine at length concluded, maugre that passion which could never be silent. He also wrote to Prince Constant, and the Letter to regulate the several Dominions that pay'd their homage to his Scepter, he sent for the most considerable among the Britains, the Picts and the Hybernians. But while thus he bestows his time upon weighty affairs, while Lennox, who was appointed to attend the Queen on the behalf of her Subjects, prepares for his departure with a magnificent train, Constantine understands that Geronces and Loerinia were escap'd into Gallia, notwithstanding the care he had taken to stop all the Posts: and a few days after an answer was brought him from Octavia in these words.

The Princess Octavia to King Constantine.

I Understand with infinite satisfaction, that you have taken Troynovant. But, Sir, surprisal had no share in my joy, for I am too well accustomed to hear of your renowned Actions, to wonder that you gain Victories, or take Towns. I always thought what you went to assail, would not long hold out against the Conquerour of the Romans, and that a great King, who had overthrown so many Armies, subdued so many Nations, would easily reduce a company of Mutineers to their duty. Yes, Sir, Troynovant owes you a perfect obedience, the King my Father has chosen you for his Successor, and Octavia her self yields you up all her right, and gives her voice for your Establishment. Reign then, Sir, for my repose and for the honour of our nation: they are a haughty people, and it is fit that only such a Prince as your self should govern them, and that a formidable Arm should wield the Scepter, my hand is too weak to hold it. But after all this shall I not reign your companion, if you continue faithful? For if you change your mind, what will a Throne avail, when my life will become miserable.

The enamoured Constantine read those inestimable Characters, which the fair hand of his Mistress had drawn, a hundred times over. He kissed them, he stopt at every word, he examin'd the force of the Sence, and found at the close of the Letter something so obliging, that he felt those transpartations of joy, which he had never proved before. Divine Octavia, crycd he, can you believe that a heart devoted to yours, can be capable of change? What Beauty, how charming soever, can rob you of your conquest? No, no, fair Queen, it is impossible to want a constancy for you; be but faithful your self, and Constantine, the most passionate of all your lovers, shall be without all question the most happy among men.

The End of the Third Book of the Eighth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

How extraordinary soever Constantine's joy appear'd to be, he was not for that the more remiss in business, sending me away to the Picts, and Lisca to the Island of the Hibernians: Nor was he forgetful of those Britains, who had been faithful to Gratian. For besides the many other benefits that he bestowed upon them, some he plac'd in the chief Magistracy of the Cities, others he made Commanders in the Army. But while all things seem'd to tend toward a happy Conclusion, he received news that did not a little perplex him: For he understood that Gerences had joyn'd himself with Maximus at Vienna, that he was very liberal to the Soldiers, and that with the money and jewels of a King cruelly murder'd, he had given a new life to the Roman Affairs: So that they were near ready to bring another Army into the field, to find Constantine more work. Thereupon my Master fearing the Queen of Albion's safety, prepar'd to repass his Army into Gallia: he ordered Lenox to stay in Troynovant, and committed the government of the Kingdom to him. But while he felt a secret melancholy which he could not vanquish, neither by the hurry of employment, nor the force of his reason, he received the following Letter.

Gildon to King Constantine.

I Am robb'd of her whom I love: nor can I any longer give you an account of that treasure which you entrusted in my custody. In short, Sir, the Queen of Albion is departed from this City. After this, can you expect from an afflicted person, words sufficient to express his misfortune? My shame is too great, and my grief too insupportable to permit me to give you the full relation; and therefore I have entrusted the Gaul who brings your Majesty this Letter to give you a more ample account of this fatal accident.

Constantine having read this Letter, stood like a Statue, he cast his eyes several times upon the Paper, and then he found it was not without cause, that despair had been so long brooding in his heart; he rear'd his eyes to Heaven, as if from thence he required a divine Princess, of whom the celestial powers ought to have taken a more particular care, since they had fram'd her with so many extraordinary advantages. As a Lover he sighs, complains, and examines the proceedings and carriage of Gildon: but as Constantine he banishes all thoughts that might be injurious to that generous Stranger; and instead of being dejected for this new affliction, he rowzes up his fury against the Romans, whom he verily thought to be the authors of his misfortune. He beheld the messengers sent by Gildon with such a discomposure of mind, and so many symptoms of impatience, as visibly testified his real desire to understand what his Master had left unrelated, to which the Gaul gave him the following satisfaction.

“Sir, it is in vain for me to say any thing of Gildon's tormenting grief, since it is impossible for me to describe it; only give me leave to tell you, that after your departure he took all the care imaginable to divert the Queen of Albion, and to allay that melancholy which your absence occasion'd; there was a fair Lady whom he passionately lov'd, who was inseparably in the Princess's company, and that few other persons were admitted into that beautiful society; and certainly they might have there spent many a pleasing hour, either in discourse, in reading, or in taking the air, had the absence of your Majesty permitted them those innocent pastimes. These illustrious personages were wont to take the air forth of Avignon in a little Island which the Rhofne encircles, about a Bow-shot from the Wall; and though it were within sight of the Walls, Gildon never fail'd to accompany the Queen, as also to take along with him a strong Guard: yet all this wariness could not prevent his misfortune; for about ten days since the Queen of Albion was carried away by force together with the fair Lady whom he so much lov'd, they were all together in the Island of which I have made mention, when a certain Stranger approaching my Master, under pretence of begging some favour at his hands, gave him the following Letter.

Maximus to Gildon.

IF thou art not as cowardly as perfidious, thou wilt not refuse to follow the Soldier who gives thee my Letter. He will bring thee where I am, with only a Sword and a Target; and therefore bring no other Arms, if thou wilt not render thy self unworthy the honour which I offer thee to fight me, thou wilt not delay to give me satisfaction. Thou art not ignorant of my quality, nor of the injury which I have received, nor what satisfaction I expect. Come then, and let not the fear of losing thy pretended Government be any excuse; for that will be but a vain one, since thou art not desired to stir from the City which thou hast caused to revolt from us. For in short, I stay for thee at the very Gates of the Town; 'tis in the view of thy accomplices that I will punish thee, and where I expect to take that revenge which my Country and my love demand.

“He had no sooner read those words, but his eyes sparkled, and the haughty language of Maximus so incensed him, that he commanded the unknown Soldier to give him the Shield which he wore himself, and to bring him to his Master. No sooner did the Stranger lead the way, but Gildon followed him apace; and though he left the Queen of Albion, and the person whom above all others in the world he loved best, he minded it not, being wholly bent to encounter Maximus, and make him repent of his threatening Bravado's. True it is, he did not see any appearance of any danger that could happen to those fair and noble personages; for besides that, he did not absent himself but a short while, he was assured that whatever fortune befel him in the Combat, that they would in an especial manner be taken care of by the Cavarians: so that he went to the place where the grandeur of his courage call'd him, without taking so much as one of his Friends along with him, not believing that a Roman, such as Maximus was, could be guilty of treachery. Nor would he return to the Queen, for fear lest the disturbance of his countenance might make her suspect a design which honour oblig'd him to keep secret; besides that, he was ashamed to appear before Ladies at a time that he was to go seek an enemy that had sent him such a lofty challenge. Nor was he far distant from his adversary, but Gildon was extremely surpris'd, when instead of Maximus he beheld a Stranger, whose Physiognomy he had never seen, nor was he a Roman. His proportion was tall, and there was to be seen in his countenance a wild fierceness, mingled with grief and melancholy. This unknown person no sooner perceiv'd Gildon, and understood who he was, but looking upon him with a kind of villainous satisfaction to himself: I am overjoyed, said he, that my plot has so far taken to Maximus's advantage; and that after it has been my good fortune to proclaim Maximus Emperour at Vienna, I shall be yet more happy to put Gildon into his hands. It may be, (replied my Master, briskly drawing his Sword) you will not so easily accomplish your design; for Gildon knows how rather to die honourably than—— We would let thee die, (said the Stranger, interrupting him) but as we have no need of it we must preserve thee, notwithstanding thy pretended generosity.

Upon these words, eight or ten men, who lay hid in a little Thicket of Owers and Poplars, rush'd out to encompass and apprehend him; my Master got his back to a Tree, and while he defended himself by the assistance of the Tree, and with his Buckler, the impatient Stranger commanded his Assassins not to spare him, but to kill him whatever advantage they lost by his death. And certainly they had executed their cruel command, when on a sudden the Island began to ring with the noise of several cries, calling out for Gildon to come to the assistance of Queen Octavia, whom they had taken away. Upon which more than twenty Gauls in search of their Commander, came running from several parts to the place where their help was required; so that the Stranger seeing so many got together, and perceiving that the fair prey which he chiefly aim'd at, was already seized, he made all the haste he could to be gone, and with his company presently got into certain Boats that lay about a slight shot off, and immediately commanding them to row with all their might, by the force of their Oars, and the rapidness of the Stream, the perfidious Traytors soon got out of sight. Immediately Gildon ran to the place where he had left the Queen of Albion, but she was gone, nor was it possible for him to pursue those Ravishers, there not being a Boat to be had, being always us'd to pass the River in a great Ferry-Boat, for Octavia's better convenience, who always rode in her Chariot: so that he could only abandon himself to a remedyless grief, enduring at the same time that which he rightly judg'd you would endure upon the sad tydings of so cruel an accident. Unutterable were his lamentations, without taking the least notice of his wounds, nor could we have got him out of the Island, had we not laid before him the impossibility to recover the Queen, and the danger we were in, lest the enemy, of whose cunning contrivances we had so sad experiments, should have sown the seeds of Sedition and Rebellion among the Cavarians. Gildon gave little ear to us at first, but we press'd the same things so often over and over, and urg'd them with so many arguments, that at length we prevailed with him to return to the City. Thither he caused one of the Assassins to be brought, who being run through the Body, could not follow the rest of his company: they were about to take care of his wounds, but the remembrance of his crime, and the presence of death which he saw before his eyes, caused him to put by the charitable hands of those that were busie to dress his hurts: Suffer a miserable wretch to die, (cry'd he, with a disturbance that appear'd something terrible) leave a Parricide forlorn, that has assisted the murderer of his Sovereign, and who also came to assist him to carry away the Queen of Britain; that innocent Princess was destin'd to the same barbarous end as her Father, had not the passion of Constantine and Maximus preserv'd her, and had he not found it necessary for him to make use of Octavia to shelter him from the Arms of those two Lovers. How! cry'd cry'd Gildon, was it Gerences that commended me to be slain, and who at this time detains the Queen of Albion in his power? " Upon that Exclamation the Stranger beholding my Master, with all the earnestness he could, and discerning him by his face; " Yes, answered he, " it was Gerences himself, who the other day over-perswaded the scrupulous Maximus, and " caused him to write that short letter, which I delivered into your hands. The Roman " was very unwilling, to set his hand and name to a counterfeit contrivance, so little conformable to the virtues of his Nation. But the Britain who understood that you were " always diligent to attend upon Octavia, laid the matter so convincingly before him, that " there was but that one way to seduce you from your care, that Maximus consented at last " to send that pretended challenge, on condition that the Queen of Albion should be seized " on, nor be in the hands of any but Romans, and that they should carry her no where but " into a City of the Empire. Gerences was resolved to manage the enterprise himself, but " for fear of failing in his word to Maximus, whose friendship he sought mainly to preserve, " and for fear of terrifying Octavia with his odious presence, which might make her resolve " rather to dye than yield to force, he order'd Maximus's soldiers to seize the Princess, while " he himself drew you into the Ambuscado, which he had laid for your surprise.

The Stranger had striven so much to disburthen his heart, that his weakness increased upon him, and as if he had only stayed to finish his relation, that he might merit by the confession of his crime, to dye without infamy, he expir'd just as he had uttered this Relation.

You are also to understand, (said Gildon's Officer pursuing his information) that as I was just upon my departure from Avignon, there was brought to the City a young Virgin, who was hurt in the bustle wherein Octavia was surpriz'd, whom at the entreaty of the Princess, they had sent back in a supernumerary Boat which they made no use of. Gildon went to visit that Virgin, who inform'd him of several circumstances, which it will be superfluous to repeat: She gave him also a Letter, which the Queen of Albion had recommended to her care, that it should be delivered to your Majesty.

The King greedily opening the Letter which Gildon's Squire presented him, not without eminent signs of disturbance, read these words.

The Princess Octavia to King Constantine.

I Am once more violently forc'd away, I am upon the Rhofne, but whither they intend to carry me, or how I shall be able farther to keep a correspondence, as yet I cannot understand. However, Sir, I must tell you this, that it is absolutely necessary for you, to accept of the Crown of the King my Father, that the Romans may be sensible of that union of the two people which they so much stand in fear of. What will you not be able to obtain with so formidable a power? Will they refuse a Princess that has no more Kingdoms to give, and whom you may perhaps cause them to restore by open force? Farewell, I shall be surpris'd if I write longer, only do what I order you, and whatever alteration shall befall me in my fortune, be you assured that no change shall happen in my heart.

Would to God Madam, (cry'd the enamour'd Prince, killing the last words of the Letter) would to God you would preserve this constancy for the unfortunate Constantine, you would render him the most glorious among men; nor should all the forces of the West, hinder me from wresting out of Honorius's hands a treasure, which is of a value infinitely beyond his Empire: I must succeed Gratian because you command it, however I shall not ascend the Throne but only to establish it, and then quit it again to fix you there.

Having spoken in this manner, he considerably rewarded Gildon's Squire, and sent him back to his Master with a most obliging answer, and a positive promise to be upon the banks of the Rhofne, with an Army sufficient to rescue Octavia, and defend the Cavarians from all the forces of Rome. To this purpose he coveted so passionately to repass into Gallia, inasmuch that that desire, joyned to the resolution which he had to obey the Princess, and suffer himself to be Crowned King of Great Britain, obliged him to hasten the Ceremony, and to omit that sumptuous magnificence, that ordinarily displays it self upon such occasions. For besides that he would not admit of any pomp, or pastimes in the Absence of his Princess, he knew that such tedious preparations, would too long delay his journey. He was no sooner in a posture to depart, but Lisus and my self attended him with five or six hundred, dred, of the young Nobility among the Piſis and Hibernians: For we eaſily engaged them to follow the King, the Attractive Charms of whoſe perſon and virtues, had obliged to the ſame duty, above a thouſand Britains of moſt eminent quality, not only in Troynovant, but had drawn them alſo from all the Provinces of Albion. Thus he might with more ſafety be abſent from his Kingdoms, having in his Army ſo many hoſtages, of the moſt conſiderable quality and families in the three Nations. At that time there was a report ſpread abroad, that after the death of the Empreſs Thermaſtia, the daughter of Stilicon that proud favourite, and his Son Eucherius were both ſlain by order of the Emperour: That the Franks, the Burgundians, and the Vandals, threatned the Provinces of the Empire with a terrible invaſion, that Alaric ſeeing that Honorius made no haſt before the concluſion of the Truce, to give him that ſatisfaction which he had promiſed, prepar'd to re-enter Italy, and that the Gauls trembled at the very name of Conſtantine. It was further rumour'd, that the Romans had no other hopes than in the valour of Conſtance, and that it was upon him only that they had caſt their eyes, upon whom to confer the charge of repelling that inundation of many nations, which was ready to pour it ſelf forth upon the Weſtern Empire. And indeed Conſtantine believed, that the Enemy had but only that perſon to oppoſe againſt him; and not imagining that other Captains alone, could retard the liberty of Oſiavia, he thought of nothing elſe but of fighting with him for that fair Lady, reſolving to ſtay for Conſtance, and with him to put the ſhare of the greateſt part of Europe, to the deciſion of one Battel. So ſoon as he came into Gallia, and had joyned himſelf with Prince Conſtant, neither Armies nor Towns could put a ſtop to his Conqueſts, ſo that in a ſhort time he reduced under his obedience, all thoſe Countries that acknowledged Narbonne for their Capital City, he overthrew Maximus again, and enlarged his Dominions to the very Province of the Romans. After this, hearing that Jovian, who was the Emperour's Lieutenant in the Country of the Vivarians, made great preparations, and that the Queen of Albion was in Arles. He ſent Conſtant againſt thoſe Forces which the Romans were raiſing, and he himſelf marched directly toward that City, within whoſe walls he believed all his happineſs to lye incloſed. Before he began the ſiege, he gave a viſit to Gildon whom he found abed, where a deep melancholy had kept him for ſome months, as being tainted with the venom of a ſlow-working poiſon. It is not neceſſary for me to repeat the diſcourſe that paſſed at that enterview, between thoſe two afflicted Lovers, nor the particulars of a war that has made ſo loud a noiſe and were perhaps no leſs worthy to be taken notice of, than many others with which I am obliged to entertain your attention more exactly. Know then Madam that Jovian came over to our party, in regard that he, though the Lieutenant of Honorius, had made thoſe levies with no other intent, than to take Advantage of thoſe troubles, and to uſurp the ſoveraignty of thoſe Countries of which he was then Governour. And that Conſtant had no ſooner treated with him in the King's name, but he marched for Lyons to drive Maximus, and Geronces out of that place. Where we underſtood ſoon after, that valiant Prince being aſſiſted by Dagobert and Antenor, had ſo vigorouſly purſued them, that Geronces no longer finding any Sanctuary for his beloved Princeſs, adviſed Maximus to quit Gallia, and to retire into Spain among his Relations, who were in a condition to relieve him. It was reported that the Roman was unwilling to hearken to him at firſt, for fear of abſenting himſelf too far from Oſiavia, till Geronces laid before him, that he could no longer hold out in thoſe Provinces, where having taken upon him the Title of Emperour; the Romans were no leſs his Enemies than the Britains. That inſtead of being able to defend the young Queen of Albion, he would never get her out of their hands, unleſs he made uſe of Stratagem rather than open force. That he himſelf would undertake, to have the Princeſs conveyed into Spain, provided that Maximus would conſent, to let him carry Queen Loocrinia along with him. He added entreaties to the Arguments which he had urged, and ſo well made out the intereſt which he had, to diſpoſe of Oſiavia at his pleaſure, that Maximus yielded, and marched directly for the Pyrenian Hills. Geronces ſtayed among the Gauls to plague Conſtantine, and while that victorious Prince made all things yield to his Conquering Arms, the perfidious Traitor fought by all the plots and contrivances that he could deviſe, to overturn and ruine his propriety. You have heard Madam, that the valiant King of the Britains took Arles, that afterwards he marched againſt the famous City of the Maſſilians, which after a very ſtout reſiſtance he carried by force; ſo that he was abſolute Maſter of all thoſe fair Provinces, from one Sea to the other. But perhaps you may not know theſe circumſtances, which it is neceſſary for me to relate, that you may the better apprehend the ſequel of my diſcourſe. Beſides that I am oblig'd to let you know, that my invincible Maſter never behav'd himſelf more valiantly than in that memorable Battel, where the Britains were forced to yield to the Romans, where Conſtantine however could not be ſaid to be vanquish'd.

quish'd by them, as our enemies themselves confess'd. Know then, Madam, that my Master did not find in Arles the fair Princess whom he sought, but understanding that she was in the strong and stately City of the Massilians, he presently besieged that place of importance, and took it by plain force before the Romans could relieve it. But what could he not perform when he fought for Oëavia's liberty? So that at last Fortune ceases to persecute him, granting him at length the precious reward of all his hopes. In brief, he delivered his fair Queen, he saw her, he threw himself at her feet, and did her homage for all the Crowns that he wore, and return'd her thanks for all the victories he had won. He was contented to find with her the faithful Gadens, and a most beautiful Lady nam'd Merofida, whom, as I have told you, Gildon passionately lov'd; but while he was transported with joy, and thought of nothing else but how to divert his Princess, and conduct her safe into her Dominions, he had advice that the famous Constance was marching toward him through the Alexandrines and Lucernois, with all the speed he could make, and an Army of fifteen thousand Horse, and sixty thousand Foot.

Upon this news the King of the Britains prepar'd to receive the Vanquisher of many Kings like an experienc'd Captain, and to make good against him the renown which he had won in all other enterprises. On the other side Constance confess'd that he had to deal with the most terrible enemy of the Roman people: That Constantine was more formidable than all the Alarics, Radagaises or Acaces; and that the Britains, the Picts, and the Hybernians were more to be fear'd under their valiant Prince, than the Goths, Herules, or Vandals under any of their Captains. These two renowned Warriours having an extraordinary esteem one for another, and knowing the importance of the War which they undertook, which all the West look upon as the decision of its Empire, resolv'd to display to the view of all Europe all the knowledge of their Art which they had acquir'd by long experience. In the mean while Constantine minding above all things the safety of the Queen of Albion, and judging that if Constance got the better, the City of Massilia would be sooner attacked than Arles, convoyed Oëavia to the latter place, breaking down the Bridges, and cutting down several great Trees in the way, to hinder Constance's march. He also reinforced the Garrison of Arles, the Government whereof he gave to a certain Gaul, named Ergastus, whom Jovian had sent to him with four thousand Horse, during the Siege of that place. Several Skirmishes pass'd with different success, but with equal Generosity; for the two Generals always spoke kindly one of another, and sent their Prisoners every day back without ransom. At this time also Gildon came and joyn'd with us, but having great contests with Antenor and Dagobert, the grounds whereof it would be too tedious to relate, the two Gauls not receiving that satisfaction which they expected from Constantine, and which perhaps they had as little reason to pretend to, treated underhand with Constance, and revolted to the Romans with above ten thousand men. Constantine was somewhat vex'd to see that Fortune began already to concern her self in a war, the event whereof he would have had to depend only upon courage and military experience; and therefore knowing his Adversary, who had receiv'd so great an advantage, was strong enough before, besides that for his valour he was to be compared to one of the greatest Captains among the ancient Romans, he resolv'd not rashly to hazard a Battel. To that purpose he remov'd his Camp more than once, and amus'd his Enemies with Skirmishes, resolving to stay till Jovian came to joyn his Forces with his, according to his promise. Constance on the other hand, before he would hazard a Battel upon which he knew the fortune of the Empire did depend, he survey'd all the advantages of the ground himself, and march'd from place to place, that he might seize the most advantageous Posts to encamp his Army. But hearing of fresh Supplies that were coming to us, he considered no longer, but fought all ways to provok us to fight before Jovian came with his Recruits, which were all ready to march in the Country of the Vivarians. The fierce Constantine, more eager to seek than avoid all opportunities of giving Battel, suffering himself to be led by the Grandeur of his Courage, would no longer delay time, but resolv'd to receive his Enemies like a person who had been accustomed to such accidents, and yet to vanquish.

But, Madam, before I describe to you this famous Battel, that has made such a noise in the world, I am oblig'd to advertise you that I shall speak no more but what the Romans confess themselves, nor should I relate those particulars which are known to all the world, were it not my aim to shew you that Constantine was always invincible; but only now the Lover of the Queen of Albion lost the Britains the victory, that he might see whither his love call'd him; for the Prince understanding the Evening before the Battel, that Oëavia was extraordinary sad, he was so little Master of his passion that he could not refrain from going to visit his pensive fair one: he took Gildon along with him, and found her in so deep deep a melancholy, as if she already had had some foreknowledge of those misfortunes that afterwards befel us. Constantine remain'd a long time with her to comfort her, while the skillful Constance shrewdly observing that our wonted fierceness did not gladden in our eyes as formerly, and that there was not that diligence in observing orders as used to be, he presently conjectur'd that either Constantine was not in the Camp, or else that he was sick; and therefore losing no time, he spent the whole night in passing his Army over a small River, the passage whereof, it was afterwards said, that Constantine ought to have disputed. The next morning the Prince was truly surpris'd at the diligence of the Romans, and was so far from staying for their coming, that he resolv'd to advance and charge them. To which purpose he march'd directly towards them in very good order; he commanded the right Wing himself, the left he gave to me, and the Cavalry to Prince Constant and Gildon, who signaliz'd themselves against Taxander and Castinus, who had the same command in the Enemies Army. The valiant Artabure who led their left Wing, was opposite to Constantine; and I had the honour for some time to sustain the first onsets of Constance, who had reserv'd the Right Wing to himself. But, Madam, without rehearsing circumstances which you cannot be ignorant of, I shall only speak of the two chief Commanders. Those two great men fought at the head of their Army, they observ'd and labour'd to take all advantages; and by and by thundering in among their Enemies, brought destruction and terror along with them wherever they went. In vain the veterane Soldiers kept their Ranks clos'd, in vain they endeavour'd to preserve their wonted reputation, those furious Warriours fell in among them, overturning and overwhelming all before them; so that finding no resistance worthy their valour, they fought every where the one for the other, animated rather with emulation, than exasperated with envy or animosity. After they had chang'd their Horses three or four times, they found each other, for they knew one another by the sumptuousness of their Arms, though far better by the blows which they both bestow'd among the crowd; and after a loud challenge they began a most terrible encounter. They were quickly wounded both, while the astonish'd Spectators beheld whatever agility and strength could do, when seconded by a great courage. In short, it seem'd as if fortune had taken delight to make these two famous Captains meet, both young, both well limbed, and always Victors; and that for the first time they should both retire, neither of them being Conquerours; for they were parted by a great Body of Cavalry, and the day being at an end before the Fight, darkness veil'd the splendour of many noble actions. Both Armies rested all night in the Field, but the two Captains, instead of taking repose, spent all that time in looking after their several Commands.

While these two Heroes labour without intermission, while their eyes are every where, while they promise their Soldiers, and visit the Officers, give me leave, Madam, to return to the City of Arles, and to discover to you the Treasons of Gerences, instead of keeping your thoughts in suspense, which may give you afterwards a needless surprize. That perfidious person, after he had try'd all ways in vain to ruine the King of the Britains, went into the Country of the Vivarians, and by vertue of his money and his confidence soon got a reputation with Jovian. When he found that he had gain'd upon his affections, he inspir'd him with great hopes, offering him his wealth and his life, and solemnly promising to tie himself to his fortune: You see, said he, that the fortune of the Empire wholly relies upon the valour of Constance, and that the courage of Constantine is the only support of three or four Nations: and being they were never vanquish'd, but have an ambition beyond measure, you may be sure they will fight it out to the last man, and to the last drop of their blood: let them destroy one another, but as for your part never think of taking one side or other, nor of acknowledging any Superiour, but now you have so favourable an opportunity to make your self the greatest Potentate in Europe, never lose it. You may easily accomplish your design by seising upon the Empire, after a Battel that has exhausted all their Forces. And as to what lies in me, I promise you, and my life shall answer for me, to help you to espouse the Queen of Albion; she is at Arles, Ergastus, who is your creature, commands that City: you need do no more than write to him, that I may have liberty to act, and in a little while I will bring you hither the young Queen Octavia: why should I persuade you to a thing where I must take all the pains, and run all the danger, did I not foresee the fortunate success of my design, and afterwards expect a reward answerable to the importance of my services?

To these arguments he added many others, as since that we understood, and press'd so home a thing that was plausible enough of it self, that Jovian, perswaded of the truth, embraced him a thousand times, returned him a thousand thanks, and quite transported with joy, committed to his care the whole management of that great design. The perfidious Traytor, ravish'd with delight that he had laid so good a foundation, departed for Arles, Arles, gave Jovian's Letters to Ergastus, and got into the City at the same time that Constantine entered into the Province of the Romans. The Britain and the Gaul conferr'd together; and after they were agreed they took such measures, that Geronces, as you shall see, deceiv'd those whom he seem'd to serve.

The Evening that the two Generals were constrain'd to retire without any advantage to either party, Geronces told Ergastus, that it was time to execute the design which they had taken in hand: However, said he, it behoves us to tarry till the two Armies are engaged, and that we have found a way to abuse Constantine, should be understand that we are about to carry away Octavia, or should be so imprudent as to quit the Fight to rescue a Mistress. Upon which, the Impoitor seeming to be in a study, presently all of a sudden said he, I find it very convenient that we should separate our selves, and that one of us carry away Octavia with a small company, and as it were carelessly without any noise, while the other attends Merofida with a considerable Convoy, that by the number of her Train she may be taken for Octavia; and that if we be followed, which I do not much fear, the main attempt may be to deliver the Gaul.

Ergastus had no sooner consented to what Geronces propos'd, but the crafty Britain gave him his choice which party to lead, with an extraordinary seeming ingenuity; but afterwards pursuing his first advice, Yet, said he, methinks it would be much better for me to have the charge of conducting Octavia to the place where we have appointed to meet; for being that I understand the British Language, as having liv'd a great while in the Island, it will be hard for any person to give the Princess any advice but what I shall understand: besides that, there will be less wondering to see you go well attended out of a City where you are Governour, than that a Stranger should lead a great party, believing that you act by some private order of Constantine.

At last, Madam, Ergastus and Geronces agree in all things, while the two Generals expect the approach of day with an impatience which they could not moderate. They no sooner perceiv'd the very first dawn of light, but they made the large plain which was covered with their Armies, to ring with the noise of their warlike Instruments. Constantine rides from Rank to Rank, encouraging the Soldiers with different speeches, fram'd according to the temper of the several Nations, laying before them how ill it would become them in one Battel to lose the honour which they had purchased in so many notable Encounters; that there remain'd but one more proof of their valour to tame a haughty power that sought to impose a yoke upon all the Nations of the West; while he the more to encourage them, rides with his face open among the Soldiers, many Voluntiers single themselves out from both parties, challenge one another, fight and signalize their valour at the head of the Armies. But the eager Constantine aims to give the first onset; so that three thousand Archers of the Picts, and the same number of Irish Slingers had no sooner discharged a Shower of Darts and Stones, but he thundered in upon the Enemy with a Body of four thousand British Horse. And now, Madam, observe the effect of Geronces's Treasons; for at that very time that pernicious Traytor advertises Constantine by several Messengers, that the Garrison of Arles had carried away Octavia, to the end the enamoured Prince, to rescue the person whom he only ador'd; might quit the Field, and lose the Battel. He was in hopes also that the King would pursue Ergastus, and that the Gaul might be kill'd in the Encounter, or at least lose so many of his men, as not to be able to rescue out of his hands the lovely prey which he was carrying into Spain. In the mean while, the wicked Geronces makes all the haste he could toward the Pyrenean Mountains, and all the way he pleases himself with a spiteful content, continually to behold the fair Queen of Albion, while her destiny depended upon his will; nor is he less satisfied to see himself protected by the Arms of Constantine and Ergastus, and to think how variously his plots would affect the King of the Britains, and Jovian's Lieutenant; nor was the Traytor deceiv'd; for Constantine was struck as with a Thunderbolt when he receiv'd the news. Presently looking upon that misfortune as the greatest that ever besel him! Alas! (he cryed with a doleful ejaculation) To what extremity am I reduced? Must I quit the Field at such a remarkable time as this? Ought I to abandon my Princess when it lies in my power to rescue her, when she reaches out her hand for help, and for my sake refuses a most potent Monarchy? Ingrateful Prince, unfaithful Lover, darest thou presume to deliberate? Does it not behove thee to sacrifice thy life, thy ambition, and thy honour it self, to flee where thy love and thy acknowledgment call thee? Thou ventur'st no more than one Battel, the event whereof is uncertain; but it is certain that thou losest Octavia, that thou leavest a Princess whom thou adorest be taken away, a divine person that can only make thee happy, and who has given thee so many transcendent proofs of her affection.

Immediately coming to a final determination, he put himself at the head of a great Body of light Horſe, commanding the old Soldiers to make good that poſt which he quitted, and where the greateſt fires of the Battel was like to be. He exhorted them in few words vi- gorouſly to ſtand the ſhock of the Enemy, then giving them to underſtand that he was go- ing upon a very conſiderable enterpriſe, he turn'd off to the left hand, and poſted after the Ravifhers of Oſtavia, taking along with him for their guide, a certain Gaul who had precifely related to him every circumſtance of his miſfortune.

In the mean while ſuch a Captain as Conſtance, was not wanting to make uſe of all thoſe Advantages, which the abſence of his Adverſary might afford him, though there follow- ed a great ſlaughter on both ſides. Prince Conſtant, Liſca, Gildon and my ſelf, ſtood firm for a good while, before the formidable Commander of the Romans, but at length we ſaw that our Troops, in vain oppos'd the progreſs of his proſperity: For they being no lon- ger encouraged by their General, began to ſlacken in their reſiſtance, and afterwards ſeeing their Ranks grow thin they gave way, and ſoon after betook themſelves to a univerſal flight. During the rout the deſperate Conſtantine return'd, having killed Ergaſtus and cut in pieces his Convoy, without delivering Oſtavia. He no ſooner perceived the diſorder of his Troops, but he ſtopt thoſe that were flying, and with threats and prayers he again rallied above twelve thouſand, with which he renewed the Fight, and as if he were unwilling to outlive the loſs of the Battel, and the loſs of his fair Queen, he threw himſelf into the thickeſt of his enemies, where he did wonders paſt belief. But after he had fought for the great Con- ſtance, after he had fought with Prince Taxander, wounded the fierce Artabure, overturn'd Antenor and Ariobindus: he took pity of the poor men that followed him, and not being willing that they ſhould any longer, expoſe themſelves to be cut down by number, under the leading of ſo valiant a Commander, he retreated to Arles before that numerous Army, with ſo much experience and reſolution, inſomuch that Conſtance himſelf confeſſed, that few victories were to be compared with that admirable retreat. Nevertheleſs the afflicted Conſtantine paſſed the following night, in a condition to be very much lamented, the defeat of the Britains ſadly tormenting his mind. But as his heart could not accuſe him for any thing, and that the enamoured Prince could not repent, for having forſaken all to purſue the Ravifhers of Oſtavia, all his other grief gave way to that which he felt, for not having reſcued that moſt incomparable Princeſs. He complained of that miſfortune in ſuch ex- preſſions, as would have melted the hardeſt heart in the world: And it was with much ado that he would ſuffer his wounds to be taken care of, while far from taking any reſoſe, he ſurrendred up his heart a prey to Melancholy. In a word the night appeared as dreadful, as the day had been unfortunate, and no ſooner did darkneſs give way to the morning light, but the Romans appeared ready to inveſt the Town on all ſides, which was ſtrangely alarm'd at the ſight: Nor were the Soldiers themſelves a little ſurpriſed, having no more than juſt time to breath. Conſtantine on the contrary appear'd to be leſs ſad, and immediately pre- pared to make a vigorous ſally. He was ſo well beloved, that all the whole City oppoſed his deſign, but the valiant Prince joyning to the grandeur of his Courage, a kind of con- tempt of his life, would give ear neither to entreaty nor advice. But having compelled Gildon, who ſain would have followed him, to take charge of the Town where he had a love- ly Miſtreſs to defend, he took a review of the Troops, and choſe out thoſe that were in the beſt condition to ſerve. And ſo leaving the infantry with Gildon, he put himſelf at the head of four thouſand Horſe, and having divided the command thereof between Prince Conſtant, Liſca, Gildon and my ſelf, he ſallied forth accompanied with all the good wiſhes of the people. He was no ſooner come within a flight ſhot of the Enemy, but there appeared to be ſomething more great than ordinary in his looks, in his countenance, and in all his Actions: and he no ſooner ſpied certain ſquadrons of the Romans, but he gave them a brisk charge and cauſed them to give way, after they had made but a feeble reſiſtance. Caſtinus made haſt to their relief, but my Maſter having thrown him to the ground at the very firſt ſhock, he ſoon broke through the Cavalry and came up to the body of the Army. At that time Taxander and Ariobindus turn'd about to gain the Crupper of us, and to cut us off from the City, while Conſtance himſelf endeavours to hemm us in upon all the other ſides. Prince Conſtant for ſome time ſtood firm before him, while Liſca and I endeavour'd to repel the o- ther two. In the mean time the furious Conſtantine had his eyes and his Arms every where and wherever he came he carried the victory, as if it had been fix'd to his dreadful Sword. With one blow he ſlew Tanaxilla, with one blow he wounded Dagobert, whom he ſpar'd afterwards when he knew him: And to ſay all in a few words, he cut to pieces whatever made head againſt him. While he performs theſe deeds of wonder, the great Conſtance in- cens'd at the reſiſtance, wherewith Conſtant oppoſed his paſſage, turns upon him only all that valour which had been fatal to ſo many Kings, and gave him ſo weighty a blow upon his his head, that the Prince being stund and wounded, fell between his Horses feet: which some of the Britains perceiving, laid him upon a Buckler, and carried him to the City, the generous Roman not opposing their design. At the same time Taxander slew Lisox, and Armbindus and I being dangerously wounded, weary and feeble fell from our hortes, inso-much that the rest of the Horsemen fled, and left my Master all alone. The Prince looked round about him, and finding himself almost quite forsaken, in the midst of above fifty thousand Soldiers, his Loife dying under him, he rimibly leap'd from his back, and instead of being discouraged, he felt his heart strengthened with a greater resolution at the sight of a danger so terrible. The undaunted Champion covers himself with his Buckler, and with a heap of bodies that lay dead at his feet, and deals such terrible blows on every side, that none durst come near him, so that they were contented to keep aloof off and shoot at him, every one hoping to have the honour to kill that great and valiant Prince. However he avoided or received upon his shield, the greatest part of the blows, and very fortunately for himself: For as he stood defending himself in such a wonderful manner, the great Constance comes to the place himself. No sooner had he observ'd what had passed, but he chased at those of his own men, that seemed to be the most eager, and commanded them to retire. He spake with so much authority, that they soon obeyed: when the Generous Roman turning himself toward my Master, and addressing his speech to him with an aspect that shewed nothing of an Enemy, Great King, he cryed, continue invincible: For we are so far from disputing with you, a Title which is so much your due, that we rather aim at the preservation of a glorious life, which others seek to destroy after a manner so beneath the honour of our Nation. The fierce Constantine, more ready to run through fire and water to meet death, than to yield to the strength of an Enemy, was dilarm'd by obliging words, but not enduring to be overcome in generosity, no more than in greatness of courage; If you are the great Constance, he made answer, I yield my self to you, for it is no shame to yield to your valour, and the fortune of such a great person. Afterwards not contented to have testified his acknowledgment in these words, he presented his Sword to his generous Benefactor. The Roman presently alighted, and accepted with an extraordinary civility, the present which my Master offered him. As the Emperour's Lieutenant, said he, I receive the Sword which you give me, but as a person that knows what to pay to a Prince of your worth, I return you the Sword of Constance. And upon that he presented to my Master a rich Sword, the Hilt whereof was no less remarkable for the workmanship, than for the precious Stones with which it glittered all over.

Those two great persons having viewed one another more exactly, were strangely surprized, and both seemed to be prepossessed with an esteem each for other, and by virtue of their merit, which produced a quick and powerful effect, they both felt in their souls a mutual disposition, to enter into a strict reciprocal Amity. And they would have immediately shown some testimonies thereof, but that Constance found it more convenient to take care of Constantine, carrying him to his Tent, there to have his wounds searched. He rode all along by his side and never left him, till he had recommended him to the most skilful of all his Chirurgeons. At length he gave orders for the wounded to be dressed, and the dead to be buried: And I am obliged to acknowledge that I was as kindly and generously used there, as if I had been among my relations in Armorica. Nor did Gildon take long time to consider, but made his own Articles: for neither could the King help him, nor could he look for any relief, besides that he found that the breaches which Constantine had made before, were not well repair'd, and that he was a Conquerour that came with a numerous, and well disciplin'd Army to besiege the Town. Constance would not enter into the City without Constantine, where he gave him the most convenient Apartment in the Town, and caused him to be serv'd and attended, as a great and powerful Monarch: Constant and I caused our selves to be carried to my Master's Quarters, but whatever we could say, or whatever civility Constance shewed him; that afflicted Lover made no other answer, but in sighs and tears, evidently testifying the marks of that profound melancholly, occasion'd by Octavia's being carried away. Constance, who all this while thought that the ill success of the Battel, had been the reason why he looked so sad, began to comfort him in such Language, as he thought proper for that occasion. The King full of acknowledgment, and charm'd with that manner of proceeding, thought himself, obliged to let Constance understand, that it was not the success of the Romans, that was the cause of his disturbance: and thereupon by degrees he told him the Adventures of his life, as I have related them to your Majesty: Not but that he slightly pass'd over those passages, that related to his own Actions, so far from boasting or vain glory, that he rather endeavoured to conceal them all that he could. Nevertheless Constance knew how to understand his virtue for all his modesty, and admiring such a croud of virtues, he could not forbear from making new offers to the Hero that possessed them. Sir, said he, *I am a Subject of Honorius, I have no priviledgè to dispose of a great King; whom the fortune of war hath made my prisoner, but what is there that may not be done, for the renowned Constantine's sake? I will endeavour peace between the Emperour and your self, which I doubt not to accomplish, in regard that the Emperour loves his own quiet, that you are generous, and that some regard will be therefore had by both for my mediation. You shall reign peaceably over the Picts, the Britains, and Hibernians, you shall also quietly succeed your Father in his Kingdom, only you shall restore to the Romans, the Conquests which you have made in Gallia. For the name of Emperour, which I do not believe you have any design to accept of, having already refused it; I believe that being of such an illustrious descent, and possessing of so many great Kingdoms, that you will not make any great scruple to dissemble with a title which being not lawfully purchased, neither increases your revenue nor your power. In the mean while, since they have convey'd away the fair Queen of Britain out of your power, and seeing that the loss of her is the only cause, of that severe affliction which torments your mind, make haste, Sir, and pursue Octavia's Ravishers, as soon as your health will give you leave. You are free, and if Honorius be incens'd, or accuses me for having abused the Authority which he gave me, I will throw my self at his feet, and present him my head for the reparation of my offence. Ah! 'Tis too much,* (cry'd the King of the Britains, transported with admiration and acknowledgement) yet shall it never be said, that the great Constance ever lost the favour of his Emperour, for the ingratitude of Constantine. I accept the liberty which you give me, since it may conduce to the reestablishment of my Princess: But, Sir, I engage my word, both as a King and as a Prince that loves his honour, that so soon as I shall have rescued the Queen of Albion, you shall then again be the Master of my destiny, while I surrender my self a Captive to Honorius, if he approve not the carriage of the most generous of all the Romans.

This obliging and familiar conversation, pass'd from one to t'other reciprocally; and Constance using the same freedom that Constantine had done, related to him the particulars of that passion, which he had for the Princess Placidia. The next morning they took into examination, such of the Inhabitants of Arles, as were most likely to give my Master any information, touching the manner of Octavia's being convey'd away, and they had no sooner describ'd the Stranger, whom they suspected to be the Author, as having often seen him in private conference with Ergastus, but that Constantine was fully satisfied, that it was the Traitor Geronces, who had been the contriver of his misfortune. Immediately a trembling Ague seiz'd his joynts, and the disconsolate Lover could not without horror call to mind, that the fair Queen was now in the clutches of Gratian's murthurer, and at the discretion of the most cruel of all mankind. And that which yet appear'd more terrible, and which deprived him of all comfort, was, that he neither knew nor could conjecture, in what place Geronces had taken sanctuary. However after he had ponder'd upon it for some time, he began to think that he was either fled to Jovian, or else that he had cross'd the Pyrenian to joyn with Maximus, who was escap'd into Spain. He communicated his thoughts to Constance, and the Roman having already made the same conjecture; You know, Sir, answered he, that the protection that Maximus or Jovian can give Geronces, will prove very feeble to defend him against our power, and when we shall undertake their pursuit, I do not think we shall find any great obstacle to obstruct our enterprizes. In a few days I will march against the latter of these Rebels, who has followed the example of Maximus in taking upon him the Title of Emperour. And then I will give the great Constantine the satisfaction, to go and vanquish his own Rival, and to exterminate the abominated Geronces, if he have rather made choice of Spain, than the Vivarians for his place of refuge. On the contrary, if it be from Jovian that he seeks his support, I promise you that I will take no less care, to send you the parricide, than to make him restore the incomparable Princess whom you admire, to the end there may be nothing wanting to make you full satisfaction, and that you may punish the most criminal of men, at the same time that you shall receive the fairest Princess in the world, as the most glorious reward of your virtue.

These Madam were Constantine's expressions, and your Majesty may be pleas'd to observe, that then Queen Amalazontha was but Princess of Turingia.

My Matter charmed with the Generosity of the Roman, Ah, Sir, said he, how great is the heart of Constance! How magnanimous upon all occasions! If I recover my Princess, the Battel of Arles will be to me a greater gain than loss; for the friendship of my Conquerour is so inestimable, that I should not be able to retaliate those obliging proofs of his kindness, though I should yield him a hundred victories.

Thus those two Heroes entertained one another for three or four days that Constance devoted to Constantine's company. But when he was oblig'd to depart, being resolv'd to march march against Jovian, he could not leave the King of the Britains without renewing those protestations which he had already made him. Constantine confirm'd his, after which they tenderly embrac'd, and how great soever their courage were, they could not part without some signs of grief, as foreboding that either they should never see one another more, or never but both unfortunate.

You know, Madam, that Constance overthrew Jovian, and that he reduc'd the Vivarians to their obedience to Honorius: you have likewise heard of the fatal wound by which this renowned person was forc'd to keep his Bed in the chief City of the Tectosages, while Alaric reinvaded Italy, and laid it waste, while proud Rome became a prey to the Goths, and Prince Autalpb carried away Placidia as the only Beauty which he aim'd at. Therefore instead of repeating to your Majesty these accidents, I must only tell you, that my Master ordered himself to be convoyed into Gallia Armorica. Upon his arrival Aldroec was transported with several different passions; on the one side he was overjoyed at the sight of his beloved Constantine; but on the other side what grief could be greater than his, when he saw that dear Son of his bleeding from so many wounds, and possess'd with a most deadly melancholy? While he takes care of his recovery, promising the Chirurgeons excessive rewards, Constantine lies tormented with a thousand discontents. He heard no news neither from Octavia, nor from Constance, only he understood that Alaric was marching toward Rome, which did not a little vex him that he could not succour the native Country of his Friend. While his affliction increases, his Attendants gave him notice that there was a Messenger from Lenox that desired to be admitted into his presence: he commands him to be brought in, when the Britain having given him an account of the reason of his coming, presented him a Letter which Geronces had written to the Governour of Troynovant, with an intent to allure him to his party, the contents whereof were to this effect.

Geronces to Lenox:

IF thou hast an aspiring courage, and wouldst advance thy self above thy condition, Briamenus, whom I have sent to thee, will tell thee the way; make use of his advice, and never stand upon scruples, which amuse the vulgar. However, if Chimeras are more prevalent over thy Soul, than those reasons he will let thee understand by my instruction, remember at least, and let Constantine know, that the Daughter of Gratian is within my power, and shall be no better used, than as they deal with a person who belongs to my service, and that she is not to return into her Country but by my order.

The conclusion of that insolent Letter appeared so cruel to the King of the Britains, that he cryed out, rearing up his eyes to Heaven, O infinite Justice, who art the Sovereign Disposer of rewards and punishments, why sufferest thou the treacheries of the most accursed among men to prosper, while thou leavest forlorn a fair and innocent Princess, whom we admire as one of the most beautiful works of Heaven? Wherefore does thy vengeance delay? Are not Geronces's crimes enormous yet enough for thee to let fall thy ponderous hand upon so wretched an offender?

Pronouncing those words he turn'd about with a restless impatience, he sigh'd, and tears were also seen to tricle down his cheeks; and that great courage which the rudest assaults of fortune could not shake, was not proof against that despair which Geronces's Letter had settled in his Breast, so deeply sensible he was of whatsoever concern'd his beloved Queen: Is it not enough, said he, for my fair Queen to be in the hands of her Father's Murderer? Is that divine Princess to be still put in the balance with a forlorn wretch, a wicked villain, an accomplice of Geronces? Dost thou live Constantine, while thy enemies exercise so strange a piece of tyranny? Canst thou live Constantine, when yet perhaps thy divine Octavia lies in fetters? Coward, canst thou suffer that the same person that reigns in thy soul, should be subject at the same time, to the barbarism of the most cruel among men? No, no, it shall never be said that Octavia weeps in captivity, while Constantine sees the Sun: I will cause my self to be carried into Spain, there shall my Soldiers fight, nay I will fight my self for the safety of my adored Princess.

The violence of that commotion having redoubled the fury of his Fever, Aldroec and some of the principal of the Court hasted to his Chamber, but instead of comforting him, as they intended, their hearts were so mollified, that they were compelled to mingle their tears with those of the afflicted Lover, so lively, and so well grounded were his complaints; nevertheless they attempted to divert him from the resolution which he had taken. But the amorous Prince manag'd his persuasions with so much reason, with so many entreaties, and so fix'd an obstinacy, that the King of Armorica yielded, knowing the temper of Constantine, and fearing lest the wounds of his Soul should prove more dangerous than the wounds of his Body. Aldroec's condescend somewhat allayed my Master's disquiet, who having understood where Octavia was, and not despairing to be able to set at her liberty, endeavour'd to chase from his thoughts whatever might retard the cure, that he might be in a condition himself to fight for the Queen of Great Britain. Thereupon he gave out Commissions to make new Levies; he sent for the messenger that came from Lenox, and having given him an answer, and some other instructions to carry back, he could not forbear to inquire of him in what manner they treated Bramenus. Afterwards the niceness of his thoughts went a little farther, and he imagin'd within himself that it would be some content to him to see the person that had seen Octavia, and that he should understand some more certain news of the Princess, if he could but have a relation from the mouth of that Britain himself. Wherefore in regard the Governour of Troynovant had not only sent the Letter which he received from Geronces, but had also caus'd the person that brought it to be guarded into Armorica, it was no difficult thing for Constantine to satisfy his curiosity. He therefore commanded that Bramenus should be brought into his presence, yet he no sooner saw him but his joynts trembled, so that he could hardly endure the sight of him; for he presently imagin'd that he was an accomplice of that offender that had sent him, and that he as well as Geronces had embrued his murderous hands in the blood of the Father of his Princess. The thought thereof augmented his horror, which made him hastily send Bramenus back, being exasperated by the same passion which had caus'd him to send for him. Nevertheless he order'd that great care should be taken of him, so excessive was his fear for Octavia, and so true it is that fortune is pleas'd many times to make the greatest personages sensible of her capricious humour.

In the mean time some persons zealous for my Master's repose, went to Bramenus, and understanding by the fierceness of his looks, and the boldness of his carriage, that threats would sooner provoke than fright him, they us'd him with all civility, made him great presents, and more considerable promises. The lustre of Gold and Silver dazled his eyesight, and having at last touch'd his heart, he appear'd less extravagant, and at length inform'd the Britains all the particulars of his Master's treacheries which I have related. He told them moreover that Loecinia had chang'd her name into that of Nonnichia, a name that she afterwards render'd very famous, that Maximus and Geronces had leagu'd themselves with Didymus and Verodian, who were very potent in Spain, and that they had already many Towns and considerable Forces. As for Octavia, (said he, continuing his discourse) she only thinks upon Heaven, and weeps, without taking any care to reestablish her self in her Kingdom, or accepting any of those Expedients which Geronces daily proffers her. Lately they told her that Constantine was dead, but she would believe nothing of it; they propos'd Maximus to her for a Husband, but she refus'd him with disdain; nor would she that they should think of undertaking to restore her to her Kingdom of Britain. She made them answer, that the King her Father had dispos'd of it before his death, and that she her self had also renounc'd her Title to it; and though she had still some right to it, she would chuse rather never to reign, than to be beholding to a Traytor and a Parricide. That they suffer'd those reproaches, and were so far from using violence to her that spok'd them, that they only laid before her what course she were better to take, and how she was to carry her self toward a person who was absolutely Master of her Destiny. However she took no notice of those admonitions, but rather seeming the more incens'd, she holdly answer'd that she had an entire confidence in a power far superiour to that of her tyrannical Governours. That that supreme power would at last relieve her oppress'd innocence, that it would bring down the pride of the guilty, and perhaps make use of Constantine's Arm to execute those acts of vengeance: nor was this all, for you shall see that her constancy proceeded farther yet: it was told her privately that her enemies would quit the interests of Maximus, and seek a means to restore her to Constantine, provided she would write and persuade the Prince that Geronces and Loecinia might enjoy the Kingdom of Ireland, which being an Island separated from her Territories would not be of any great importance. It shall never be, said she in answer to them, that the Daughter of the unfortunate Gratian ever labour'd for the settlement of that Monster which they had mention'd to her: for Octavia has too great an esteem for the illustrious King of Britain, to advise him to make any such dishonourable agreement, I had rather chuse to die, than make him commit so foul a piece of treachery, or were I capable to perform it, how have I deserv'd so much from Constantine, than he should take notice of my mediation?

In short, they could never make that spirit of hers to bend, that had always appear'd so mild; and Geronces has been constrain'd to seek out other ways, to satisfy Loocrinia's turbulent humour, before Constantine should be in a condition to impede his proceedings. He sent me therefore to Troynovant to advise Lenox not to lose so fair an opportunity, to advance himself to the Royal Dignity. I have discharged my commission, lying before Constantine's Lieutenant, that he had no more to do, than to receive Maximus and Geronces into his government with their forces, that the new King of Albion was not in a posture to oppose their designs, and that before he could return into Britain, they should be all three strong enough to repel more considerable Armies, than a King of Armorica could bring against them. That Maximus, to make himself more acceptable to the Britains, should marry Octavia their natural Queen, and that the Picts, considering Constantine's misfortune, would be ready to submit to Loocrinia, an active Princess and accustom'd to rule. That for his part being seconded by Maximus and Geronces, he might easily possess himself of the Kingdom of Ireland, and that hostages should be given by all parties for the security of such an important League. I strengthened with Arguments what I had to propose, I also shew'd him how easie 't would be to bring all these things to pass, notwithstanding all which the fainthearted Lenox, changing colour at my discourse, caus'd me to be seized instead of sending me away with an answer, or embracing a party that made him such advantageous propositions. I have told you my thoughts with that freedom which is not usual, for why should I conceal those things which Lenox himself can sufficiently declare, and what can I fear among the Britains, since the life of their Queen is to answer for mine,

Thus Madam, you hear the discovery which we drew from a person, that we could have hardly got to speak, but by engaging him insensibly in a discourse; Constantine having commanded that he should be treated with all civility, far from turning him off rudely. Nay the enamour'd Prince was yet more exact, for he order'd him to be convoyed to the other side of the Pyrenian Hills, into a County that was at Maximus's devotion. In the mean time he hasten'd his levies, with so much diligence throughout all Armorica, so that presently after Brauenus's departure, we had above twenty thousand men in readiness, and Lenox having sent us a far more considerable number, our Army rendezvouz'd above fifty thousand strong. Prince Constant who was very near recovered, commanded in chief: and the eager Constantine leaving his bed, but finding his strength not to serve him to ride a horseback, order'd himself to be carried in a Litter. As for my own part, being in as bad a condition, I followed my Master's example, and we were no sooner at the foot of those vast mountains, that separate Spain from Gallia, but we understood that Verodian and Didymus possess'd the tops of the Hills, and defend'd all the passes. Constantine seeing the trouble that he should have, to force an Enemy so advantageously posted, and that had besides a perfect knowledge of the Country, shew'd himself to the Soldiers, and the more to encourage them, promis'd to lead them himself.

At those words the Britains rent the Skyes with shouts of Admiration, and promis'd him to vanquish their Enemies, whatever obstructions lay in their way. They were importunate that Constant might lead them, and that the King should keep in the Rear, arguing that the most cowardly and faint-hearted, would not dare to flee nor so much as to recoyle, in the sight of such a renowned Captain, whom all the Army had in so much veneration. Constantine made answer that he knew his Soldiers too well, to have any such injurious opinion of their courage. However all the Captains redoubled their importunity to him so zealously, that he consented at last to their desire. But the fight was no sooner begun, but the generous sick man presently forsook his Litter, and by his absolute command caus'd a Horse and Arms to be brought him, and his heart sustaining his body, he ran into the front, joyned himself to Constant, and contributed with much renown to the famous victory which we obtained over Verodian and Didymus. The discomfited Enemy fled into their Country, through by-ways to us altogether unknown. But having gain'd a large plain which displayed it self at the foot of the mountain, Geronces brought them a considerable reinforcement, rallied them and retreated in good order. It was impossible for my Master without a prodigious labour and trouble, to pursue them so fast as he would have done, and therefore he sent only at first some few parties to charge and keep them in play: But not long after he us'd a far different method, for he no sooner had heard news of Octavia by the prisoners, but he resolv'd to come to a battel for the rescue of that fair Queen. He understood that Geronces was never absent from her, that Maximus and the false Nonnichia were inseparable, and that the Britain had perswaded him to approve that way, which he had made choice of to unite their interests, because it was most Advantageous to him, and made him absolute Master of the Queen of Britain's destiny. He understood that Flavian had given Maximus a retreating place in Cartagena or new Carthage. That Geronces had always resided in the famous City of Tarracon, and that he did not depart thence, till after he had heard of the rout of Verodian and Didymus, and that thereupon he presently came to their relief, and that he carried along with him Queen Oclavia, guarded with a flying convoy, not daring to leave her in a City of which he was not well assured, and wherein he was unwilling to be besieged should he lose the Battel: he told this news to the principal Officers of the Army, and being still apprehensive of the danger which dayly threatened the Princess in fighting for her liberty, he made use of another Expedient, which his love infused into him: thereupon turning to his own Soldiers, and shewing the Spaniards to them, My Friends, he cryed, your Queen, the most amiable Queen in the world, and who deserves that all the world should serve her, is before your eyes, and by the mouth of your King desires your assistance to rescue her from the tyranny of her Enemies: she is only guarded with the miserable reliques of an Army which you have so lately vanquish'd. But among those reliques she has Lords and Tyrants that domineer over her. Will you suffer that she shall any longer remain under the cruelty of those Barbarians? Will ye suffer those remains of a frighted Army to recover heart? Or that they should presume to rally before their Victors faces? Let us charge them and finish their destruction; but let us make use neither of Dart nor Stone, nor Javelin, our Swords will be sufficient to execute our design: other weapons may be fatally dangerous, and cause us to lose more at one blow than we shall gain by all the performances of our life time, though we should thereby become Victors over all the Nations in the world.

Presently he put himself at the head of six thousand Light Horse; and for that the liberty of Oclavia was the principal thing he aim'd at, he left the charge of managing the Fight to Prince Constant and my self, while he accomplish'd the design which he had to cut off all the retreat to Tarracon, that they might not carry the Princess back. To which purpose he chose extraordinary Guides, promising them large rewards and recompences, upon the exactness of their fidelity. In short, to avoid all places where my Master might fall into any ambuscade, they led him a great way about, insomuch that the Spaniards were upon the rout, and running away when he was just ready to fall into their rore: he was immediately troubled at it, but his grief was far more excessive when he understood by the first that fled, that Geronces was escap'd, and drove Oclavia's Chariot full speed before him: that he was separated from Verodian and Didymus; who fled toward Cesarea Augusta, while the other took toward Tarracon, built by the Scipios. Then did the enamoured Prince spur on after the Ravishers of all his happiness, and that with such a speedy diligence, that he was oftener mingled with the Spaniards than guarded by his own; he let them flie on, not having leisure to fight them, as well as for that they could tell him little or nothing of the truth which he desired to know, yet having still a restless impatience, at length he pitch'd upon one, who, as he thought, might more certainly inform him, he imagined he had seen him, either in Geronces's company, or at least in his service, though he could not precisely call him to mind in the condition wherein he met him. That miserable wretch lying along in the high way, by the prodigious quantity of blood which he had shed, and the mortal paleness that overspread his face, made it manifest that he had but a few minutes to live. My Master, not to lose time, nor to be rude to a dying man, ask'd him very courteously and mildly in the British Language, whether Geronces were got into Tarracon. He is too wise to do that, (replied the wounded person, believing the Prince to have been of his party) for he knew before it came to a Battel, that if he were overcome, there were no safety for him in Towns. That Tarracon would not fail to treat with the Victors, and to obtain the more advantageous conditions, they would together with the Town deliver up the young Queen of Britain to Constantine. After those few words he took breath, and then making another essay, he pursued his discourse, Avoid your enemies, said he, who will be at your heels in a moment, and if you seek Geronces, ride on to the Sea shore, where he is ready to embarque in a Vessel which there expects him: Tell him that Bracmenus—— And saying that word he expired, and thereby my Master understanding the principal thing that he desired to know, put on at full speed, not staying to behold a person whom he afterwards remember'd that he had seen in Armorica. By and by he discovered a sumptuous Chariot, but there was no person in it, only he found that the Horses were all in a foam and water; at the sight thereof the amorous Constantine's heart leap'd, and therefore riding on with the same speed, he came to the Sea-side just as the Ship had put off, the vehement Prince followed a good way into the Sea, without considering the danger, and so long as Geronces's Followers could hear him, he promised vast rewards to them that would deliver him the Queen of Albion. Presently Geronces appears upon the Poop, and seeing that some of the Horsemen shot at him, he fetch'd out Oclavia and Gadenna, and opposed them to the Stones and Arrows, while his own men at the same time aim'd at Constantine. But he forbid them to shoot, and being overjoyed to see his Princefs, he could not endure they should importune him to come out of the water, It matters not for me whether I die or no, said he, provided I could see the Queen, that I could set her at liberty, and recompense the authors of her freedom. Olivia altho her self, pale with tear and grief, made him a sign with her hand, so that Constantine was now only guided by the dictates of his love, and though he was wounded, and that his Buckler was all stuck with Darts, he had no power to think of his own safety; but there he stood crying continually to Geronces's people to endeavour the Princefs's preservation.

You may perhaps wonder that a Galley should stay so long in the same place, but you must know that Geronces finding himself to be out of all danger, had commanded them to hold water within a Bows shot of the Shore, with an intent to destroy that person who was most terrible to him of all persons in the world. In the mean time the greatest part of those miserable creatures that laboured at the Oar looked upon themselves to have now the most favourable opportunity to change their miserable being for a happy life, under the protection of a great King. To which purpose the boldest among them, to begin a general mutiny, laid hold of a Partisan. Geronces, who had his eyes every where, observing that action of the Slave, grew mad, and drawing a Cimiter of Damascus Steel, he let fall such a back blow upon the Slave's arm, that he cut it sheer off; nor was the Barbarian so contented, but with an unparallel'd inhumanity, with the bleeding arm that was cut off, he beat all the other Slaves about the head, not daring to kill them when he had so much need of their labour. After that horrible punishment he commanded them to ply their Oars, while the dejected Constantine was ready to die for grief. He would not take on aloud, nor comfort his heart with lamentation, as not becoming a person of his dignity and courage. And therefore having shut up his affliction in his Breast, the force of his grief became so violent, that the strength of his Body began to fail. Besides that danger, they saw him in a place where the waves were enough to overwhelm him, though the Sea were never so calm: yet could they not perswade him to turn toward the Shore, though they often repeated to him that it was for Olivia's preservation that he ought to look after his own. They represented to him likewise that Geronces would be sure to land again in some part of Spain, that he would not forsake neither Locrinia nor Maximus, and that there was no likelihood that a Galley should make for the Channel without convoy, when there was no necessity. Those arguments qualified his despair, being at length fully perswaded that Geronces would again joyn himself with his Friend and his false Nonnichia: nor was he deceiv'd in his judgment; for some time after we learn'd by our Spies and some prisoners that we took, that the Queen of Britain was in Cartagena: my Master was overjoyed at the news, resolving to march thither and besiege it by Sea and Land, to the end Geronces might have no way to escape. And for that purpose he sent Prince Constant to Barcelona to the King of the Goths, to crave the assistance of some Men of War, for which he offered him very advantageous satisfaction; Autalpb granted him more than he desired, whether it was his own Generosity, or his interest that oblig'd him to assist a King against his Rebels; or whether it were that Placidia having heard of the friendship that was between Constantine and Constance, favoured the Britains for the Roman's sake. However it were, Autalpb sent him twelve Gallies and forty Vessels without taking any farther consideration, than so much money as was convenient to satisfy the Soldiers and Seamen, who began to mutiny, because that in compassion to the Queens tears, the King had promised them never to wage war again in Italy. Constant soon appeared before the Port of Cartagena, while we at the same time were diligently employed in drawing a Line about the City. The Town was large, and besides the fortifications wherewith its Founder Asdrubal had strengthened it, Flavian had omitted nothing which might make it tenable against more numerous Armies. Our works advanced apace, for we had not only a great number of Pioneers, but the Soldiers also, who were commanded to break the ground, had notably besirred themselves.

In the mean time the besieged made several sallies, the success whereof did not always prove so advantageous to us, but the impatient Constantine having brought all his Engines to play, and battering the walls without intermission, soon made several great breaches, which not a little terrified the besieged. On the other side, the Britains went fiercely unto the Assault, animated by the presence of an invincible Prince: and Maximus shewing himself in person, to sustain the hearts of his Souldiers, the fight was maintained with great fury and obstinacy. Maximus had also the advantage to wound my Master, but that honour continued not long, for the incens'd Constantine soon after run him quite thorow the body. The Roman tumbled without life upon a heap of stones, while the King entered the City, with such a terrour as put the Spaniards utterly to flight. Flavian hastning to rally the ena-

gain, endeavour'd to repel the victorious Enemy, and to revenge the death of Maximus. But the valiant Prince advancing toward him, and looking upon him as the only support of Octavia's Ravishers, assail'd him with so much anger and resentment, that he laid him at his feet after a weak resistance. The Enemy seeing their Leaders fall, immediately fled, and shutting themselves up in their houses, left the women and Aged people to beg quarter for their lives. Though by the laws of war they had no reason to expect it, yet Constantine caused the Soldiers to forbear killing and plundering, and understood at length that Geronces being beaten by Constant, had retired himself to the Citadel. Immediately he resolv'd vigorously to assail the Traitor in the last of his Sanctuaries, nevertheless he had no sooner prepared his Engines ready for Battery, but he began to fear a thousand fatal Events. He revolv'd in his mind the hatred, which Nonnichia had against the Queen of Albion, the cruelty of Geronces, and what despair might work upon two persons, so violent in their humours. Such terrible thoughts as these, so surpris'd that illustrious object of misfortune, that he knew not what to determine: However at length he thought he might treat with Nonnichia, without doing any injury to Gratian's memory, especially having no proof that she had contributed to the death of her Husband. To this purpose he offer'd her very advantageous conditions, provided she would release Octavia. But the haughty Queen instead of laying hold upon this opportunity, to be at peace and to live restored to an honourable condition, return'd a furious answer, that she would rather dye than owe her safety to a faint-hearted compliance. That she too well remembered the ingrateful Viridonix, to favour Constantine's or Octavia's desires, and that she had this comfort still left, that it was in her power before she perished, to sacrifice to her revenge, the person who had caused all the misfortunes of her life. My Master trembled at these words, and understanding that Geronces had less inclination to treat, he knew not what resolution to take, so that he was about to have quite given over the Assault, fearing to enrage the Princesses Enemies. On the other hand finding it not in his power, to abandon Octavia her self into the fury of those Tyrants, such a Torrent of Anguish overwhelm'd his Soul, and his resolution tottered between so many various meditations, that after so many victories, and in the midst of so many loud Acclamations, that great Personage mov'd the pity of all that beheld him, and knew the cause of his misery. He fought without intermission, all means to save the Queen, but could find none, and not being willing to make use of violence, till he had made tryal of all other ways, he promised the Soldiers in the Citadel, whatever he thought might prove effectual, to induce them to leave Geronces and to take part with Octavia. He also confirm'd the promise which he had made, to the principal Citizens of Cartagena, who being won with the generosity of their Conquerour, seconded his purpose with an extraordinary zeal. To which effect they gained all those that were of their own Nation, and and in regard the Spaniards that were in the Fort, were not inferiour in number to the Romans, and that they had the advantage of being in their own Country, they presently mutined, and after that began to declare their minds freely, that it was convenient to treat with the King of the Britains, and to restore him the Princess whom he demanded. At those words Geronces grew mad, drew forth his Sword and flew upon a young Officer, who had been the first that spake in that manner: But the Spaniard, who did not acknowledge his command, thought he might defend himself, without offending the laws of military discipline, and finding himself well back'd, withstood the Britain like a man of courage. Then every one took to their party, according to their inclination or interest, whereby the mutiny encreas'd to that height, that Constantine making use of so favourable an opportunity, vigorously assail'd the Citadel. Geronces reduced to this pinch, no longer observ'd any rules, he called the Britains whom he had left to guard the two Queens, giving them express command not to let them live, and prepares to defend himself to the last gasp, as well against his enemies within, as against the Besiegers.

In the mean time Loctrina takes four Soldiers, keeping them at her elbow, and seeing her self at liberty during the tumult, she runs like a distracted fury to Octavia's Apartment. The Princess with an admirable constancy, attended the determination of her destiny, and rearing up her eyes to heaven, to implore the Aid of that sovereign justice that protects the innocent, she saw Loctrina advancing towards her with a dagger in her hand, followed by four Soldiers, and transported with rage. The unfortunate daughter of Gratian had no other assistance nor no other comfort, than the company and tears of Gadena, when the furious Nonnichia manifested by her threatening looks, that she was just prepared to sacrifice to her hatred, that fair and innocent victim. However before she executed her abominable purpose, she was resolv'd to satisfy her self, by loading the young Queen at her own pleasure with scandals and reproaches, and to make her suffer as long as she could, that terrour which the presence of a violent violent and assured death inflicts. Thou thinkest, (she cryed with an utterance full of horror) to triumph now over my destiny, but I am yet the Mistress of thine, and thou shalt never have the satisfaction, to see me in the power of my persecutor. No more shalt thou behold the Tyrant whom thou adorest, and who follows thee every where, but only to run after favours of which thou wouldst have persuaded him to be less prodigal, had not thy soul been altogether unworthy of this Birth. Ab Madam, answered Oëavia, how far does your resentment extend, that you do not take away my life without blemishing my honour? Hast thou any honour, said she interrupting her, for what canst thou refuse thy Constantine, after thou hast given him thy Kingdom of Albion? Thou hast plucked me from the Throne where Gratian seated me, but I shall straightway have the pleasure to pluck out thy heart, and to deprive thee at least after thy death, of the person who has reigned in too great power during thy life.

Upon these words the cruel woman felt her rage increase, but while she lifts up her hand; and with an execrable satisfaction, surveys the incomparable Oëavia, looking where to theath the fatal weapon with which she was Arm'd, she heard the hasty steps of some body coming behind her, and which made her turn furiously about, to see who it was that durst interrupt her, or come to succour the Queen. But how was she surpris'd when she perceived it to be Geronces, who came toward her with his sword in his hand, stain'd all over with blood, and carrying in his looks all the dreadful symptomes of despair; Madam, all's lost, he cryed in a dreadful tone, the Enemy is entred: But it shall never be said, that Geronces suffer'd a Princess whom he adores, to fall into his hands. While he expresses himself in that dismal language, the Citadel resounded with the famous name of Constantine, while Nonnichia appears as it were thunder-strook, and stands immoveable suspending her fury.

During this tumult and astonishment, Oëavia and Gadenz nimbly withdraw themselves, and by large promises to their Guards, easily obtained leave to get into another Chamber; to which they were convey'd, with as much respect as could be shewed them, in so strange a confusion. Geronces who had the same resolution, to sacrifice the young Queen to his despair, as Loctrinia to her jealousy, soon perceived Oëavia's flight, and not being willing that the lovely Victim should escape, was about to pursue her, when the noise redoubled of the King's approach. Whereupon the Britain fearing to fall alive into his hands, and least Nonnichia should be expos'd to the insolency of the Soldiers, saw that he had not a minute of time to lose, and therefore turning himself quite frantick toward the person whom he loved, and casting a wild look upon her, he thrust his Sword through her body with that quickness and violence, that she had not time to speak one word to her murderer; then falling upon the point of his own weapon, he rob'd himself of those torments which his crimes had deserv'd. In the mean time the invincible King of the Britains that only had Oëavia in his thoughts, hastens at the head of his own Soldiers, into an Apartment whither he was led by the Prisoners, and with a heart divided between love and despair, he casts his Eyes about every where looking for the Princess. He enters first into the fatal Chamber, where the bodies of Loctrinia and Geronces lay weltring in blood, and he no sooner beheld that spectacle, but he admir'd the managements of eternal providence. He was not troubled that Geronces came to such an end, nor that an offender whom he could not have punished without great circumspection, had as it were been drawn in by her destiny, to that fatal conclusion of life, to which despair generally reduces persons, guilty of the same crimes. Yet though a parricide merits no favour, Geronces having been always Constantine's Capital Enemy, that generous Prince was loth to condemn him, how wretched a villain soever he were, without observing the rules of moderation. But seeing himself rid of that care, he commanded the bodies of Geronces and Loctrinia to be taken away; the latter to be buried, and the other to be kept till Oëavia had resolv'd, in what manner it should be dispos'd. As he was giving order to that purpose, he heard the voices of some persons, that begged quarter for their lives of the soldiers that followed, promising that they would deliver the Queen of Albion into their hands. Constantine hearing that engaging promise, ran toward them that made it, and looking upon them altogether transported with joy; Is it true, said he, that you can shew me the Queen? have you had care to preserve her? Is it possible she should be in a Chamber where you guard the Door? Then without expecting an answer he enters the Room, and he had not gone many steps, before he spy'd Oëavia together with the faithful Gadenz, one of her Maids of honour. They looked pale and dismay'd, and carried in their countenances many signs of that horror, which at the sight of so many terrible accidents, had amaz'd their senses.

The victorious Constantine clad in his glittering Armour, yet more splendid with the honour he had won, throws himself at the feet of his Princess, more happy in that submission, than in the magnificence of a triumph, being hardly able to speak for joy, or express the satisfaction of his thoughts. But at last after he had continued pausing a while, like a person desperately gone in love and deeply plung'd in joy; Is it you Madam, cryed he, is it you my most divine Queen? and is it the pleasure of heaven that I should once more see your face? Yes, Sir, (replied the Queen beginning now to breath at more liberty) 'tis the unhappy Octavia to whom you speak, and to whose misfortunes you are now certainly come to put an end. But instead of continuing their discourse during their surprize, those two illustrious persons could not express their innocent affection, otherwise than by their looks, after which my Master complemented Gadena, not believing that Octavia would be displeas'd, that he took that liberty in her presence.

As for our parts, the Princefs received most obligingly Prince Constant and my self, coming to present our duties to her, after we had quieted the disorders that usually attend the taking of Towns. Constantine also departed from that confusion with all speed, to the end no object of desolation might give nourishment to that melancholy, which a long series of misfortunes had fix'd in the Queen's heart. He took his march therefore for Terracon, while Constant return'd to the Court of Autalpb, with orders to enquire of a Roman Lady, whom the Queen of the Goths tenderly loved, what news of Constance. He had been already inform'd by Virginia, for that was the Ladies name, of the particulars of a journey which Constance had made to Barcelona, and knew that that unfortunate lover, not being to be suffered by Placidia to live near her, was gone with an impatient grief to seek for martial employments, upon the borders of the Rhine. Of all this Constant gave an account to the King my Master, so that the generous King advancing toward the River Hebrus, spent many of his thoughts in the memory of his friend, out of an extraordinary fear lest he himself should have been some cause of his misfortune. Terracon stay'd not till we fate down before it, but presently surrender'd it self, as did all the other Cities under Flavian's jurisdiction, following her example. They sent their deputies to Constantine to assure him of their fidelity, but the Prince would not accept their homage, but in Honorius's name: for he believed himself so far bound to that renowned Roman, that he could do no less than act upon all occasions, for his Advantage and Honour. He feared continually lest he might have made him lose his credit with the Emperour, and persisted in the resolution which he had taken, of going to Rome, if by no other means he could restore the reputation of his friend. Nevertheless whatever satisfaction he had, to acquit himself of so just an engagement, he could not forbear being sensibly afflicted, to think that he must be forc'd to leave his adored Princefs: For as he was always in her company, and found her more charming than ever, and more dispos'd to render him happy, his joy was inexpressible. But how great was his grief, when the cruel remembrance of the promise which he had made to Constance, oppos'd it self to the establishment of his happiness, and when so severe a reason began to plunge, the sweetness of his hopes in the gulph of bitterness. In short, that enamour'd Prince could not abandon his heart with pleasure, to behold that incomparable beauty, the possession whereof was assured him, when with no small disturbance he thought upon that tyrannical honour, that went about to absent him from his Princefs. And indeed so violent was his anguish, that Octavia perceived the effects thereof in his looks, though she imagin'd that it arose from no other cause, but from the King's impatience, who eagerly now desired that inseparable union, which he had so long wish'd for: so that upon such occasions, the more lovely Sex being the more modest and reserv'd, the prudent Princefs durst not presume to question the passionate Constantine. Gadena, who had the same thoughts, was yet more confident, and believing that it was merely respect, that kept the King of the Britains lips so close lock'd, she gave them both to understand, that there was now no longer need to use that nice circumspection, but that they should repass the Pyrenians, and fulfil Aldroec's will.

At those words Constantine remembering his promise to Constance, was constrained to look down with his eyes and sigh: Octavia blushed and Gadena was surpris'd at my Master's silence, upon an opportunity so favourable to tell his thoughts. But the unfortunate Prince not finding his soul at rest, as by what appeared might easily be conjectur'd, had not the power to stay any longer in the Queen's company, but resolv'd to be gone for fear Gadena should put him to a farther nonplus. He believed that that dutiful person, being as much concern'd for his interests as for Octavia's, might draw from him something of discovery, that would not a little perplex him. And because he was neither able to disguise his thoughts, nor declare his engagement to Constance, for fear of afflicting his Princefs, he rather chose to deprive himself of her Company for some little time, than expose himself to the danger of giving her any cause of disquiet. So soon as he was retired into his Chamber, his soul was was turmoyl'd with various troubles, while he the most happy, yet the most miserable of all Lovers, beheld the Sovereign Arbitratrix of his life, without daring to dispose of himself. His heart and his love perswaded him to procure to himself the satisfaction of enjoying what he lov'd; but his reason and his honour imperiously commanded him to acquit himself of his promise. He endured a torment unconceivable, while he sustain'd the shock of these violent, yet opposite passions. At length, weary with the punishment that he inflict'd upon himself, Severe voice, cryed he, of a cruel duty I will no longer obey thee; I adore the divine Octavia, she does not oppose my happiness, and shall I be so much my enemy my self to renounce my own felicity? But how shall I presume to present the hand of a person without honour, and a breaker of his word to a fair and great Queen.

He mus'd a while upon what he had said, and believing that he had found out a way to satisfy his love and his acknowledgment, he was intended humbly to have besought the Queen to consummate his felicity, so soon as they should be arriv'd in Armorica, resolving to go afterwards where the interests of Constance call'd him, with the honourable advantage of being in the possession of his Princess. But immediately repenting of such a thought, as of a most horrible crime; Is it for any other reason, said he, than more sensibly to afflict the Queen of Albion, that thou pretendest that she should favour thee the more? Is it not enough that a Lover must forsake her, but that she must also lose a Husband? Is it fitting that a Prince who is not master of his own will, should be united in wedlock to that divine person, to be immediately separated from her, only to submit his destiny to the humour of a Court that is at enmity with him? No, no, Constantine, it behoves thee not to aspire to a Dignity of which thou art not yet worthy, which thou canst not peaceably enjoy until thou hast acquitted thy self of thy promise to Constance. If it cost thee thy life to restore that Roman to his lost favour, thou dost but in acknowledgment return him that which he has given thee out of his meer generosity; and by so doing, far from leaving Octavia the widow of an unfortunate Prince, thy death will advance her to the Sovereignty of many Kingdoms, and put her into a condition to chuse where she pleases. What hast thou to say, added he all of sudden, feeble Lover, fainthearted Lover? canst thou think without dying that another should enjoy the Queen of Albion? O Heavens, that sent me into the world only for that divine Princess's sake, will you suffer so terrible a piece of injustice?

After he had thus lamented to himself, he perceiv'd the troubles of his Soul increase, and imagining that only the company of the person belov'd could allay them, he hasted to Octavia's Apartment. That lovely person receiv'd him with her usual kindness, however, as Lovers are generally quick of apprehension, Constantine observ'd something more of coldness, and less of freedom in her conversation. Her eyes also seem'd less to sparkle, instead whereof they shewed more of sweetness and a charming languishment, which how far could they not affect a heart of which they were already Sovereign Controulers? Constantine thereupon retired more forlorn than before, yet spent the night with more content than disquiet; for he determin'd to abandon himself wholly to that good fortune which he could work out by his own endeavours, rather than submit his fate to Constance's disposal, being of opinion that he should acquit himself well enough toward his Friend, if he march'd to Rome with a force equal to that of Honorius, and with his Arms in his hands restor'd him to his former condition. But the light of his reason returning with the light of the morning, he foresaw that in executing such a design, he should but destroy Constance's Country, and render Constance odious to his Fellow-Citizens: and that on the other side, by marching at the head of a puissant Army, he should rather seem to act with pride and caution, than perswaded by the motives of a true generosity. Thus his virtue contending with his passion, soon renewed his cares, till at length, labouring under such an opposition of thoughts, he determin'd upon his last resolve. However, that he might examine with himself what he had to do, he took a walk forth of the City in a pleasant place, which deriving its name from the renowned Family of the Scipio's, is called the Cornelian Gardens. Constantine had no sooner weigh'd what Octavia and Constance could reasonably require from a heart full of love and acknowledgment, but he judg'd that for the very honour of the Princess, he ought to keep his word with his Friend: and fixing in an opinion which he found so just, he sat him down at the foot of a great Tree, and the few Attendants that followed him being retired, for fear his passion should alter his resolution, he presently wrote these following Lines to Constance.

I Have made a happy advantage of that leave you gave me to go and fight for the Queen of Al-bion. The Princess is free as I am also, and shall suddenly render my self your Captive, according to your order. And I dare make you this protestation, that I have never surceas'd from being so, since I have been so far from breaking those chains which you have made so easie, that I have rather more strongly invited them by my acknowledgment. In short, having reveng'd the death of Gratian, and set Octavia at liberty, I thought it my Duty to acquit my self of my promise to you, and to be true to that word which I gave you more than once. Dispose absolutely of my destiny, nothing can hinder me —

At those words, instead of having power to write on, his pen dropp'd from his hand, when rearing up his eyes to Heaven, Is it reasonable, mournfully he cryed, that my destiny should be at the disposal of any other than my Princess? Alas! to what an extremity of misfortune am I reduc'd? Was ever heart so rent and torn with the violence of tyrannick passions? Or ever suffered the violence of more boysterous and contrary agitations? Then returning to ponder upon the miserable condition of his fortune, he fell into such a deep contemplation, that he perceiv'd not Constant coming toward him. The Prince was newly arriv'd from Barcelona, and understanding that the King was in the Garden which I mention'd before, he came to give him an account of his journey, and of some other particulars of weight which he had to communicate to him. He discours'd him all the way as they return'd to the City, and told him that the Goths would not let him enter into the City; that the report was that King Autalph was slain, and that Sigeric had usurp'd the Sovereign Authority. They assured me also, said he, that Placidia had been the innocent cause of her Husband's death, in having dissuaded him to wage war in Italy, a sufficient provocation to enrage the fury of a Nation that took delight to enrich themselves by plunder. That thereupon the Queen of the Goths was departed from Barcelona with her dear Virginia, in expectation of Prince Wallia's return, for whom she had sent, and of whom they also related very extraordinary Adventures.

Constant entertain'd the King of the Britains to the very Gates of Tarracon with this discourse, but not having met with any person that could tell him any tyding concerning Constance, he made no mention of him. Constantine was touch'd with a real sorrow for the death of Autalph, but the disturbance which he felt for that was nothing comparable to the content that renewed it self in his mind to see the hopes of his generous Friend revive. He thought also that it behoy'd himself to give him notice of so important a revolution, before he had any other information. In the mean time having a desire to finish the Letter which he intended to send, he found he had lost the Table-Book wherein he had begun to write it. Immediately he gave me order to seek it in the place where he thought he had left it; but at the very time that he saw I could not find it, and was about to make use of another, there came to him certain Commissioners from Didymus and Verodian. They took up a good part of the day with Constantine, in pleading for their Master's interest, when the amorous Prince having disengag'd himself from their company, hasted to visit Octavia, manifestly troubled that he had been so long depriv'd of her Society. But he was strangely surpris'd when he was told that the fair Princess was sick, and that she had given a strict command that no person should come into her Chamber. Is it possible, (said he, extremely terrified) that that command should concern me, and that the Queen has not left me out of the crowd?

His astonishment not permitting him to say more, Octavia's Page took upon him to speak, and because he knew not his Mistress's mind, he made answer according to what he thought himself: You conjecture right, Sir, said he, that it is not usual to give no more respect to a great King, than to the vulgar; and therefore instead of refusing entrance to him, as to the rest of the people, we only beseech him not to make use of that privilege which his Birth and Dignity claim. Besides this general consideration, (said he, seeing that my Master stood musing and vex'd) you know, Sir, that a Princess, who was the Daughter of Gratian, has a particular reverence for your Majesty, nor do I believe that your Majesty can suspect that a person so infinitely just, can fail of her esteem and acknowledgment for the renowned King of the Britains.

The afflicted Constantine, instead of making any answer, was perplex'd with his own sad thoughts; and whether he believ'd that Octavia was sick, or whether he thought her unfaithful, his anguish was not to be express'd. He sigh'd, he look'd upon the Princess's Attendant; and though he ardently desired to be better instructed, he would not presume to draw any further discovery from his mouth, such was his fear, lest he should understand any thing that might increase his affliction, or any way diminish that profound respect which he had for Octavia, by causing her Servants to speak more than they had order to let him know. He return'd therefore with a restless impatience, and no sooner was he got into his Chamber, but he abandon'd his Soul to that dreadful grief that had seiz'd it: many times he perswaded himself that Octavia's health was endamag'd by the various accidents that had befallen her, but he was always more inclin'd to believe that the Princess's heart began to waver.

While he laboured under the apprehension of the latter misfortune, he considered every thing that might be the occasion thereof, and finding himself neither guilty in word nor in thought, he sent boldly to the Queen's Apartment to understand the condition of her health. But the Page whom he sent, return'd no better inform'd than he had been himself, only he learn'd that Octavia took her repose, and that no persons were admitted into the Room. Many others were sent with the same success. Nor was Constant or my self more prosperous, for all that we could learn, was, that the Queen was very melancholy, and that all other company was troublesome to her but Gadenz's. Upon that Constantine fell into a kind of despair; but instead of repeating all the complaints that he made, it will be sufficient for your Majesty to understand, that he thought himself far more unhappy for being thus out of the Queen's favour, than for all the misfortunes that ever besel him at any other time. Some few days after he was inform'd that Gadenz had perswaded her fair Mistress to take a walk every Evening in the Cornelian Gardens. The news whercof overjoyed him, being in hopes that he should thereby find an opportunity to throw himself at the Queen's feet, to the end he might either satisfy himself, or expire for grief, if she continued inexorable. However, he forbore the first night she took the air, as not being willing to give her too hasty a disturbance: but he could not admit of a longer delay, and therefore the next day he suffered himself to be guided by the violence of his passion. Nevertheless, that he might observe his opportunity, he thought it not convenient to tarry till the Queen was in the Garden, believing that he should commit a great piece of folly, should he go to disturb her in a place where she sought retirement: and therefore he resolv'd to be there two or three hours before the Queen's usual time. And for fear so nice a person should come to have intelligence of his being there, he was let in at a little door in the most private and unfrequented part of the Garden. There he remain'd in the most remote part of all, and fearing lest the diversity of objects should interrupt a contemplation that pleas'd him beyond the most delightful place in the world, he laid down upon the Grass, and by and by turning himself upon his right side, he negligently lean'd his head with his eye fix'd upon the ground. In this sad posture he revolv'd in his mind all the misfortunes of his life; but when he came to think upon the Princess's displeasure, he felt his Soul assail'd with a grief so painful, that his courage not being able to resist the tenderness of his affection; the unfortunate Lover not only sigh'd, but shed tears, when he call'd to mind the cruel unkindness which he had so little merited.

While he afflicts himself in that manner, two Ladies cross'd that solitary part where he lay, and walking some five or six steps behind him, when they beheld his proportion and his habit they were not a little surpris'd, as appear'd by their whispering. They were both very lovely, though with no small difference; for she that was incomparably beyond the other, mov'd with such a majestick air, that thereby it was easie to conjecture that her descent could not but be as illustrious as any in the world. In short, Madam, it was the charming Queen of the Goths, who having made an escape out of Barcelona with her beloved Virginia, to avoid the consequences of a violent Rebellion, was retired to Tarracon, being pleas'd with the solitariness of the Cornelian Gardens. At that time, as my Master afterwards understood, she was discoursing of her misfortunes to Virginia; sometimes shedding tears when she remembred Autalpb, and sometimes sighing for the return of Prince Wallia, as the only protector that she had among the Goths. While she thought of the absence of that virtuous Prince, she could not forbear to speak of her faithful and unhappy Constance, which sad and pleasing discourse took up their time, till my my Master's comly Stature, little differing from that of the renowned Roman, fix'd at once both their eyes and feet. The astonish'd Placidia could not tell at present what to think, but she had no sooner cast her eyes upon the Sword which Constance had given to the King of the Britains, which she knew again by the Hilt that had been often admired in the Court of Rome, when she took him for her Renowned Lover; and not being able to controul the first motions of her surprize, Ab! Is it Constan—— she cryed, but not being able to say any more, her colour chang'd so, that she had fallen to the ground, had not Virginia upheld her: my Master hearing the shriek, turn'd about, and seeing the different conditions of those two fair persons, he immediately rose up and ran to their relief. Nor could he do less than hold the charming Queen of the Goths in his Arms, in regard while Virginia's were too weak, long to continue their assistance. But so soon as Placidia was come to her self, and that Constantine understood her name, he fell before her upon one knee, and kiss'd the hemm of her garment, and without any regard to his own dignity, he gave to that fair and great Princess, all the honour which he thought due to the Widow of the King of the Goths, the Roman Emperour's Sister, and generous Constantine's Mistress. Placidia on the other hand no sooner understood him, to be the great King of Albion in that submissive posture, but she rais'd him, and shewed him all the civility which Honorius himself would have claimed.

Afterwards these two illustrious persons, entertain'd one another with a free and pleasing discourse: nor would Constantine notwithstanding Placidia's reservedness, forbear to speak continually of his friend, and no less to praise his love, his fidelity, the grandeur of his courage, and the generosity of his soul. It was a discourse that many times made the Queen blush, and fain she would have changed the subject, but the diligent Constantine strove to convince the scruples of her mind, and endeavoured to fortifie the motions of her heart, which he made no doubt were favourable to Constance. He offered Placidia also to restore her to Ataulph's Throne, but she refused it, as deeming it unjust to deprive Sigeric of his succession to his Uncle, nor being willing to reign with a Gotbick Prince, whom she loved as little as she hated Constance. Virginia, who greatly pityed that renowned Roman, many times seconded the King of the Britains. Nor were they willing to leave off a discourse so pleasing, but that it grew late, and that Placidia was to return to her Chariot. Constantine led her thither, and before he left her, he renewed those proffers which he had made her, before, promising either to protect her, or to send her to the Emperour. Placidia testified her acknowledg'ment, but in answer to the generous Constantine, she told him that she had chosen a private retiring place, upon the banks of Hebrus, where she resolv'd to live without any noise or pomp, till the return of Prince Wallia: Judging that in point of decency, he being of the whole blood of Antalph, and the most virtuous Prince among the Goths, was the fittest person to return her to Honorius. The King of the Britains approving the prudence of Queen Placidia, press'd her no farther, nor would he presume to enquire the name of the place, to which she intended to retire, knowing that she might easily send to Terracon, if she had any need of his assistance.

Being parted from that fair Queen, he felt the violence of his passion increase, the effects whereof were only suspended, so that now having no other thoughts, but of seeing the divine Octavia and recovering her favour, he sought for her with all the diligence imaginable, he searched every thicket behind every hedge, and at last when he almost despaired of finding her, he saw her in an Arbor shaded all over with green boughs. She was sitting upon a bank of Cammomel, leaning her head carelessly upon Gadena's shoulder, manifesting by her looks, and by the tears that trickled down her fair cheeks; the painful Anguish of her soul. So soon as she perceived the King of the Britains, she blush'd: Ab! Gadena, cryed she, who is that which I see?

After these few words she rose up hastily, and went forth at another door, opposite to that where the Astonish'd Constantine, stood immoveable like a Statue. How great soever were the surprize of that unfortunate Prince, yet greater was the force of his love, the violence whereof carried him toward the fair and pitiless Octavia. He stay'd her, he threw himself at her feet, and while sighs and sobbings interrupted his half uttered words; Great Queen, he cryed in a mournful tone, for heavens sake what fault have I committed? discover your mind, and suffer me either to justify my self, or to dye for the expiation of my crimes. The hard hearted Princess instead of being moved, beheld the afflicted Prince with all the signs of a fierce Anger, and struggling to get loose out of his Arms, Go perfidious, go ungrateful man, said she, unworthy of thy birth and rank, go live and reign in quiet, far from the unhappy daughter of an unfortunate Father. With that she went very swiftly toward one of the Garden doors, while my Master getting before the Damself that followed her; Generous Gadena, said he with tears in his eyes, have you no pity upon a miserable creature, whose only hope is your protection? Sir, (answered she with a coy behaviour, and still eagerly pressing to follow Octavia) I spoke in your behalf when I could do it without prejudice, but were it true that you had still need of my mediation, you are not any longer to expect it: For in short, I am clearly of opinion, that it behoves me to prefer the concerns of my Mistress before yours. And better it is that in doing my duty, I should act according to reason, than———According to reason, said he interrupting her, Ab! Gadena,———Yes, Sir, answered she in a fret, according to reason; after which she flung from him in great hast to overtake Octavia, who was already at a good distance before.

The disconsolate Constantine followed her, but because he durst not presume before all the world, world to hinder her from taking her Chariot, and for that decency did not permit him to follow her a foot, he beheld her as she went away with a dreadful anguish. He return'd to Tarracon very fast, his countenance chang'd, despair in his eyes, and suffering himself to be guided by the violence of the passions that reign'd in his Soul, he went to Octavia's Apartment, and laying aside that circumspection which he was wont to observe, he entred without demanding whether he might or no, and without taking any notice of those persons that made their obeysances to him, he went directly to the Chamber of the severe Princess. Presently he threw himself at her feet, and not having the power to speak, he express'd himself only by his tears. But the Queen, instead of being mov'd therewith, or looking upon them as the signs of his love or repentance, was so cruel as to turn away her face, and rearing up her eyes to Heaven; Alas! she cry'd, (shall I never find any Sanctuary to protect me from the persecutions of an enemy so odious?)

Those words so dreadful, struck a terrour into the very heart of Constantine, so that the unfortunate Prince standing in an amaze for some time, at length fell down in a swoon before the inexorable Octavia: yet did she not appear altogether so pitiless upon that accident; for she could not forbear to cry out for help, nay, to run her self to the assistance of Constantine; but the King was no sooner come to himself, but the severe Virgin vex'd that she had been so sensible of compassion, and not enduring to see my Master, went into her Closet, and shut the door after her; Constantine followed with plaints and entreaties, but all in vain; so that being reduc'd to the extremity of despair, he had certainly ended this miserable life, if the Religion which we profess had not been an enemy to all violence of that nature: for that commands us to wait till the supreme power that gave us life thinks fitting to take it away again. So that my Master durst not presume to imitate those unfortunate Heroes, who were wont to prefer death before servitude, or a long series of misfortunes. Thereupon he retired back to his own Apartment, where he refus'd either to eat, or to be seen of any person, spending the cruel night that succeeded so fatal a day in walking up and down the Chamber, instead of taking the least care of his rest. He examined also with himself what might be the cause of his disgrace: and comparing in his thoughts Octavia's words with the circumstances of time and place, he believ'd that the Princess might have been a witness of his discourse with the Queen of the Goths, and not knowing the true reason of those civilities that pass'd between them, he made conjectures thereupon which were not altogether without foundation. However, he soon reject'd any such thoughts as being too empty; for he durst not presume to imagine that Octavia could nourish in her heart a passion against him, void of love; besides that, he remember'd very well, that before his meeting with Placidia, his Princess had already begun to scorn him and decline his visits. Nevertheless, not to omit any thing for his satisfaction, he resolv'd to put it to the proof; and to that end, he went to the Queen of Britain's Apartment, so soon as decency would permit him. But instead of seeing her, he was surpris'd after a strange manner, when they told him that she was retired to a Religious House of Virgins, consecrated to the service of that God whom we adore, and that she had chosen that Sanctuary to be free from the persecutions of a Prince for whom she had nothing but a little pity remaining. Constantine all forlorn, hasted to the place of her retirement; he desired to speak with a person named Paulina, who was the chief Abbess, telling her such sad stories of his affection and Generosity, that she began to be really mov'd. At length he desired her to get leave of the Queen of Albion that he might see her. He promised easily to clear the mistake, and to justify himself, in relation to his meeting with that Lady whom he saw in the Cornelian Gardens. He gave her instructions also to make it out to her, that her dissatisfaction was groundless, and that it must of necessity be a wrong interpretation of his actions or his words, that had produc'd that aversion in her mind. Paulina, who understood the sincerity of his intentions, was very willing to undertake the composition of the difference, and being perswaded that she should take pains for the good of several Nations, in favouring Constantine's designs, she went to Octavia, but spake to her with more earnestness than good success. The severe Princess confidently answer'd, that she knew too well that Constantine was guilty, that she would neither see nor hear him, nor give ear to his justification, for fear he should deceive her a second time. However, Paulina would not be so answer'd as yet, she made her a reply, and urg'd all the reason she could in my Master's behalf: but Octavia continued in her obstinacy, and believing that the person that took Constantine's part to be her self abus'd, she would at length no longer endure the discourse. The wise and prudent Paulina fearing farther to provoke her, would not presume to talk any more of the King; so that when she went to give the unfortunate Lover an account of the success of her mediation; There is no remedy, Madam, (said he, with tears in his eyes) but I must die, since my innocence can- not save me; nor indeed is it to appear in my behalf, when the divine Octavia condemns me. But, Madam, said he, sighing, is it not enough that I must be unfortunate, but that for my sake a young and beautiful Queen must shut her self up in sad retirement? For Heaven's sake root from her mind a resolution which will be so fatal to her, persuade that severe Princess sometimes to go abroad to take the air, and use those divertisements that are answerable to her age and dignity. I will endeavour as much as in me lies to procure her comfort, without considering that she makes me miserable, wishing her an accomplish'd happiness, at the very time she causes me to die a death so strange and cruel.

Paulina mov'd more than before with my Master's Generosity, promis'd also to take his concerns upon her, not believing that Octavia would refuse her what she desired, only for her own advantage; nevertheless the Princess remain'd inexorable, No, no, (answered she, with a fierceness not usual with her) I will not go out of this place so long as Constantine shall be in Spain: for while that perfidious person is in the same Country with me, I will shut my self up in a perpetual retirement, lest in going abroad I should expose myself to the danger of meeting him.

The disconsolate Constantine no sooner understood the last resolution of Octavia, but he departed without being able to speak, such a load of grief oppress'd his Soul; and being retired into his Chamber, he sent for Constant and my self; he seem'd to us to be quite chang'd, his eyes that wont to glisten with a warlike and amorous fire, appeared heavy and clouded: nor might you less perceive all other symptoms of a person hating life. Then looking upon the British Prince with a sad aspect, Cousin, said he, I leave to your care the entire conduct of the Army; I leave to you all my Rights, Privileges and Pretences; I recommend to you my dear and faithful Dinocus; and I desire you to reward and employ Lenox. As for the King my Father, I do not mention him; for I know what thoughts nature and virtue have infus'd into your Breast for so good a Prince. But give me leave fully to instruct you what to do in relation to the divine Princess whom I adore: so soon as I am gone ——— Ob, Sir, (said we, interrupting him, and throwing our selves at his feet) it shall never be said that we forsook you, since we love your person above all the Kingdoms of the world. For Heaven's sake, replied he, sighing, tye not your selves any longer to the fortune of a miserable man; you have suffered too much already for me; 'tis time for you to seek that repose which I have made you lose, and for me to find out death for the satisfaction of Octavia.

Prince Constant and my self endeavoured to lay before him that the Queen of Albion could neither hate him, nor long continue her discourse; but instead of hearkening to us, with a lively aspect, It is too true that I am scorn'd by that fair Princess, she has told me as much to my face; and I am too unhappy that it is not in my power to die after such a Sentence. Nor should I so much as dream of any comfort, did I not believe that Heaven has preserv'd me on purpose to be serviceable to Constance, and that I may be able to offer to the interest of such a Friend a life which I hold by his Generosity. Therefore oppose not my resolution, you will contend in vain, for I believe I commit as many crimes as I stay minutes in Spain, and therefore I am resolv'd for Germany, where I shall either find Constance, or an honourable death.

In short, Madam, my Master was so obstinate in the execution of his design, that all that we could obtain from him was, that I should attend him with two or three of his Esquires. He left precise commands with Prince Constant to take care of the King of Armórica, and the Queen of Great Britain; and constituted him his General Viceroy over all his Dominions, and absolute General of his Armies. After this we made all the haste we could to the Pyrenean Hills, and were no sooner entred into Gallia, but my Master, the most perfect Lover that ever was, dispatch'd a Courier with a Letter to this effect.

The unhappy Constantine to the Divine Queen of Britain.

You are free in Spain, Madam, I have left it, and I shall suddenly leave the world, that you may live without reserv'dness, and that your liberty may have no other bounds than the ends of the earth. I also vow that I will not justify my self before my death, knowing that I must be certainly guilty, while it is my misfortune so to be esteem'd in your thoughts. The veneration which I have for whatever concern you, is so great that I rather wish my honour may suffer reproach, and be blasted, than you should be accounted unjust. And that my memory should be odious, than that my innocency should vex your repentance for having condemn'd me without a cause.

He felt some ease after he had thus disburthen'd his thoughts; and continuing his resolution, he thought it convenient to change his name to travel with more safety. And therefore he took the name of Viridonix, which he had already made use of, travelling very hard every day to reach the Banks of the Rhine. I should have oppos'd his design, but remembering Melusina's prediction, I made no question but that Constance was the person that was to put a stop to the misfortunes of Constantine's life, as he had stopp'd the torrent of his Victories in the Province of the Romans. I made some interpretations of it to my Master, who having little disposition to believe things that pleas'd him, answer'd me with a melancholy aspect, that he would not flatter himself, being a miserable person that had no hope left, but such an unfortunate person, that without considering the event of things, would use his utmost endeavour to his last gasp. In this manner talk'd the unfortunate Lover upon the Road, and believing he should find the end of his misfortunes upon the Banks of the Rhine, he post'd thither with all the speed imaginable. We pass'd through A Armorica, where we got together some five hundred Horse for our Guard; and you well know that upon our arrival we were charg'd by a party of Cimbrians, that Constantine defended himself like an undaunted Hero, till at length he was rescu'd by the Prince of the Huns, whose timely aid sav'd the life of that great King.

Thus, Madam, you have heard what have been the Adventures of my renowned Master. I have repeated the story at large, since it was your own command, and without considering that I had not eloquence enough to discourse upon such a subject as I ought before your Majesty, I only look'd upon my Duty that oblig'd me to obey so great a Queen, or at least to satisfy her curiosity, if I could not answer the perfection of her ingenuity.

PHARAMOND.

The Ninth Part.

BOOK I.

D*Inocus* had no sooner finish'd the History of Constantine, but the fair Queen of Turingia by most obliging testimonies manifested her attention to his Relation, letting him understand how much she was concern'd for the mistortunes of the King his Master. Balamir also testified how much he admir'd the Actions of that great Prince; but because it was late, they thought it now convenient to take their leaves of Amalazontha; whereupon he departed together with Dinocus, whither his employment, and the care of the King of Britain call'd him. He beheld that renowned personage with an increase of his esteem, not being able to forbear giving him those praises which Constantine could not brook, though no more than what he deserved from all the world. But those two brave persons were no sooner parted from one another, but they abandon'd their thoughts to the passions that reign'd in their Souls, while the divine Beauties of Rosamond and Ocīavia busied their contemplation, during the greatest part of the night. But while the chains of those two fair Queens depriv'd them of that rest, which the greatest part of the world then enjoyed. The King of Suevia was troubled with a passion less just, but more tumultuous. He could not endure no more than the hairbrain'd Briomer, that the Queen of the Turingiens should quit their party; and their rage still tormented them with greater violence, when they considered that Pharamond, the object of their implacable hatred, was however not hated by Amalazontha. After a thousand designs which they had contriv'd in disorder, they resolv'd at length to oppose by open force the departure of the Turingiens: and to avoid the dividing of the Army, and from engaging it in a Fight which might expose it to the Enemy, they resolv'd so to strengthen their party, that the Queen of Turingia instead of being in a condition to resist should be forc'd to obey the Laws of the predominating Faction. The King of the Herules was of their Cabal and Judgment. And Gondiocb, the Rival and particular Enemy of Pharamond, would with all his Soul have been willing to have hinder'd a disunion of the Army in favour of the King of the Franks, if that remainder of natural Generosity which was yet left him, would have permitted him to have taken Arms to restrain the liberty of a fair and young Princess. Gondemar was too virtuous to enter into that conspiracy. And indeed the King of Suevia knew him too well to impart any thing of a design to him which was contrary to his inclinations. Besides that, he very impatiently endured his humour in most affairs; nor was there in all the Army a Prince, except Balamir, more likely to prejudice the resolution he had taken. Therefore to the end it might succeed more prosperous, he thought fit not to speak of it at all; for though Ardaric were Pharamond's Rival, and that the young King of the Basternes sigh'd for Albifinda, he rather chose to dispense with the assistance of those two Princes, than to discover a design wherein he apprehended but little success.

Nevertheless,

Nevertheless, for the better management of the enterprize, he was willing to understand what contrivance might be used in the Turingiens Quarters: to which purpose, though he had given instructions to certain confidants of his own, he could not forbear going privately himself, together with Briomer, to hear and observe what was discours'd among the Troops, which he looked upon as Enemies. Immediately he listen'd up and down in several places to no purpose, but coming to the Tent of one of Amalazontha's principal Officers.

After some words spoken the sense whereof he could not understand, he heard a certain person pursuing the following discourse; 'Tis true, Sir, said he, that to morrow you have a very favourable opportunity of seeing the Queen, but has a person of your condition, any need of so nicely observing your time, rather may you not expect many privileges, after so many services performed? That which I have done, replied the other, is so much above the meanest recompence, that the divine Amalazontha can bestow upon me, that I cannot question her bearing it in remembrance, and I assure you that I had not come only to give her a visit, had I not understood by that intelligence which you know I have, that she is to march hence to morrow, contrary to the good liking of the King of Suevia, and several other Princes, upon which occasion I thought my self in a capacity to serve her. There is another young Prince, replied the former, that has the same design in this Camp. Ah! if that be true, replied the other sighing, I have more cause to bewail my own condition than I thought for, nor can I tell whether my reason, will be sufficiently powerful to tame a passion, which it has essay'd to subject to its Empire. My desires began to be less violent, for as I could not conceive any hopes, that I might preserve the Accord of my first passion, I began to encline to deprive my self of the sight of that which I adore. But now I find that the competitorship of a Lover, that may be more happy than my self, rekindles a flame that I endeavour'd to have extinguish'd: For when I consider that the Rival whom you mention, comes to serve Amalazontha, having the same design that brings me hither, and the same affliction that I have, not the same advantages, when I consider that he may aspire to a happiness, which only my Birth forbids me to pretend to, all the generosity of my soul is too weak, from hindering me to envy his felicity, from opposing it, and from bewailing my cruel destiny. The unfortunate Lover held his peace, after he had thus expressed himself, when the impatient King of Suevia not being able to endure, that any person should come to the assistance of a Princess, whom he so mortally hated, resolv'd to secure those two commanders, whose discourse he had overheard, and to punish all those that had kept correspondence with him.

To that purpose he went his ways in great haste, called for Briomer, told him all he had heard, and what he intended to do. From thence they went to the King of the Herules, and after they had talked to him, according to the violence of their own rash humour, they all agreed that it was better to let alone two persons, that were only concern'd for Amalazontha's interests, and could do no considerable harm, rather than to make a disturbance among the Turingiens, unless they could become their absolute Masters. I confess, said the King of Suevia, it would be a means to give the Queen of the Cimbrians, the Prince of the Huns, the Kings of the Alains and Gepides, as also the King of the Burgundians himself, an opportunity to seek an accommodation, and I make no question, whether they would not think themselves oblig'd to take the Princess's part, whom we would rather constrain to be of our side. Therefore it behoves us to give a false Alarm to the French Camp, to cause the whole Army to stand to their Arms, and if the Turingiens then refuse to fight for us, we may without scruple fall upon them, and cut them in pieces: for in short we must finish our work when once we begin, and utterly destroy those whom we have once provok'd, lest out of a desire of revenge they revolt to our Enemies, or else assist them in those attempts, which they may make upon our Camp.

Godegesile and Briomer approv'd the King of Suevia's counsel, so that after a long deliberation upon the means, which they were to make use of for the execution of their design, they gave out many private orders, after which they retired expecting day with an extreme impatience. No sooner did the morning begin to display her beams, over those vast numbers of men of war, but several Scouts in a strange terrour came and brought news, that the Army of the Franks was advanced on this side the Line, that Pharamond had drawn from Segoduna to the Mountain, and that they came on in good order, to attempt some great enterprize without all doubt. Upon that the King of the Suevians and the Herules, were very much surpris'd, while the Captains of so many Nations as compos'd that formidable body, calling the Soldiers to their duty, you might have seen the Cimbrians, the Suevians, the Burgundians, the Alains, the Gepides, the Herulians and Basternes, rang'd in an instant under their peculiar standards.

The principal Officers of the Turingiens gave the same Orders, and their Queen seeing herself in honour oblig'd to consent thereto, notwithstanding her passion, was cruelly afflicted to be reduced to that extremity. True it is that her grief was soon allayed, a certain Knight having assured her upon his word, that the intelligence which the Scouts brought was utterly false, and that the Franks had not so much as made a shew, of coming out of their Trenches. The serious aspect of him that spoke, soon perswaded her to give him credit, for so noble was the behaviour of that brave Champion, that he attracted the eyes and respect of all the Turingiens upon him, how mean soever the Arms were which he then wore. Almost all the Army believed already, what that unknown person had divulg'd, when Prince Balanir confirm'd the truth, having only discovered instead of the Enemies Army, some few Squadrons of the Suevian Cavalry, that coasted along the side of the Wood, which was between the two Camps. The King of the Suevians and Herules, were very much incens'd against the Scouts, that brought such a groundless piece of intelligence, and caused them to be diligently sought for in all places, where they knew they were not to be found. Nevertheless, they did not much endeavour to perswade the rest, that it was not by their order that this false Alarm had been given, seeing they did it only to discover the Turingiens intentions; and since they had effected what they desired, they were not much troubled that it should be known to be their own contrivance. But though the Turingiens stood to their Arms, yet were not the two Kings very well satisfied, for they had much rather that the Turingiens had given them cause to accuse them, and a plausible pretence to have fallen upon them.

Immediately they sent for Briomer, they walked together to consult what they had to do, and found themselves sufficiently at a loss, what way to go about the execution of their design. In the interim some of their trusty Agents, among those whom they had entertain'd in every Regiment of that great Army, came to give them notice that Amalazontha was gone out of the Castle, toward the Turingiens Quarter, to hasten their departure, for fear of exposing them to the danger of some unexpected Battel.

Upon that news, they looked all three upon one another, as if they expected from each other, an immediate remedy against a mischief they so little dream'd of. When the King of the Suevians being most forward to speak; What do we stand considering for, said he, when Amalazontha openly deserts our interests, and for ought we know intends to joyn with the murderer of the King her Brother? Shall we be more wary and cautious in an act of justice, which we are going about to put in execution, than Amalazontha is in a design so opposite, to the sacred laws of her birth and our alliance. Let us oppose her attempt, let us compel her to act according to her duty and our wills; let us secure her person, and then we may easily take an order with the Turingien Troops. Godegesile and Briomer easily agreed, and the latter of the two by the command of the two Kings, put himself at the head of five hundred chosen Horse, to meet Amalazontha.

This violent instrument of the passion of two Princes, put himself in a place where the Queen of Turingia was necessarily to pass, and no sooner did she appear, but approaching her in a rude manner; Madam, said he, I have order to conduct you back to the Castle, where you may remain with more reputation and safety, than among men of war. You have order to conduct me back to the Castle, said Amalazontha interrupting him, who is there, I pray, that claims so much authority over a person, that acknowledges no power but that of Heaven? We have not time now to examine those priviledges, replied Briomer, for the noise and tumult of Arms, either interrupts or will not give us liberty, to hearken to such discourses. Meer piece of insolence, said she, dost thou not know that thou speakest to a Queen? Yes, I know it well, said he, but I know withal, that it is by the order of certain great Kings that I speak, and that I am to oppose your design. How, said Amalazontha thorowly anger'd, can they hinder me from looking after my own forces and disposing of them, and shall not Amalazontha sooner dye, than see her liberty subjected to the violent humour of Tyrants? Concluding these words she was about to go forward, when Briomer more forcibly opposing her passage; Return Madam, said he after a very rude and resolute manner, and expect to make use of that liberty, of which you suffer suspension so impatiently, when you shall give such orders to your subjects, as are conformable to your dignity, and that kindness which you ought to have for the memory of your brother. And not being contented to have spoken after this manner, he insolently took Amalazontha by the Arm to force her to return back to the Castle, while the extraordinary commission which he executed, having made a noise over all the Army, had drawn together several Troops from all quarters of the Camp.

By and by appeared a great body of the Turingien Cavalry, commanded by several Officers of the greatest quality in that Nation, highly zealous in Aiding their Queen. But their zeal, how vehement soever it were, did not equal the eager fury of two Knights, who separating from the rest of the Body, flew among Briomer's Guards, threatening them in a most terrible terrible manner, Uld, Barbarians, they cryed, and not being able to use more words, they explain'd their meaning in deeds more conformable to their anger, for with two prodigious thrusts of their Lances they laid several of the Sueves upon the earth, while others trembled for fear; and after that, drawing their Swords, they fell in with the rest with so much valour and impetuous fury, that the Turingiens that followed them had soon disorder'd Briomer's party. In the mean time, those two Champions fought every where for the Leader of that affrighted crue, at what time the King of the Suevians and Herulians, understanding that Briomer was in danger, hasted with several Troops, either to bring him off, or to defend him; on the other hand, the rest of Amalazontha's Forces advancing, there had began an encounter which might have prov'd bloody enough, if Balamir, followed by a Body of the Cimbrians, together with the King of the Gepides and Basternes with their own Life-Guards, had not come in time to prevent it.

The Generous King of the Britains also, who could not endure to keep his Bed at such a time as that, notwithstanding the inconvenience of his wounds, called for Horse and Arms, and whatever his faithful Dinocus could persuade to the contrary, he could not hinder his valiant Master from joyning with the Prince of the Huns to assist him either in composing the difference, or in fighting as occasion should serve. All the Captains that knew the famous Constantine gave a great shout for joy, and indeed the presence of that great King, who was already highly reverenc'd in the Army, was very useful to Balamir, who with a surprising swiftness rode from Rank to Rank, prayed, entreated, menaced, and at the same time made use of his Sword, as necessity required. Ardaric and Humbert acted little less vigorously; and Rosamond and Albifinda shewed themselves at the Castle Windows to the most eager of all the Troops; the fair Queen of the Cimbrians also made continual signs with her fair hands, call'd the principal Officers by their names, and spoke to them, either as she saw them act, or according to that power which she had over them. To so many deeds, and so many words, Balamir, Constantine and Ardaric added so many arguments, and so many pressing instances, addressing themselves to the King of Suevia, representing to him, that the Army in destroying it self would become a prey to King Pharamond, so that at length the very name of Pharamond, so odious to the enraged King, appeas'd some part of his anger, and settled him soon after in a capacity to follow their advice, such was his fear of disuniting an Army which was to fight against the King of the Franks. Godegesile and Briomer, whom the conformity of their humours, and their hatred against Pharamond, rendered faithful partners with the King of Suevia's temper, moderated their fury, so that all the rest of the Troops, according to their example, finding the heat of their animosity to cool, that had stirred them up one against another, suddenly retired, and all the tumult was quieted and calm'd in less time than they took to engage themselves. In the mean while the two Champions that fought so heroically for the interests of Amalazontha, had flung themselves among the Suevians that Briomer commanded, and had open'd themselves a way to the very Queen of the Turingiens, that she might behold them sacrificing their Lives, in defending her from the assaults of her enemies. But when they saw that the disorders were wholly pacified, they alight, and casting themselves at Amalazontha's feet, they gave her to understand in very passionate words, that how great and heroick natural courage might be, yet love oft-times heightens it, especially when the person belov'd, appear'd to be expos'd to any danger.

What contentment did they not enjoy, after their honourable labours, to talk to their lovely Mistress and Queen; and how strange do you think was the surprize of Amalazontha, when the two Champions not seeing any of the Turingiens near her, litting up the Vises of their Helmets, whether to breath, or to talk with less trouble, O Heaven, cry'd she, when she saw and knew them; but not able to say more by reason of her astonishment and weakness, caus'd by the agitation of a strong passion, she fainted away in the Arms of her two Lovers, who ran hastily to her succour. Their present fear hinder'd them from being sensible of their happiness, though they no sooner perceiv'd that the fair Queen was in no danger, and observ'd the new charms of her languishing looks, but they felt those extasies of pleasure which there are few persons able to comprehend; yet were they not a little perplex'd, notwithstanding so sweet a satisfaction, they both envying the part which they severally participated in that joy, and therefore looking upon one another as furious enemies, and considering one another as the mutual obstacle of each other's pretences; Methinks, said the younger of the two, with a kind of envy, that your diligence is not altogether so necessary; for though there be some occasions wherein there may be need of much help, there are others where multitude does more harm than good. Since you so well understand the difference of such occasions, replyed the other very impatiently; you may do well to leave me alone with the Queen, not being obliged to give your self any farther trouble.

The respect which they had for Amalazontha, was the reason they said no more, beside that they had no leisure: For at the same time Balamir and Constantine arrived, who finding the Queen of Turingia in a condition, to be conducted back to the Castle, the Prince of the Huns himself took that office upon him, neither he nor Amalazontha being willing, that Constantine, wounded and feeble as he was, should put himself to the trouble of a civility, prejudicial to his health. The Queen of the Cimbrians and the Princess of Suevia, affrighted as they were, did not fail however to come and meet the Queen of the Turingiens, and in the mean while that they were all three talking, what persons of their Sex could say upon accidents of the like nature. Dinocus got the King of the Britains into his bed, while Arderic and Humbert stayed with the King of the Suevians and the Herulians, to hinder them from any farther extremity of violence. But the first of those two Princes, seeking for an object of his choler, which he could not moderate; "Will they not however permit me," said he, to seize and punish as spies those two unknown Knights, who came yesterday in the evening into our Camp, and fought before my face for Amalazontha's interest? "How," said Godegefile and Briomer, can they deny the demands of a great King, and what the laws of military discipline expressly require? Arderic judging well that their fierce humours would proceed yet higher, if there should be any satisfaction of that nature yielded to, undertook to speak, and return'd for answer that it was but just, to leave those two unknown persons, to the rigour of the laws of war, if they were not own'd by some of the chief Officers. "But Sir," (said he pursuing his discourse, and addressing himself to the King of Suevia) ought we not first to understand from the Queen of the Turingiens, whether those two persons belong not to her, and are not in her pay; not that it is my Aim that you should send to complement Amalazontha; but on the contrary I will take charge of that Affair my self, for as I have not manifested any disaffection to that Princess, I can Act without being taxed, for having any thing of malice or heart burning in demanding that satisfaction.

He pronounced these words after such a manner, that it might be perceived that he was not altogether unwilling to second the Animosity of the King of the Suevians. In the mean while, as he was truly generous, and had beheld with marks of great esteem, the valour of those two Knights, at whom by his conjecture they aim'd; he ordered the Captain of his Guards to send to the Queen of the Turingiens, to the end she might have time to provide for the safety of those two valiant persons. On the other side, the King of Suevia having no great confidence in the King of the Gepides, secretly dispatched some of his own creatures, with orders (by the consent of Godegefile) to joyn themselves with the Herulians, and to go and seize certain of the Turingiens, whom he particularly pitched upon, that he might be inform'd from their mouths, though it were by constraint of the Rack, who and where those two persons were, that fought for the Queen of Turingia. But in the mean time that in seeking for them, they began to raise a new tumult, they were got a good way from the Camp, with those Officers that had conniv'd at their escape: And while they rode upon the side of a wood upon the left hand; seeking for a place convenient for the design which they had in their heads. At length they made a stop, and looking furiously one upon another, "It behoves us," they cried, before we go farther, to shew that we can fight more than one way, for the fair Queen of Turingia.

Their Esquires and the Turingiens in their company, immediately opposed their purpose, but all persuasions and Arguments were in vain, so that the two Champions being at a Carricks distance one from another, turn'd head and ran one against the other, with an equal fury and equal success. So terrible was their encounter, that their Lances flew in a thousand Splinters, and their Horses already weary and too weak, to sustain so rude a shock, fell upon their Cruppers and afterwards tumbled backward upon the ground. Their Active Riders quitted their Stirrups in a moment, and drawing their Swords flew upon one another a foot with the same fury. And their passions that transported them, causing them to despise defensive Arms and all manner of wariness, they threw away their bucklers, dealing such blows as made their Steel strike fire. Already the blood trickled down their Curiaffes, and without doubt their Combat had had a fatal end, if two Knights, noble in their outward appearance, and attended by others of meaner quality, had not interposed between them. They were both magnificently Arm'd, and the majesty of their deportment attracted veneration: so that they had no sooner allighted, and couragiously thrown themselves between the two exasperated Combatants, but they parted them, maugre the obstinacy of their inveteracy. "Valiant Knights," cried he to whom all the rest gave a respect, what reason can you have to draw these Swords one upon another, that you ought rather to turn upon the Common Enemy.

There are particular interests, replied one of the Assailants, that more powerfully incense than general quarrels: And for my part, replied the other, I do not believe that the Enemies which we have are common to us both. I see well then, replied the other that had parted them, that you are engaged in a private quarrel, and that it is not for me to enquire into the occasion. I see though discretion permits me not to demand any discovery thereof, however I am not thereby prohibited from suspecting the justice of the cause: So that I have nothing else to do, if I am not deceived in my conjectures, but to make it my request to wait till that fair person, who has put their weapons into your hands, declare her self, and by her own choice make the one happy, and the other unfortunate.

To these he added other words so perswasive, that the two Rivals were convinced that they could no longer continue the marks of their Animosity, however in taking Horse they could not but declare by their eyes, that they were no way pleased at this disturbance. and that their greatest comfort was the hopes they had, that it would not be long ere they met again. Afterwards they turned toward those unknown persons, who had been so diligent to serve them, and having given them to understand, that it was for weighty considerations, that they did not discover their faces to persons of their dignity, such as they appeared to be, especially in the Camp of the Cimbrians, they beg'd them for the present to dispence with that point of good manners. The two Knights would willingly have known those two valiant Heroes that had gained their esteem, but that opinion which they had already conceived to their Advantage, prohibited them from pressing any farther, a thing to which they had so little inclination of themselves. Being all on horseback they took toward the Camp, when the two Rivals soon perceived, that they were the King of the Burgundians, and the generous Gondemar that had parted them. That these two Princes made a falley forth of the Line of Entrenchment with Salamir, and that while the Cimbrians under their famous General, scouted to the right hand toward the Meadows, they had been picketing upon the left hand toward the Wood, from whence they were but newly come. By that time they were thus inform'd, the generous Gondemar approached them, and after he had considered their faces; Valiant Strangers, said he, since 'tis not your desire to be known, I will in no wise oppose your intentions, but I am afraid that you cannot for that reason, be received into our Camp as you really deserve to be: but to salve that fear, you may if you please accept of Quarters with the King of the Burgundians, where you may remain with safety and free privacy: and I make no question but those offers which we shall propound, may reduce you to our party, whatever advantages you may have by being engaged to the contrary. This behaviour of yours, does no way surprize me, answered one of the unknown persons, for the reputation of Gondemar is so well known, that it is hard to say, whether his virtue be more admired in Pharamond's Camp, than reverenc'd among the subjects of King Gondioch. However I dare not accept what you so obligingly offer: But the reason which I have to refuse it, shall never hinder me from testifying my acknowledgment upon all occasions, wherein I may give proof thereof, without wounding those laws which to me are inviolable. As for my part, replied the other unknown Knight, I am glad there is nothing that hinders me from taking part with the generous Prince of the Burgundians, or from hoping that in following my own inclination, I may have the opportunity to find you in the Enemies Army: For I see well that destiny made us to agree in one thing, that we might differ in all others.

He uttered these words so softly, and at a time when Gondemar was obliged to speak to the King his Brother: So that his Rival answering him in the same manner; I know, said he, that we are not both of the same party, and I should be very well contented but that I apprehend, you have thereby the advantage of seeing a divine Princess every day, whose company is forbid to me. But I cannot tell, said he, whether you will quietly enjoy an honour, which a competitor like my self, is resolved to dispute with you to the last gasp. This discourse which might have renewed their passion, was interrupted by the approach of Gondemar, who began to talk of general news, till they arrived at the Camp where they found all things quiet. For the Prince of the Huns, the Kings of Albion and the Cepides, had been very successfully industrious, to calm the late disturbance, having laid before the opposite party, that it belong'd to Amalazombas's Officers, to look after the observation of discipline among the Turingiens, as it was their duty to punish spies and deserters of their colours, in the quarter belonging to their several Nations, but that no person but the Queen alone had power to dispose of her own forces. So that at last the King of Suevia himself, notwithstanding the violence of his humour, would not oppose Amalazombas's resolution, but consented to the departure of the Turingiens with less reluctancy, especially when he understood that their Queen would not leave the Queen of the Cimbrians, whereby her person being in hostage, there was no danger that her Army would joyn it self with Pharamond's.

The two Rivals being both deeply concern'd at that news, and passionately desiring to see Amalazontha before the departure of the Turingians, turn'd toward the Burgundian Princes, and testifying their several engagements to them, took their leaves, and went feverally with a purpose to contrive how to bring about their design. The Officers who waited on them at that time made it their first care to see their wounds dress'd, which being neither large nor dangerous, the impatient Rivals were in hopes not to keep their Beds long, nor would they have been perswaded to take their Beds, till they had been at the Castle, but that they were inform'd that there would be a world of company with the Queen of Turingia all the rest of that day. But if they were overjoyed when they were led to the Apartment of the person beloved, they had still the ill luck to meet and hinder one another, immediately their distaste began to renew; for they no sooner beheld the fair cause of their love, but they look'd upon themselves as objects of hatred. The Queen of the Turingians chid them for the surprize which they had put upon her; but how unwilling soever she were to receive the the visit, she would not presume to refuse it, admitting them with all the civility that might be. True it is, that when she was going to speak she blush'd, and while she laid one of her fair hands upon her face to hide the change of her countenance, she fetch'd a deep sigh, Ab, Prince, said she to the youngest of the illustrious Lovers, who was indeed the passionate Sunnon: Ab, Ambiomer, said she, turning to the other, to what extremities will you reduce me? Then she stood pausing a little while without saying any more, but immediately after making answer to her own thoughts, Is it you, said she, that do me these considerable services, and must I always owe to you for the most important obligations of my life? Instead of saying any more, she appeared all of an instant so prepossess'd, that she gave little heed to what either Sunnon or Ambiomer made answer in relation to their passionate and tender affections: yet she made an attempt three or four times, that she might shew her acknowledgment, and to expel from her mind a thought that afflicted her in such a manner as might be easily observ'd; which; though she knew was not a thing presently to be remov'd, yet in point of civility she thought her self oblig'd to speak; and thereupon addressing her self to the Prince of the Franks, Sir, said she, your pretence has strangely perplex'd me, nor could I see your life expos'd in your Enemies Army, without deeply considering at the same time what could be said to my prejudice, had you fallen under the tumultuous fury of the Suevians and Herulians. What would Pharamond then have said? Would he not have accused me to have reveng'd the death of my Brother with his, and to have sacrific'd the Generous Sunnon to the Ghost of the unfortunate Amalaric?

After those few words her blushing increas'd; however, being willing to disguise the passion which she had augmented, Not, (said she, pursuing her discourse) that revenge is a thing always forbidden, but that I really believe that revenge of which I speak, could not have been brought to pass with any advantage to my reputation. Ab, Madam, replied the amorous Prince, the death of Sunnon had been honourable, had you but look'd upon my life lost in your defence as a thing devoted to your service.

All the while he spoke he kept his eyes fix'd upon Amalazontha's countenance; nor was it without an extraordinary trouble that he observ'd a disturbance therein; and that instead of being mov'd to pity, she carelessly turn'd her self toward his Rival, As for your part, Ambiomer, said she, think not that I can forget these obligations which you have laid upon me, or that I am not always ready to grant you all the recompence that it becomes a person of my degree to bestow upon a Knight who has so highly and faithfully serv'd me without being thereto any way oblig'd. But after that, he reasonable, and consider that I am a Queen.

At those words of Recompense and Queen, the fierce and amorous Ambiomer blush'd for madness, not enduring them, but with an extraordinary impatience. Thereupon those Generous Rivals felt the violence of their sorrow increase, but their hatred toward one another diminish, seeing themselves equally unfortunate. So that if the Prince of the Franks continued as passionate as before, his Rival was disturbed with motions so contrary and so tumultuous, that he understood not well the nature of them, not being able to judge whether he could always love Amalazontha, or whether at length he could suffer himself to hate her; I see, Madam, said he, that you will never be mov'd with the respectful passion of Ambiomer. In the mean time, whatever his descent may be, his heart perswades him that he deserves an illustrious Lady, and that he is not altogether unworthy the advancement which you see him now aspiring to, and that perhaps fortune may not always be so contrary as you make her prove to him.

After he had spoken these words, and that the Queen her self had given him to understand, that a longer discourse would prove prejudicial, he prepared to be gone as well as Sunnon; when the Turingians who had introduced them, began to speak in their own justification.

fication. They declared to their Queen the purpose which they had, to perform an Act of courtesie for two valiant persons, that came to present themselves to her. It was not for any other reason, Madam, said the most considerable among them, that I besought Inbergida, when she spoke in the behalf of Sunnon, and that I favoured the purposes of that Prince, as of the valiant defender of your dominions. The former may assure our march, by obtaining from the King his Brother, that neutrality which you demand: and the other will lead us into our Country with that courage, that never forsakes us when he appears at the head of us. He enforced many other Arguments, whereby he represented to the Queen, how profitable Sunnon's mediation would be, when they were to desire a cessation of Arms between them and Pharamond, and how useful Ambiomer would be to lead the Turingiens boldly through all places, where there might be any danger. Amalazontha considered those reasons, and and having left the conduct of the whole Affair to the Turingien that spoke, the two Rivals took their leaves: Prince Sunnon, with little satisfaction and more love; the incens'd Ambiomer with thoughts that made his heart waver between love and disgust. While they prepared to depart, with an intention to effect, what Amalazontha's Officer had requested them to propose and mediate, the fair Queen found in her self a secret inclination, to write to the King of the Franks, and verily believing that she might really do it upon this occasion, she went into her Closet, and there wrote the beginnings of many Letters, which she tore as fast, imagining with her self that she had either not said enough, or that she had wrote too much. So powerful was the conflict of her mind, between the violence of her passion and the force of her modesty. At last instead of writing, she resolved to let those persons act who were less prepossessed: while she her self, to expel an Idea that totally possessed her thoughts, or else to follow an imperious motion, that constrained her to a farther discourse of the King of the Franks, went to pass the rest of the evening with the Queen of the Cimbrians, where she also found the Princess of Suevia.

Rosalind was somewhat surpris'd when she saw her enter, but immediately rising to meet her, she embraced and kissed her, chiding her very obligingly for the little care she took of her self, in not reposing after a day of so much tumult. In truth, dear Sister, said she pursuing her complement, We have great reason to blame you, and I cannot tell whether, far from receiving you with our wonted confidence, we ought not rather to forbear some part of our civility, to punish you for the offence you have committed. What! come into this Apartment, before you gave us time to visit yours? I must needs confess, added the Princess of Suevia, that I am vexed that I have no more disposition to be angry: However I am glad of this satisfaction, that a person more to be feared than my self, checks you more severely than I could tell how to do. How (replied the fair and pensive Queen of the Turingiens endeavouring to smile) would you have a person like me perplexed with the Affairs of an Army, to repose her self at her own ease, and give exact and quaint answers to two Princes that understand the world, as well as it were convenient she should know the Art of war?

These words pronounced with a pleasing aspect, occasion'd a more jocund and brisk conversation, than could have been expected from three persons, whose hearts were too sadly engaged to give overmuch liberty to their thoughts. In the mean while, several occasions offering themselves to make mention of the Franks and their forces, these Princesses after they had avoided the discourse two or three times, at length fell to talk altogether of the noble endowments of Pharamond, and those two Princes the worthy Brothers of so famous a King, making them the Theme and Subject of their converse, till it was time to part.

The next morning so soon as day appeared, the King of the Britains departed in a Litter for Francfort, with an extraordinary impatience to see the great Constance, and as he left a high esteem of his person, in the hearts of the chiefest part of the Confederate Princes, so could he not part from the generous Balamir, without giving and receiving more particular testimonies of a friendship, that seem'd established for many years. On the other side, the Turingiens stood to their Arms by Ambiomer's order, and Sunnon attended by Amalazontha's deputies, left the Cimbrian Camp to return to the Franks. Not but that they had both a vehement reluctancy, to absent themselves from Amalazontha without seeing her once more, or that they had not both fair pretences to request that favour: For Ambiomer might have desired more precise orders, and Sunnon more particular instructions; but Amalazontha had given them full commision to Act, as they themselves saw good, and by that cruel civility deprived them of that content, which they would have doubtless preferred before the most absolute and uncontrollable Authority in the world. Nevertheless the Prince of the Franks was so well assured, that the King his Brother would grant him whatever he requested, and the Princess her self was already, so well acquainted with the generosity of Pharamond, that the Turingiens made no scruple of beginning their march. They took the left hand way through the Valley, at the foot of the Hill opposite to Segodunz, and march'd with all the satisfaction, which the hope of seeing their own Country could infuse into them. As for Ambiomer, he, having wholly abandon'd himself to the restless torments of his disquiet, and the condition of his mind causing him to avoid all company, that he might with more freedom consider what resolution to take, march'd every day at the head of the Turingiens, at a distance from the other Commanders, and suffering himself to be guided insensibly by the humour that led him to solitude, he entred the Wood, followed only by a few, while the Army march'd by the side of it.

The early Sun display'd as yet but his first Beams, so that the thick branches which a vast numbers of huge Trees oppos'd to the weak light, extended a shade enough to create a kind of terror, in minds less prepossess'd than Ambiomer's. But as much prepossess'd as he was by a passion scarce own'd, that caus'd all that disturbance in his breast, he could not forbear from making a stand, and fixing his eyes upon an object altogether extraordinary; he saw several Horsemen that ready to expire, seem'd to swim in their own blood, and if such a person as Ambiomer, bred up among Arms beheld them without astonishment, yet could he not without a surpris, cast his eyes some three or four paces farther. In short he not only discover'd a magnificent Chariot, the Horses being taken out and tyed to several Trees, but also he beheld a certain person, whose excell'g beauty deserv'd to be admir'd, than the strange condition of her fortune, to be pitied and reliev'd by persons the least generous and compassionate. How magnificent soever were her habit, now particular the fashion, Ambiomer stood not to consider them so exactly, finding that he had enough to do, to admire that charming unknown beauty: for there was never any thing seen whiter than her complexion, never a more lovely tincture than hers. All her Lincaments so regular, the shape of her face so miraculously proportionable, only her Eyes that ought to have darted forth a thousand Flames, and have enlightn'd a beauty so accomplish'd, were fix'd, either by the hand of some remorseless death or a deadly swoon. That fair unfortunate, worthy to fetter the most untam'd liberties, was her self in Chains, having her fair Arms tyed, by barbarous and impious hands to the pole of the Chariot: an object so surpris'g, suspend'd all Ambiomer's former meditations.

The tumultuous thoughts that a little before turmoyl'd his Soul, were on a sudden quite becalm'd, while the torments of his disquiet losing their force, suffer'd the motions of softness and good nature, insensibly to take possession of his heart, without being able either to know or examine the cause: For he found it was impossible to see so many beauties expos'd to inhumanity, without being mov'd to pity. He rode therefore up to the Chariot, he Allight'd, cut the Stranger's bonds, and desiring to know with the same swiftness, whether she were in a condition to be further reliev'd, he laid his hand upon one of those fair Arms that he had unlock'd. Immediately whatever virtue that happy hand had, it could not chuse but tremble, whether out of respect which that divine person infus'd into it, or the fear that Ambiomer had that she was past recovery. True it is that this fear soon vanish'd, for the diligent Knight not only perceiv'd that the unknown Beauty still breath'd, but some few moments after saw that she came to her self, she open'd her eyes and turned her head toward her deliverer. In that posture several stately Plumes overshadow'd the attire of her head, and underneath them a magnificent wreath of costly precious Stones twis'd with her hair, darted forth a rich and glimmering Lustre, to which the lively colours of the feathers were artificially suited, though nothing comparable to that Celestial fire that sparkled from the eyes of that divine person. Those fair Eyes were large and proportionably distanc'd, and it was to be question'd whether that languishment which then eclips'd their beams, did not make them more supportable by moderating their Lustre, or whether it did not cause their charming Rays, more victoriously to Triumph, by insinuating into the heart, with a more dangerous sweetness, as being neither suspected nor formidable. Ambiomer had not time farther to consider her disposition, nor could he speak when he would, his mind was so strangely possess'd. For the Stranger after she had diligently observ'd his goodly proportion, and consider'd his diligence, at length unlock'd the fairest lips in the world and thus brake silence; Knight, said she with a grace that had something in it of a secret charm, Your behaviour gives me to understand, that you are not only no associate with those that persecute me, but that I may find in your Generosity, a Sanctuary against their violence.

She utter'd those few words with an aspect so obliging, and the tone of her voice so charmingly harmonious, that Ambiomer, notwithstanding his trouble and his love, perceiv'd that those words had a power to make an impress'ion in a heart less capable to receive it.

it. And thereupon after he had very earnestly beheld the unknown Beauty, and perceiv'd that she was neither sick, nor hurt, Madam, said he, the succour that I have afforded your distress, is no more than what you might have receiv'd in any part of the world, but if fortune, which too ordinarily appears the enemy of the persons most excellent, have rais'd you any adversaries, I will do that in your behalf which you cannot expect but from those persons who are most faithful to your interests. In the mean while, Madam, if it be your pleasure that I should induci you to the Camp of the Cimbrians, there are three great Princesses in that place who need understand how to be just to merit, they will doubtless be a comfort to your affliction, and cause you perhaps to forget those strange accidents of the cruel effects whereof I have been a witness. In their company you will be at quiet, in safety, and without hazard of your reputation. And if it could be possible that you never should have heard of the charming Queen of the Cimbrians, the fair Queen of the Turingiens, and the amiable Princess of Suevia, I should not presume to bring you to such persons whose fame had never reach'd your ears. Though I did not know those persons, answered the unknown Beauty, whom you mention, and whose merits all the earth adores, I could not be coy to follow your proposal with an entire confidence; we will go therefore to the Queen of the Cimbrians, since it is your pleasure, nor will I make any scruple for once to perplex her with the familiarity of an unfortunate person, since my present condition obliges me to it; besides that, I am not unacquainted with the Generosity of the illustrious Rosamond; and I have hopes also, that that fair person will have no reason to repent of granting me her protection; for perhaps I may bring an additional strength to her party that may not be contemptible. But, generous Knight, before we set forward toward the Cimbrian Queen, give me leave to seek for a Chariot, wherein are two of my Virgins whom they caus'd to be driven along with me, as also to make enquiry what is become of a certain Knight who fought in my behalf with a most eager zeal. He cannot but be very happy, Madam, replied Ambioner, whatever be his condition, nor could he give a sufficient price to be so honourably eterniz'd, though he purchas'd it with the loss of his life. But, Madam, how great soever his happiness be, it behoves us to encrease it, by letting him understand it, while we second your goodness with our care and fidelity.

When he had thus said, he call'd for several Horsemen, and commanding them to take several ways, he order'd them where to meet when they had any tydings to bring, or atter they had beaten the wood in vain: as for his own part, whatever disposition he might have naturally to have made one in the search, he staid however by the Chariot, and having caus'd the Horses to be untied from the Trees, and put in again, and he caus'd the Troops which he lead, to make a stand, and return'd himself to the Cimbrian Camp, riding by the Stranger's side, and entertaining her with a discourse of those persons whom she was shortly to see. He believ'd that he might do her that kindness without being wanting in Amalazontha's service, nor to the employment which he had accepted, not doubting also but that Pharamond would consent to a neutrality, that would secure the Turingiens from being assailed or molested by his Forces: so that there was no danger in his absence for a short time: or if the King of the Franks (which he thought very improbable) would not yield to the request of a fair Queen that had no desire to remain his enemy, for his beloved Brother's sake, that then it was the best way for the Princess's Forces to make a stand, whereby they might be able to retire to the Body of the Army before the French could fall upon them and cut them to pieces; besides, his reason told him, that he could not in honour forsake a person of that Dignity, which the unknown person shew'd her self to be. In her converse he tasted that sweetness which for some time suspended his disquiet, and more than that, made him wish more than once that Amalazontha had been of the same disposition, or that the Beauty of the Stranger, which was not inferior to that of Amalazontha, had had the same power over his heart. But who can assure thee, said he, that a person altogether yet unknown to thee, can have a greater kindness for thee than the Queen of the Turingiens? Is it out of her acknowledgment for the service which thou hast done her? Or is it because she seems not to be so royally descended? Does she not come to proffer a considerable reinforcement to Rosamond's Army? Flatter not thy self, Ambioner, thou art only a Voluntier, whose extraordinary courage can have no high pretences: besides that, thou thy self dost merit thy own misfortune, for but thinking a thought of infidelity. Love Amalazontha, be not a weary of suffering for her, and leave to her will and the power of thy own destiny the entire disposition of a life wholly at their mercy; notwithstanding all thy reason. Thus he continued constant to his first passion, whatever delight he took to behold and converse with that amiable Stranger.

As they were just approaching to the Trenches, a Knight of a comely presence, who had followed in as great haste as three or four wounds would permit him, drew near, and was received received by the unknown person with a great deal of satisfaction; I always believ'd, Madam, cry'd he, that Heaven would not forsake a great and virtuous Princess, to the rage of the most violent Prince that ever was: and I began yesterday in the height of your misfortune to conceive some hopes from the encounter of the Burgundians, who repulsed your enemies, and kill'd a good number besides. And you, valiant Ambiomere, (said he, turning to the Knight, of whose name and merits he had already inform'd himself) though you may not find a recompense to your liking, in the pleasure which you take to do good actions, you will have no reason to blame your fortune. She has led you to the aid of a Princess, or rather, the Queen of the Lombards; now that the famous Agelmond, Monarch of that warlike nation, has ended his life by an accident absolutely deplorable. Yes, Ambiomere, that King is now no more: he that had extended his Conquests to the River Vittula, he that triumph'd over the Forces of Honorius near the River Po, he has lost the sight of day; or if he yet beholds it, he enjoys it only among those torments which an imperious passion causes him to suffer, and which can only tame his invincible heart.

At those words Ambiomere could not forbear blushing, and turning toward the Princess of the Lombards, he bowed himself with all respect to the very pommel of his Saddle, and demanded pardon for all the faults which his ignorance might make him commit. But that charming Beauty, instead of taking upon her that majestick aspect which her Dignity seem'd to demand now she was known, redoubled her civilities, looking with far more sweetness and mildness than before. Ambiomere had found it had overcome him, so that his heart murmured against the humour of the Turingien Queen, while he declared his acknowledgment to the Stranger, yet with so much discretion however, as not to violate the Laws of decency and good manners, which were to be observ'd before so great a Princess. But while he testified his desire to be better inform'd, they beheld a Chariot driving toward them, wherein were certain Ladies, who as soon as they drew near the Princess, she knew them for her attendants, being very glad to see them again after so great a danger escap'd, a danger so terrible and dreadful to her.

The Strangers still look'd all like persons affrighted and fear'd; yet could they not forbear looking upon their fair Mistress, so great was their fear for her, that they could hardly believe what they saw. However, at length giving credit to the testimony of their eyes, they could no less forbear then to shew the excess of their joy for an escape so fortunate and unexpected. They could not for their lives make answer to the Princess without disorder, many times speaking before she had made an end; their surpris'd passions being no way conformable to exactness of behaviour, so that those young Ladies, transported with duty, though they observed not so much regularity at that meeting, yet they manifested the greater proofs of a zealous affection.

That converse lasted not long, because they presently enter'd into the Camp, where the quality of the Stranger was no sooner divulg'd, but every one seem'd overjoyed, some out of hopes of new assistance, others less interest'd, regarding nothing but an extraordinary merit, of which they saw so many apparent symptoms in so fair a person. The Queens of the Cimbrians, of the Turingiens, and the Princess of Suevia, receiv'd her with an extraordinary joy, giving her all the testimonies of their esteem and friendship that could be expected upon the first interview. Is it possible, Madam, said Rosamond, that the Heavens who fram'd your outward excellencies with so much care, should take so little to preserve them from the cruel outrages which you have suffered. Since fortune, Madam, has been so daring as to offer such insolencies to your person, replied the Princess of the Lombards, it is not for me to complain of her persecutions in your presence, especially having procured me the advantage which I now enjoy. We could have wish'd, replied the Queen, that the advantage which we reap by your arrival had made us happy by some other means: but since that cannot be, it lies in our part to give you that content, as may bury in oblivion some part of the afflictions which you have endured.

That which most astonish'd them, was, that the Beauty of the Princess hardly gave way to Rosamond's, and disputed with advantage the priority with Amalazomba's charms, nor would yield to that pleasing sweetness that render'd the Princess Albisinda so amiable. Albisinda, as well out of her own inclination, as by the order of the King her Father, resign'd her Apartment to the Princess of the Lombards; but the fair Stranger would not accept but of part, and that too with such a graceful unwillingness, wherein there was no mixture of the obstinacy of complement. Ambiomere, whose intentions of siding with the Cimbrian party, became to be nois'd abroad, was civilly receiv'd by the most illustrious persons, to whom Amalazomba presented him, as believing her self oblig'd thereto, and the King of Suevia himself, who had chang'd his opinion at the same time that he understood Ambiomere's, infinitely carcs'd that famous Warriour, the more to endear him; he desired also that they

they would carry the Knight that came along with the Princes to his Quarters, not only recommending him to the most able Chirurgeons, but appointing him also Attendants convenient for him.

As for Ambiomer, he felt only a pleasure mix'd with grief at the unlook'd for sight of Amalazontha, while he still perceiv'd in her countenance the same surface of indifferency, which was the cause of all his misfortune, so that he took his leave, not one jot better satisfied than before. However, before he departed, he had a great desire to see the wounded Knight, who was laid in one of the King of Suevia's Tents, believing himself oblig'd to give him a visit. He no sooner came into his Chamber, but after the first complements pass'd between them, I do not believe, said he, that the barbarous usage shewn to the Princess of Lombardy, might arise from any other cause than a Lover's despair. 'Tis very true, (answered Grimaldus, (for so was that strange Knight call'd) that it was only the revenge of a disdain'd Prince that carried him to that height of violence. That disdain, (said Ambiomer, interrupting him, and blushing he knew not for what reason) had not produc'd so strange an effect, had it not been accompanied with a very severe jealousy, or that the Princess of the Lombards had not look'd more favourably upon a Rival less unfortunate. It is most certain, reply'd Grimaldus, that she never yet loved any person in this world, and that a peculiar niceness of her judgment has hitherto preserv'd her heart in an entire liberty.

Those last words caus'd a secret joy in Ambiomer's heart; but as he was about to reply, with an intention, without question, to pick out some other assurances of a conjecture that did not a little please him, the King of Suevia entred, and chang'd the subject of the discourse: so that Ambiomer presently departed, and took Horse to return to Amalazontha's Army.

But if the King of Suevia were officious to gain the friendship of the Lombard Knight, as well by civil complements, as by an obliging care of his person, to the end he might procure him the alliance of his Nation, he was no less diligent to execute a resolution which he had taken, together with Godegesle and Briomer, to mischief Amalazontha: to which purpose he gave out several private orders, hoping thereby to raise a Rebellion in Turingia. While he was hammering this revenge, he forgot not to look after his own security, and the concerns of the Army. For he made no question, but Pharamond understanding the departure of Amalazontha's Troops, would either assail some Quarter of the Camp, or come to a general Battel; and therefore being fierce and cunning, he had a mind to be before hand with the King of the Franks, and to assail him first in his own Trenches. He was in hopes that such an attempt as this might dazle the Cimbrians, who could not but from hence conjecture that the enemy was either very weak, or in great disorder, when experienc'd Captains, notwithstanding the departure of the Turingiens, should go about to force their Camp. He was of opinion also, that this venture was not very dangerous, but only to outward appearance, for that it might cause a present surprize and fear among the Franks, but if afterwards they took heart, and went about to repulse the Cimbrians, it was an ealie thing to retire in good order before an Army that could not come out of their Trenches but in confusion: besides this consideration which concern'd the general interest of the Nation, there were others more particular, being the products of his own natural temper. His restless humour was incessantly covetous of novelty, and his mind was so turmoil'd, that he was so far from fearing lest any ill success should render him miserable, that every moment he desired a change, imagining, as it is natural to the unfortunate, that a change could not but be favourable to his purposes. The hatred which he had against Pharamond; his love for the Princess of the Franks, and his jealousy of his own Son, the Renowned Viridomar, rent his very heart to pieces, and he found no other ease but in believing he should vanquish his Enemies, revenge himself upon the King of the Franks, and make himself Master of the Destiny of a Beauty so charming, yet so troublesome. But when that flattering thought gave way to contrary sentiments, and that the King began to think he might be beaten, then he trembled, and was often just upon the point of changing his resolution. Then he considered that there was some reason to hope for a considerable reinforcement of the Lombards, and a more considerable succour from the Emperour Theodosius, at the request of Varanez and Martian. True it is, that his impatience causing him to apprehend the delay and the vexation of a tedious sufferance, he began by and by to resume his first resolutions. For he believed the loss of the Battel would be less insupportable, than the restless passions that tormented him; and so representing to himself the utmost extremity to which the loss of a Battel might reduce the vanquish'd, he found that he should not be without help in a condition so deplorable. In short, he was of opinion that the fair Queen of the Cimbrians would flee from a victorious Enemy, and that her Lovers would would not fail to remove her as far as possibly they could, from the most formidable of their Rivals. At other times his envious humour made him imagine, that after the defeat of the Suevians, a house so haughty and so triumphant as that of Pharamond, would never march into an unfortunate Family: And that there was little likelihood that they would consent, to bestow the Princess of the Franks, upon such an unfortunate person as Viridomar. No sooner was he thus confirm'd in his design, but he resolv'd to make a tryal: And for that the greatest part of the Princes interest'd in his party were Pharamond's Rivals, he hop'd the more easily to gain their consents. However he thought it convenient to consult, upon such a weighty enterprize, and to hold a Council of War, in the Apartment of the Cimbrian Queen.

In the mean time Amalazontha's Envoy, having obtained from Pharamond more than he desired, returned from the Camp of the Franks: And he had no sooner given an Account of his Commission to the Queen his Mistress, but he went to Rosamond's Chamber, where he was expected to relate what news he had brought along with him. The Turingien being willing to declare, what he had observed most remarkable in the Enemies Army, or else to testify his acknowledgment to so great a Princess, who had without doubt oblig'd him by her generous behaviour, told a thousand things to Pharamond's honour, as well in relation to the qualities of his person, as to what concern'd the discipline of his Army. He told them also what he had been inform'd, by the chiefest among Sannon's Officers, and assured them that Artabure had declared for the Franks as well as Constance, and that they had sent for fifteen thousand Horse, part of the Armies of Honorius to reinforce Pharamond. That it was reported that though the Emperour, did not presently declare himself openly for the King of the Franks, however that he would not deny to let Constance, dispose of good part of his forces for his Assistance, provided they did not march under the Eagles or Standards of the Empire, against those Kings that were accounted his confederates. This is not all, said he, pursuing his relation, the King of the Tongres is dead, and Taxander being sent out of Italy, and having taken possession of his Realm, is also coming to joyn with the Army of the Franks. Is it possible, said the King of the Herulians, that he who is a Prince of so much courage, and was always bred up in the Emperour's Court, should so little consider future consequences, as to joyn with a powerful Stranger, whom he is concern'd to oppose, unless he intends to let him extend his Empire to the Gates of Rome? It may be, said Balamir, he aims at Agrippina, seeing that Atfard the Father of Marsinda, who is reported in the Camp of the Franks to be dead, was crowned King of Cologne in the Reign of the great Theodosius. However it be, replied the King of Suevia, I cannot imagine that either the Emperour or the King of the Tongres will be against us, or that they will infringe the rights of an ancient Alliance, to take part with a people that have harass'd so many Kingdoms, and who if they enter Gallia, cannot but cause a dread of many other resolutions. But though it were true that so boisterous a tempest threaten'd us, and that all the several interests in the West that obey Honorius, should rise against us, ought not we to prevent our Enemies, by falling upon them without any more ado, before they come to be strengthened with such formidable Aids?

All the Princes that were then present with the Cimbrian Queen, agreeing in opinion with the King of Suevia, that it was necessary to put in execution the design which they had contriv'd, gave orders to have all the Army in a readiness the next morning, as soon as the first dawn of day appeared. Rosamond after that went to visit the Princess of the Lombards, where she found Albisinda and Amalazontha, and by reason the resolution which had been taken did no way please them, their Converse was very melancholy. To free themselves therefore out of that perplexity, instead of any farther discourse about the Army affairs, they talked together of the Accident which had befall'n the Princess of the Lombards, and of the desire they had to know the particulars.

While they were thus busied in company with the fair Stranger, all things were in a hurry busily in the Camp. All the Commanders being busied in their several employments, and preparing for a Battel, which they resolv'd their valour should eternize. They also declared how glad they were of a general Battel, having received advice that above fifty thousand men, were coming out of high Germany, and advancing toward the Rhine without discovering their design; insomuch that the next morning by break of day, all the whole Army was in Arms. Immediately the King of Suevia chose out of his own Nation, such as were the nimblest and the stoutest, and order'd them to march with all speed, toward the Wood which was between the two Camps, with an intent to make themselves Masters of the most convenient Posts, commanding twenty Squadrons more immediately to follow them, and assist them if they found any resistance. As soon as the Sun began to scatter his beams, upon the tops of the neighbouring Mountains, the whole Army mov'd in little bod-dyes out of their Entrenchments, so that the plain afforded a pleasing yet terrible prospect being covered with so many thousand Armed Soldiers, and so many different Nations. Belamir and Arderic commanded the right wing, composed of Cimbrians, Alans, and Cepides. The Suedes and Herulians that made the left, were led by their own Kings, who would not remove themselves, from those advantageous Posts which they had seized. The main Battel where the Basternes and Burgundians fought, obeyed Gondiech and young Humbert, Gondemar was in the rear with a reserve of six or seven thousand Horse, and Prince Contran stayed behind to guard the Castle, and Briomer to defend the Camp, being both left behind by reason of their contention in the Council, where there were as many interests as several parties.

The great quantity of ground which they took up, in Advancing toward the Camp of the Franks, spread their number to a large extent, and such a vast body of men in Arms appeared, that few mean courages would have abided their approach. But the undaunted Pharamond grew joyful at the sight, and having laid a design little different from that of his Enemies, he was as little surpris'd at this time, as he used to be at any other, wherein the same occasions presented themselves. He had this Advantage also to hope, that he might now fight his Enemies without offending Rosamond, in regard he was assaulted, and that the just Queen had given him leave to defend his life, against which certain too severe and rigid Laws, had Arm'd so many thousands of men. That invincible King issued forth of his Trenches, commanding the right wing himself that he might keep along the side of the wood, judging well that the most violent assaults would be made, where he had most reason to believe, the Enemy had most opportunity to make use of policy and Stratagem. The choicest of the Franks therefore were led by their own famous King. The Gauls and Tongres who composed the left Wing, were commanded by Marcomire and Alexander. The vigorous Sumnon, who notwithstanding the inconvenience of his wounds, was resolv'd to be a Horseback and make one in so great a Battel, led the main Battel composed of Sicambrians, Marses and Angrivarians. Prism and Claramont remained behind to guard the Camp. Genebaud, Meroveus, and all the other renowned Captains of the Franks, took their several charges under the King and his two Brothers. Artabure was resolv'd to draw his sword for the King of the Franks, as he had already freely offer'd, and Pharamond to testify the confidence which he had in his friendship and good conduct, gave him a reserve of six thousand Horse, to succour as he should see occasion.

The Army of the Franks marched out of their Trenches in this order, courageously moving after the Standard, of the most valiant King in the world: And seeming rather to march to a victory than to a Battel, the success whereof is to be doubted. Immediately Pharamond who knew all the most Advantageous Posts, rode to the top of a little Hill, from whence he observed the countenance of the Enemy: And seeing them come on in very good order, and all the plain covered with Squadrons and Battalions, he was infinitely pleas'd within himself: For besides that his warlike humour delighted in objects of this nature, he was in hopes they would come to a general Battel, and that that Battel would decide the famous quarrel, that had Arm'd the greatest part of Europe: So that which way soever he looked upon the conclusion of that war, he saw that whether he overcame his Rivals, or whether the greatness of his courage, would not permit him to survive the loss of the Battel, however there would be an end of all the misfortunes of his life. Nevertheless his last thoughts made not so deep an impression as his hope, and therefore as one that had order'd all things like a great commander, and whom the sight of the many Lovers of Rosamond, did but inflame with new fires, his Heart prognosticated nothing but happy success.

He exhorted his soldiers in few words, and riding from Rank to Rank with his Viseer up, he inspired the multitude with a double proportion of courage. And to make the best advantage thereof, he put himself at the head of a body of Cavalry, that covered one of the Wings of the Infantry, because the plain contracting it self in that part, forms a kind of a valley, between a little Rivoler that discharges it self into the Segna, and many great trees that grow at the foot of the descent. Pharamond had no sooner charged his Enemies, but the Combat began to be boistrous and bloody: And as the valiant King there signaliz'd himself, he was valiantly seconded by Genebaud, Cleomer, and Cloderic. The latter having the satisfaction to serve his renowned Master, without fighting against his own Nation. The Kings of the Suevians and Herulians, forced the great Pharamond to retire more than once, and made a resistance so much the more case, by reason that they poured down a shower of Arrows, from one side of the Wood where they lay shelter'd, and unawares charged upon the Flank of the Enemy. The King was nothing at all surpris'd, but making use of the same stratagem that he had done before against the Cimbrians and Burgundians, he oppos'd against the Hill such Troops as were most likely to make head. Cleomer, who command'd them, alighting, and having stood the first discharge of their Arrows, not only entred the Wood, but still covering themselves with their Arms, as they advanc'd toward the Enemy, they fought with great advantage. Then Pharamond broke in among the Herulians with more ease, and seeking every where for the haughty Godegesile both as his Rival, and the most noble enemy he could meet with in that part, he challeng'd him several times in threatening language; nor did the King of the Herulians avoid his enemy how terrible soever he was, so that they easily found one another, and fought hand to hand, notwithstanding the great throng: Pharamond made a thrust at the Viser of his Helmet with more vigour than success, the Sword only gliding along the Steel, which but the more incens'd the enrag'd Pharamond: thereupon turning about, as the King of the Herules did, they continued a most terrible and bloody Combat: Godegesile made one thrust that pass'd between the lower end of his Helmet and his Curia's, but made only a very slight wound, while Heaven it self preserv'd so great a Prince. But Pharamond on the other side let drive so ponderous a blow upon the head of his enemy, that he fell stunn'd and wounded at his Horses feet. Pharamond immediately commanded Cloderic to take care of him, and to carry him off with a sufficient Guard; whereupon the Herulians betaking themselves to flight, he vigorously pursu'd them, spurr'd on by the ardour of his courage, and an impatient heat that drew him to the Cimbrian Camp. The King of Suevis maintain'd the fight against Genebaud with more vigour than could be expected from his age, when the haughty Gondioch, who had got no small advantage over Ibere, came to his assistance, and with a numerous Squadron put a stop to the victorious Troops of Pharamond. Artabure being join'd with Ibere, rallied the Angrivarians; and as he was about to charge the Burgundians, their King came to the assistance of his left Wing, and Gondemar with a Reserve re-inforc'd the Basternes, who were near overlaid by Sunnon. The Roman however sustain'd the French Prince; and Pharamond in the interim giving a fresh onset, broke in with a most dreadful impetuosity upon Gondioch's Troops, so that he put them to the Rout, notwithstanding the valour and experience of their courageous Prince. Gondemar no sooner understood that the Burgundians began to give ground, but he hasted to their relief, while Sunnon opposing Artabure against Humbert, ran to assist the King his Brother. There it was that so many deeds worthy eternal memory were perform'd, while Sunnon and Gondemar signalize themselves in a high degree, while Gondioch outdoes himself, and the great King of the Franks does miracles of valour. The earth was covered with dead bodies, both parties being at once both Vanquishers, and both vanquish'd. But at length after an extraordinary obstinacy the Burgundians gave way to that Nation that was destin'd to give them Laws. Gondioch and Gondemar so often rallied their Troops, that Pharamond could not quite vanquish them, till within view of the Trenches. The fight whereof occasion'd strange commotions in his heart; for presently he thought to enter the Camp, to make his victory more entire, and that he might triumph over his Rivals in view of the divine Queen; but that hasty thought giving way to the deep respect he had for his ador'd Rosamond, he look'd upon the Entrenchments of the Cimbrians as sacred Barricadoes, which were not to be rudely attempted: How, Pharamond, cry'd he to himself, wouldst thou commit a crime, and lose that innocency which thou hast hitherto preserv'd, notwithstanding all those offences committed against thy will? Repent, bold Prince, and if thou hast not a mind to deserve those punishments which thou sufferest, look upon those Trenches with veneration, that have the honour to enclose the Queen whom thou adorest.

While love is thus more powerful than his ambition, and tenderness possesses his Soul, notwithstanding the clattering of Arms, and noise of Victory, Artabure makes the Basternes give way, and drives them to their Trenches: and for that the same consideration did not withhold him, which stopp'd the passionate King of the Franks, he enters the Camp, and there fighting with the same valour that had purchas'd him his renown, he beats the hair-brain'd Briomer, and advancing fiercely toward the party that Gontran command'd, after some resistance breaks in among them, gains one Gate of the Castle, and giving order to send for a Chariot, he commands a prisoner presently to conduct him to the Apartment of Rosamond. He was no sooner entred the Chamber, but he lifted up the Viser of his Helmet, and turn'd the point of his Sword downward, and approaching the Queen with all respect imaginable, he let her understand who he was, and thus address'd himself to her, Madam, said he, be pleas'd to permit me to convey your Majesty to the other Camp; there you will find less disorder, and it may be more obedience than here. How discreet soever Artabure was, neither to mention the defeat of the Cimbrians, nor the Victory of the Franks, Rosamond for all all that could not forbear to sigh: Then I see, said she, that fortune has declar'd her self for our Enemies, and Generous Balamir is lost. That great Prince, Malion, replyed Artabure, is still fighting for your interests; and for those Troops which you call your enemies, they have a thousand times more affection and zeal for your Majesty than those that seem to have espous'd your quarrel.

Concluding those words, because he was unwilling to lose time, he presented Rosamond his hand; and that great Queen thinking it below her Dignity, by shrieks or entreaties to tell me any reluctancy, prepar'd her self to submit to the Vanquisher, and follow where he should lead her. In the mean time, Pharamond understanding that the Franks were not only enter'd the Camp, but the Castle, was infinitely perplex'd, and hasten'd thither, transported with anger, to punish those that should lose their respect, or fail of their Duty to Rosamond, and going up stairs, he meets Artabure just coming down, when all astonish'd and forlorn to meet his divine Princess, now a Captive in the hands of the Roman: Ab! too valiant Artabure, cry'd he, Ab, my too zealous Friend, what art thou doing? That which becomes me, answer'd he, both in relation to your self and the Queen of the Cimbrians. No, no, (said he, interrupting him) it shall never be said that ever any force was put upon that divine Princess, so long as the unfortunate Pharamond sees the light of day.

Concluding those words, he put himself between Rosamond and Artabure, and throws himself at the feet of the only person in the world who had power to humble him. Immediately so excessive a joy seiz'd him, that he could not open his lips to express his thoughts, believing himself to be the most fortunate of men; nor was he in a capacity to hearken to Artabure, to consider that he was not yet Master of the Camp of his enemies, when the Roman, to whom at the same time they brought word of the condition of the Army, Sir, said he. Balamir has made our left Wing give way, and pursues it to the very Trenches: he is now about to return, and therefore let us put our selves in a posture to encounter him, and get an entire victory.

But Pharamond, instead of answering, being only busied in beholding the charming Queen, Artabure leaves him without any more words, at a time when every minute was to be managed to the best advantage, believing that his departure would sooner perfwade him than all the arguments in the world. But the passionate Pharamond, far from following, stays to admire the charming Beauties of the Queen; and addressing himself to her with all submission, For Heaven's sake, Madam, said he, look not upon me as guilty of a new crime; for though I present before your divine eyes an object which they cannot chuse but hate, 'tis not so much out of want of that deep respect which I shall ever pay you to my last gasp, as out of my fear and care lest the Soldiers under my command should commit the least offence displeasing to your Majesty in the heat of a Battel.

He uttered those words with so many signs of tenderness and deep respect, that the fair Queen after she had earnestly beheld him, return'd him this answer, Had you never appear'd before me, said she, but in this manner with your Arms in your hands, the unfortunate Theobald had been still alive, and I should not have been oblig'd to look upon you as an enemy: but you have obtain'd victories too fatal to me, not to be every day remembred, more especially when I behold you my self the Vanquisher of my Army. Ab, Madam, replyed he, if by the loss of a thousand Battels, of a thousand lives, nay, of my honour it self, I could but cause you to forget that which has made me the object of your ill will, instead of justifying my self in reference to the lost life that has drawn so many tears from your eyes, you shall see, Madam, how I will sacrifice to you all things for the revenge of your Brother's death: nay, provided I may but appease your indignation, I will renounce with joy all the Crowns which an ambitious heart can require from fortune and Victory. How happy should I be, added he, sighing, but a violent transportation hindering him from saying more, he abandon'd himself to the pleasure of beholding that divine face which produc'd that pleasing trouble in his Soul. The fire of his love sparkled so visibly in his eyes, and so evidently manifested it self in his behaviour, and all his expressions, that Rosamond blush'd to find her self in such a Labyrinth, that being desirous to oblige Pharamond to depart yet taking notice that the noise which she heard of a new Combat, could not move him to leave her company, See yonder, Sir, said she, how necessary your company is among the Franks; and though the memory of Theobald did not forbid me to stay long in your company, you may well think that I ought not to let you fall into the power of your enemies for having set me at liberty. Alas, Madam, said he, what can my presence avail among my Soldiers, since there is a necessity that I must be beaten, and that I cannot overcome, as you tell me, without afflicting you? Shall I appear at the head of them, only to be a witness of their being routed? Or shall I rally them again and fight to incur your displeasure. The affliction, which as I have told you, your valour has been the cause of, cannot make me yet so unjust, replied the Queen, to take it amiss that you should defend your life, and preserve your honour. Go and fight, said she, both for the one and the other (hearing the noise increase) follow those directions that Heaven and your courage shall inspire, and do not believe that Rosamond ceases to be just because unfortunate.

At those words, uttered not so much with the tone of an enemies voice, as with a sweet moderation mingled with Majesty, the amorous Prince had just so much power over himself as to leave the charming Queen of the Cimbrians, perceiving a new access of eagerness to overcome his Rivals, how invincible soever those obstacles were that stood in his way: I leave you, Madam, said he with a sad and respectful look, and since you permit me to defend my self, I will still encounter my enemies, who perhaps will not obtain that victory so easily which I would gladly yield them, for the honour they have of being in your presence every moment, and of entertaining the fairest Queen in the world.

Concluding those words, he departed, and perceiving Balamir returning with his victorious Troops, he advanc'd furiously toward him, as being his most formidable Rival. On the other side, Sunnon, who had followed the King his Brother, and had seen the Queen of the Turingiens, began to think of setting Viridomar at liberty, remembering that that Prince had formerly sav'd his life, as well as the Princess Polixena's. He had understood in the Camp of the Cimbrians, while he lay hid there for Amalazontba's sake, in what Quarter the King of Suevia kept the Prince his Son. Thither flies he, and after a stout resistance he enters the Chamber where Viridomar was confin'd: presently he made himself known, and embrac'd him with an extraordinary affection, Generous Prince, said he, you are free, you are free all manner of ways, and far from being oblig'd to make any satisfaction for the service which I have done you; for I have not yet discharg'd my self of those obligations which you have laid upon me.

After those words he hugg'd him in his Arms, and left him without staying for an answer, whether it were that his business call'd him, or that he did it to leave Viridomar his entire liberty without any manner of constraint. The Prince of Suevia no sooner perceiv'd that it was Sunnon who had given him his liberty, but he was thereupon infinitely overjoyed. At first he resolv'd to follow him, but soon after his resolution staggered; he found he could neither fight against the King his Father, nor against a Prince that had given him his freedom, and the Brother of Polixena beside; and thereupon he felt an extraordinary grief, believing that this new favour of fortune was but the beginning of a new persecution. However, it behov'd him to determine quickly, and indeed he had no sooner resolv'd in his mind those opposite considerations that kept his thoughts in suspense, when he understood that the King his Father was in great danger, but that it was not against the Brothers of the Princess against whom he was to appear in his defence: he sends therefore for Horse and Arms, and hastening to the place to which they directed him, he found that the Prince whom he went to succour was wounded, and that he did but weakly defend his life and liberty against a great number of his enemies that environ'd him. The violent King knew his Son, and seeing him come with his Sword in his hand, and a courageous look, his imagination quick and jealous, presently conceived a hundred unjust thoughts. In short, he believ'd that Viridomar had escap'd in the hurly burly of the Battel, that he would revenge himself for a great injury, and at one blow assure himself of his future repose; and out of this apprehension looking upon him with eyes inflam'd with choler, Perfidious wretch, cry'd he, art thou come to joyn thy self with the Franks, and to deprive me of a life which hinders thee from ascending my Throne, and placing therein the Sister of Pharamond?

The Generous Prince, instead of returning any answer, flies at the enemies of his ingrateful Father, breaks in among them, overturns the most eager, disengages the King; and perceiving that his Horse being run through in several places was ready to fall, the Prince alights and presents him his own, with the same submission as he could have shewn to the most indulgent Father in the world. At length addressing himself to him with the same respect, Sir, said he, will you be pleas'd to pardon me for stirring from that place where I was confin'd by your order.

Upon those words the King of Suevia, beheld Viridomar with a kind of Astonishment, at first he manifestted something of shame, afterwards being sensible that the acknowledgement, which he owed for so great a piece of service, restrained his natural fierceness, he was so vexed to see himself thus hamper'd, that his very madness appeared in his look, and hindered him from giving any answer. Nevertheless at length; Viridomar, said he, you have rescued me out of the hands of the Franks, but what have you done which you were not oblig'd to do? For who can assure me that affection had a greater share in the Act, than desire of honour? Afterwards beginning to think that the generous behaviour of the Prince, would would make a noise in the world, and that the report thereof would certainly be known to the Princes of the Franks, he blushed for Anger, and if he did not run wholly besides himself, it was not so much out of any moderation that proceeded from his reason, as out of the weakness caused by his wounds, and his weariness after a tedious fight, notwithstanding all the vigour of his courage.

Viridomar caused him to be carried to the town, where his wounds were searched; but not being found dangerous, and seeing all those Officers and Attendants about the King, who were most necessary and in whom he most confided, the Prince thought he might leave him without offence, desirous rather to go in search of some opportunity, to discharge himself toward the person that gave him his liberty. To that purpose he drew near his Father, and whispering him in the Ear; Sir, said he, you are free but I am not, and therefore be pleased to let me go, and give some testimonies of acknowledgment to a Prince, to whom I am beholdng for your liberty. Go, said he, follow the dictates of your own heart, serve the Enemies of your Country, of your Father and of your Sovereign: for if my carriage has been severe toward you, I make no question but you will justify it by your Actions, now you have your own will.

The Prince endured whatever was sharp and biting in that answer, with the same aspect with which he was wont to endure all the reproaches of the violent King, taking his leave in a most dutiful manner. He was no sooner mounted but he inform'd himself, of the condition of both Armies, whereby he understood that Pharamond was marched to meet Balamir. That Artabure being about to follow him, was attacked by Briomer and Contran, and that at the same time, Gondioch and Gondemar had rallied a part of their Troops, and charged Sunnon as he was going to joyn with the King his Brother. Viridomar never studied which part to take, he flew to the succour of Sunnon, and while he fought against the Burgundian Princes with the same valour, that he had at other times opposed against Balamir and Pharamond themselves, a certain Knight haughty and warlike in his deportment, entered the Camp, and joyn'd himself to the Cimbrians. After he had made himself remarkable by his great Actions, he assisted Contran where he manifested, by the redoublement of his vigour, that it was principally in defence of the Castle, that he exposed his life. He presented himself before Artabure, and fiercely challenging him; If thou art Sunnon, said he, and durst make an attempt upon the liberty of the Turingien Queen, turn thy Sword against me, and if thou canst begin the execution of this design by my death happily for thee. I am not Sunnon, replied the Roman, but how inferiour soever my valour may be to his, I have no mistrust that it will submit to thy strength. They had no sooner done speaking, but they charged one another with an unspeakable fury, and though they were often separated by the Throng, yet they met together again.

In the mean time the invincible Pharamond opposes the formidable Balamir; he saw him marching at the head of the Cimbrians, and Advancing toward the Camp with an aspect that manifested the honour which he had won, and the hope he had to have still the same success. For in short, that valiant Prince and the King of the Gepides, had so luckily conducted the right Wing, that maugre all the endeavours of Marcomire and Taxander, they put to flight all that made head against them. At first the Prince of the Franks, vigorously opposed himself against the Captain of the Cimbrians, but after he had for some time sustain'd the impetuosity of his fury, he was separated by a great body of Cavalry. Then he sought for Arderie, to signalize himself by some noble exploit, and having found him he opened himself a passage with his Sword, met with him and prepared to Assail him. And as they were both hardy and stout, and animated with the same passion, they obstinately contended for the victory. Nor was the same fortune that too often shares in such encounters, wanting to second their purposes in removing all obstacles that they had reason to fear, and fatal in its kindness, gave them! sure to give one another several wounds, and to put themselves almost out of a condition to maintain the Combat. On the other side the Prince of the Huns, and the King of the Tongres met, and both the one and the other overturning all obstacles that made any resistance, they presently knew and assailed each other with a great deal of satisfaction, each other finding in his renowned enemy an object worthy all his valour. Thereupon they displayed all that nimbleness joyned with courage, could produce of admiration. But the generous Taxander at last fought with more courage than good fortune, receiving two wounds, for which he comforted himself with the honour of having dyed his Sword in Balamir's blood. But then that furious King flew upon the King of the Tongres, who received him like an undaunted Soldier; but if he vigorously sustain'd the surly shock, his Horse was overturned, and Taxander, as nimble as he was to disengage himself from his Stirrups, had been overwhelmed among a great Body of the Cimbrians, if Balamir

Umir himself, to preserve the life of so valiant a Prince, had not stopp'd the most eager of the throng. The King of the Tongres, whose Sword was up against him, taking notice of that action, was mov'd with his Generosity, so that instead of pursuing his blow, he us'd the following expressions, I make no question but that you are the famous Balamir, your last action assures me of it, as your valour perswaded me before: enjoy then all those victories which it bebozes me to yield to your conquering Sword, and receive my heart after you have triumph'd over my strength.

Concluding these words, he delivered him his Sword, but the Prince of the Huns, instead of accepting it, commanded a Horse to be brought for Taxander, whose quality he no sooner understood, but he return'd him this answer, Sir, said he, 'tis only to the divine Rosamond that you are to deliver it; if I lack'd by my self, and did not hold my employment under the fairest Queen in the world, I should be so far from receiving that Sword which you offer me, and of which you make too good an use to surrender it into any other hands, that I should not so much as request of you that word which you will not now refuse me, to permit your self to be condued into our Camp.

To which, when Taxander had given his consent, he recommended him to Telanor's care, while he continued the pursuit of those affrighted Troops that Marcomire strove in vain to rally, or encourage any farther. Not but that he made a stand from time to time with a select number of men, notwithstanding his wounds, or that he did not shew in that retreat an experience beyond his age. But what could he do against the famous Balamir, who had rally'd the Gepides, and the Alains, and had joyned them to the Cimbrians? What could he do when the timorous Tongres had caus'd a disorder among those Troops which he sought to encourage?

That Generous Prince seeing that he could not stop the right Wing of the Enemy, and that part of that which he commanded was entirely routed, and just upon reentring into the Camp, resolv'd not to survive his bad fortune; and therefore to end his life with honour, he resolv'd to go seek out Balamir, to encounter him, and not to leave him till the death of the one or the other had decided the controversy. But at the same time that he parted from the rest with this intention, Charamont issuing out of the Trenches fresh and active, labours to rally those that fled, and to lead them on again to the charge. On the other side, the Prince of the Huns no sooner understood that the Franks were entred the Cimbrian Camp, but he began to be in fear of Rosamond's being taken, being no less prick'd forward by that noble emulation between him and Pharamond. And thereupon passing into the rear of his Troops, he made that the Front, and advances toward the famous King, who, on the other side, in his way to meet him, encounters Telanor, beats him, and had the satisfaction to give the King of the Tongres his liberty. However, Sir, said Taxander, give me leave not to make so much advantage of this renowned action performed in my behalf, for I am more powerfully bound to Prince Balamir by my word which I gave him, than the strength of his Guard: so that if your valour could without trouble disengage those whom you have from the crowd of their Enemies, your Generosity doubtless will not permit them to fail of their promises.

After these few words, not finding it convenient to say more, he took his leave of Pharamond, who embracing him with all respect and tenderness, suffered him to depart, not being willing to oppose his intentions so conformable to his own. In the mean time, it growing somewhat late, the two famous Champions foam'd with impatience till they came hand to hand. No sooner were they so near as to observe one another, but they set spurs to their Horses both at the same time, as if they had known one anothers intentions; and meeting in the middle between the two Bodies, they encountred with that vigour and violence, that the air resounded, and both their Lances flew in a thousand pieces: the two Rivals were enraged that those weapons had no better seconded their purposes; and therefore drawing their Swords, they prepared to put an end to a Combat wherein they found themselves engaged more out of a desire of Glory, than out of any animosity, whatever hatred might proceed from their jealousy. But their Troops that followed them, though Enemies to each other, yet inspired with the same Genius at that time, thought good to oppose a resolution which would prove so dangerous in its consequence, the Franks being fearful for their King, whatever confidence they had in his valour; and the Cimbrians growing pale for their General, with the same affection and tenderness they could have trewd their Sovereign. To which end they courageously clos'd themselves to part their Captains, by that means calling them away to their several charges; so that the great Pharamond, and the incens'd Balamir were constrain'd to defer till another time the effects of their anger. While they therefore signaliz'd their conduct and their courage, Vindomar performed exploits little different: for as if it had not been against the Suevians that he fought, he displayed all his courage, and so well seconded Sannon's valour, that they quite cut to pieces the Burgundians that Gondioch had rallied, so that the fierce Prince was obliged to save himself by flight. But Gondemar preferring death before a retreat, met with a fate no way correspondent to his generous intention. For he let drive a great blow at Viridomar, which he receiving upon his Buckler that was excellently temper'd, Gondemar's Sword broke, so that the disarm'd Prince lay now at Viridomar's mercy of whose confinement he had been the cause some weeks before.

In the village and at the foot of the Castle, they fought with different success: Genebaud was entred the Camp in Aid of Artabure, when that valiant Knight who was already known for Ambiomer, desirous to hinder that conjunction, advanced toward the Frank Prince, having left Gontran and Briomer to make head against Artabure. But that famous Roman renewing his courage, to put an end with honour to the Actions of that day, made the hairbrain'd Cimbrian give ground, and the Burgundian Prince making an obstinate resistance, was wounded, and he forced to surrender his liberty to the valour of his Enemy. Nevertheless, that good fortune which every where followed the Franks, forsook them against whom Ambiomer fought, so that how gallant and courageous soever Genebaud was, after a fierce and bloody combat, he met with the same fate in fighting his Adversaries, as Gontran had met in undertaking Artabure. But at length notwithstanding these brave exploits, that valour displayed in both Armies, there was now a necessity that so many Renowned warriors, should part sooner than they were willing: For their heat and fury continued longer than the day, and the envious night far more speedy than they desired, spread it self in an instant over the world, as it were to bury in darkness those noble exploits, the remembrance whereof never ought to perish in the memory of men.

The End of the First Book of the Ninth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

P*Haramond* and Balamir brook'd it with impatience, that the only obstacle which they never thought in a condition to hinder them, had spoiled their generous design, either to vanquish or dye. They were not content to have carried away the victory wherever they fought, seeing that at the end of a Battel, that had been so honourable to them both, they both met with a new vexation, to be parted from an Enemy before they had triumphed over his valour. In the mean time as much Heroes as they were, their fury must yield to the laws of nature, so that they were constrained to retreat, before the obscurity of the night engaged them in a pal-mal confusion, without being able to discern their own from the Enemies Troops. The first care they took after their retreat, was not only to relieve all those that stood in need in both Armies, but both parties had free leave granted to search by Torch-light, for all such wounded wounded persons, of whose recovery there was any hopes. The next day having caused the most considerable among the slain to be buried, they made great fires upon the place where the Battel was fought, to prevent the corruption of the Air, after which they began to compute their losses. Certain it was that the Advantage was really on the Franks side, however not so great as to pass for an entire victory. They had killed about five and twenty thousand of their Enemies, but they had lost above fifteen thousand: And if the King of the Herules, generous Gondemar, and Prince Gontran were prisoners to the Franks, the Cimbrians had among them the King of the Tongres, and Prince Genebaud.

Besides these famous Warriors, of whom we are obliged to make particular mention, several others illustrious both for their birth and merit, though less celebrated by fame, were either slain or else signalized themselves in that Battel. Nor was valour that seems generally, to make the only decision in such memorable encounters, the only virtue to be admired: For generosity produced as noble effects, which are looked upon with as much esteem and as much satisfaction, as Acts of valour how honourable or glorious soever. For that reason when the Battel was at an end, there appeared no farther hostility or enmity; the prisoners on both sides being treated with as much care, as if they had not changed their Camps. There were also some proposals mentioned for a Truce, long enough to give time for the cure of the wounded, and to make new Recruits and new Alliances. Viridomar seconded the proposal to his utmost, for he had surrendred himself to Sannon, not believing that he could serve the King his Father in the Cimbrian Camp, or dispence with a voluntary taking the French side. On the other side the generous King of the Tongres surrendred himself to Balamir, and for that his valour and his last exploit, had won him the esteem of all the confederate Princes, he was visited by all those that were in a condition, and was most obligingly complemented by all the rest: and which he found himself so highly obliged, that being otherwise charm'd by the merit of Pharamond, he thought he could not more profitably employ his time for the good of both Armies, than to mediate a peace, after a Battel that had so much weaken'd their force. Before he published his design he discovered himself to the Prince of the Huns much to this effect; Sir, said he, were you not one of the most valiant Princes in the world, and that the justice of your mind were not as well worthy our admiration, as the grandeur of your courage, I should not presume to tell you that it is time to put an end to a war, where you daily win new additions of honour. But I am assured that you will not prefer the interest of your Reputation, before the good of many Nations that bewail their calamity, and that you have a generous consideration, that many men must lose their lives in these encounters, where you only signalize your valour: And therefore, Sir, if you think it convenient that I should second the good intentions of the great Constance, I shall be overjoyed by my labours and my travel, to settle peace among so many desolate nations. I will write to the generous Roman, who has already began to mediate for a general accommodation, and after I have given him an account of the condition of affairs, out of that respect to that great personage, under whom I served my first apprenticeship in war; I shall conjure him to take upon him once more, a negotiation, the good success whereof will determine, the miseries of a good part of Europe. He said no more, when Prince Balamir returned him to answer; Though it were certain, said he, that fortune had always befriended me in fight, yet she never favoured me so much that such a Prince as you, should think me worthy these obliging expressions which you have bestowed upon me, nor indeed to give me any great authority in our Army. The power which it may be thought I have, depends upon the illustrious Rosalmond, and whatever my inclinations may be either to peace or war, I must absolutely submit to that fair and great Queen. It is she, Sir, who is chiefly concern'd in those differences, to which you would endeavour to put an end: and it is to her that you are to address your self, in relation to the treaty, which you proffer to undertake with the famous Constance. I will say this however, (if you will permit me to tell you my thoughts) that it will be very convenient before you make any overture, that you declare what engagements those are, that tie you to the French interest. The Queens of the Cimbrians and Turingiens, have confusedly heard many remarkable stories of your life, and being I know they mainly desire to understand the particulars, it will be a very easy thing for you to satisfy their request, and at the same time to let them know, how you came to take part with Pharamond. There are so few accidents in the story of my life, worthy the curiosity of those fair Princesses, replied Taxander, that I could willingly be dispens'd withal, where I can give so little satisfaction. It will be a very difficult thing for you to deny what they demand, so soon as you do but see them. I know sufficiently already, replied Taxander, how far renown has spread the wonders of those miraculous beauties, which is the reason I fear that all the recital which I can make, will not merit their attention. And most certainly I shall be very short, without repeating those accidents in war, of which they have had sufficient information.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but they brought him word, that there was one of Rosamond's Attendants who was come to complement him on the behalf of the Queen his Mistress, and he had no sooner return'd his answer to the first civility, but he received many others of the same nature. The Queen of Turingia, and the Princes of the Lombards were no less obliging than Rosamond, not only to complement Taxander, but also the Kings of Suevia, and the Geptides, who were considerably wounded. They gave a visit to the King of Suevia, from whom the afflicted Albisinda would not be absent. They also sent to visit Balamir, Ambiomer, and the King of the Hasternes, though according to the opinion of the Chirurgeons, there was no necessity for them to keep their Chambers above two or three day. They also manifested their intentions to visit those Princes who were threatened with more tedious distempers, as soon as things were recovered out of that disorder wherein at present they were. But they were not a little surpris'd the next morning, when it was told them that Balamir was come to the Castle, and desired admittance into the Queen of the Cimbrians presence: for indeed that amorous Prince could no longer deprive him of a sight so precious: and the King of the Tongres who was a little troubled with his wounds, being only in one Arm, soon followed him, to see those celebrated Beauties of whom the whole earth had spoken with so much admiration. Balamir presented him with a comly grace, and Taxander accosted the Queen after such a manner as was not only conformable to the grandeur of his Birth, and his new Dignity, but like a person accomplish'd with that polite and brisk behaviour which he had learn'd in the Court of Honorius. The Queen on her part most obligingly receiv'd the King of the Tongres, and after the first complements of civility Taxander thus proceeded, Madam, said he, the Generous Prince of the Huns was willing that I should come hither to receive an honour which might cause me to forget that which I have lost in the Battel; or else perhaps he is too much concern'd for your interests, as not to be contented to have made me yield my Arms, unless he also deprive me by your presence of the liberty of ever bearing them again against a divine Princess whose Beauties no person can have the power to resist. You see for all that, (modestly replied Rosamond, turning the subject of the discourse) that our side was never the more successful: so that if Balamir had not performed prodigious exploits of valour to our advantage, we had been at this time at the mercy of our Enemies. The Franks might overcome the Cimbrians, replied Taxander, but whatever success accompanied them in the Battel, never would the renowned Pharamond have been the less a Captive to the divine Queen of the Cimbrians. As you express your self, replied Rosamond, I am apt to believe that it was out of a particular friendship that you adher'd to his interest. Nevertheless, as the alliance which you made so all upon the sudden, has surpris'd all the world, we desire to be better inform'd, when you shall be pleas'd to think it convenient, to the end, that if you have any reason to dislike a confederacy with us, we may be able to satisfy you in that particular, and to let you know we are not so unjust as the world perhaps would persuade you. That shall be when you command me, Madam, and something which Prince Balamir has already told me as from your Majesty, shall make me go a little farther in recounting to you all the passages of my life that have made any impression in my memory. If this recital be not inconvenient, replied the Queen, I know not why I may not request it this very time, At least, Madam, replied the Prince of the Huns, you need not fear that the length thereof will prove prejudicial to the King of the Tongres's health; for by what I understand of his disposition, he will but very slightly pass over his own famous actions; so that you are like to hear but one half of his History. Provided he conceal nothing but what renown has already publish'd, replied Rosamond, we shall have no cause to complain. In truth, replied the complaisant Taxander, I cannot tell whether I shall be quick enough to discern those things which I am to speak, from what are unnecessary for me to repeat. But at the hazard of committing never so many faults, I must not refuse to be my own Historian, since the fairest Queen in the world commands me.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but the illustrious Personages took their Seats, when the King of the Tongres, after a short study, thus began the Relation which they required of him, addressing his speech to the beautiful Queen of the Cimbrians.

The History of Taxander.

I Am of opinion, that it is not without a kind of vain glory that we reproach fortune; for besides that, she is continually said to be an enemy of virtue, we rather chuse to accuse her humours and follies than our own weakness; otherwise her blindness might testify that we suffer unjustly, and beget that compassion which we seek in our misfortunes, as the most pleasing consolation of the miserable. But, Madam, though that power which I mention be not so culpable as she is ordinarily describ'd to be, yet she ceases not to render her self formidable, when she unites her Forces to those of love, and when she displays her follies in the vast Empire of that dreaded Deity, I have but too severely prov'd the truth hereof, as you will find in the pursuit of this discourse. But before I give you an account how maliciously she seems to have taken pleasure in the persecution of my life, I will tell you the reasons that perswaded King Marsandus to send me, together with my Sister Cleomira, to the Court of Rome. Atsard King of Agrippina, Father of the Prince that gave me life, some time past made a league with Theodosius the Great, and fought for his interest with so much valour and conduct, that he thereby not only obtain'd to be his Lieutenant General over all Gallia Belgica, but also to be Sovereign of the Tongres. Marsandus inclin'd by his breeding and nutriture to serve the Romans, preserv'd the same affection for Honorius: so that the Princess Cleomira and my self were no sooner of an age fit for travel, but he sent us both to Rome, how loud soever they murmured in Germany against so odd and severe a piece of policy. Nevertheless, the prudent King did not deprive himself of the sight of his children, nor in all liklyhood seem to forsake them, but that they might live with more security in the Capital City of the West. He saw the Cloud that was gathering into a dismal Tempest. He saw a numberless number of Nations preparing to make an inundation upon the fairest and most pleasant Provinces of Europe, and that his Dominions were threatened to be made a thorough-fare for all those people who were taking Arms to the ruine of the Empire. Therefore he was willing to give Honorius that proof of his friendship and fidelity, to the end he might be assisted by him, and not be suspected at such a time when all the world was up in Arms against him, either to shake off the Roman yoke, or to usurp the Territories of the Empire. You know, Madam, that the King of the Huns had a design little different from that of Marsandus, and that he sent the Princess Theodolinda to Rome, who was Sister to that great Prince who was the cause of my now speaking before your Majesty. The Romans look'd upon that fair and noble Stranger with a great deal of respect, insomuch that Honorius, the Empress his wife being dead, had those thoughts for her which made the Huns expect a closer alliance than what was at the present intended. There was nothing then talk'd of, but of pastimes and pleasure, so that during a time that seem'd to be consecrated to joy, I made it my business to visit the fairest persons, that were the ornament of that Magnificent Court, and to be acquainted with Claudian, and some other of the wits who flourish'd at that time. There I reform'd and polish'd among the Ladies whatever I had brought of rude and unbeseeming out of our Climate, and I not only in a short time understood the delicacies of the language, but I ventur'd also to make several Verses which Claudian did not disapprove; nor did these soft and pleasing amusements hinder me from the exact exercise and practice of my Arms. And whenever there was any occasion of going to war, I went along with the young Nobility that were covetous of Honour, without any regard to my Dignity. Thus was my life happy, besides that, I had a name among the Soldiers: during the Winter I signaliz'd my self by actions of Gallantry, if I may be permitted to speak after that rate; and for that I had no particular ties, but fought to please all in general, there was not a Lady that would not be of one side or other in the matches which I made, or who took any offence at my eagerness or diligence. Those pastimes were laid aside upon Stilicon's death, the particulars whereof are known to all the world, Honorius for some days appearing very sorry, to shew that it was not by his order that Heraclian had slain his illustrious Favourite. But as he began to live at more liberty, having cast off a yoke so burthenfome, he receiv'd news that the Banks of the Rhine were throng'd with several vast Armies. Soon after there came Embassadors from the King my Father, who laid before him the troubles of Germany, and conjur'd him by the memory of Theodosius to assist his Allies, who had always faithfully fought under his Eagles, for the Glory and Honour of the Empire. They added some days after, that several Nations had revolted from the Romans, that the Nemetians had taken part with Pharamond, that the Senonois held for Gondioch, and that they had also admitted him into their Territories. Hereupon I presently prepared to hasten to the Aid of Mirisandus, but as I was about to depart, we understood that the Franks and Furgundians were divided, and that having made Alliances, with all the neighbouring Princes that were taking Arms, all those great Armies were marching one against another, instead of pouring themselves forth upon the Territories of the Empire. Thus the King of the Nemetians, the Prince of the Senonois, having exposed themselves to the displeasure of Honorius, sent privately to Rome, made large Presents to Heraclian then in great favour, and requested him to make their peace, yielding to any conditions which he was pleased to prescribe. Heraclian gave them to understand, that he found it a very difficult thing to obtain what they demanded. That Honorius was bitterly incensed, and that it was but just that they should have at least as much respect for a person of his quality, as the Kings of the Huns and Tongres had shewn already. That all the world had heard of their proceedings, and that they ought therefore to do more than other Princes less powerful, who had broken with the Emperour, not only by giving the best hostages they could, but by adding other circumstances more obliging.

During that negotiation which endured for some time, Heraclian laid before them great obstructions, to the end that Salison and Cavaria, (for those were the names of the King of the Nemetians and Prince of the Senonois) might be the more engaged to him, and that they might shew the greater submission to Honorius. On the other side he extoll'd his great pains to the Emperour, telling him how he gained Nations every day, that he had perswaded and almost reduced Salison and Cavaria, to resubmit themselves to his government, which they were just upon the point to do, upon very advantageous terms to the Empire. True it is that he managed this Address with a great deal of policy, for soon after it was reported that the Prince of the Senonois was coming himself to Rome, and that the King of the Nemetians would send his Wife and his Daughter in his behalf. It was about that time, Madam, that Heraclian was possessed of the government of Africa, and that the Emperour himself became desperately in love with that incomparable Lady whom he had seen in Trajan's Gardens.

Heraclian who was at that time with Honorius, felt the same fire, but as it is not their history which I am now relating to your Majesty, instead of rehearsing the particulars of their engagement, I will only content my self to say, that there were few that could boast of their freedom, that had seen the most admirable Bellamira. I may also add that there were few beauties in the world, more accomplished or more charming than Bellamira's. But while Heraclian visited that most wonderful beauty on the Emperour's behalf, instead of speaking for his Master, though he only acted for his own proper interests, there came to see him a young Knight of a goodly presence, and full of wit and briskness. Heraclian however, would not let him be seen but by few, confers with him only in private, and makes the world believe that this very Stranger, was the Prince of the Senonois, who was unwilling to appear according to his quality, until he had received that favourable answer from the Emperour, of which he was in hopes. Nevertheless he openly obliges him to the service of a lovely Lady, the Sister of Artabure whose name was Hersilia, who thereupon gives her such pretended proofs of a violent passion, that Hersilia was thereby thorowly moved and engaged.

In the mean while Heraclian is advertised, that certain Ladies were arrived within six miles of Rome, at a house belonging to one of his nearest kindred named Camilla. Thither goes he, and notwithstanding his love for Bellamira, good manners and business detain him there for some days. Maximus and Ariobindus follow him, out of a curiosity incident to youth, and they were no sooner returned, but they talked of nothing else but of a wonder, which they had only had as it were a glimpse of, yet they durst compare her beauty, to the charms themselves of the Princess Placidia. The next day Flavian and young Aëtius made a match to go visit Camilla, and so earnestly desired me to make one that I easily yielded, Aëtius was desirous to take Artabure and Claudian along; but Artabure refused to visit a person, that had obtained from him to his prejudice, one of the most principal governments of the Empire, and who too often did him many other ill offices with the Emperour. On the other side Claudian consented to our request, but as he had been a Favourite of Stillicon's, (as his famous works made manifest) he had too much a desire to go to Camilla's house to visit Heraclian, as to discover what news he could pick up in the Country. No sooner were we come nere a place, that was to prove so fatal to my purpose, but I felt an alteration within my self more than ordinary, and which without doubt was only an ill omen, of what was afterward to befall me. I presently blam'd my own weakness, and striving to recover my former briskness, Have ye thought upon, said I to Flavian, what method we ought to observe, in coming all four together to Camilla's house. For my part, I think it is better for us to divide our selves, and that while Claudian and Ætius, enter at that gate which we see before us, that we go about and seek to get in at the Park. 'Tis very true, said Claudian, in consent with me, that there may be some jealousy of so much company, in a house that entertains the favourite of Honorius, and so beautiful a person beside. As for doing any injury to the favourite; replied young Ætius, it will not be any great prejudice to go all together. We shall yet find less perhaps, replied Flavian smiling, if we have any desire to serve that fair Stranger, whom we are so covetous to see. With that, said I impatiently, happen what will it is not convenient that they should suspect that we come by agreement, or to have made a match, which cannot be pleasing to those persons, who it is evident desire not much company.

Concluding these words I left Ætius and Claudian, and rode toward the Park Gate, at a swifter rate than before, as it were led thither by the compulsion of my own destiny. Flavian followed me, and we were no sooner enter'd and allighted, giving our Horses to our Pages, but we took a walk by the side of a brook to avoid seeing Camilla, till Ætius and Claudian had been some time with her. For my part, though I had been at the same place several times before, I must confess that it never seem'd so pleasant as at that time. The Air seem'd more sweet, the chirping of the Birds more delightful, the brooks more fair and clear than ordinary, the verdure and shades seem'd to have put on a new spring, and a more pleasant dress than ever before I had observed. In short, all things seem'd to dispose my heart, to a certain pleasure which is inseparable from the first engagement: or to say better, all things seem'd to open that unfortunate heart, that it might more easily receive the poison which threaten'd it, and which was to please it for the present, only to punish it afterwards with a tedious pursuit of torments.

Thus conducted by a kind of meditation wherein I found a secret charm, I went toward a pleasing tuft of trees, and entering into the shade I perceived two women admirably shap'd, and who had something of the stranger in the Air of their faces. But because of the sumptuousness of my riding habit, and for that Flavian who appear'd to be a person of quality, seem'd to follow me with a more than ordinary respect, the Ladies left the bank of the Rivolet free, and very ceremoniously retired. Yet were not my thoughts so strongly prepossessed, as to hinder me from taking notice of their behaviour: And therefore Advancing toward them, I civilly told them, that it was for me to quit a place which already belong'd to them, that Ladies had no less privilege in Italy than in other Countries, and that they were less to be ignorant what it was to give way to a Sex that owed all respect and duty to theirs.

While I was using these complements, one of the Strangers turned her head as if she had been fearful that my discourse was overheard, though indeed it were only to see whether I had not wak'd a young person who was fallen asleep, in reading a book which she still held in one of her fair hands. She sat upon the grass at the foot of a great Tree: But, Madam, what was it I saw there, or how shall I be able to describe her? I drew near, rather moved by a natural impulse, than by any reflexion that I could make, and Advanced gently forward to a place where I might more conveniently behold her as to the fatal point, whither a force beyond the power of my resistance constrained me. I saw (alas! what have I suffered for that sight, after the happiness but of one moment?) I saw a wonder which immediately defaced all impressions of the most accomplished beauties, imprinted in my memory before, raising those disturbances in my mind that I never was Accustom'd to. My eyes were dazzled with the whiteness and splendour of her complexion, exact was the symmetry and of a perfect hue, the tincture of those vermilion lips that clos'd her mouth, besides a thousand graces more triumphing in her beauty, that wanton'd among the curls of her white hair, that dangled upon her cheeks at the pleasure of the gentle Breezes. As all contributed to my ruine, the same wind discovered to me part of her youthful bosom, and that charmed me altogether, so that although I could have defended my liberty against all those charms, yet others more powerful that displayed themselves in an instant, would soon have utterly enthralled it.

In short that admirable person that slept not very soundly not long after wak'd, and as if those celestial eyes had been only closed to create more fire, they darted so many beams at once, that methought my soul was all of a flame. I was dazzled, astonish'd, lost my remembrance and the knowledge of every thing. In short I saw nothing but that divine unknown person, being touch'd with such an unusual passion for her, that my heart never felt before. While I beheld her in an extasie more then ordinary, and with joy suck'd in the poison that afterwards wrought so fatally, she perceived me, nor was I wanting to make a most respectful obedience. But when her women drew near her, they no sooner had given her their hands, but she rose, and after a civil courtesie she took a little path that cross'd the way where I was, and went away before I was capable of taking any resolution. However, I knew that my eyes and my heart followed her; and when the Trees had robb'd me of the sight of her, my eyes were curtain'd with darkness, and all those things which I beheld with pleasure lost both their charms and lustre. Not but that I had still some kind of veneration for the place which that celestial Beauty had left, for I envied the Grass on which her fair Body had lain. Methought that after that Honour it rose again more green and lusty. And a thousand thoughts like these had come into my mind, had not Flavian interrupted me, Sir, said he, smiling, surely that beautiful Stranger is a most dangerous person in matter of revenge, that for so slight an injury done to her repose in making her, has disturb'd yours after so terrible a manner. I cannot tell, (answered I with all the brisknets that I could possibly recollect) whether you are already acquainted with the humour of a person that you never saw, but I am sensible how much you are deceiv'd in reference to my concerns; for I never received more content than I had in meeting that wonderful unknown Beauty. I would have run after her, had modesty permitted me, and notwithstanding the dangers which you have the unkindness to make me apprehend, I long impatiently to see Heraclian, to the end, he may bring me into the company of that person which you call so dangerous.

Concluding those words, instead of staying to hear Flavian's answer, I went in great haste to Camilla's House; nor had I gone many steps before I saw Heraclian, who was coming together with Claudian to meet me. He received me with all the civility I could have expected from a haughty Favourite, who was not only Governour of Africa, but also by reason of Honorius's weakness, pretended to be Master of all the affairs of the West. He told me his Kinswoman had been extremely surpris'd at the honour which I did her, and that for his part, he was bound to make me a particular acknowledgment. But my mind was so little at rest, that I return'd him no direct answer, and my countenance appear'd to chang'd, that Heraclian, who never believ'd me to be his Friend, thought that I had some private design, and that I had not come to that place, but that I knew I should there find the Queen of the Nemetians, and the Princess her Daughter: insomuch that if Claudian had not interrupted the discourse, it had not perhaps continued very pleasing. True it is, that we soon discovered Camilla in a green Court between the House and the Park, whither, as I gathered by Heraclian's words she was also come, together with Atius to meet me. I immediately made haste to salute her, when she, after the usual complements upon such occasions, desiring me to go in and rest my self in a magnificent Parlour, Madam, answered Flavian, either I am deceiv'd, or Prince Taxander has less need of repose than to go seek where he may lose that sweet rest which he enjoy'd when he enter'd the wood. I confess, said I, I met there a most incomparable Beauty, from whom it did not a little grieve me to part. And therefore, Madam, as you would not that I should repent of my coming to give you a visit, I make no question but you will permit me once more to see so amiable a person, to the end, that being accustomed to her charms, I may return with as much quiet and repose of mind as when I came hither.

Those words somewhat puzzled Camilla, which made her cast an eye upon her Kinsman, that she might the more handsomely come off with her answer. Heraclian appear'd very much troubled, and fearing lest I should either come to know, or fall in love with the Princess of the Nemetians, for that was she to whom my heart had surrendred it self, Sir, said he, the Stranger for whom you enquire, is a personage of great quality, who came to this House to avoid company, and to tarry with her Mother, who has been advis'd to take the Country air.

Claudian observing that I was not very well satisfied with that excuse, What, said he, shall I know there is a Lady in this Park lovely and young, and shall I suffer her to be melancholy and retired. To what purpose serves a lively and brisk humour, when I must be barred its privileges, and that it should be forbid me as to another man, to see a person that I am oblig'd to divertise.

Camilla, Atius and Flavian could not chuse but laugh; but for my part, I observed Heraclian, who, after he had paused a while, plainly thought he should encrease my suspicion, if he manifested any farther reluctance; to let me see Adelziada (for that was the name of the Princess of the Nemetians) but having peculiar ends of his own, he neither would let me know her name, nor give me an opportunity to entertain her in particular. And his behaviour being conformable to his intentions at that meeting, "Sir, said he, you shall see two persons instead of one, and you must not take it amiss, if Camilla, who acts in all things according to the rules of order, does not show you the Lady of whom you speak, “ unless it be in her Mother’s Chamber, who would not her self approve any other sort of “ visit. “ By what I find, said Claudian, you are more exact in this place of Divertise-“ ment, than you could be at Rome, and perhaps you come not so much into the Country, “ to take that sweet liberty which is ordinarily sought for there, but rather clog it with “ these troublesome customs that injure modest persons in great Cities. “ However, I am “ of opinion, replied Heraclian, that it is better to consider the quality of the persons, than “ nature of places. “ I am of the same opinion, said I, for though in the Country we are “ allow’d to banish the peffment of Ceremonies, I agree that we must make an excepti“ on as to the women, to whom we owe all the respect in the world.

After I had said those words, Camilla gave me the hand which she had yet free: and while Ætius and I began to lead her toward the House, Heraclian, attended by the rest of the company, went directly to the fatal Wood, where I had surrendered my heart to the divine Adelaiada. I could not forbear to turn my head, and followed him with the thoughts of such as were more happy than my self, but when I was in the Chamber of Polyena, (that was the name of the Queen of the Nemetians) I could not draw near a person, in whose power it was to dispose of all that I ador’d in this world, without being touch’d at the same time both with fear and veneration. I complemented that Princess almost with as much respect as if I had known her real quality; but afterwards I spake so little, and with so much disturbance, that the disorder of my mind might have been easily taken notice of, had I not been discourting with a Lady, whose want of her health did not admit of a converse too long, or over nicely cohering together.

But, Madam, when Adelaiada, the youthful, the charming Adelaiada entred this obscure place, and that Light it self, together with the Graces and Cupids entred along with her, what became of poor Taxiler? The lustre of these bright Beauties being added to the Dominion which Heaven had granted that divine Princess over my heart, gave my heart a new wound. But alas, too powerful was the stroke, and too weak my resistance against it, so that I could not hide my passion nor keep my countenance! I mov’d toward Adelaiada with such a discomposure of mind, that all the company observ’d it, and after I had made her a most profound reverence, to the best of my remembrance, I spake to her much to this effect; I cannot tel, Madam, whether we ought not to repent, that we have made you forsake your retirement. But I am sure, Madam, we may well blame such persons like your self for being cruel, while robbing themselves of the pleasures of the world, they rob the world of the only light that can make it happy.

Those words pronounc’d with a passion that glistn’d in my eyes, caus’d the young and modest Adelaiada to blush; and observing that Polyena, instead of speaking her self, lett her at liberty. Sir, said she, I expected so little to hear such complements as these in the Country, that I am very much at a loss to return an answer, so that although I were in a desert, which is a kind of Sanctuary against such flatteries, I do not believe I should have any great reason to be a weary of it. “ What could you do in your desert? (pleasantly replied Claudian) Or what honour could you purchase there? Were we in the times of the Goddesses, I would permit you to go thither every day: but at present, though you should have been there for many years, attended with a company of Nymphs, and a pack of Dogs, though you should appear there with your Bow, and glittering in all your charms, do you think you should be taken for Diana? Or would you not in such a place be accounted a mortal creature?

Those words made the entertainment more pleasant, Camilla, Ætius, Flavian, and Polyena her self continued it in a very complaisant manner, though Heraclian seem’d to be much troubled, and in a deep study. As for the fair Adelaiada, she spoke little, but she hearken’d very attentively, and though she was very young, yet did she not forbear to turn her eyes, when mine went about to speak what my lips could not utter; but what obstacle soever I found that would not permit me to give her the first knowledge of that violent passion which she had created in my heart, yet could I not but think my self happy, only because I was in the presence of that divine Princess. I diligently observ’d all the lineaments of her face, with a transportation that I am not well able to express; and with one look I beheld in her countenance, Youth and Beauty, Wit and Wisdom, and a lofty Air allay’d with a sweet Modesty. In short, I took notice of so many rare qualities in that admirable person, that I my self more deeply fix’d the fatal dart with which she had wounded me, so that I departed desperately enamour’d at the first sight. Were I oblig’d to recount all that pass’d at our taking leave, I should have a task hard enough; for in truth, these new disturbances that work in my heart, hinder’d me from taking notice of such particulars as did not seem of any great importance. However, I remember I cast an amorous look upon the beautiful

Adelaiada,

Adelaiada, and that I endeavoured in vain to make my eyes speak, and that I did not take my leave, but with a resolution to return, with the first opportunity that offered it self.

Upon the way I was very much disturbed and full of meditation, while A tins and Flavian were very sedulous to put me into humour: but notwithstanding I found my self melancholy, the secret pleasure that I took therein, made me refuse their merry discourse, yet with a graceful respect: But Claudian, who had an extraordinary friendship for me, and who very well understood in what a condition my heart was, instead of continuing the discourse he turn'd it another way, taking for a new subject the new favourite of Honorius, discoursing of his publick management, and how vain a person his reputation had made him. I was very glad that he had done me that good office, for besides that I had some reason to fear, lest they should talk too much of my passion; I saw my self disengaged from concerning my self in their stories of Heraclian, whereby I had the more leisure to think upon what I loved, and from what I had parted. So soon as I got home, I ran to my Sisters Apartment, and immediately gave her an Account of my short Travels, before she desired to know any thing of her self: And all the while I related to her with so much earnestness, all the circumstances that concern'd Adelaiada, and perplexed my rehearsal with so many digressions, only to have an opportunity to repeat the name of the fair Princess: that Cleomira having very earnestly beheld me; Certainly Brother, said she smiling, you have taken a great deal of pleasure in making this long recital, and you must needs confess that I am less behold- ing to you, than you engaged to me for giving you a hearing so patiently. How! said I interrupting her, do you call it long? a discourse that I have cut off above half? Then, said she very pleasantly, you must have a hundred different phrases more, to tell me your Lady is the most beautiful person in the world. Ah Sister, said I very seriously, there is nothing more true than what I have told you; see her your self and you will be of my mind, and that my expressions have been rather faint and short of the truth, than any way superfluous. But Brother, replied Cleomira, before I can make a match to go to Camilla's house, will not your passion be over? For the Prince of the Tongres being too rational to have any unjust passions, can he preserve above two or three days a kindness which he has for a Lady, of whom he knows nothing but her birth? It suffices, I replied, that this Lady is lovely enough to be beloved, that quality is enough to engage my heart, without troubling my mind to seek for others. You are not ignorant, said she, how persons of your degree ought to behave themselves. Ah! cruel Sister, said I interrupting her, why do you tell me of a thing which I understand too well, and which has already rais'd too great a trouble in my thoughts?

Concluding these words I grew melancholy, but afterwards all at an instant; Dear Sister, said I pursuing my discourse, if the Stranger of whom we speak, be the Princess of the Nemetians as the report runs, will you then condemn my passion? On the contrary, answered Cleomira, I would farther it, for I should be glad that Taxander and Adelaiada might ally two neighbour Nations, who have always held a good correspondence together, before they took different parties in these new wars. How happy should I be, cryed I, should that come to pass, but how shall we discover this secret? I will speak of it to the Princess Placidia, replied Cleomira, perhaps she will draw from the Emperour some knowledge more certain. My dear Sister, said I impatiently interrupting her, if you love me then go and visit Honorius, lose no time I conjure you, and omit nothing that may do me the greatest kindness that I can request from you.

I pressed her after that so fair, that I obliged her to visit the Princess Pulcheria that very evening, and to solicit her in my behalf, while I walk'd all alone in the Chamber, employing all my thoughts in the contemplation of the divine Adelaiada. In this posture when I called to mind some part of her charms, I thought my self to be the most happy among men, for having seen the fairest person in the world, and for having at the first view the most violent passion for her, that a Lover could feel. I blam'd at the same time all those that could see Adelaiada, and not fall passionately in love with her: I thought them to be either insensible, or else that they knew not what beauty meant, and which way soever I took it, yet still I thought them less happy than my self: Not but that an Amorous disquiet that had disturb'd every moment of my rest, had already got possession of my heart, but as men generally flatter themselves, when they have no reason to complain of the person beloved. I hoped for a propitious success, and perswaded my self that my fair Stranger, would not be displeas'd to see me serve her, with a design to advance her one day to a Throne, especially if she were not of that degree, as to pretend to such a dignity. Or on the other side, if it were Adelaiada that I loved, that Salison and Martandus would willingly consent to my happiness, for the good of their own Kingdoms,

Thus I employed my contemplations till Cleomira returning from the Emperour, I went to her Chamber: And as I was beholding her countenance to conjecture thence, what news she had brought me; Brother, said she, I come to discharge my self of the commission which you gave me, I have spoken to the Princess Placidia, who has a very great suspicion, that your fair Stranger is not the Princess of the Nemetians, yet she has promised me to give me a better information, so soon as she can find a fit opportunity to speak to Honorius. Cannot she find, said I, an opportunity to speak to the Emperour every moment? And therefore since you neglect the chiefest of my concerns, I will go again to Camilla's house to morrow: For indeed I ought to give a particular visit to those Ladies of whom we are now speaking. How Brother, replied Cleomira, will you before you are better instructed, give another visit to your terrible unknown Lady? And that to fortifie a passion which perhaps it will behove you to banish from your breast? I cannot tell, said I very smartly what it may become me to do, but I am certain it will be never in my power, for she will reign in my soul to the very last gasp. In short, Sister, I will ride to Camilla's house and take Claudian thither with me, not only because of his acceptable Company, but because he has that ready wit to help me out in my discourse, with such persons as may be perhaps too nimble for me. Besides, as he has a great deal of ingenuity, and I to tell you truth a great deal of love, it will prove very hard if we do not discover, something of Heraclian's hidden intentions. But the Princess Cleomira still opposing my design, yet not finding me to be moved in my resolution; In truth Brother, (said she with some marks of displeasure) I never thought you guilty of so much extravagancy before, and I am very much surpris'd that reason has so feeble a dominion in your breast. You would never wonder without doubt, answered I, had you ever seen those charms that rais'd my passions. But after all, Sister, if the person whom I love be of an illustrious descent, partake with me in my joy: But if on the other side I sigh for a Lady of a mean condition, pity and blame me, but never expect that I should change my mind.

Concluding these words I took my leave of the Princess Cleomira, who seeing she could persuade me to nothing and that it was late, thought it not fitting to detain me any longer. I was no sooner in my own Chamber but I went to bed, not so much to sleep as to meditate without disturbance. Immediately imagining new Idea's of what I loved, I fashioned in my fancy so lively an Image of that Beauty, that with its brightness it dissipated those vapours, that would have envelop'd my senses: Nor was my sleep it self, which nature forc'd upon me at length, less favourable to me, in representing to me in my dream Adelaiada, as fair as when I saw her, or as she was represented to me waking.

The next day I sent to Claudian, to request him to make one in a match that I had made, he gladly consented, and coming in all hast to my Chamber, we rode together toward the place wherein was harboured the most powerful Allurement of my soul. Upon the way I made a real confession of my Love to Claudian, and we were no sooner arrived, but this diligent friend, while I entred into Polyena's Apartment, went to Heraclian's Chamber, to keep him there, that I might have the more freedom and leasure to talk my mind. He found him not there, being afterwards told that he was walking in a Gallery, with one that was come from the Emperour, when casting his eyes upon the Table, he found there a little Note which he presently read. Whereupon having made a little pause, and rais'd to himself several suspicions, he was of opinion that it behoved him not to neglect the shewing it to me, and then to let Adelaiada see it: And to that end spying me as I was going down stairs, from the Queen of the Nemetians Chamber into the Garden, with the Princess and Camilla who had a great desire to walk, he made hast toward us and all the way as he came he held the Letter open in his hand, as if he had had some curiosity to shew us: so that after the first complements were passed, Camilla who knew her kinsmans hand, Let us see, said she to Claudian, what Heraclian has written to you. 'Tis not to me, answered he very pleasantly, but to some other persons that this note is directed. Why then are you so inquisitive, said she, with the same briskness, after other peoples secrets? Because 'tis my duty, replied he, for Heraclian has not more right to take care of affairs of state, than I to take care of all those things, that concerns the gallantries of love. See Madam, said he addressing himself to Adelaiada, whether you and I are of the same judgment: And after that presenting a Table-book to the Princess, she took it and at the beginning, read a piece of a Letter to this effect.

Since you have no real business that detains you at Rome, and that you do not visit our Ladies to any other intent, but only to make them prove serviceable to your designs, come into our wood

“ I cannot tell, said Adelaïda to Claudian, what your judgment may be upon those words, but for my part, I do not believe that we are to seek for any mystery therein; Heraclian has written to a Friend who is apparently ambitious, he intreats him to come and refresh himself in this House, and that he may have no pretence to excuse himself, he writes the first lines of that Note, indited as we find them. “ I see very well, answer'd he, that you make this interpretation, lest you should seem to fail in your acknowledgment toward Heraclian; and that you make as if you did not apprehend that he desires some person to come and lose by the sight of your Beauties the liberty which he has defended against our Roman Ladies: I am also a little more bold in my conjectures; for I am apt to think it is some Stranger that he invites into these Woods, and that he aims to remove that Stranger from Herfilia's charms, to expose him to the force of yours.

At those words the young Adelaïda blush'd out of modesty: and Camilla taking the Table-Book, “ I must confess, said she with a very pleasing aspect, that your great Wits are a strange sort of people, they would always pretend to have reason, and yet sometimes they are deceived as well as we. However, she cry'd, addressing her self to Claudian, without examining whether it be a Stranger that is to come, or with what kind of charms they intend to fetter him, lay the Table-Book in the place from whence you took it, or else expect to be severely chid. “ Heaven, defend me, said he, turning himself about, from drawing such a mischief upon my self.

So leaving us, he carried back the Letter, and return'd to us as we were walking in the Garden. Immediately he presented Camilla his hand, giving me thereby the opportunity to lead Adelaïda; so that now the Pages and young Virgins that attended, being retired, I thought I had found a favourable opportunity to entertain Adelaïda by letting her know the powerful effect her charms had wrought in my heart: but Heraclian, destin'd to interrupt me in my passion, at that very instant appear'd, and approaching me, he protest'd that he had left all company and business to wait upon me, so soon as he knew of my arrival. I was vex'd to be thus disturb'd, especially when I saw him continue to walk along with us, and that I could not utter a syllable of that which most tormented my heart: nor durst I presume to look upon that fair face so much as I desired, the only Idea whereof was enough at another time wholly to employ my thoughts with full satisfaction; and I should have thought my self very unfortunate, if the presence of the person belov'd, had not allay'd the best part of my disturbance; or that the pleasure of holding her fair hand had not in some measure made me amends.

In short, Heraclian's persecution lasted as long as my visit, and I was constrain'd to depart without letting the admirable Adelaïda understand the affection I had for her, which so perplex'd my Soul, that neither Claudian nor Cleomira, after that, could afford me any consolation. The next day Cavarin departed from Rome, which confirm'd those suspicions which Claudian had rais'd; and Heraclian returning presently after, the report run, that the Strangers that were entertain'd at Camilla's House, were return'd into their own Country. Be pleas'd then, Madam, to consider how great was my surprize! How sad was my affliction! And because I was not well assured of what Nation Adelaïda was, I could not guess into what Region she was return'd, nor what Road she had taken; I enquir'd what news of her in all places I could think of, and of all persons I thought likely to give me any intelligence. I press'd Cleomira to give another visit to Placidia, and I sent to King Salison's Court, to see whether the Queen and the Princess of the Nemetians were there, or to know what was there reported concerning their absence. In a word, I omitted nothing which a passion ingenious and fertile in Expedients could infuse into me. Not but that I resolv'd to be inform'd by Heraclian, and to challenge him if he refus'd to satisfy me; but I was still to observe a Decorum in my proceedings, in regard he was in the Emperour's favour, and that I was to consider Marisandus's interest; but above all, because it lay in his power to serve me in reference to Adelaïda, if I could gain his friendship, 'twas my opinion therefore that I was to seek other means than to search for a discovery from him, which made me resolve to go to that fatal place which I had always in my mind, imagining with my self (to the end I might please my self with seeing it once more) that those persons whom I had sent would not inform themselves with that care and exactness, and that the most cunning among them all would not be able to win the Domestick Servants of Camilla to give them the best instructions so well as my self. While I was turmoil'd with a thousand tumultuous thoughts, I saw Claudian enter: I met him immediately, and in a very sad tone, Well, Claudian, said I, Our divine unknown Beauty is vanish'd from the unfortunate Taxander; and the cunning Heraclian has a design without doubt to dispose of her, in favour of some Stranger who more servilely flatters him than the Prince of the Tongres can stoop to do. Sir, answered he, I am perswaded that this Stranger is the Prince of the Senonois, and that she did not so diligently visit Herfilia, to the end, that Artabure her Brother might solicit the Emperour in her behalf, as she made use of Heraclian for the same intent. I am also apt to think, that that Favourite of Honorius apprehended at length that Cavarin came to court the Sister of his Rival in favour, and that he endeavoured to oppose an alliance that might render Artabure considerable in the Court of Rome, by his becoming powerful among the Gauls: so that he came here to deprive Cavarin of Herfilia, pretending he shall espouse Adelaïada, and by that means he will procure a peace for the Nemetians and Senonois, to the end, that those two Nations being beholding to him, might always stick close to his interests. Ah, Claudian, cry'd I, you speak reason; I have had thoughts little different from yours; and I plainly see, that the suspicions which you rais'd at Camilla's House were but too well grounded. I knew, answered he, that I was not at all deceiv'd, nor did I take Heraclian's Table-Book for any other purpose than to shew Adelaïada how much it concern'd her to be wary, and to treat her Lover who was coming to see her, as a person that was drawn thither not so much by the power of her charms, as by the politick contrivance of the Roman that sent for him. That policy, said I, may net have perhaps all that success which they promise to themselves; for though the murderer of Stilicon bear a more absolute sway with Honorius, yet when he shall be guilty of a greater crime than that which he committed in the view of the whole world, it will not be a very easie thing for him to dispose of a Princess whom I adore. Alas! (continued I sighing, and lifting up my eyes to Heaven) Was it my fate to see that divine Princess only that I might no sooner passionately love her, but that she should as soon be taken from me? Was it just that my Destiny, too potent for my reason, should entice me to a place where it became me not to have gone, and whither I was only led to be delivered up to my evil fortune. Ah, Claudian, never was a Lover more unfortunate seen, so that if I do not suddenly find out Adelaïada, I cannot tell to what extremity I may be reduc'd to rid my self out of that miserable condition where in you see me.

While I bewail'd my self in this manner, Cleomira return'd from the Emperour, and rehearsing to me what she had been inform'd by the Princess Placidia, she confirm'd me in the opinion to which Claudian had perswaded me, and of which I had prepossessed my self almost at the same time. But when Claudian was gone, she gave me a more particular relation of all things. She told me that Placidia had been inform'd by Honorius, that the Stranger that was departed from Rome was Cavarin the Prince of the Senonois; and that it was true, that I had seen at Camilla's House Polyena Queen of the Nemetians, and the Princess her Daughter, nam'd Adelaïada. That Cavarin was tenderly beloved by Herfilia, and she had been espoused to him, if Heraclian, who apprehended from thence an augmentation of Artabure's power, had not chang'd the Senonois Prince's mind, as well by the power which he had over him, as by proposing him greater advantages in the person of Adelaïada. That he had perswaded Honorius that it was only for the welfare of his Dominions, that he had oppos'd Cavarin's kindness for Herfilia; and that he might well believe it was not for him to suffer a Roman so potent as Artabure to make an alliance that might give him a Sanctuary among Strangers, which might embolden him to make attempts against the Empire. As for the place to which Polyena is retired, Honorius knows it not at present; for he reposes such a trust in Heraclian's management, that far from informing himself of the State of Affairs, he only hears what his Favourite thinks fit to give him an account of. Ah, Sister, (said I impatiently, interrupting her) of necessity I must know where Adelaïada is; and since you can no longer condemn my passion, it behoves you to act by consent with me, and not to leave any thing unattempted to make me happy. Dear Sister, (said I, most affectionately beholding her, and taking her by the hand) for Heaven's sake see Placidia to morrow morning, make use of all your credit with Honorius: but above all things vigorously pursue what the Princess acts for my interest: I am mad to think of the softness of the Emperour, and the nimbleness which I observ'd in Cavarin: And it may be, said I sighing, that very moment must render Cavarin the most happy among men, and Taxander the most unfortunate Prince that ever was: it may be perhaps that fatal moment is already past, at this very time that we are speaking of it. "Affairs of this nature, replied Cleomira, move "not so fast as Lovers thoughts; so that before Salison be advertised thereof, or have giv"en any order therein, or that Polyena or Adelaïada can get to the farthest part of all Gal-
 "lia, we may easily, if I be not deceiv'd, find obstructions enough to hinder Cavarin's de"sign. In short, Brother, as I am very willing you should court the Princess of the Ne-
 "metians, I have discovered your intentions to Placidia, I have conjured her to make Ho-
 "norius your Friend, and to understand from him all things relating to your advantage.
 "She testified how glad she was to do me any kindness, and opening her very heart to me,
 "after she had spoken with a great esteem of your person, she told me she could not but be “very indifferent for Cavarin, but that she had an Anitpathy against Heraclian, that she will represent to the Emperour, how he is not only obliged to prefer you before the Prince of the Senonis, by reason of the Alliance that united our two houses since Theodora, but also out of the acknowledgments which he owes you for your services.

These words having for some time calm'd my troubled thoughts, I return'd Cleomira as many thanks as if she had not been my Sister, but had given me all the Crowns in the world. However neither the satisfaction that produced my complements to Cleomira, nor the tranquility of my mind endured for any time: For notwithstanding all my hope, the trouble I was in for not knowing where Adelaiada was, having seiz'd my heart all of an instant; I see dear Sister, said I, that I may expect a great deal from your assistance, but as it is grounded upon the protection of Honorius, and that he will be slow in giving us such proofs thereof as we desire, there is a necessity for me in the mean time, to know where I may see the Princess whom I adore, if you desire I should live, till you can shew me the good effects of your undertaking. And therefore while you return to Placidia, I will go to Camilla's house, for provided we could but discover in what part of the world to find Adelaiada, I would demand no other help but the assistance of my love and courage, to supplant Cavarin maugre all the Stratagems of Heraclian.

This I spoke with so much passion and transportment, that Cleomira was surpris'd, and I must confess it was not without reason, since no man ever loved with a more violent passion in so short a time. I was so desperately lost, that the next day instead of preparing for Ravenna, whither the Emperour was going to keep his Court, instead of being mov'd at the news which they brought me, that Constance was marching with a great Army against the famous Constantine, I departed out of Rome to seek Adelaiada, not taking notice either of the Emperour's journey, or of the conquests of the King of Albion, nor so much as thinking of them. so much was my mind taken up with the Idea of my Princess. I was no sooner come to the place where I had seen her the first time, but I was seiz'd with some thoughts that went near to Idolatry: Impatiently and greedily I sought about every where; and because I could not think to find her, my passion being no longer subject to my reason, I committed a hundred little follies, which as fruitless as they were, however pleas'd a fond and enamour'd heart for the time. I call'd my Princess a hundred times, I ask'd the trees and Rivers for her; then crossing my Arms I stood immoveable. At last transported by my passion, and as if I had been ignorant that Camilla had followed Queen Polyena, I desir'd to speak with her, or that they would tell me where I might find her, as a person that had important business with her. Hardly had they returned me for answer, that she was gone with those Ladies that I had seen in the house, and that they knew not whither they were design'd; when I took all the principal domesticks aside one by one, but seeing that neither promises nor threats would work any effect, and that I could receive no farther satisfaction, I return'd to Rome impatient to know whether Cleomira, had had any better success with Placidia. She told me that that generous Princess had urged Honorius very home, and that the Emperour had also very earnestly spoken to his favourite: Which eagerness of the Emperour, said Cleomira, appeared so extraordinary, that Heraclian very much suspected the meaning, and therefore that he might have time to unfold the Riddle, and in the mean time arm himself with politick wariness, he answered with an affected indifferency, that he knew not where Polyena was, and that he did not think it convenient to be inquisitive, into the circumstances of a good part of the journey. Ah! Heraclian, (then cry'd I out of the fury of a resentment, which I could by no means moderate :) But fearing to make known my intentions to my Sister, I shut up my Choler and listned to her as before. That pretended coldness of Heraclian, said Cleomira, pursuing her discourse, might deceive Honorius but not the persons interested, they suspected a great part of what we know, and this morning Hertilia visibly testified the same to the Princess, who as she well knew had no kindness for that favourite. She made a great deal of sport with him but very neatly and cleverly, that she might preserve her respect as well to Placidia, as the Emperour's choice. Heraclian's colour came into his face for madness, but whether he wanted ingenuity to reply, or whether he thought that the Princess would not favour him, he would not continue a discourse of that nature, with a young Lady so smart and witty. But went in all hast to Honorius's Closet, where there being then a consultation about bestowing the principal employments in Constance's Army, he declared himself openly against Artabure, that he might make a difference between the Brother and the Sister, in order to revenge himself.

Cleomira had no sooner concluded these words, but she was advertis'd that the Princess Theodolinda was come to visit her, whereupon I retired to my Apartment that they might have the more freedom of discourse. There I began to walk up and down in a petting chafe, and in threatening language; “Ah Heraclian, cry'd I, thou thinkest to be protected from “ Artabure’s anger by thy favour, but fear Taxander who is no subject of Honorius, and who “ is able to revenge himself, notwithstanding the protection which thou hast obtained by “ thy treachery. Then instead of continuing my complaints, I went to seek out Heraclian, and found him at the Emperour’s Apartment where they said he was, whence I resolv’d to follow him as soon as he went forth.

No sooner was I come to Honorius’s Chamber, but he received me with all extraordinary civility. He told me that Constance and the Romans, promised great things to themselves from my friendship, “ And for my part, added he very obligingly, I think that in opposing “ you to Constantine, we shall oppose the most valiant of our Confederates, to the most for“ midable of our Enemies. I will not mention the employments which you may hope for in “ our Armies, your birth and your noble Actions claim many privileges, which shall be pre“ serv’d you entire, and you shall find in us that acknowledgment, always which is due to “ your person.

He would have spoken more, had not one of the deputies of the Massilians entred, who came to make a report of the condition of the Roman Province. I would have taken my leave, finding that Heraclian was upon going; but before I could take my leave, Honorius redoubled the testimonies of his good will toward me, embracing me with a most cordial affection. I was not insensible of the caresses of an Emperour, nor of the honour I might acquire in a war so memorable and important. Nevertheless Love so absolutely possessed my heart, that I withdrew making only a profound reverence, instead of returning any answer, not daring to promise my service in an Army, that removed me at too great a distance from Adelaiada, nor finding my self in a capacity of changing my resolution to fight Heraclian, if he deny-ed to tell me where my beloved Princess was gone. To that purpose I followed him, and ac-costing him when we were both without the Palace of Honorius, and in the turning of a by-“ street, I think, (said I to him with a cold indifferency) that there is no person to whom I can “ better apply my self than to you, to enquire what is become of Camilla and the Strangers
 “ who are with her. “ You may deceive your self, replyed he with the same behaviour, if you “ think me so well instructed in her affairs. “ You are proudly taken up with the affairs of “ state, said I with the smile of anger, that you cannot endure to be question’d concerning “ an inconsiderable journey, and still keeping the state of a favourite in small things, will “ make a mittery of what you know so well. “ It shall not be by Heraclian that you shall “ be inform’d, replyed he with a reserved tone, and more than that, after you have in vain “ employed the chiefest persons in the world, you will be never the wiser. It suffices then,
 “ (said I interrupting him, and laying my hand upon my Sword) that this remains to revenge
 “ my quarrel, and wherewithal to search even in thy very heart, the secret which I demand.
Heraclian at the same time being in the same posture, we presently fell vigorously to work, while I being at the same time transported with love and anger, and also the person that gave the very first assault; fought with more fury and less caution, for fear lest we should be parted, before I had obtained some advantage over a person, whom I believed to be in all things inferiour to the Prince of the Tongres.

Heraclian guarded himself with that Activity which testified an assured courage, but my impetuosity soon made him give way, which I no sooner perceived, notwithstanding the violence of my anger, but I gave him a home thrust in the Arm, pressing on without permitting him any respite. Then I began to feel less resistance, and I had certainly worsted him, when all of a sudden he renewed his courage perceiving people coming toward us. I took notice of it also, and therefore being desirous to put an end to the Combat, I flew upon my Adversary, and having seiz’d the Hilt of his Sword, I had certainly disarm’d him, if the people running in had not speedily parted us. This Encounter made a great noise over all the City, and the Emperour no sooner understood th’ circumstances, but he appeared to be very much incens’d against me. He highly complained that I had quarrell’d with a person so much respected by him, at the very Gate of his Palace, where he had made me so many obliging offers, and that which more sensibly anger’d him was, that I left Rome, protesting that I would never be reconciled again to Heraclian, unless he would give me that satisfaction which I required, and which he could not deny me. In the mean while all the Court was divided, and though the number of those that court fortune, be generally greater than the generous party, I dare say that Heraclian had fewer that took his part, than were on my side.

The Princess Placidia and Theodolinda, did me the honour to send to see me, Artabure, Atius, Ariobindus, Flavian, and many others of the most high quality among the Ro- mans, came to offer me their service, and Claudian whose elderly years privileged him from tendring such proofs of his friendship, made me a visit of another nature: For having

declared himself for my interest, he maintain'd it every where with that Wit and Boldness, that he increas'd the number of my Friends, and disabus'd many persons whom the Flatterers of Heraclian had prepossessed to his advantage.

A few days after, a Squire of Constance came to complement me on the behalf of his Renowned Master: while they discoursed at Rome with so much heat both on the one side, and the other, insomuch that many apprehended that the consequences of our quarrel would prove not a little dangerous. Honorius, naturally of a good disposition, would have put an end to it; but loving Heraclian, and on the other side, being unwilling to break with the King of the Tongres, he was at a great loss. His favourite protested to him that he knew not where Polyena was, that he had no reason but to leave Adelaiada wholly to her disposal, and that it was not just to obstruct the Prince of the Senonais in those pretences which he had already declar'd, and likewise obtain'd to be approv'd. On the other side, Placidia represented to him that he ought to stand my Friend to the King and Queen of the Nemetians, and to obtain leave at least that I might be admitted to court the Princess Adelaiada, as well as the Prince of the Senonais; and that the Princess ought to be left to her liberty to make her own choice. So that Placidia, who had a greater esteem for me than I could expect, believ'd that I should have no reason to complain of her mediation; and that the Princess of the Nemetians would not stick to prefer me before the the Prince of the Senonais. Besides this, she gave Honorius farther advice, telling him that he ought not to suffer my design of engaging my self in his quarrel to be any way prejudicial to me; nor to permit my Rival to win any advantage upon me, by living where Adelaiada retided, while I was fighting against the King of the Britains: that he ought to engage Cavarin to pass into Africa with his Friend, while I march'd with Constance; and that matters being so easily pois'd, Rome would preserve the alliance of the Tongres and the Senonais so much the more easily, while Constance and Heraclian had time to deal with both Princes who were there particular Friends. Honorius being perswaded by the Princess his Sister, acted according to her counsel; and as he went to Ravenna, where he found the incomparable Bellamira, with whom he was so deeply in love, as I have told you, he visited Polyenz upon the way, and conferred in private with her that very day that the Princess left Italy to return to the King her Husband. He sent Flavian afterwards to me to give me an account of this conference, and to assure me that Salison and Polyenz, as soon as she came home, would receive such proposals as should be made on my part, as favourably as those from Cavarin; and for the final determination, that they would refer themselves wholly to the inclinations of the Princess their Daughter. After that Flavian inform'd me what I have already told you, and how earnestly Placidia took my part. He gave me to understand that that obliging Princess had testified to divers persons of Quality, that she should less fear the success of Honorius, and Constance's safety, if my assistance were but joyned to that illustrious Roman. And while he continued his discourse, which could not but be very pleasing to me, my love furnishing my mind with a hundred importunate thoughts: Alas! cry'd I, how unhappy am I? Must I renounce my honour if I follow Adelaiada, and fail in my acknowledgment to a generous Prince to whom I am infinitely beholding? Cannot I go, said he, sighing, where Constance, Placidia, and Honour call me, but I must absent my self from her whom I love, at a time when it is in my power to abide where she remains? No, no, I will not forsake Adelaiada: you know, Flavian, what charms she carries in her eyes, you have been a witness to my vows, and you have seen both together at the same time the most amiable person in the world, and a man the most enamour'd in the Universe: insomuch that you cannot be surpris'd at my behaviour; but though you should not approve it, and that all the world should think it strange, however this will be consolation sufficient for me, that I may follow Adelaiada, and that Adelaiada believes me to be the most passionate of all her Lovers. Wonder not that I talk in this manner, for I make no mystery of the affection which I have for the Princess of the Nemetians; and though it were unknown to the greatest part of the Court, I find it too just not to be made publick. I rather wonder, said Flavian, that you have no better apprehended the news which I have brought you, and that you complain at a time so favourable to you — In short, did they believe that you would march along with Constance, they would hinder Cavarin from seeing Adelaiada while you continued in the Army; for Polyena is not only engag'd not to bear any proposal for the Princess her Daughter till your return, but to the end, the Prince of the Senonais may be farther remov'd than you from the person which you love, they have oblig'd Heraclian to take him along with him into Africa. Let Cavarin, said I very hastily, and according to his own Politicks, let him forsake the Princess of the Nemetians, and serve upon the Emperour's Favourite, for my own part I will only follow the dictates of my own love, and abandon all things to adhere to Adelaiada.

Afterwards pausing upon what I had said, I imagined to my self that Constance and Con- stantine

Flavine would not fail to observe one another's motions, out of the mutual knowledge they had of each others experiences; and that they would certainly spin out time before they came to a Battel, to take their advantages and preserve their men, and that by that means I should be a good while deprived of the sight of my Princeſs; ſo that I went about to fix my ſelf in the reſolution which I had taken: when all of an inſtant, methought that if I declin'd the Battel, I could not with any reputation appear before Adelaiada, and that it behov'd me clearly to win Honour when Heaven offer'd me ſo fair an opportunity, were it for nothing elſe but to render me worthy of that perſon whom I ador'd. I was about therefore to tell Flavian that I had alter'd my reſolution; yet before I could determine there happened a violent Combat between the extreme paſſion which I had for Adelaiada, and the natural inclination which I had to ſignalize my ſelf in the Army. But at length conſidering that it was in my power to ſatiſhe thoſe two contrary perſwaſions, and that it was neceſſary for me to follow the incentive that carried me to the performance of noble exploits, to the end I might appear with more Honour before the Princeſs of the Nemetians: I promiſed Flavian to ſee the Emperour, that I would lay aſide all heart-burnings againſt his Favourite, and that I would ſerve him in the Army. That of all this he might aſſure him in my behalf, and that I would ſuddenly be at Ravenna to make good his undertaking for me.

While Flavian returns to Honorius with better ſucceſs in his Errand than he expected, the Courier whom I had ſent to Salifon's Court came back; and after he had related to me in few words what I already knew concerning Polyena and Adelaiada, he told me that he was aſcertain'd in Samarobrina, (ſo was the City call'd where Salifon then kept his Court) that Prince Cavarin was to eſpouſe the Princeſs Adelaiada: that the Emperour had obtain'd Salifon's and Polyena's conſent, and that the Princeſs had alſo given hers. Thoſe Tydings ſtruck me like a clap of Thunder, inſomuch that notwithstanding the promiſe I had made to Flavian, I alter'd my reſolutions a hundred times: I thought to make my complaint to Honorius, to tax him with my ſervices, and to accuſe him of keeping an underhand correſpondency with my Enemies. Then I deſign'd to be reveng'd upon Heraclian, and to diſpute the enjoyment of Cavarin with the laſt drop of my blood, and laſt of all to forſake the Romans, and joyn with the Britains. But no ſooner had my reaſon appeas'd the greateſt part of thoſe tumults which my love had rais'd, but I repented of thoſe mutinous thoughts, finding that it behov'd me to give leſs credit to the report of a Town, than to the word of an Emperour. At other times I conſidered, that ſince my Meſſenger had left Samarobrina, there might have been a change of Affairs, through the mediation of Honorius, and that for that reaſon I might be able to acquit my ſelf of what promiſes ſoever I had made to him, without any prejudice to the paſſion that was predominant in my heart. Nevertheleſs not being willing to omit any thing, I immediately ſent back again to Salifon's Court, with order to give me intelligence from time to time of whatever concern'd the Princeſs of the Nemetians; and for my own part I ſtedfaſtly reſolv'd not to engage my ſelf in Conſtance's Army, till my Rival had embarqu'd for Africa. Thereupon I went to the Emperours, where I was receiv'd with all the marks of kindneſs which he was wont to ſhew me, and underſtood that Artabure and Heraclian kept no good correſpondence together: Immediately I conjectur'd that Herſilia's reſentment might have contributed to their mutual diſguſt. But I underſtood ſoon after that that fair Lady neither blam'd the Roman, nor Cavarin himſelf: that they apprehended little or nothing in the conduct of that Prince who had wrote ſuch affectionate Letters from Camilla's Houſe, how paſſionate ſoever he appear'd at the ſame time for Adelaiada. I was ſurpris'd at that manner of proceeding; I with'd that Cavarin might only love the Siſter of Artabure: but my love did not prohibit me to hope, and perſwaded me that there was no Rival that could diſpute a heart with a Princeſs that was the Sovereignneſs of mine. Flavian, who had inform'd me all theſe particulars, related others to me ſome few days after. He aſſur'd me that the Prince of the Senonois had defended his liberty againſt the charms of Adelaiada, as he had preserv'd it from Herſilia; and that he had not continued to write to Artabure's Siſter, but only to appeaſe her in reſpect of Heraclian: Not, ſaid he, but that Cavarin deſires to wedd the Princeſs of the Nemetians, though he be not yet much in love with her; for beſides that, he may ſoon have a kindneſs for her, in regard ſhe is very beautiful: Salifon and Cavarin will reap conſiderable advantages by their alliance. They will have no reaſon to fear thoſe great Armies that make Germany tremble. And being they have neither of them loſt the friendſhip of Pharamond or Gondioch, being only reconciled to Honorius out of neceſſity, whatever ſucceſs betides the war between the Franks and Burgundians, they will be mutually proteſted from any invaſion of the Vanquiſher: ſo that the Prince of the Senonois, who always acts according to ſucceſs, has omitted nothing to gain the heart of Adelaiada, and had us'd ſuch extraordinary means, that he had almoſt perſwaded swaded the young Princess into a belief that he passionately lov'd her.

Thus you have heard what I learn'd by an accident, the particulars whereof I do not believe necessary for me to relate. I will tell you however that I had them from the mouth of Heraclian himself; and therefore seeing I came to understand them only by chance, I could not think my self oblig'd to make them a secret. And thus it happened: we were five or six miles from Ravenna, in a pleasant Garden belonging to Ariobindus, where without doubt you know already that Honorius uses to take the air. Heraclian being separated from the Emperour's Train in the company of Maximus, with whom, as he was talking together near a pale behind which I lay reading, he spoke of the wit and abilities of Cavarin with so much heat, and so lowd, that I easily over-heard all those particulars of which I have given you this account. After I had embrac'd Flavian, and testified my acknowledgment, I mus'd upon what I conjectur'd Adelaiada's thoughts might be, but when I imagined to my self that the belief she had of being belov'd by Cavarin, proceeded from her inclination to love that very Prince, then again that cruel supposition tormented me with an unconceivable grief, How, Adelaiada, (cry'd I, when Flavian was gone) shall the charming Adelaiada be sacrific'd to the policies of a person that loves her not, to the desires of one that perfidiously abuses her credulity by the pretended testimonies of a passion which only ought to be the effect of a sincere heart? No, no, it shall never be while the enamour'd Taxander enjoys the Light of Heaven; nor shall the contrivances of Cavarin and Heraclian end in that success which they promise to themselves.

Afterwards being in a capacity to consider what I had to do, I resolv'd to see the Prince of the Senonais, and to force him to yield me a Princess whose worth he did not understand, or else to dispute the enjoyment of her to the last drop of my Blood. While I was contriving this design, came a Courier from Constance, who reported that the King of the Britains had taken the famous Town of Marsellia, and that there was a necessity of the Roman Army to march with all speed to the relief of a Province almost ruined, and that called to him for help. Immediately all the young Nobility of the Court prepar'd to be gone in all haste; and I having received Letters from Constance, would not be less diligent than the rest to joyn with the Army: not but that I had still an intention to tell Cavarin my mind. But it being a difficult thing for me to secure my self from being chid by the Emperour, was that which made me melancholy. I was but little in Honorius's presence that day, I refus'd as much as decency would permit me, the company of Ladies; and the next day the Emperour going to divertise himself in Ariobindus's Garden, I stirr'd not out of Ravenna to follow the Emperour, till I thought he was just ready to come back, and that all the sports and pastimes were over. But I had not gone far from the Walls of the City, when I perceiv'd riding toward me certain persons of Honour very gay and magnificently arm'd, account'd as if they had return'd from entering the Lists before Honorius and the rest of the Court. I stay'd not long to talk to them, but being desirous to get to the Garden before the Emperour was come away, I took my leave and rode on faster than before: but I was suddenly forc'd to make a stop, seeing several Horsemen scuffling together, which I took at first for a frolicksome continuance of that days Divertisements. But I soon chang'd my opinion when I beheld five or six men valiantly defending themselves against ten or a dozen, who assail'd the other with an extraordinary fury. I never stood to consider which part to take, but flew to the weaker side with my Sword in my hand, desirous however before I assaulted persons whom I knew not at all, to moderate their anger, and compose their difference. And in regard I was in some reputation among the Romans, and that my face was open, I had some hopes that they might have some respect for my intentions, or at least some regard to my requests. But I had no sooner open'd my mouth to enquire the cause of the quarrel, but the principal of the opposite company, after he had given me a fowr look, flung himself toward me, and gave me a good blow with his Sword. That unworthy action of his incens'd me so highly, that I was bent without mercy against a person who had assaulted me without a cause, and for that I had no other Arms than my Sword, I resolv'd with all speed to dispatch a Combat the continuance whereof might prove fatal to me; so that I thought less to defend my self than to be reveng'd of my Adversary whom I mortally hated, insomuch that I was wounded immediately, but having luckily spied a defect in his Curials, I soon sheath'd my Sword in his Body. A Horseman that fought on his side, and saw him tumble at his Horses feet, seem'd to be very much griev'd, Good God, cry'd he, my Master is slain; and presently looking upon me with eyes inflam'd with anger, he stood a while considering whether it was best for him to fall upon me, or help the Knight; but the last motion prevailing in his Breast, he alighted, when at the same time, fortune not always favouring good intentions,

¶ The fall of a person so considerable among his own associates, had so weakened the contrary party that we had easily overcome them, had not a great body of Cavalry appeared at the same time, or that we had not believed that Honorius himself had been there in person. Thereupon we immediately parted, as if we had acted by consent: And for my part, I return'd by a by way to Ravenna for fear of being seen, and thereby engaged to make a relation of the Combat. I was of opinion that Honorius would have turned, all the circumstances to my prejudice, and would have been assured that what I did was premeditated, and that it was a design which I had resolv'd upon, because I did not accompany him, and that he would chide me by representing to me, that it was not for me always to quarrel with his most faithful subjects: And therefore contented with the testimony of my own conscience, without requiring other witnesses, and being satisfied that I had been only guided by a motive of generosity, I did not desire to make any noise in the business. On the contrary, I forbid my Attendants that had any knowledge thereof, to say any thing of it. The other persons concern'd observing the same caution not to displease Honorius, no person could tell precisely what had pass'd, only it was reported that Heraclian and some other Courtiers had been wounded, while they endeavour'd to part certain Knights, that fought upon the Road to Ravenna. For my own part I could not go abroad, in two or three days by reason of my wound, wherefore Flavian who was altogether my friend, reported to Honorius, that a certain indisposition of health, that hindred me from attending him to Ariobindus's Garden, increased upon me, and oblig'd me to keep my Chamber. Honorius did me the honour to give me a visit, and the greatest part of the Court having shew'd me the same civility by different conversations, I understood several pieces of intelligence, that were not ordinary. They assured me that Artabure and Heraclian, did not hate one another for any other reason, but that they both loved Bellamira, and that it was believ'd with no small probability that they had fought one another. I knew also that the report ran every where, that the Prince of the Senonois was dead, and that Heraclian had given it out by his flatterers, that Artabure had slain him upon a quarrel for satisfaction, in reference to Herfelia's resentment. Two days after the news of Cavarine's death continued, and was confirm'd, and notwithstanding Herfelia's pique, whom it became to justify her generous Brother, it was so variously discour'd, that Honorius was fully satisfied of the Animosity between Artabure and Heraclian, and had a design to remove them one from the other, fearing lest their reputation might cause any faction at Court. Heraclian received orders to take possession of his Government in Africa, where he was generally thought to have been already. And Artabure departed to overtake Constance in the Army, that was marching toward the Province of the Romans. I together with Flavian took the same rode with Artabure, pondering upon the way what would be the issue of this business, without being able to clear those suspicions that had already seiz'd my thoughts. So variously did men talk of things according to the variety of their passions.

Soon after, Madam, I learn'd that Artabure had not at that time yet seen Bellamira, and that Heraclian's jealousy was ground'd upon a visit, which he had made to one of her Kinswomen, devoted to the service of that God whom we worship, in a house where Bellamira was wont to seek retirement. On the other side, I knew also that it was not said, that Heraclian and Artabure had been before at Ravenna, but that they were only ignorant of that circumstance, because they had been but few days with the Emperour: Nor did they speak at all of this particular, as being less necessary in the recital of their Adventures, but only for the understanding of the Relation which I am now to pursue.

To return therefore to a Story from which I made a digression, only that I might not leave any doubt in your Majesty's remembrance, I must tell you, Madam, that while Heraclian sows the seeds of a famous revolt in Africa, and while he prepares to cover the Mediterranean Sea, with a Navy as formidable as ever was seen, we march'd against Constantine, and after many skirmishes the success whereof prov'd various, we fought the famous Battel of Arles. You know Madam sufficiently, not only all that happened in that memorable conflict, but all that relates to the defeat of Jovian. And therefore instead of making a relation of a war, of the circumstances whereof few are ignorant, it behoves me to entertain your Majesty with the discourse of a fair Princess, whom I retain better in my memory, than all the most considerable exploits of both Armies, and of whom I think it too long, before I come to speak. While the victorious Constance, wounded with a poysoned Arrow, caus'd himself to be convey'd to the City of the Tectosages: Flavian who never would forsake me, and I, travell'd to Samarobina, and still as I drew near the Town, I enquired

the news that most concern'd me, I was told that Salifon was in great perplexity, and that he had much ado to keep the Citizens of Samarobina in order, and that Polyena's health being much impair'd since her return out of Italy, she was gone to the waters of Tongres, together with her daughter Adelaiada. I took no long time to consider, but made hatt to a Prince who I thought might have need of my Assistance: and having some reputation, and for that love and youth not only augment the heat of courage, but also many times render it successful, my presence immediately wrought so powerfully upon the minds of the Rebels, that they submitted themselves to Salifon, and I received from the Prince a thousand testimonies of acknowledgment and friendship.

If it were pleasing to me be treated after that manner by the Father of Adelaiada, I was much more charm'd by the civilities I received from Polyena, and the Princess whom I adored: For the King of the Nemetians had wrote to them in my behalf, and extoll'd so bountifully the service which I had done him, that I thought my self the most fortunate of men, from the day that I arrived in the dominions of the King my Father. The next morning I apparell'd my self in most magnificent habit, I sent to Leodia which is the biggest of the Neighbouring Cities, for whatever could be had to render the pastimes and diversifements at our waters, sumptuous and rare, and I went to visit the Queen her self, so soon as she was in a condition to be seen. She had a great Train of company with her, and while I was busied in beholding that which I passionately loved, and sigh'd for grief that I had been so long absent from Adelaiada, they fell to discourse of the pleasures that our waters of the Spa every year afford. For my part, (said a fair Lady of the Country of Belgia) that which I find there most agreeable, is to meet in the Country with the diversifements of the greatest Cities, and to be often there at Balls and Comedies. Do you say nothing, added a young Batavian Lady, of the surprise which we find, when at our coming forth from a numerous assembly, we see our selves environ'd with woods, hills, and rocks? What you mention both of the one and the other, said a Parisian, is not particular to the Spa, for expence will afford you the same delights, in every field where the Masters are rich and liberal. But we may fancy a kind of pleasure near these Fountains, not to be met with but in few places, for at the sight of many sick people, they who have their healths believe themselves more happy, and they who are indispos'd may find some satisfaction, in conversing with those who are troubled with the same distempers. Since every one has spoken her thoughts, said a Neustrian, I declare it, that I came hither only for recreation sake, and that persons of my humour satisfy their prevailing passions better, in these places of concourse than in Cities: For if fortune favour them they gain only them to whom they are unknown, whose complements rarely move them, and to whom they are not obliged to be so complaisant. If on the contrary they happen to have any considerable loss, it makes no noise in their own Country, or at least it comes not to be known till they have had time to alter and palliate the circumstances. As I am of a world divided from yours, replied a British Lady, I must confess that the diversity of Nations, that I see in this little Country, pleases me infinitely: Nor can I imagine where in any other place to enter into a friendship, with persons whom we never saw before, nor perhaps shall never see again.

Flavian taking notice that that general discourse, was no way profitable for me, and that my Aim was to discourse Adelaiada by her self, I wonder, said he, that not a word has been said of walking, which is one of the most usual diversifements in the Country. But methinks instead of busying our selves to commend it, the Princess should shew a good example, who were she now pleas'd to lead us the way, would give a better reputation to that pastime, than we could do with all our commendations.

The Queen of the Nemetians looked upon me, and as I had been to visit her she would not express her mind, till she had honoured me with those Compliments, that civility requires upon all occasions of the same nature. But so soon as she observ'd in my looks, that I was pleas'd with Flavian's proposal, addressing her self to the Roman; If the Prince of the Tongres, said she, be of your mind, I am very free to give my consent that Adelaiada may leave us for some few hours.

After she had spoken these words, all the company rose, Adelaiada's Attendants were called for, and I had the satisfaction to give my hand to that fair Princess. When we were out of the house, I found that it would be no small ease to my mind, if I should let that most incomparable person understand the passion, that I had cherish'd in my heart. I look'd upon her with an extraordinary love, but that love how violent soever it were, being accompanied with a deep respect, instead of opening my lips, caus'd me only to sigh and look downward. Adelaiada taking notice of my behaviour, made a right conjecture of my thoughts, and therefore to divert me from a discourse, of which her modesty was too apprehensive, she fell upon the subject which Flavian had interrupted. Since you have not declared your self, (said she speaking of the pleasures of the Spa) let me ask you the question, what you think to be there most agreeable to your humour? For my part, Madam, (said I with an Air that spoke before I could express my self) methinks there is nothing so pleasing as the liberty we have to bewail the evils we endure, and if the Princess of the Nemetians will not refuse me that privilege, which all people enjoy in this place, I must crave leave to tell her that Taxander has adored her, from the first time that ever he saw her, and that he was no sooner deprived of the sight of her, but he suffered all the cruelty wherewith absence could afflict the most passionate of Lovers. I said no more after those few words, when the charming but too cruel Adelaiada, blushing and keeping silence for some few minutes; Prince, said she, with a haughtiness mingled with disdain, I knew I was in that Kingdom, where you are one day to wear the Crown, though you had not been so bold as to put me in mind of it: But know withal that the Princess Adelaiada has not changed her condition, in changing the Climate, and that she expects that men should consider the privileges, which she claims by vertue of her birth and sex, as well in the Country of the Tongres as in other places. Ah Madam, said I sighing, for Heavens sake better understand the unfortunate Taxander, he has a veneration for you that no men have for mortal creatures, and since his destiny made him your servant, he was left a subject to the Emperour of the Romans, than to the charming Princess of the Nemetians, even in Italy where he first beheld those eyes. Taxander Madam adores you, Taxander is yours, if he offend you by this respectful protestation, he must never cease to injure you after that manner, as long as he lives, finding himself in a better capacity to expire at your feet, to appease your displeasure, than to repent of that pretended crime. The Princess perceiving that I spake with so much vehemency, feared the continuance of a discourse which she could not brook without disturbance, and therefore making a stop she stayed, till those persons that followed her overtook us and mix'd company: Which so much grieved me that not being Master of my Affliction, I sigh'd a hundred times during the walk which I had desired.

Being parted from Adelaiada Flavian came to me, and after he had spied in my looks, the troubles of my heart, and understood the cause; "And well Sir, said he to allay my sorrow, you see no more than what often happens, upon the first discoveries and protestations of love: For it is evident that the Princess of the Nemetians did not think it expedient to let you conceive too fair hopes at first. "Ah Flavian, cryed I. I am lost, the unjust Adelaiada scorns me, or else her inclinations are more favourable, to some other lover more happy than my self. But which way soever my ill fate has ordain'd, both the one and the other is more unsupportable to me than the most cruel death.

After that without giving Flavian time to answer, I recounted to him what had passed between us, I represented to him my submissiveness and the severity of Adelaiada, and aggravated her unkindness to him, that he soon perceived I was the most enamour'd person in the world, and that the Princess of the Nemetians had not so much softness in her conversation, as she had sweetness in her looks. He was much surpris'd at it, and us'd all his endeavours to disengage me from a person, whose behaviour gave him some distaste: And giving me to understand that I had sufficiently acquitted my self, of my respects toward Polyenz and the Princess, he perswaded me that I could no longer dispence with my duty that engaged me to make halt to see the King my Father: And in regard my thoughts were not much different from his, in relation to the Prince to whom I owed my being, I remained not long unresolv'd, but at length departed for Mosellana, where Marsandus usually kept his Court, but with an intention to return as soon as possible to Adelaiada. The King of the Tongres received me, with all the marks and signs of tenderness that could be expected, from the most indulgent Father in the world. But though the joy which I felt at the sight of a Father, was little less than his, yet it much less endured, having but for a while suspended those thoughts, which were only to be bestow'd upon Adelaiada, while the Ideas of that Princess fill'd my imagination, and tormented me with the remembrance of her severity.

These reflections joyn'd to the melancholy caused by her absence, insus'd a certain languishment into my eyes, which being observed by Marsandus, he was earnest to know the cause. But because I durst not presume to discover it, yet had not confidence enough to make any excuse, the King my Father was not satisfied with my Answer, but began to have a suspicion: And therefore to inform himself he put me upon a discourse, wherein he mention'd the Sister of Honorius, the Princess Theodolinda, and many other Roman Ladies whose beauty he had heard extoll'd, and finding that I gave my opinion concerning them, without any alteration in my countenance, he bethought himself of speaking something of my journey to the Spa, and the charms of Adelaiada. Hearing that Princess nam'd I blush'd, and my mind was discompos'd in that manner, that Marsandus who heedfully observed me, took notice notice thereof: Ah, my Son, said he, you are in love with Adelaïada, and I will enquire no farther whence proceeds your melancholy, the cause whereof I have been diving into this three or four days. Those words augmenting my discomposure, the King of the Tongres was confirm'd in his belief, Prince, (said he with a more lively air) I am glad your distemper is no worse than I apprehend it to be; for I believe it will be no difficult thing to obtain the cure.

Hereupon, being in a furious perplexity, and not knowing what to answer, I took my leave of Martianus as soon as possibly I could; and while I retired to my Chamber, he sent for Flavian to be inform'd of all the particulars that concern'd my passion. He had a long conference with the Roman, and at last resolv'd by his advice to send to the King of the Nemetians, to propound a Match between Taxander and the Princess his Daughter. After that he gave me leave to go to the waters, where I was no sooner arriv'd, but I went to Polyena, and evidently made manifest the visible marks of that passion that controul'd my heart. The charming Princess blush'd, perceiving an earnest disquiet, and a joy mingled with anguish; and I had the pleasure to perswade my self that the Carnation that appear'd in her cheeks was too lovely to be an affect of antipathy or choler. But the satisfaction of that deceitful thought endured not long, I found too soon that it was not an easie thing for me to move Adelaïada; and that in spite of my submission, my complaisance and my cares, that severe Princess did exactly avoid all opportunities that I could possibly find to let her but understand what I suffered for her. Flavian, who expected not such ill success, was desirous to know the cause of a behaviour so surprizing; to which purpose he could not find a better way, than by obliging himself to serve a beautiful Virgin nam'd Ydonia, in whom the Princess repos'd a very great confidence: and in regard that Lady was fair, and of eminent quality among those of her Country, Flavian not only beheld her without reluctance, but soon after, his passion for her was little different from that which I had for Adelaïada: his love not so violent as mine was better entertain'd. And while I led a sorrowful languishing life in the presence of Adelaïada, the happy Flavian had the satisfaction to see that Ydonia, to ease him, wore some part of his Fetters: yet the obliging Roman thought his felicity not perfect so long as I complain'd of the cruelty of my Princess; and taking notice that my health began to be visibly impair'd through the effect of a profound melancholy, and that all people were willing to contribute toward my recovery except Adelaïada, he resolv'd to make use of Ydonia's reputation to render Adelaïada kind, or at least to oblige me to take my last leave of an ingrateful and unjust Princess. To that purpose he went to Ydonia very much discompos'd, and that fair Lady having a kindness for him, no sooner perceiv'd the trouble of his thoughts in his countenance, but she eagerly press'd to know the cause: Flavian spoke first to my advantage, then upbraiding the Princess of the Nemetians, he protested that he could not endure she should either have an antipathy against me, or shew her self indifferent. Then he conjur'd Ydonia in language most urgently pressing, to declare to him what Adelaïada's real thoughts were, and to tell him ingenuously whether the Princess was prepossess'd against me with any natural antipathy, or whether I had offended her by any action of my own. Ydonia was at a great loss, and kept off a great while before she would say any thing to the purpose; but her heart being already accusom'd to be complaisant to Flavian, caus'd her to return him this answer, The Princess of the Nemetians said she, knows the merit of your Friend, she esteems the Prince as much as you can wish; and since you constrain me to say more than I ought, I must confess that she would now have had thoughts more obliging, could she overcome a scruple that opposes it self to Taxander's happiness. But, Flavian, do not flatter your self that obstacle is invincible; and Adelaïada, who has the goodness to communicate her most secret thoughts to me, has never yet trusted me with that, to hinder me without question from being in a condition to contend with her in the behalf of a Prince whose part I generally take. Ah, Ydonia, reply'd Flavian, Adelaïada dares not declare to you what forbids her to give the Prince of the Tongres admission into her heart, because she finds it to be an obstinacy ill grounded; nor can I imagine that a thought of that nature can long hold out against a merit which you say is already known to her. Nevertheless, replied she, I am afraid you deceive your self; for the Princess has spoken to me with that resolution, which is no way conformable to your hopes. 'Tis enough, Ydonia, (said he impatiently, interrupting her) that resolve of Adelaïada's must of necessity produce another which will determine Taxander's misfortune: I must represent to the Princess, that she ought to disdain so much weakness, and that it is time for her to shake off those chains with which she stands at present so unjustly fetter'd.

He had no sooner spoken those words, but he took his leave of Ydonia in great haste, and coming directly to me, he gave me an account of all that I have already related; afterwards more than ordinary zealous, Sir, said he, you must think no more of Adelaïada: 'Tis not for such a Prince as you to languish in vain for her; and if your heart cannot be easily won to forsake a Princess that has charm'd it; call back again into the same heart that desire of honour that possess'd it so long time before: let us go to the War in Germany, let us take part with the Sueves, who are the Roman Confederates, and you will find in the divine Rosamond, or the amiable Albisinda, those charms that will bury in oblivion a Beauty which you ought never more to have in remembrance. I will follow you, Sir, and yet I am not disdain'd by Ydonia, and if I am capable of such a self-denial, what answer can you give me for an excuse? That you are a Generous Friend, I replied, but never any true Lover; Ah, Flavian, you would soon change your resolution; had you for Ydonia a love that came but near what I feel for the Princess of the Nemetians, you would prefer the joy of being in her presence before all other contents; and all the honour that attends on Triumph, how glorious soever they be, would be a meaner satisfaction without doubt, than that which you would find in serving the person whom you really lov'd. To those I added other words, which testified how impossible it was to take off my affection for Adelaiada, inasmuch that Flavian withdrew very much vex'd; and while he made haste to complain of me, I went to visit the Princess, the first sight of whose fair eyes quite defac'd all the impressions of reason which his arguments had labour'd to raise against my love.

The next morning Flavian returning to visit me more eager, and more discomposed, Sir, said he, we must be gone from a Country fatal to your repose: Alaric is marching against Italy, and threatens Rome it self with utter desolation; and though the interest of Honorius did not call you to the relief of a City where you have been eminently esteem'd, you cannot refuse your assistance to the Princess Cleomira, to a dear and noble Sister ready to be besieg'd by an Army of the Barbarians.

At this news, which was too true, I seem'd not a little surpris'd, and perceiv'd my self inflam'd with a noble enmity against the Goths. But, Madam, I must presume to tell you, that at the same time Adelaiada, as ingrateful as she was, still was Mistress of my heart; and that after a conflict between the passion which I had for her, and the claims of Kindred and Friendship, she imperiously commanded me not to remove from her presence. Flavian no sooner understood my resolution, but he was struck with an astonishment more than ordinary, after he had taxed me with a folly unworthy the grandeur of my courage, How, Sir, said he, are you immovable, and can you preserve a constancy which Adelaiada so much disdain's? What thoughts would you have, should that Princess prove more kind? I should believe my self the more happy, (replied I with a sigh) but I should be neither the less diligent, nor less faithful: after all that, if you look upon my passion to be extraordinary, go to Adelaiada, and read my excuse in her fair eyes.

Then Flavian beheld me with an aspect where compassion seem'd to be mingled with anger, but his friendship proving at length more prevalent, he went to Ydonia to give her new testimonies of that affection which I offered to the Princess, to the end that Adelaiada having the knowledge thereof might be at length compell'd to take pity on me. Thus was the Princess soon inform'd of the deep respect I had for her, and listen'd to those evidences which she heard from the Ydonia's lips, with that sorrow which manifested that I was not unworthy her acknowledgment, though she could not however give me any relief.

In the mean time a Nemetian Lady of great quality came to the Spa, and gave Polyena an account of a Treaty almost concluded upon, and request'd her on the behalf of the King her Master to look upon me as a Prince that was to be his Confederate. Salison had also written to Adelaiada, wherein he commanded her to receive me with that civility, and that confidence which Ladies usually have for those who in all probability are to become their Husbands. On the other side, Martсандus was not only careful to advertise me of all that had pass'd, but he gave me assurances of my happiness, and promised me to agree with the King of the Nemetians in all things for the obtaining what I so ardently affected.

These tydings at first fill'd me with joy, but when I consider'd that neither Polyena, Salison nor Martсандus could render me happy, and that only Adelaiada could accomplish my felicity, I breath'd innumerable sighs, feeling an augmentation both of my fear and sadness. After a vast variety of thoughts which an extraordinary love infus'd into me, I went to visit the Queen of the Nemetians, to whom I thought I was bound to apply my self for several reasons. Polyena receiv'd me after a most obliging manner, and having testified to me how glad she was that Salison and Martсандus agreed in their intentions so conformable to her own, she began to deal more frankly with me, and told me if I would see Adelaida, I should find her in her Closet with Ydonia and Flavian: immediately I went to wait upon the charming Princess, not being able to enter without trembling, into a place where my destiny was to be decided. I first consult'd those fair eyes that I ador'd, to find there the prognosticks of my good or bad fortune, and took notice that that Adelaiada no sooner perceived me, but she laid one of her fair hands upon her cheeks; to hide those blushes which my presence had occasion'd. As for my part, upon the sight of what I loved, I felt my self so transported with my passion, that Flavian and Idonia being no way suspected, I threw my self at the feet of my Princess. "I come hither to you, Madam, said I sighing, as to the only person that can dispose of my destiny: you know Madam that by the will of your Father, I find my self advanc'd and encourag'd in the most honourable of all my pretences; but I protest never to take any advantage of Salison's good-nests, so that if I cannot obtain from yours a voluntary consent, I renounce that supreme felicity to which my hopes have rais'd me. It is sufficient Madam that I am so unfortunate, as to live without your favour, without loading my self with a crime, and by rendring my self guilty, of putting a force upon your Inclinations. Sir, I am reduced to that streight, answered Adelaiada, that I cannot preserve my innocency, bow cautiously soever I behave my self, or what limits soever I set to my intentions. In short, if I follow not the orders of the King my Father, I fail in my acknowledgment to you, and that obedience I owe a Father, who has the privilege to govern and dispose of my inclinations. On the other side, if I fulfil Salison's commands, I must accuse my self of lightness, and all my life reproach an ingratitude in my self, which I cannot think can ever deserve to be pardoned. But Madam, (said I afflicted with those last words) of what ingratitude———I beseech you Sir, said she, seek no farther interpretation, for I must confess to you with all the freedom that your behaviour merits, that I am troubled that I cannot answer your desires. Ah! my Princess, replied I sighing, Who in the world can if you cannot? Truly Sir, answered Adelaiada, that which raises the scruple which opposes your suit, so that if you can be content with my esteem and good will, you shall never have cause to complain. That which you offer, I replied, is of a high value, but I must presume to say my heart desires something more, and that the passion whose Empire it acknowledges, requires another sort of Recompence. You may find it in the society of some other Princess, replied the blushing, not constrained and tyed by the accidents of a contrary fortune, while I lie under the reproaches of an incens'd Father, not daring to declare to him the reasons of my proceeding, with which he would be himself surpris'd. Would Taxander may perish, (said I interrupting her, with a new disturbance in my countenance) before he prove inconstant to his divine Princess. No, no, Madam, I shall never change, but notwithstanding your severity, I will rather chose to wail and mourn under the weight of my chains, than to receive Crowns at the hands of any other Princess. And how insensible soever you may be in respect of me, I will sacrifice my self to the displeasure of Salison and Martlandus, and that the King of the Nemetians may have no reason to blame you for your reluctancy against me, or your disobedience to him. I will my self seem to be the cause of breaking off a match, so honourable and satisfactory to my self. I will absent my self from you, I will quit that happiness which I prefer before all the Empires of the world, and in the Armies of the Goths, go seek the end of a life which you cause me to hate, and which you may render the most fortunate in the world. Ah divine Princess, wherefore will you not tell me?———"Yes; Generous Prince (said she interrupting me, and moved with my resolution) I will open you my heart, since nothing could sooner have urg'd me to it. You may perhaps have understood already, said she pursuing her discourse, that the Prince of the Sennois was to have espoused me, by the will of those persons who have power over mine. The King my Father had commanded me to have a great value for him, and as then it was in my power to dispose of my affections, while Cavarin on his part gave me a thousand obliging proofs of his, I followed Salison's commands, and gave my consent without any reluctancy. Judge you now Sir, of what importance an engagement of this nature, is to a soul that is capable of honour: And whether I ought not to be strangely sham'd of my self, should I change to the prejudice of a Prince who is dead, with all those privileges and claims which I have mention'd, and who himself never would have chang'd. Ah! Madam, said I, that you should know so little.———

At those words I held my peace, not daring to speak against our Rival, whose Tomb ought to be his sacred sanctuary: But Flavian not being obliged to the same reservedness; Madam, said he, the Prince of whom you speak was but a Politician in the disguise of a Lover, he was not tyed so much by the motives of his affection, as by the maxims of state-prudence, and would have been unfaithful every time that change could have been profitable. At the same time that he sigh'd at your feet, he wrote affectionate Letters to Hersilia to preserve Artabure's friendship, and I make no question but he would have renounced the fairest Princess in the world, to have only been looked upon by the Sister of Honorius, could he have had the same pretence to have favn'd upon her, without exposing himself to the displeasure, of the most formidable of all the Romans. I would you could persuade me to it, (replied Adelaiada casting a most obliging look upon me) but Fla-

vian, besides that all the words and Actions of Cavarin manifested the contrary, behold there a testimony of his constancy. Concluding these words she presented a Letter to Flavian, and as I had an extraordinary impatience, to see whatever might concern my misfortune, I greedily overlooked these words, while Flavian read them aloud.

Heraclian to the Princess of the Nemetians.

I Have lost Madam a most Royal friend, and you Madam the most faithful of all Lovers: I am inform'd that Cavarin is dead, and that he had not lost his life but because he was beloved by you. And indeed it is true that he might have had his life, would he have promised not to have lived only to serve you: But this generous Lover has renounc'd his Life sooner than his Claim; you approved it Madam, and so honourable it was that he was willing to carry it to his Tomb. He has left the world but has not forsook the Empire, and it may be said that he has extended your dominions beyond the Limits of the world.

"I am not ignorant, replied Flavian after he had read the Letter, that it was reported at Rome that Artabure had slain the Prince of the Senonois, and that he had fought with him for Heraclian's sake; nevertheless that rumour was very uncertain, for it was presently known that only Heraclian's creatures made it publick. 'Tis that incertainty, replied the Princess, that troubles me at present, and I could wish that the Prince of the Tongres could quit me of it, but forbear I beseech you till I have better information from him. When Flavian observing that there was a Postscript, continued to read these words.

I do not doubt Madam, but you will suddenly know the Murderer of Cavarin, that he may not entertain you with a pretended passion, nor dare to presume to demand a heart, which the unfortunate Prince of the Senonois had merited and obtained. But Madam, I fear nothing from a heart like yours, nor can I imagine that you will ever endure, that our common Enemy shall triumph over an illustrious Lover, who had been promised the honour of espousing the divine Princess of the Nemetians.

At those words Flavian held his peace, and Adelaiada changed colour, and I remain'd like one astonish'd: the suspicion of the Princess was confirm'd, and the jealousy which I had before was almost turned to a certain knowledge, and Flavian not knowing what to think he beheld me without speaking a word. The Princess at length brake silence and addressing her self to me; "Prince, said she, there is no person in the world can better clear the point in relation to Heraclian's letter than your self, and to shew you what an esteem I have of your sincerity; I declare that I will rely upon your single testimony: And if you can assure me that it was not your self that slew Cavarin, you shall find me freely dispos'd to follow the orders which I have received. But if that Prince for whom my Father had design'd me fell by your Sword, I cannot believe that you will again assail him in my heart, and there take from him a second life which it behoves me to preserve, and constrain me to receive you in his Room.

She had no sooner spoken in that manner but I found my self in a strange perplexity, I saw my self the Master of my own destiny, I found my self in a condition to render my self the most happy Prince that ever was. But alas, I found at the same time, that I did not deserve the happiness which it lay in my power to procure; should I obtain it by that dissimulation, that became not either Adelaiada or Taxander. I beheld my Princess then with an extraordinary melancholy. and in that posture; "Madam, said I sighing, Heaven is my witness that I know not how to live absented from you, and if you banish me I shall dye the most unfortunate of men. On the contrary had I the advantage not to have done any thing to displease you, I should prefer it before the honour of possessing the Throne, either of Theodosius or Honorius: At the same time I also protest, that I cannot assuredly tell whether I slew the Prince of the Senonois or no, but I must confess after all this that very strong conjectures, forbid me to aspire to that felicity, which you would surrender to my disposal, nor shall it ever be said that Taxander betrayed his own thoughts, or deceiv'd

“ the Princess whom he adores. No, Madam, I will not purchase the marks of your good “ will at so high a price; for I will rather chuse to live and die in misery, than obtain it by “ means that would render me unworthy of it, being neither conformable to the greatness “ of my courage, nor the purity of my flame.

Thereupon I gave her a full relation in a few words of what befel me upon the way from Ravenna, and then pursuing my discourse, Madam, said I, see there a perfect account of the grounds of my suspicion, for it is not by a disguise of the truth that I pretend to an affection like yours, but by services of high importance, even by the loss of my life. But yet dear Princess, would you that vain appearances should deprive me of a most solid felicity? Is it reasonable that a Prince, whose pretences could not destroy mine, should after his death overturn those hopes which were permitted me while he lived? Was his felicity absolutely establish'd, had you given him your hand? Is it to the Princess of the Senonois? To the Widow of Cavarin that I address my self? Ah, Madam, after an ingenious confession be you just in your turn: I beseech you let not your scruples, let not your ill grounded suspicions be more prevalent than your Father's commands, or the testimonies of the most zealous and most respectful passion in the world. In truth, Madam, replied Ydonia, I do not understand what answer you can make to Prince Taxander. How, (said the Princess, interrupting her) is Ydonia against me too? Ydonia that knew in what manner I was engag'd, she who knows my disposition, and how I value my word: have I not told you, (said she, addressing her self to the fair Lady) that notwithstanding the esteem which I had for the Prince of the Tongres, I would prefer the Prince of the Senonois before him when ever I should be put to my choice, being already engag'd to declare my consent in his favour. Why then, Madam, replied I, was I permitted to serve you as well as my Rival? That I might not displease the Emperour, replied Adelaïda, who had declar'd himself in your behalf: at which Heraclian and Cavarin that knew as much, were not much troubled, being fully perswaded that I was not given to change. Ah, Madam, if it be so, Cavarin knew not how to love, for the passion which I have is always accompanied with fear and impatience, nor could I live in any quiet had I a Rival that were not contemptible, or found any remora of my happiness. But, most Sovereign Princess, will not the death of the too fortunate Prince of the Senonois permit you to dispense with a constancy that occasions all the misfortunes of my life. I must ingenuously confess, replied she, that it would not allow me any dispensation:
but, Prince, I mean more in relation to others than your self, if you deprive me not of that good opinion of your virtue of which I am already prepossess'd.

As she had concluded those words, there came one from the Queen her Mother that earnently call'd her away; whereupon we immediately return'd to Polyena's Chamber, and we were no sooner come into her presence but we perceiv'd her countenance was chang'd.
 She could hardly express the cause of her sadness, but the Courier that was arriv'd told us in short, that the Citizens of Samarobrina were absolutely revolted, declaring that their City was a free City of the Gauls, and under that pretence had sent Deputies to Pharamond, with a promise to put themselves under his jurisdiction, if he would protect them from Salison.
 In the mean time they besiege the City whither the King is retired, and that there was great probability of their carrying the place if it were not speedily reliev'd. The news having put my Princess into a fright, there appear'd so much perplexity in her face, that my heart became turmoil'd with several violencies, infomuch that not being able to moderate the transportation of my mind, but addressing my self to Polyena, Madam, said I with a resolute utterance, fear nothing in reference to the King, so long as Taxander lives; I will reduce those Rebels and set Salison at liberty; for when the valiantest among the Tongres shall joyn with the most faithful of your Subjects, a divided City will not be able to hold out long against their united Forces.

I spake with an aspect so proper to infuse courage, that the Queen being thereby somewhat assur'd, Sir, said she, 'tis upon you that all my hopes depend, I beseech you to make an end of what you have so generously propos'd. Besides the honour that attends you, you will fight for your self in fighting for the King of the Nemetians, and you will reduce Samarobri- na under the obedience of a Prince who will leave in one day under your Dominion.

These last words causing me to turn toward Adelaïda, I beheld her sighing, but the presence of the Queen not permitting me to express my mind, I was constrain'd to leave her, being to undertake an enterprize that could not be deferr'd. Thereupon I sent the principal Officers which I had about me to draw out several Troops and Companies out of the several Garrisons, and having appointed them a general Rendezvous, I met them with an extraordinary haste. In the Evening I went to take leave of Polyena and Adelaïda, and had the opportunity by Ydonia's and Heraclian's means to discourse that fair Princess in her Closet; I depart, Madam, (said I in a very passionate manner) yet I do not absent my self from the divine Adelaiada but for her interest. I forsake Honorius, Placidia, and an only and dear Sister, to go to the relief of Salison; and so long as you are not offended with the design that causes me to march for Samarobrina, I shall without doubt return a Victor. Then will I oppose so many effectual services to your vain scruples, that perhaps you will not then remain so firm in your constancy to make me suffer, as I in that constancy which I have always had to dedicate all the actions of my life to your service. But, dear Princess, if I return with that favourable success which I dare promise my self, that fortune that attends me, and the victory which I shall gain, shall they both be sacrific'd to the destiny of my Rival? Go, generous Taxander, said she, go and set the King my Father at liberty, and remember that cruelty ought not to enter into the heart of a Prince that is going to fight.

Somewhat of a blush that accompanied those words, gave me to understand the true force thereof, so that I returned Adelaiada's thanks with some kind of satisfaction, more than I had received from the beginning of my engagement.

The End of the Second Book of the Ninth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

BEfore I took my leave I complemented Ydonia, believing Adelaiada would not take it amiss; so that I not only took my leave of her with all the civility that I thought due to a person that was so infinitely dear to the Princess, but I also recommended to her my own concerns, after such a manner that I perceived her mov'd with my request. After that, Flavian and I retired, who, notwithstanding the ordinary humour of the Romans, prefer'd his Mistress before his Country, immediately we rode both together to the general Rendezvous, taking along with us all the Soldiers that we could find in the way. On the other side, the King my Father sent to me without delay, and understanding that they were levying men in several Countries of Gallia for the assistance of Samarobrina, he caus'd Polyena and the Princess to be conducted to Leodia, a fair and strong Town not far distant from the waters. In the mean time I marched toward the Rebels with a Body of four thousand Horse, and understanding that a party of the Belgians were about to get into the City, I set upon them so suddenly, that I defeated them before any party from the City could be sent out to make good their approach. The report thereof coming to the City, at first caus'd no little disturbance among them: but the Inhabitants took heart, and understanding that five and twenty thousand men were advancing in all haste to their relief, they assaulted the Castle more vigorously. Though I found my Army increase, as well by the accession of those Forces which the King my Father sent me, as of those of the Nemetians who were desirous to signalize their zeal and fidelity, however I could not but be in great perplexity for the Father of Adelaiada. The Assaults and Sallics were frequent and vigorous; so that while I apprehended that every blow might be the death of Salison, and occasion sorrow in the heart heart of my Princess, that cruel apprehension so tormented me every moment, that I sought out for a way speedily, to suppress the growth of farther trouble. To that purpose I gave the principal Rebels to understand, that I would procure their pardon, if they would submit to their Prince. On the other side, that I would lay wast all their estates, if they continued obstinate. But they not valuing any such threatening language, return'd insolent answers, and would hearken to no propositions tending toward any accommodation, till they understood that the Nemetians that were in my Army, began to burn their Enemies houses, and that the King of the Franks, instead of protecting them, sent forces to Salison.

The treaty continued a long time, but at length was concluded to the King of the Nemetians full satisfaction, who return'd me so many marks of acknowledgment and favour that my hopes increased to a double proportion. A thousand times he affectionately embrac'd me, he called me his Son, his deliverer, and the only restorer of him to his lost dignity, and understanding that the Gauls who came against him, had invaded the Territories of the Tongres, he resolv'd to march in person to the relief of the King my father. I oppos'd my self to this generous resolution, for not looking upon any war to be considerable, but what concern'd the Princess Adelsiada, I bent all my care to reestablish the King of the Nemetians. The better to assure him in his Throne, I sent away the heads of the sedition, and left him sufficient forces as well to joyn with his own, as to keep in subjection the inhabitants of Samarobrina. In all regulations that were made to the advantage of the King Flavian was very servicable as well in his Advice and counsel, as in his valour during the war. Salison most obligingly return'd him thanks, and forced him to accept of some considerable presents. He wrote also in my favour to the Queen and Princess, and did not only in his Letters extol the most inconsiderable of my Actions; but gave her to understand, that he ardently coveted my Alliance. Had I not understood these circumstances which I have repeated, I had not however delayed my departure, being extremely impatient to see Adelsiada: To that purpose I made haste toward Leodia, but as I was in hopes suddenly to enjoy the company of my Princess, I received news that did not a little disturb my satisfaction: For the report was, that the famous Alaric had taken Rome, that the riches of that magnificent City was become a prey to the Goths, and that there was nothing but disorder and desolation in that City, which had given laws to all the Nations of the world. Immediately a fear surpris'd me for the Princesses Placidia, Theodolinda, and Cleomira, who would not forsake the Romans in their misfortune. But I was assured that Autalpb brother of Alaric, that Walilia a Prince of the blood, and Attalus the most considerable of his general Officers had not only protected them from the insolency of the Soldiers, but had caused them to be us'd with all the respect, which they could have given them in any other place.

Flavian enquir'd after many particulars of so strange a resolution, seeming to be very much afflicted: Nevertheless love still being the more predominant passion in his heart as well as in mine, we comforted each other with the sight of Leodia, whither we had made such an extraordinary haste, that they were surpris'd at our arrival: For I went to visit Polyena before she was advertis'd of my return. Ydonia was the first person of my acquaintance, that I met, and therefore after I had consult'd her countenance addressing my self to her, “Ydonia, said I, have you remembred the unfortunate Prince who——— Ah, Sir, (said she, interrupting me with a pleasant assest) never speak of being unhappy I beseech you: but prepare to be received with all the sounds of rejoycing and triumph. Notwithstanding all these great words, said I smiling, I would know whether you have spoken in the behalf of Taxander. Perhaps less than you believe, answered she, for in truth renown has so well delivered her self in your behalf, that all I could do was but weakly to second her. I beseech you, fair Ydonia, do not think, that excuse will satisfy me how fair soever it seem: for I must still desire you to tell me, whether you have taken care of my concerns. You have so much interest your self that my intercession was altogether needless, for every advantage you got over the Rebels, made some progress in the heart of the Princess. I see by these answers, said I, that 'tis not your desire I should keep you any longer in discourse, but that you civilly command me silence. Besides that it is but just that I should give that place to Flavian, which he has deserved by many noble actions; and that while he enjoys so pleasing a converse, I should go and give an account of what I have suffered for her in my absence.

In short, I went to Polyena's Chamber, where I was received with all the marks of favour, that Salison had bestow'd upon me at Samarobrina: But that which pleased me most, was a favourable glance from the fair Eyes of Adelsiada; and as I was turning toward her to make my reverence, Flavian happily entred, whereby I happily gained an opportunity to discourse of my passion to my divine Princess. Madam, said I, may I not be so inquisitive as to desire to know the condition of my fortune. It will be no difficult thing to answer you in that particular, replied the Princess, for your valour is so universally spread abroad, that you may easily guess at the honour which you have won. There is no other honour but that of being yours, dear Princess, said I interrupting her, and therefore I beseech you let us talk of that which most concerns me. Tell me I conjure you what you think of Taxander, and how you intend to dispose of his destiny. She paus'd a little upon those words, but I urging her still more earnestly, Taxander, answered she at length, the Rebels are overcome, Salison is free, and Adelaïada was never ingrateful, let that suffice you and require no more from a person of my humour.

Those words gave me some satisfaction at first, but having examin'd them I was not so well content, seeing they rather proceeded from my Princess's acknowledgment, than from any perswasion of her own inclination. So that I should have requested something more, had not the Queen at the same time complemented me, with an entreaty to go and take my repose, understanding that I was but newly alighted at the Palace Gate. I was therefore constrained to retire, but instead of taking my rest; Flavian and I spent all our time in talking of the charms of Adelaïada. The Roman would needs perswade me that I stood very fair in the Princess's affection, but finding me not overmuch disposed to believe it, It may be, said he, you may not remain long in suspense, for if Ydonia has not deceived me, you may to morrow make Adelaïada explain her mind, and draw from her own lips a confirmation of what I tell you.

He infused this hope into me with an Air full of so much assurance, that I impatiently longed to see my Princess again, and I went to her Apartment transported with love and joy, so soon as Flavian judg'd it convenient, according to the order which he had receiv'd. We found Adelaïada in the Garden, and her Pages retiring to sit on as we drew near her; I gave my hand to that beautiful Princess, and thus expressed my passion to her. Is it possible, Madam, that you should not yet be moved with those demonstrations of tender affection, and veneration which I have for you, and that you should not value me so far, as I am favour'd by fortune? Pronouncing those words I beheld her with an amorous look, and to those expressions I added others, to which she return'd me this answer. Methinks, Taxander, you ought to have been contented: But since the commands of the King my Father, and those obligations you have laid upon me, permit me a free liberty of speech. know that the will of Salison and your own services, have vanquished that reluctancy which I had to my pretensions: and since it remains uncert in whether you slew the Prince of the Senonais, while it is not to be question'd but that you saved my Fathers life and Crown; I dare safely (without being unjust to Cavarin) obey my Father, and cease to be opposite to your intentions. How highly have you engaged me, divine Princess, cryed I, what acknowledgment can I make of a favour so extraordinary? I was so transported that I was about to proceed, when one of her Attendants came to her in great haste, and told her that Megastus desir'd to be admitted.

The name of Megastus seem'd to trouble Adelaïada, and turning about she saw a stranger of a comely aspect but somewhat wan, approaching toward her: I took notice that she had not the power to speak to him, which made me more exactly heed the person, who had caused that discomposure. I had no sooner observed him but methought he was not unknown to me: so that being desirous to inform my self; Stranger, said I, have I not seen you before, either at Rome or at Samarobrina? No, Sir, (answered he sighing after he had well considered my countenance) and I wish to heaven that I had never met you neither, upon the rode to Ravenna.

At these words I recollected my thoughts, and calling to my remembrance all that had befallen me, when I went to meet the Emperour in Ariobindus's Garden. I observ'd that the Knight who spake to me was the same, who ran to the succour of his Master during that fight, the particulars whereof I have already repeated. I was so surpris'd at Megastus taking that opportunity; Is it in your presence, Madam, said he, that I come to find the Enemy of Cavarin? do you not know Madam, that the Knight who gives you his hand, is the person that slew the unfortunate Prince who adored your beauty; and if you know it, is it possible that you should suffer him in your presence? He had no sooner spoken in that manner, but Adelaïada stood in an amaze: She had cast her eyes downward, and by and by looking in my face; Prince, said she, do you grant for truth what he gives you to understand? I confess, said I overwhelm'd with grief, that I wounded the Master of this Stranger; but Madam let him speak on, let him tell the whole Story, and then if he has as much zeal for truth as he has for his Master's interest, he will tell you without doubt that Cavarin assaulted me, that he was arm'd that I could not know him, and that I took his life away only in defending my own. 'Tis enough, replied Adelaïada, you slew Cavarin.

After she had said those few words, and call'd Ydonia, she rest'd her hand up on her Arm, and making a sign that no person should follow her, she went into a green Arbour: Megastus retired, understanding my quality: but for my part, I stood like a Statue, and as I was pondering upon the capriciousness of my fortune, Flavian came to me, seeking to moderate some part of my trouble, Ab, Flavian, (said I interrupting him) never was Lover more unfortunate than the miserable Taxander, and perhaps the only person in the world that ought to bewail his Rival. Why should you bewail him? replied Flavian: Or why should you repent of having defended your self? Think you, Sir, that the injustice of the Princess can last long? think you she will never open her eyes, and that she will not soon see how advantageous you will be able to repair the loss of which you have been the occasion? Fear nothing, Sir, Adelaïada does not hate you, you have serv'd her, she is sensible of Gratitude, and Ydonia stand your Friend.

Having so said, he leaves me, goes toward the Arbour, stands at the door, and takes notice that the Princess was talking to her beloved Ydonia with a passionate languishment, and that the tears trickled down her lovely cheeks. Flavian's behaviour surpris'd the Princess who desired him to return; nor did the Roman only obey her, but causing Adelaïada's Attendants also to retire, he takes me by the Arm, causes me to walk a great way about, and brings me to sit behind a pale that clos'd up one side of the Arbour. After Ydonia had look'd out, and saw that there was no person in the Alley that could over-hear their discourse, we had not listen'd long but we understood that Adelaïada sigh'd, and then thus continued her complaint, Is it not true, Ydonia, that this is a strange blow? My heart had fully determin'd, it had chosen the Prince of the Tongres, and its persuasions were authorised by the will of a Father, and by considerable services; but now at a time when it seem'd lawful to follow my own inclinations without scruple, that Megastus should come, that he should divide my Soul from my heart, that he should put me in mind that I cannot bestow an affection upon Taxander which I had promised to Cavarin, without committing a piece of inconstancy unworthy a virtuous mind. This niceness of your thoughts, Madam, answered Ydonia, serves to no other purpose but to make you miserable; nor do I find any reason why the return of Megastus should alter your resolution. After all, Madam, what has the Prince of the Senonais done for you? What has the Prince who adores you not done? And what can you your self pretend to do for a Lover so generous and passionate? As long as I live, replied she, I will preserve a perfect kindness for him. He has told you, already, replied Ydonia, that he was not satisfied with that, and that they who love as he loves, expect something more affectionate and more obliging. Ah, Ydonia, you press me after a strange manner, replied the Princess, and I find that I must be forc'd to call Megastus again, that he may take part with my reason against a person that too strongly shakes my inclinations. Those inclinations will prove but weak, replied Ydonia, if you once forbid that they should be countenanc'd. You know what I have told you, replied Adelaïada, and if you question the truth of my words, see here what I wrote when I could not otherwise discover you my mind concerning a Prince whose interests you have so zealously embraced.

Having so said, she gave her certain papers, and rising up she return'd to the Queen. I immediately so earnestly desired to see what the Princess had written, that I would not let Flavian rest till he had got the papers out of Ydonia's hands; and I had no sooner received what I so immoderately coveted, but after I had a thousand times kiss'd the characters written with Adelaïada's own hand, I read the following Lines.

SHall I always suffer, and shall I never know neither what I ought, nor what I would do? Must two Princes combat together in my heart, and tear it to pieces, and I not be able to take neither part? I confess, nor does this confession displease me, that my esteem and affection strive for T. but my compassion upon C. causes me to fear the reproaches of an unfortunate Prince, should he bewail himself in a place whence nothing can come to our ears but what is very terrible. But it is not that I am apprehensive of provoking C. but that I do not find my self dispos'd to offend him by preferring T.

I kiss'd those Lines over and over, I read them with delight, I return'd thanks to the Princess; and that I might still find the same consolation in the misfortune that had befallen me, I sought farther, and found these obliging words.

Determine with thy self, feeble Adelaïada, unfortunate Princess, love, since thy destiny will have it so: but love that which is most lovely in thy eyes, without being afraid of what thou shalt never see. Thou knowest, and thou hast thought so a thousand times, that thou didst not preserve thy good will for Cavarin, but to render thee more worthy of Taxander, by shewing thyself capable of a generous constancy; but shouldst thou not better deserve the affection of this Prince by bestowing thy own upon him, out of an acknowledgment which he has so well deserv'd?

“How much am I engag’d to your favour, divine Princess, (cry’d I after I had read the Letter) how inestimable is your resentment, and how much above all my inconsiderable services! But from these pleasing reflections passing in an instant to the consideration of my misfortune, methought that the return of Megastus, and the change in Adelaiada’s mind would still occasion me to undergo extraordinary sufferings; and therefore to divert what I fear’d, I went to the Queen, who was already inform’d of the circumstances of my misfortune. Polyena declar’d her self very much troubled. that the Prince of the Senonais had lost his life by my hand. But I neither perceiv’d in her looks, nor by her discourse, that I had that cause to apprehend those obstacles from her which I had ground to fear from the scrupulous Adelaiada. In short, as I was going to the Apartment of the severe Princess, Ydonia met me, and requested me in the Princess’s name not to see her in two days. “Let her command me to die, cryed I: And you, generous Ydonia, (said I sighing, and addressing myself to that fair Lady) do you undertake such cruel commissions? Return, I beseech you, and by that ardent and faithful passion which your charms have created in the Soul of Flavian, perswade her to change the decree which she has given out. “Think you, Sir, said she, that I have not spoken in your behalf, or that I have not labour’d to gain you that acknowledgment which is your due, and undeserv’dly bestowed upon the Prince of the Senonais? Certain it is, that I have oppos’d the humour of the Princess, that I have condemn’d that constancy that she would preserve for Cavarin, that I have taxed her with your services. In short, I have mollified her, I have incens’d her, but could not prevail that you should see her to day. She answer’d me that decency would not permit her; and because I absented my self, the sorrowful and charming Princess look’d upon me with a languishment that mov’d me to compassion: and those tears I saw trickle from her fair eyes have obtain’d that silence from her which her arguments could never have impos’d.

I was so mov’d with those last words of Ydonia, that instead of requesting any more the favour which I desired, I return’d full of grief, which was however mix’d with something of despite. I walk’d about my Chamber, complaining of the cruelty of Adelaiada, and I abandon’d my self so absolutely to the torments of my mind, that Flavian, who came to me, not being able to moderate the violence of my anguish, was desirous to set my thoughts at work before he left me, hoping to ease my fancy by diverting my ears: to which end he began to discourse of those papers of Adelaiada’s which I had seen through his means, and told me that certainly the Princess had never put down those thoughts of hers in writing, but to ease her heart: “For my part, said he, I had made Verses a hundred times since I began to be in love, had the Muses been so kind as to have inspir’d my fancy, which makes me wonder that you never make use of those elegant and strenuous expressions that Poetry might furnish you withal.

Those words kindled a certain fire that was almost extinguish’d in my Soul, and joyning it self to my love it presently compell’d me to despise the ordinary ways of complaining, as not conformable to the violence of my passion: to that purpose I studied for the most vigorous expressions, and while the severity of my Princess depriv’d me of rest, I spent the night in meditating upon the deplorable condition of my fortune, or in bewailing it in an Elegy that perhaps did not describe it amiss. The next day——“How, Sir, (said the Queen of the Cimbrians, interrupting him) will you leave the Verses out of the rest of the Relation? “Quite contrary, Madam, since your Majesty testifies your desire to hear them, I will recal them to my memory as well as the time will give me leave. In short, having return’d that answer, he made a pause for a little time, and then repeated the following lines, which he address’d in this manner to the original cause of his disquiet.

The Elegy.

OH, Love, since by thy cruel Arms assail'd,
 My Tears and sighs my sorrows first bewail'd :
 Since first an amorous heart, by fate constrain'd,
 Of the harsh rigour of thy Laws complain'd :
 Since Mortals felt the raging pangs of woe,
 Did ever sorrows like my sorrows show ?

The unjust Iris, whose bright eyes controul
 Each faculty of my enamoured Soul :
 Ah! She whose beauties I alone adore,
 To spite my flame, loves what is now no more.

Yet thou tame Love brook'st thy degraded Might,
 While the cold Grave usurps thy Tapers Right :
 Robs thee of Hearts, and then torments them too,
 While all those vows to thy fair Altars due ;
 Now to the Empire of the Grave are sworn,
 Where never yet thy brighter Fires did burn ;
 Where never yet thy feeble Bow and Darts
 Could ever reach to wound those senseless hearts ;
 Where happy Thyrsis safe from storms of Love,
 No more can either rash or fickle prove :
 Fortunate Rival! whom my fatal hand Sent unawares unto the Stygian Strand.

A Victor there he triumphs over me,
 And gains a conquest by my Victory :
 Compelling Iris to bewail his Fate :
 What Honour, what Success more fortunate !
 Iris, whose beauty knows no parallel,
 Unless my love, and my as constant zeal.

Let all my love and perseverance scorn'd,
 She constancy for constancy return'd
 To Thyrsis pays ; to him she pity shews,
 And thinks with friendship to reward my vows.

Rather, too cruel Iris, let me bear
 Thy hate more useful, and far less severe :
 So may my anger make me break my faith ;
 Or else despair may hurry me to death.

But incens'd Iris chides my low'd complaint :
 Behold the torments under which I faint ;
 I suffer, yet I dare not tell my woe,
 Nor hate my Rival, though my only foe.
 Twixt Iris thus, and Thyrsis in distress,
 My wavering thoughts turmoild, seek vain redress.
 Determine then ye Gods, that know my faith,
 Bequeath me Iris, or bequeath my death.

“ What ! said Rosamond, you would then have depriv'd us of all this pleasure, and left “ us to think that you had learn'd so much of the Roman haughtiness, as to believe there “ is nothing in Germany but what is still barbarous ; or that persons born and bred there are “ not worthy to hear such delicate pieces as these. “ 'Tis true, (very complaisantly replied “ Taxander) that your Majesty might have some ground to think as you do ; but I cannot “ tell, said he with the same air, whether my fear were not better grounded, when I was a-“ sham'd to repeat a Copy of Verses before so great a Queen, whose Wit is not inferiour to “ her Beauty, though her Beauty fills the world with admiration. Those words caus'd the “ charming Queen to blush, though instead of an answer she return'd only an obliging look,
 and

and far from entering into those contents that chiefly serve to beget high complements, her fair eyes required only the pursuit of Taxander's Relation, which made the Prince continue his Story.

Whatever ease I might find in the complements which I made in the Elegy which your Majesty has heard repeated, my heart was nothing satisfied: I was enrag'd against Megastus, nor did I spare my Princess; and as if no person ought to have been exempt from reproaches, I was angry with my self, accusing my self of injustice. Then beginning to ponder upon that niceness of Adelaiada's thoughts, and representing to my mind that modesty and behaviour that accompanied all her words and actions, I fancied to my self so much pleasure in being belov'd by a Princess of her humour, that my passion augmented, and I felt in my Soul fresh and more ardent desires to vanquish those obstacles that were opposite to my pretences. As I was casting about how to accomplish this design, Flavian enter'd, and far from conforming his countenance to that sadness which he saw in mine, he ask'd me for my Verses after a very jocund manner, not caring to begin his discourse upon a subject that was any thing common and ordinary. He was very well pleas'd with those which I shewed him, he told me 'twas convenient that Adelaiada should see them by Ydonia's means: and that he might not continue his discourse of a Princess that render'd me unfortunate, he talk'd to me of the march of the Gauls, and the invasion wherewith they threaten'd the Territories of the King my Father: but I immediately perceiving his drift, Generous Friend, said I, do not fear but that I will be ready to aid Martlandus when need shall require. I will go, and for his interest expose that life which I owe him, for I should render my self unworthy Adelaiada, should I remain with her when it became me to appear at the head of our own Armies. But after all, Flavian, I find my love so violent, and my passion so extraordinary, that I shall not absent my self from Adelaiada till necessity drives me. And yet, replied he, you must be forc'd to leave her very suddenly: for to-morrow the Queen of the Nemetians departs hence with an intention to return into her own Territories to the King her Husband. "How, said I, presently interrupting him, is Polyena so unjust, to be guided by Adelaiada's persuasions? But the changes when she has a mind to change; and to begin a breach with the unfortunate Taxander, she removes out of this Country upon the arrival of Cavarin's Squire? "In truth, Sir, replied Flavian, I cannot but admire to see how you would appropriate all things to the concernment of your violent passion, and that you should attribute Polyena's departure rather to Megastus than to the coming of twenty thousand Goths. Would you but have heard me patiently, I would have told you that the King of the Nemetians has sent for the Queen, that he has sent Ambassadors to Pharamond on the behalf of Martlandus, and that in the mean time he had declared himself for the Tongres. He is also preparing to march himself toward those Frontiers which are like to smart with the first onsets of the War; and Polyena, from whom I have a commission to advertise you, has given me to understand, that notwithstanding her continual fear for Salison's safety, yet she cannot but approve of his proceedings. "I know full well, replied I fighting, that the Queen is all goodness, I knew that Salison was generous, but yet I fear that Adelaiada's severity will be my death. Come, Flavian, let us seek to mollifie her flinty heart, let us make use of Ydonia's credit, let us redouble our endeavours, let us do more this part of the day that remains, than we have done to this hour.

I had no sooner spoken those words but I flung out of the Room, and went to the Queen of the Nemetians, and all the way continuing my dispute with Flavian, "Do you not believe, said I, that it will be a difficult thing for me to discourse my passion to the Princess upon the Road? "Truly, said he, my thoughts are, that she will ride in the Chariot with the Queen, so that there will be no opportunity, but only for your eyes to inform her of the pains of your heart. "Do you think, said I, that Adelaiada understands that language?

Then I mus'd upon the Princess's humour as I went unto the Queen's Apartment, whether I was no sooner come, but I went directly to Ydonia's Chamber, I took notice that the fair Lady was not over chearful; and as my fancy was taken up altogether with Adelaiada, and that I thought of things only according to the passion that reign'd in my Soul, "Generous Ydonia, (said I with a countenance very much discomposed) what is it that your melancholy presages? is it the hatred of Adelaiada, or the banishment of Taxander? "No, Sir, said she, the Princess will not carry her injustice so far along with her, but I find that her scruples are returned with such an absolute dominion over her, that I do not believe it will be easie for you to vanquish them. Is it possible, said I, that she should remain so obstinate to prefer Cavarin who is dead, and who perhaps never loved her, to Taxander who adores her, and prefers his chains before all the Kingdoms and Crowns in the world? Then Flavian vian in pleasing language; Sir, said he, instead of making new complaints, permit me to demonstrate, that they are not the least moving which an unfortunate Lover makes. After he had so said, he presented Ydonia with the Elegy which I have repeated, and the Virgin had no sooner read it, but after she had testified her approbation; By what I see here, said she, you rather merit a Laurel Crown of more than one sort, and if your verses prove as happy in the hands of the Princess, as I observe them to be elegant and well composed, you will have no reason to complain of the Muse to whom you are so much obliged. Suffer me then I beseech you, Sir, said she with an obliging impatience, that I may have leave to prove the success: For if I be not deceived, you are going to attend the Queen in expectation of Adelaïda.

Thus finding Ydonia kind in her intention, I left her and went to Polyena's Apartment, where I received a confirmation of the news that Flavian had told me, touching the proceedings of the King of the Nemetians. But Madam, not to particularize exactly things which are not of importance, as not directly referring to Adelaïda; I will only tell you that I could not see the Princess, but only in the Queen her Mothers Chamber, and that I discover'd under her complements and civilities, a severity that almost made me dye for grief. Thereupon I left her, yet not without several marks of despair in my countenance, and immediately ran to Ydonia as the only person, from whom I could hope for any assistance. She no sooner perceived me, but coming toward me, I protest Sir, said she, that for your sake I have lost some part of the respect which I owed the Princess, for I must confess at the same time that I can obtain no favour at all, and that neither the force of my reasons nor the strength of my zeal have proved effectual in the least.

This made me leave Adelaïda with less choler than compassion, so insinuating was her behaviour; nor can I tell what a report you your self would have made, of a discourse which triumphs ordinarily over the will. "I know nothing more, answered I sighing, for "there are certain moments when, maugre my love, my heart murmurs against Adelaïda, "there are others when I adore that severe Princess, maugre her obstinacy, to render me unhappy. Alas! that the latter motion should controul the first, and that I should find within my self, that Adelaïda will always reign in my soul, how insensible or inhumane forever: and therefore fair and generous Ydonia, be pleased to give me leave to see her: Ah! "Sir, said she interrupting me, did you but apprehend after what manner she will entertain your visit, you would be so kind to your self as not to make it. In short, she believes that your presence would but confirm, and strengthen an inclination in her, which she imagines her self to have some reason to inteeble, and for the verses which I shewed her; they having moved her more than she was willing they should, she requested Megastus to discharge himself of the promise which he had made her. "And can you not tell, replied I sighing, what new misfortune the Squire of my too happy Rival, now threatens me withal? "I believe, replied Ydonia, that he had promis'd to give her a little Cabinet, wherein she shall find the marks of Cavarin's passion, as also some of Adelaïda's Letters, which she earnestly covets to combat the impression which your Elegy has made in her heart. "Fair Ydonia, said I, let not these weapons I beseech you, that will serve for nothing else but to wound my heart, fall into the Princesses hands: Nor suffer I conjure you Cavarin to triumph over a Prince, whose part you take so generously. But Sir, said I, I support your interest with so little success; and the Princess to renew the remembrance of the promise she had given to the Prince of the Senonois, has with so much earnestness demanded to see certain answers which she had written to him, that it will be a vain thing for me to oppose her intentions. "You see then, said I to Flavian, how fortune turns all things against me, and that the verses also of which you expected a fortunate effect, have produced an accident quite contrary to our hopes. True it is, said he, that I was the cause of your composing them, and that you receive a prejudice by them. Nevertheless I cannot repent it, for I imagine that there is something of divinity in a good poem, which is so far from being injurious, that it always promises some advantageous events.

We did not long continue this discourse, for I so vehemently desired to see Adelaïda in her Chamber, that I went thither together with Ydonia, how unwilling soever she were to carry me thither. The Princess beheld her with surprize; yet she was contented only to upbraid her with a glance, by reason that I began to speak immediately, and so passionately laid before her the injustice of my sufferings, that the Princess (Flavian and Ydonia joining their entreaties to my Arguments) after she had kept a short silence; Prince, said she, I had thought I had sufficiently explain'd my self already: nevertheless since you constrain me to reveal yet more of my thoughts, I will tell you ingenuously once for all as much as you can desire, that I had not at all wav'd in preferring you before Cavarin, had all things been to have been dispos'd according to my own election, or that the King my father had left me the entire liberty of my choices.

choice. But you know he had design'd me for the Prince of the Senonois, before I was known to your self, and my heart being engaged to him by a command that ought to regulate my will, I cannot without wounding my honour———No, no, Madam, said I interrupting her, you will not wound it at all, for when you gave your consent to Cavarin, it was not so much out of a mutual inclination, as by the cunning contrivances of Heraclian, the Ambition of my Rival, and the obedience you owed your Father. “And this is so true, replied Flavian, that I do not believe that Heaven would have permitted Taxander to kill Cavarin, but that a Prince worthy of your enjoyment, should deliver you out of the hands of a false and treacherous Lover, who without doubt rather sought the Alliance of Salison, than the charms of Adelaiada. He had reason, replied the Princess: You and I are not both of one opinion, in that, replied Ydonia, for if what Flavian says be true, ought you not to love Cavarin so much the less, and are not you dispens'd withal from testifying a constancy to a fickle and politick lover. I confess, replied the Princess, that such intentions in a Prince not yet espoused, might give me just cause to change; but Ydonia, can I be unfaithful to Cavarin, who has not been so himself to me; and will you oppose my resolution, to preserve that place for him in my heart that he has already obtained? And what will you do, Madam, replied Ydonia, for poor Taxander that dyes for you? “I will give him the friendship, replied the Princess, which he refuses, and I will always refuse him the hatred which he requires from me. When she had uttered these words she blusht, and she had no sooner uttered them but she went into her Closet, and shutting the door after her, left me in a condition whereine you might easily perceive a weighty and pressing grief intermix'd with choler and jealousy.

I shall not precisely rehearse all that my passions then inspired me withal, you already know what were then my thoughts, and it is time indeed to finish a story, the length whereof may prove irksome to your Majesty. I will only tell you, that understanding the resolution of Adelaiada not to be shaken, despair seiz'd upon my heart: so that if the Religion which I embraced at Rome had not forbid me to make away with my self, I had soon found the end of my misfortunes. The morrow after as I rode along to convoy Polyena, Adelaiada appeared to me fairer than ever: But alas! at the same time that I admired her charms, I remembred likewise, overwhelm'd with grief, that I was utterly denyed the enjoyment of them. It was not but that I could have made my application to the Queen of the Nemetians, and have obtained that from her which Adelaiada so obstinately refused me. But besides that I should have displeas'd my Princess, that which was to me more insupportable than my grief, that I thought with my self that I could never live happily with Adelaiada, unless she gave me her hand as an effect of her free consent rather than of her obedience: So that I thought my self the most unfortunate of all Lovers, though it might seem otherwise as to outward appearance. In short, I was not hated by her whom I loved, but was treated with all civility: And those persons who had power to dispose of her, had not only an esteem for me, but desired nothing more than to see me allyed to their Family. Nevertheless these kind circumstances did but augment my disquiet, methought I was like those miserable creatures, who are represented to be famish'd in the midst of abundance: And I had no other consolation but in seeking an honourable death, among the weapons of our Enemies. I did not flatter my self long with these thoughts, for we were no sooner arrived at Samarobriana, but we understood that Pharamond had sent Basogastus to make peace with the Tongres. This news that caus'd a general rejoycing in several Nations, to me appear'd sad and dreadful, for I found that instead of meeting a quick death as I had hopes, I should spin out an unfortunate life: And that I should not lose it but by the effect of a most profound melancholy, that questionless would operate no otherwise than like a slow poyson.

These sad reflections made an impression so powerful, insomuch that the loss of my health and the change of my Physiognomy, were evident marks of my condition. Salison and Polyena took notice of it and were exceedingly troubled: And Adelaiada carrying an obliging languishment in her fair eyes, protested to her dear Ydonia that my indisposition had put her into a strange disorder. “I will assure you, (said she, by what I afterwards understood) that I cannot well tell what to think when I consider the Prince's distemper. Were it dangerous I should be more troubled than you think for; but I must confess, that if I should look upon it as a proof of Taxander's affection; I should be yet less satisfied that he enjoyed not now as perfect a health, as before the Arrival of Megastus. Since his passion is no way displeasing, replied Ydonia, why should you then refuse him the recompence that it deserves? “I thought I had already told you, replied the Princess, that I should render my self unworthy of his Esteem, by reason of that fickleness to which you advise me. That I would preserve a constancy which he should not be able to disapprove, or if he were not content, “tent, yet his reproaches would be at least more easily supported, than a contempt which I should more easily draw upon my self by acting after another manner.

While they were thus arguing together, I mournfully complain'd away the time with Flavian, who like a faithful Friend was immediately mov'd with my griefs and my discoloured countenance. But afterwards thinking to thwart the despair that appear'd in his eyes, with an entire resignation to Adelaiada's will, he rose up in haste, and taking me by the hand, Let us to the Princess, said he, you have rais'd those persuasions in my heart that give me hopes that we shall mollifie hers, and that she will not obstinately hold out against the most respectful passion that ever was. Alas, Flavian, answered I, you know well what your prognostications tend to; but as I look upon the intention of my Friends beyond the event of their counsels, it is so pleasing a thing to see the person that is belov'd, that I am very free to be led to Adelaiada's Apartment.

Thereupon I went to that place to which my destiny call'd me every moment whatever injustice I there suffered, and I was no sooner in the Princess's Antichamber, but I beheld the Stranger that had overturn'd my fortune. At the same time I took notice also that he had in his hand the fatal Box that carried those writings which were to confirm Adelaiada in her scruples, and to strengthen the resolution which she had taken, not to be unconstant to the Prince of the Senonais. At so cruel and unexpected an accident my colour chang'd, infomuch that I was about to have fallen foul upon Megastus, but my reason commanding me to suppress a violence that would put out of frame the respect which I owed my Princess, and was even repugnant to Generosity it self, I made my anger give way; yet was my heart so sadly opprest'd, that finding my self begin to faint, Flavian came presently to me, but as I saw him drawing near me in all haste, “For Heaven's sake, (said I, deeply sighing) “come not near a miserable creature, or if you will not leave him without help, betake “your selves to the fountain of my misfortunes. 'Tis not here so much, as with Adelaiada, “da, that ye may do me offices of kindness, make haste to that Princess, take my part with “the same obliging zeal of which you have given me such ample testimonies, and suffer “me not to be persecuted at a time when a Tomb protects the Prince of the Senonais from “my resentment, and that my quality and a sense of justice prohibit me from taking my “revenge upon Megastus.

Flavian, instead of giving me an answer, enter'd presently into Adelaiada's Chamber, where he had the dissatisfaction to see that the person sent for by the Princess's order, had already the Cabinet, the Key whereof, as I conjectured, was not in the custody of Cavarin's Squire. The officious Roman was desirous to hinder Adelaiada from seeing that which might beget in her any thing of tenderness for a Lover whom death already render'd worthy of compassion, he look'd diligently for what he thought would soonest attract the eyes of the Princess, and having discovered among several Letters and some Bracelets two very rich Boxes, he took one, wherein he found the picture of Adelaiada. The Princess at the same time laying her hand upon the other, and eagerly opening it, found it to be the picture of a young and fair Lady of whom she had no knowledge, and which she looked upon with an apparent despite, however more out of a thought of honour usual enough upon such occasions, than out of any motion of jealousy, having never had that affection for Cavarin which might create that passion. She blush'd therefore, and Flavian perceiving it, “You see, Madam, said he, the fidelity of the Prince of the Senonais, and whether the “Sister of Ariabure did not share in his heart with the Princess of the Nemetians.

Ydonia was overjoyed at that accident, but she durst not yet speak; and Megastus, how surpris'd soever he was, did not omit to take his Master's part: True it is, Madam, said he, that Prince Cavarin had an inclination toward Hertilia, but was he therefore guilty because he lov'd a fair Lady, or for having kept a picture which he could not handsomely restore her? I confess he had been unworthy of your favours, had he made use of it according to Flavian's interpretation; or if that he had entertain'd any hopes of Hertilia, after he had declared to the King of the Nemetians his pretences to the Princess his Daughter. But, Madam, I cannot imagine that ever he acted after that manner; or if he did so, neither the indulgence that is generally favourable to Lovers, nor the respect I owed a Master should hinder me from confessing that there was a perfidiousness in his proceedings. The Princess, instead of making any answer, having open'd one of the Letters, found in effect these words.

Heraclian to the Prince of the Senonois.

Since you have no tye of affection that detains you at Rome, and that you have no kindness for our Ladies, but only so far as they serve your turn, I invite you into our Wood to the conquest of a young heart to which I have design'd you. You will carry the victory without doubt; for having been never before assail'd, nor having learn'd how to defend her self, she can never withstand a Prince always successful in such kind of enterprises. However, do not you believe this victory to be the less considerable for being so easie; you will thereby reap many important advantages; for besides the enjoyment of a fair Princess, you will find in the alliance of a Neighbouring Prince that augmentation of your power which you more earnestly seek after than the charms of a Mistress.

She had no sooner read it, but she believ'd she had formerly seen the beginning of that Ticket in Claudian's hands, afterwards reflecting upon the whole Letter, she began to believe what they had endeavoured to perswade her of the humour of the Prince of the Senonois: Flavian and Ydonia sensibly rejoyc'd, though they said little or nothing, leaving the Princess to her self, who would find enough to ditabuse her credulity. Thus soon after she found another Letter of Heraclian's that incens'd her beyond the former.

Heraclian to the Prince of the Senonois.

I Am very glad you have already made so fair a progress in Adelaiada's heart; but I confess I cannot apprehend how you can sigh, and not be in love; or appear transported, when your mind is in a perfect tranquillity. Will you not believe at length what you so well teach others? Or rather, will you not effectually love a Princess who is so amiable? Alexander is lost, and it is to me the greatest pleasure in the world, to see that your feigned support of my credit should supplant a true passion, notwithstanding the opposition of Placidia and Cleomira.

Upon reading this, Adelaiada, as she afterwards confess'd, perceiv'd all her scruples that oppos'd my happiness to vanish: she chang'd her opinion of Cavarin; and if she read any more of his Letters, it was rather with contempt than anger, considering that as a lovely Lady had so fram'd her answers, it was easie to judge of the Letters that she receiv'd, which Answers did no less demonstrate the infidelity of my Rival.

Herfilia to the Prince of the Senonois.

Your pretended Treaty with the Queen of the Nemetians drives on furiously. Without feigning, Sir, I suspect your delay, and imagine that you would not stay so long at Camilla's House, were Polyena there without Adelaiada. All the world gives a high character of that troublesome Stranger, they applaud her Beauty in all places where I come, which has caus'd in me such a capricious disquiet, that I am as often angry with my self as I blame you, or the person that detains you in the Country. I beseech you return to calm the storms in my heart: shew that you are faithful to me, and that the charms of the Princess whom you see every day, cannot rob me of a conquest which I have design'd to preserve.

Will you still write to me that you love not Adclaiada? And will you never return to Rome, to persuade me to the contrary? Think you that your protestations can entirely satisfy me, when I have so much reason to suspect that you bestow your sighs upon a Rival which makes you prefer Camilla's Wood before the Court of Honorius. Return then I conjure you, preserve the place that you have gained in my heart, and suffer not any further discontents to rise in that place where you still reign, maugre the injustice you do me.

Adelaiada being confirm'd in her opinion, took her picture out of the Box wherein I saw it, and finding withal two answers which she had formerly wrote to Cavarin by Polyena's order, she tore them, and return'd the Cabinet to the Senonois that brought it. Here, Megastus, (said she with a compos'd countenance) you have done me more kindness than I expected: and therefore believing that you were rather a faithful servant than an accomplice of Cavarin, you have more to hope than fear at my hands, provided you never utter syllable more concerning that Prince.

Megastus retired without returning any answer, his shame being so great, that he almost forgot to make his reverences to the Princess in acknowledgment of her Bounty. When I saw him come forth dissatisfied, I felt that consolation which made me recover my spirits, so that I went to the Chamber door to listen after the most important of my concerns; when at the same time Ydonia and Flavian beginning to speak, Well, Madam, they cry'd, know you not now the difference between the Prince of the Tongres's passion, and that of Cavarin? Can you refuse the illustrious Taxander a heart which he has so well merited, and which the wily Cavarin had not won but by surprise? Most certainly, replied she, That, never any thing more, shall satisfy those motions of kindness which I have for the Prince of the Tongres; and to tell you something farther, I must acknowledge that I am very glad of it. 'Twill be convenient then, Madam, if you please, replied Flavian, that Taxander himself, having suffered so much, should be his own witness of this acceptable change, and that he may see that a superiour power has re-established the condition of his fortune by the same persons that overwhelm'd it. But, Flavian, replied she, how shall I endure to see his presence after all this unkindness that I have shewed him? Ah, Madam, (cry'd I, immediately entering, and throwing my self at her feet) it suffices that you suffer me in your presence, and that to render me the most glorious of all Lovers, you at last acknowledge me to be the most passionate and most faithful.

The charming Adelaiada blush'd, beholding me without being able to speak; but after her fair eyes had express'd her mind in my favour, she return'd me this answer, Prince, said she, should I believe all that you would persuade me, should I be absolutely satisfied of your proceedings, can you be satisfied with mine, can you forget Adelaiada's injustice? That which you call injustice, (I replied, transported with joy, and laying my lips to her fair hands, which she endeavoured to draw back) is the most assured mark of my felicity; for in short, dear Princess, since you have so constantly disdain'd my sighs, my complaints and my services, since you have been so inexorable to the continual entreaties and solicitations of Flavian and Ydonia, only to keep your word with a Prince, who, being dead, freed you from so severe an exactness by his death, how solid and durable must Taxander's happiness prove, if you consent that the King of the Nemetians shall confirm it? What Prince, what Lover, what person among them who are most happy, can compare his good fortune with mine, if my Princess do not contradict my claim.

Uttering those words, I beheld Adelaiada with so much love, and Flavian and Ydonia entreated for me in language so vehement and so persuasive, that the Princess quite obliterated all my past sufferings with this obliging answer, Prince, said she, if the Prince my Father gives me liberty to act freely in the most important of all my actions, I will never consent to any but Taxander; and what obedience soever I owe him, I cannot tell whether I could freely submit to his commands were they not impos'd in your favour.

She had no sooner spoken those words but she blush'd; and how innocent soever that mark of affection was, something of a sense of shame made her return into her Closet, whither I durst not follow her, though they are seldom timorous that are happy. Ydonia and Flavian testified their joy upon so pleasing a resolution, which produced so quick a change in my mind; that restoring me to my repose, I recovered the health that my discontents had deprived me of. All Salison's Court appeared wonderfully satisfied; but while they expected suddenly to solemnize with publick festivals and rejoycings the fortunate day that was to crown my love, Polyena whom a tedious indisposition had made to keep her bed, grew worse and worse, and my happiness was delayed by her death, which equally afflicted us both, though it grieved me the more to see the tears that fell from the languishing eyes of my divine Princess. True it is, that I observed with no small consolation, that mine allayed the sadness of Adelaiada, as much as any other Company. At the same time also I shar'd the honour and the content, to dry up her tears in the midst of those persons that were most dear to her, and perhaps she did not open her heart with more freedom to her faithful Ydonia, than to the happy Prince that so passionately loved her, and with such pleasing hopes had engag'd his affection to her.

But besides that I could not yet pretend to the felicity that was promised me, in regard that prudence and decency would not permit me, to mention any such thing in a time of affliction, there came news also that snatch'd me away from my Princess. It was reported over all Europe, that Attalus Lieutenant to Alaric in Italy, had usurp'd the Sovereign power, which was only committed to him in trust, and in contempt of Honorius and his Master, had taken upon him the name of Emperour. I looked upon that piece of insolency with disdain, being vexed to see that the Son of the great Theodosius, should so patiently suffer such a publick dishonour. Nevertheless my Love prevailing over all those considerations, there wanted some particular injury to draw me from Samarobrina: And therefore when I heard all Attalus's proceedings more exactly repeated to me, a sense of honour and affection called me to succour the Princess my Sister. In short, I understood that after the taking of Rome, at the same time that Autalpb and Wallia made their Applications to Placidia, and Theodolinda, Attalus paid his devoirs to Cleomira, and without considering the inequality of birth, rais'd his pretences to the daughter of a King, puft up questionless with the prosperity of the Goths, as well as out of his natural haughtiness that afterwards rendred him famous.

Cleomira had entertained the testimonies of his affection with that contempt which they deserv'd, but the absence of Alaric and Wallia so increased the boldness of that undeserving Lover, that he exercis'd an open Tyranny over the Princess of the Tongres: for not being able to move her, he caus'd her to be shut up in a Tower whence she was not to be set at liberty, till she should give her consent to marry him. I could not hear of that strange hardness which so dear a Sister was forc'd to suffer, without a boiling impatience to revenge the injury done her, And that which redoubled so legitimate an ardency of my courage, was that I saw my Princess infinitely concern'd at the news, and that she was not only mov'd to compassionate Cleomira's misfortune, but (notwithstanding her wonted moderation) she seem'd to be incens'd against her persecutor. To go on therefore with my design, I chose out of the Tongres and Nemetians the stoutest Soldiers and most able to follow me, and march directly toward the Province of the Romans to joyn with Artabure, not questioning but he was ready to march to the relief of his distressed Country. It is not necessary, Madam, for me to repeat, what that valiant Roman and my self perform'd together. You know that Attalus was overthrown and punished, that Honorius was re-established, after which, the famous revolt of Heracian covered the Mediterranean with such a prodigious Navy, that posterity may well doubt the truth of the Story. I will only tell you that after I had deliver'd the Princess my Sister, and had staid some few days with Honorius, I was desirous to return into Gallia, having nothing else in my mind but the charms of Adelaiada.

To that purpose I repass'd the Alps with Cleomira, and understanding that Marsandus was but in a bad condition of health, we travelled hard toward his dominions, where we arriv'd just soon enough, to pay our last duties to so good a father. The King of the Nemetians obligingly testified, how much he was concern'd in our affliction, but when we expected upon such an occasion, to have received some marks of Adelaiada's remembrance of us, we understood that she was gone from Samarobrina. For Salison, to give the King of the Franks some testimony of his acknowledgment and friendship, had desired her to go and see Polixena; that since she had lost her Mother, she might remain for some time with a Princess of her merit. This with other news that I received at the same time, namely, that Constance was also in Pharamond's Camp, made me resolve to take his part, it not being in my power to live peaceably at home, when I had so many opportunities near me to signalize my self, and so many Princes assembled together, that every day acquired new honour. To this intent I rais'd what forces I could in a short time, and Cleomira having a desire also to see Polyxena, and to tie her self in friendship to Adelaiada, I resolv'd to take a journey which I imagined with my self could not be unprofitable.

Soon after my arrival I was better pleas'd with the resolution I had taken; for the Princesses of the Franks and Nemetians receiv'd the Princess of the Tongres with all the demonstrations of esteem and affection she could have expected; and I in my divine Adelaiada met with the same thoughts of favour and kindness also which she had for the fortunate Taxander when he departed from Samarobrina to joyn with Artabure. But at the very time that I intended to make known to the fair Princess my impatience to see her Queen of the Tongres, a report was nois'd through the Army of the Franks, that the Turingiens were about to leave the Camp: whereupon it was resolv'd at a Council of War, that we should advance toward the Entrenchments in Battel Array to favour Amalazontha's design. The success of that Action has enclin'd to Pharamond, though contrary to what the Franks really expected, they could not terrifie your Forces, though forsaken by such a Body of their Confederates; only they had this good fortune thereby not to be set upon at unawares by those who might have easily surpris'd them, while they attacqued the Franks, as they did contrary to all probability. For my part, Madam, I cannot tell whether I fought with bad or good fortune; for I have lost my liberty, and find my self debarred from what I love. But besides that I have not been vanquish'd but by the most formidable of all your Captains, I shall yet receive this more obliging consolation, if I may add the advantage of being instrumental to procure the peace of so many Hostile Nations, to the Honour which I have had to be so long heard by the most beautiful Queen in the world.

Thus the King of the Tongres concluded his Story, with the rehearsal whereof Rosamond appear'd infinitely satisfied; and Balamir, who would have interrupted him toward the end, durst he have attempted it before the Queen of the Cimbrians, modestly avoided the praises which Taxander had given him, and generously return'd them upon that valiant Prince: and certainly those three illustrious persons had still continued their converse, but that the return of Varanez was spread abroad in the Camp, which created new subject of discourse upon those wonderful accidents which his travels had brought to light. It was not only observ'd, that that Prince was attended by a far greater train of people than that which followed him before he departed for Francfort, but more especially men look'd upon a certain person that rode by his side: his Arms were plain, but well polish'd: his Helmet was shadowed with a fair large plume of black Feathers, and his Viser being put up (for he was talking to the Prince) discovered a haughty and warlike countenance, though the deep sadness that displayed it self much eclips'd it's natural fierceness. This illustrious Stranger was no sooner alighted, but he was by Varanez conducted to his own Quarters, with a respect which that Prince would not have shewed but to some extraordinary personage: and no sooner had the first complements pass'd between them which are usual upon the like occasions, but Varanez went to visit the incomparable Princess whom he ador'd: he testified first of all the trouble which afflicted him for not being at the Battel, and then he gave her to understand that he would no more hazard an opportunity of fighting in her detence. I shall also have the advantage, Madam, (said he, pursuing his discourse) no more to fight in your Army as a single Volontier; for the Emperour of the East, who is sensible of the interest of an alliance with the King of Persia, to strengthen the side which I have taken, has sent me those Forces which, as you have questionless heard, took their march through Germany, and brought a terrour upon all the Countries where they came, without declaring their design. And as certain it is that Pulcheria, out of her respect of a Lover whom she highly esteems, has also joyn'd twelve thousand men to that Army, which reinforcement Martian commands, while Varanez at the head of the rest will be in a condition conformable to my quality, to signalize the zeal which he has for the charming Queen of the Cimbrians.

Rosamond receiv'd the Prince of Persia with all the civility that she could think due to the Heir of one of the greatest Potentates in the world: but it was not possible for her to be sensible of any joy, or to shew it in her countenance upon the news which he brought, how advantageous soever it seem'd to be. Nevertheless, as she acted always with great caution, she hearken'd to Varanez with that acknowledgment that prudence in some measure oblig'd her to shew him, after which she inform'd her self of Constance's health, and of the cause that stay'd Martian at Francfort: “The Roman whom you mention, Madam, will suddenly see “a revolution in the condition of his fortune, if we may believe a great person whose fame “already spreads it self over all the East, and the Lover of Pulcheria, who has not here what
“so powerfully attracts him hither as my self, is gone to meet certain Officers who have left “the Forces that are coming from Constantinople. For my part, instead of absenting my “self upon that consideration, I had not power to make any stop in my journey to examine “those

“those things that doubtless deserv’d a curious inquisition. ’Tis most certain, replied Balamir, that you have seen, by report, persons very extraordinary. But more certain it is, (replied Varanez, turning himself to Rosamond) that what I now see has made me forget what I have seen. There was no such ground of astonishment other where, coldly replied the Prince of the Huns, and yet perhaps it would do better before the Queen to talk of some Stranger, than of those charms which, as you say, busie all your thoughts. I cannot tell, fiercely replied Varanez, whether the Queen of the Cimbrians have made you the trustee of her thoughts, but I should be very unhappy should I not dare to utter my passion, since she is the original from whence it springs. Persons of my humour, replied Rosamond a little perplex’d, are yet more unfortunate, finding themselves constrain’d by the capriciousness of their destiny to hearken to such discourse. Madam, replied the haughty Prince, though your fortune did not oblige you to that condescension whereof you complain, mine perhaps does with some appearance of justice, nor do I believe that any Princess in the world need to be offended, if Varanez has a design to advance her to the Throne of Persia. I confess, Sir, replied Rosamond, that such pretences as those cannot be accounted injuries, nevertheless, as content is not always to be found in the advance of fortune, there are some that may prefer the quality they are us’d to, before a more splendid manner of living.

Balamir and Taxander then taking their turns, maintain’d the Queen of the Cimbrians’s opinion; but though the difference of thoughts might have prolonged the dispute, nevertheless it continued not long. Balamir and Taxander retired as soon as the impatient Varanez was departed, which he did the sooner, not being willing to shew his extravagancy before the Queen, nor to brook a retort. Away therefore he went to the Princes of the Lombards, where he found the Queen of Turingia and Ambiomer, and as he was very much in love, but receiv’d very little satisfaction, his disquiet and vexation soon appear’d. After the first complements had pass’d, his haughty humour hindring him from putting any constraint upon himself, he began to talk of Rosamond, and addressing his speech to the two Princesses who best knew her: “Have you not taken notice, said he to Amalazontha, “that those marks of Grandeur, that appear in the looks and behaviour of Rosamond, are hid under much moderation, that they seem to shew a kind of fierceness, and that the heart of that Princess is very little capable of a noble ambition, since she is not yet mov’d with the offers of Varanez? I wish she were sensible of them, replied Amalazontha blushing, and to wish like a real Sister, I wish she were once Queen of Persia. But you hear, replied the Princess of the Lombards, that Prince Varanez tells you, that she her self does not desire it. How, Madam, said he, interrupting her, can you approve the Queen of the Cimbrians conduct, in that which concerns my passion? Sir, replied she, I am apt to think that the Heir of a great King may offer a considerable establishment, and yet not be able to bequeath a desire to accept it. And I guess that the lustre of such a Princess does not always dazzle the eyes of those that are tempted with it. It may be there is some difference, replied the haughty Varanez, between that Prince whom you mean, and the Prince of Persia, as I am assur’d there is between the Dominions they are to inherit. True it is, pursued the Princess of the Lombards, that we have no King in all Germany who may compare with the Successor of Cyrus; I confess also that the Prince whom I could name, has vernish’d his noble actions with perfidiousness, and that several hearts have been prepossess’d against him with an aversion that you have no ground to believe. ’Tis not enough, said Ambiomer, then for a great beauty to be prepossess’d against a Lover, it behoves her also not to be kind to another.

Concluding those few words, he could not chuse but cast a look upon Amalazontha, and give free passage to a sigh, but for fear it should be taken notice of, he continued in this manner, When the prejudice does not arise from the parties themselves, is there no need to fear the change of Climate, distance of place, or strangeness of manners, to which they can hardly sometimes submit? Not at all, replied Varanez, *for that Princess who goes to receive the Homage of a Nation, is so far from finding her self oblig’d to become subject to custom that may be troublesome to her, that she has the pleasure of causing those to be receiv’d that please her: but I see very well that Ambiomer is not a person that will justify the dispute on the behalf of the Princess. At least,* replied he, he will never oppose what is just and equitable; and therefore without considering what his Birth denies him, he will only regard that wherewith reason shall inspire him.

As he had a noble heart, and saw that Varanez had given him a close nip before a Princess whom he lov’d, and before a Princess that he did not deime to have any unkindness for him, he spoke those words with a furly utterance, which the two great Beauties observ’d, and therefore knowing the haughty humour of the Prince of Persia, they took their turn, and so dextrously maintain’d the argument, that neither Ambiomer nor Varanez had any opportunity opportunity to speak farther in it. The Prince of Persia soon after took his leave, but before he return'd to the Stranger in his own Quarters, he gave a visit to the King of Suevia, whom Albisinda tended with all the tenderness and diligence, that could be observ'd toward the best Father in the world. As for Ambiomer, he had no sooner left Agelmond and the Sister of Agelmond, but he went and shut himself up in his Chamber, to the end he might ponder upon the behaviour of the two Princesses, whose words and Actions he had taken exact notice of. He had understood with sufficient vexation, that the Queen of the Turingians had received Prince Sumnon after a very obliging manner; indeed the passionate Amalazontha, having her fancy taken up with the Idea of Pharamond, and hearing toward the end of the Combat, that he was entred the Camp of the Cimbrians, deceived by that Air of resemblance, that might possibly be between two Brothers, and which in an instant pierc'd both her eyes and her imagination, had taken Prince Sumnon for the Prince of the Franks, and entertained the offers of his service with a pleasing surprize, which usually causes an unexpected joy. Nor durst she change her manner of behaviour when she saw her error, for fear she should appear humourfome and ingratul, or at least for fear of disclosing those thoughts that she kept concealed: Inso much that having treated the young brother of Pharamond with an extraordinary civility; they among the Turingians that took Ambiomer's part, advertis'd him of it, as they let him know every thing else, that might concern the Queen their Mistress. Alas! (said he, reflecting upon that circumstance of his misfortune) Is it then in vain that I have fought to uphold Amalazontha's interest, when she was about to send away her forces from the side which she had embraced. To what purpose did I expose my life to save her liberty, when the Franks victorious over their enemies, were ready to have seiz'd upon her? Must I be no less unfortunate in the Camp than I was in Turingia, while with resentment I behold my self desis'd by those, that owe their acknowledgment as well to my services as to my passion? Ah, Amalazontha, unjust Amalazontha, thou deniest Ambiomer thy heart because he has not a Crown to offer thee, and yet ingratul Princess considerest not, that a Soldier renders himself worthy to reign over the Kingdom which he preserves, and that Ambiomer could not defend thy Kingdom, without shewing himself able to subdue other Kingdoms under thy subjection.

While he thus complains of the Queen of Turingia, and from time to time fills his imagination with the sweetness of the Lombard Princess; the King of Suevia receives the Prince of Persia with all the respect, that the natural ruggedness of his disposition would permit him to shew, demonstrating at the same time all the joy, that he could be capable of after the loss of the battel, which had been fought by his advice. For he was perswaded that his pity could never be overcome, so long as Varanez was engaged thereto by his love, for whose sake as being the heir of Idisgeiles and Theodosius's Ally, all the East would not fail to be in Arms. That which he understands, concerning the forces coming from Constantinople, confirms his hopes, and the better to taste the pleasure of his expectations, he conjures Varanez to repeat the news so acceptable to him with all the circumstances. The Prince of Persia who came to tell him, what he had already made known to the Queen of the Cimbrians, took his turn: And notwithstanding the impatience of his humour, pursued his discourse in this manner.

Albeit the unfortunate Constance enjoyed but little health, though deep enough plung'd in melancholy when we arrived at Fracfort, however he received us with all the marks of satisfaction; testifying to us that the very sight of us, had suspended the greatest part of his grief. We first began to talk of our particular adventures, and when we were constrained to intermix our thoughts, concerning the sides that we had taken, we did it as succinctly as might be, to avoid an entertainment which would not have proved conformable to that friendship, whereof we gave one another such obliging testimonies. But our converse was better fram'd, when we went about to comfort the afflicted Constance. And as usually great courages are not touched, but with a violent Love or an unmeasurable ambition, we laboured to moderate those two passions in a heart, wick in outward appearance seem'd to be severely beset with both.

Martian for his part ingenuously declared, how free and willing he was to renounce those high employments, which he held under the Emperour of the East, being commands little different from those which Constance enjoyed in the Court of Honorius. For my part, I was utterly against that self conceited obstinacy, that renders us unfortunate after the loss of the party beloved, for as I was one that had seen the fair Athenais in the Arms of Theodosius, and yet after that recovered my self out of the abundance of my sorrows, I endeavoured to perswade the disconsolate Lover of Placidia, patiently to suffer the happiness of the King of the Goths, and to seek for that which I had found in the beauties of Rosamond, from the charms of some other Princess. Constance appeared little moved with my discourse, but at the time that he was intending by my persuasion, to shew me more at large, that what I propos'd was a remedy both irksome and impossible, we were advertis'd that five or six strangers who had pass'd the Mein, were landed with some Ladies in their company, among which she that appeared to be of the greatest quality, was a perfect miracle. They spoke of her with admiration, and averr'd that only Rosamond or Polixena, could preserve in her presence the same which they had acquired, nor that they themselves had that advantage over her beauty, which in justice ought to be allowed her over others: Those extraordinary praises rais'd in us a desire, to see whether they were lawfully due: And indeed we had no sooner beheld that fair Stranger, and observ'd the lineaments of her face, as much as the lustre of her beams would permit us, but maugre those passions that prepossessed us, we all three concluded, that neither Pulcheria nor the Sister of Honorius, nor the celebrated Athensis discovered any thing more charming; and that neither the Queen of the Cimbrians nor the Princess of the Franks, would prove a conquest of less time or less difficult. We made our thoughts known to the most incomparable Stranger, so that after we had respectfully and in a Courtly manner, manifested the surprize wherewith she had astonish'd us, Constance offer'd her an Apartment in Pharamond's Palace, and oblig'd her also to accept it. So soon as she had rested her self we went to her Chamber, and as Lovers usually flatter themselves, and hope for success in all new attempts which they propose, I endeavour'd to persuade that charming beauty that I was come to visit her, and to invite her to this Camp, imagining that her beauty might free me from some of my Rivals. I thought that it might not be impossible, but that Balamir who was the most formidable might change a second time: I considered that he had no Crown to claim, that he had several great Kings for his Rivals, and that having forgot Hunnimonda, as having utterly lost the hopes of enjoying her, he might cease to love the Queen of the Bohemians, when he should find so many obstacles in the way of his pretences, and found the chains he wore, to be as noble and no less weighty.

The Stranger blush'd when I spoke of the Queen of the Cimbrians, and what grandeur of courage soever I had observ'd in her Air and manner of movement, I took notice that she could not hear the name of Rosamond pronounc'd, without manifesting a discontent that might pass for a kind of passion, unworthy of so fair a soul. True it is that a Calm was suddenly resettled in her countenance, and that in the following discourse she spoke so much to the advantage of Rosamond, that I began to think that it was not emulation, which had produced the trouble that I had observ'd, but that of necessity it arose from some other cause, which I understood not.

While I laboured better to inform my self, or at least to discover her Name, and perhaps also the principal adventures of that fair Stranger, I was advertis'd that several persons clad after the manner of the East, desired to be admitted to see me: and as if destiny had taken pleasure to lead me from one surprize to another, I was no sooner entred into the Hall where I was expected, but I saw five or six Officers of the Army, comely in their aspect and magnificently habited. The chief of them all was a person whose years rendred him venerable, who no sooner perceived me but he mov'd toward me with such a grace, as without doubt seem'd to have something of Majesty. And without studying to make any of those long complements, with which so many people think themselves oblig'd to perplex Princes; he saluted me, uttering his words with such an air, as rendred him worthy that respect which we had for him. Immediately he related to me the cause of his Arrival, Sir, said he, the Emperour having intelligence, that you were gone to the Banks of the Rhine, to signalize your self either in the Army of the Cimbrian Queen, or of the King of the Franks, commanded a considerable force to march into these Countries. They have order to take that side which you have chosen, that by such a reinforcement you may appear the more considerable among Nations, so far remote from the potent Monarchy, over which you are one day to reign.

Having said these few words he presented the rest of the strangers, whose names he told me and their employments; and while they were relating to me several particulars, concerning the Court at Constantinople, and of the assistance which was sent me, I observ'd that the old Officer look'd very earnestly upon Constance and Martian who were standing by me, and that afterwards he still cast his eyes more wistly upon the former. After he had considered a while, he desired to know the Roman's Name, and being told it, he perceiv'd enough (doubtless by the correspondency between the Lineaments which he had examin'd, and observations which I believe he had made) to know that which concern'd the life of so great a personage who had been the support of the Eastern Empire. He was thereupon surpris'd all of an instant, and addressing himself to me with more vehemency than I could have expected from a person of his age and humour: "Sir, said he, when the famous Leontine shall have let you see the admirable experiments of an assault which he makes his sole employment and delight, I shall not fail to assure you that his rules are more infallible than the greatest part of the world believes, and that they are not to be accounted impostures, but among those people who have but little knowledge.

At those words I made no doubt but that the Stranger was the Learned Theon, whose reputation is spread over all the East; and I was no sooner confirm'd in my conjecture, but I shewed new civilities to that wise Greek, and gave him liberty at length to explain himself at large, which he thus performed: "Sir, said he, you shall soon find that my knowledge has made me undertake a journey which my age might have excus'd; nevertheless, as I foresee important revolutions, and that the whole world is about to put on a new change: I am come into a Climate where will suddenly be laid the foundation of many great and famous Kingdoms. 'Tis in these parts that I aim to labour with some success for the side which you have taken, while Melusina, who is coming to the Camp of the Franks, shall to my counsels add her own cares, whether it be effectually true, that Heaven has promis'd so much Glory to a Nation, of which she has already written to me things altogether wonderful. If you doubt the truth of what I say, let those Officers speak, they know it was my self that obliged them to leave the Army, and that I caus'd them to make haste hither, promising to shew them at Francfort three of the greatest Potentates in the world, nor have I deceiv'd them, added he with an extraordinary vehemency, no, Sir, I have not deceiv'd them; for here they see, as well as I, where that Prince who is one day to rule the flourishing Monarchy of the Persians, stands in the middle between two great personages, to whom Heaven has promis'd the possession of two Empires. All the company seem'd surpris'd at this discourse except Constance, whose heart could not be touch'd with any future event, since the loss of Placidia. When Theon perceiving us enclin'd to listen more attentively, "Wonder not, said he, at my boldness, I utter my mind freely, not seeing any person that I have reason to suspect; nor do I speak so positively, but upon the real assurances which I have gained by long study, and from Leontin's Memoirs which I diligently preserve.

Martian fearing then lest Theon should discover some particulars that might render him suspected in Theodosius's Court, or perhaps not willing to shew any curiosity that might be taken for a mark of ambition, put the Stranger by degrees upon a discourse of mine and Constance's future Adventures: for my part I gave him presently to understand that it did not much concern me to know what would befall me hereafter; for I thought that a successor of the famous Cyrus, that a Prince who believ'd himself perhaps not inferior in greatness of courage to his renowned Predecessor, ought not to be subject to any such desire; but that on the contrary, acting upon all occasions with a courage worthy of his Dignity, he might with justice believe himself to be the Master of his own fortune. It was not so with Constance, who thought he lay under a burthen of ill fortune, and that he had nothing more to look after: "Speak on, sage Theon, said he sighing, but speak without giving your self the trouble to make the best of things, I am an unfortunate person whom all the anger of incens'd Heaven cannot render more miserable.

After those few words he held his peace, and with a countenance wherein was to be discovered nothing but a profound sadness, without any symptom of fear or hope, he gave ear to the old man, who returned him this answer, "Sir, said he, so happy is your destiny; that I make no question but you will be suddenly perfectly satisfied therein. The honour of being advanc'd to the Throne of the Cesars is but one part of that felicity which you are promis'd: you shall sit with full content upon that Throne, and that you may have no cause to sigh in the midst of that pomp which environs you, you shall behold sitting by your side a fair and great Princess which shall render you that recompence which you have so well merited, and which you have so long waited for, without any hopes of enjoying it.

Constance, whose heart was not yet capable of so pleasing a faith, being shut up against all comfort, sigh'd instead of returning an answer, or seeming to be perswaded; and therefore that he might not disoblige Theon, he chang'd the subject of the discourse, and presently after desired the Stranger to take his repose, which could not but be very necessary after so long a journey. To that purpose he order'd Valerius to take care of him, not being willing to leave me, and when he thought he had sufficiently rested himself, he went to see him in his own Apartment, and by degrees engag'd him to give a visit to the unknown Beauty whom I have already mention'd, I went before to her Chamber, together with Martian, where we staid till Constance came and brought Theon along with him. The old man immediately seem'd surpris'd at the Beauty of so fair a person, which we took notice of; and to know his thoughts upon so pleasing an occasion, we put him at first upon a subject far less considerable, and of which we thought he could better acquit himself: "You must needs acknowledge, Theon, said I, that if we may judge of the favours which we expect from Heaven, by those which we have already receiv'd, you may without doubt promise this Lady a long series of happy events.

I said no more, finding that the knowing Greek was not so much attentive to what I said, as eager to behold the Stranger's countenance; and I observ'd in his those different alterations, that intermix'd some kind of discontent with the joy that appeared in it from time to time. The unknown Beauty, out of an effect of modesty, blushed, turning her eyes toward me, and perceiving that the earnest contemplation of the old man was not thereby disturbed: "Methinks, said she smiling, that it would be more delightful to hear you relate your own Adventures, than to see you take the trouble to prognosticate my fortune. 'Tis not without cause that I speak this: and to shew you, that without the help of your Art, I know many things that concern you, instead of desiring to be inform'd any thing concerning the Court of Constantinople, as the Prince of Persia and Martian may do, I only long to know some tydings of Alexander, and the fair Hypassia your Daughter, and of the continual conversation of Orestes with the Learned and Pious Cyril.

These names pronounced so unexpectedly, striking Theon into an amaze, suspended his present contemplation, insomuch that breaking silence, and beholding the Stranger, Would to God, Madam, said he sighing, that Hypassia's destiny were absolutely like yours; and that that unfortunate Maid, having undergone so many misfortunes, might at length be happy by means of some fortunate resolution. But, Madam, as I desire this happiness without having any hopes thereof, instead of speaking of a person so dear to me, and whom I see threatened with so terrible death, I only wait with an absolute submission what the supreme cause of all things shall ordain, whose effects it is in our will as little to regulate, as in our power to create.

The sage Greek not only held his peace after those words, but also spoke but very little during the remainder of that converse, nor was he so earnest in contemplating the Physiognomy of the unknown person; whether it were, that he had observed enough, or that his mind began to be overcharg'd with grief.

Towards the Evening I conferr'd with Martian, Theon, and the Officers that were newly come; when Constance, who had taken Pharamond's part, seeing so many people assembled in my Chamber, avoided being there, believing that there would be nothing said there but what concern'd our Army, and the reinforcement which the Emperour of Constantinople had sent. After we had examined all things, and taken such orders as were requisite, I went toward Constance's Apartment, but met him by the way in a Gallery more discompos'd than he was wont to be. He was discoursing with a woman in whom the Stranger seem'd to me to put no small confidence: and no sooner were Martian, Theon, and my self met together, but Constance addressing himself to the old man, "Sige Theon, said he, if you have gathered any knowledge from those fair Lineaments which you observ'd, I wish you would tell us what judgment you make thereupon. "In my opinion, said he, I have already given you a general essay: but to express my self more precisely, till I can better satisfy my self, I must tell you, if I am not very much deceiv'd, that the Stranger of whom we discourse, is a person in every thing extraordinary. Her thoughts are as much elevated, as her Beauty is accomplish'd, fortune will give her none but terrible blows, yet will offer her none but excelling favours, but the greatness of her courage will bring her out of many dangers that shall appear to be inevitable, and the haughty Gallantry of her Soul shall fix her in the highest degrees of exaltation; I am not yet assur'd whether the greatest part of these things have not already happened. But this I know, that after a famous interchange of misfortune and prosperity, this fair person will be as happy as she deserves to be. "Ah, Theon, cryed the woman that stood by Constance, how celestial is your knowledge! You seem to be less inspired from Heaven, than inform'd only by the light of your own judgment: and to justify the truth of what you have said, I have nothing more to declare, but that it is the peerless Bellamira of whom you have been all this while discoursing. You know, Sir, without doubt, pursued she, addressing her speech to me, that the Emperour Honorius sigh'd full often at her feet, and that she looked upon his Throne but with an indifferent eye, and that she never made any other use of her power over him, but only to give him wholesome advice for the good of his Dominions. You know “ know that the Rebel Heracian took her by force away from Ravenna and carried her in-

 “ to Africa, that she was there exposed to those violences, from which she could not free her “ self but by performing a noble exploit, and killing her Tyrant heroically. But neither “ is Honorius the great Prince, that has offered Crowns to Bellamira, nor Heracian the only “ Ravisher, whose persecutions she has suffered: And I could relate to you things more won“ derful, and more agreeable with Theon’s judgment; had I time to let you know the in“ comparable Bellamira. And therefore I must confess that Theon’s last words put me to a “ stand, for I cannot see how Bellamira, can be so fortunate as he has promised her to be.
 “ True it is that her courage has constantly resisted the most rude assaults of a fierce Enemy,
 “ and that she never shewed her strength, but when she was assail’d by a bold hand, and I “ know there is one sort of injury that she cannot patiently endure. She has already defend“ ed her self, against an outrage of the same nature, she sees also others in pursuit of her e“ very moment, so that as it is impossible to change what is past and gone, or that for the “ future she can suffer an injustice so heinous to her; I cannot imagine how a heart so nice
 “ as hers, can ever enjoy a perfect tranquillity. By what I see, Sage Theon, replyed Con- stance, you have the goodness to make the best, of what your predictions threaten of severe and harsh. But you shall meet with some unhappy and miserable people, whom fortune too obliquately terrifies, to give them any ground of hopes to be ever at peace with her, by vertue of those changes with which you flatter them. For my own part, added he sighing, who pretend to no share in any thing that promises me consolation, I have heard you more out of respect to your person, than out of any inclination to believe what you foretel most pleasing to me. The losses which I have had are so great, so cruel, that I shall never find but only in my Tomb, that end of my sufferings, which you would have me expect from some favourable change.

But oh! wonderful! He had no sooner uttered these words, when he was told that an Esquire of Constantine’s, desired to be admitted: where upon taking notice that my presence caused him to act with a circumspection which our friendship might have dispens’d with,
 I complained to him of it, and not only oblig’d him to admit the King of Britain’s Envoy, but also to read in my hearing a Letter which he received, and whereat we were all surprised as well as he; being much to this effect.

Constantine to Constance.

I shall render myself your prisoner so soon as possibly I can, in the mean time, having most important News to communicate to you, which I cannot bring my self so soon as I would; I have sent this Messenger to inform you; that is to say of the death of Antalph. Yes Sir, the King of the Goths is dead, and the illustrious Placidia is now in a condition, to recompence her faithful Constance, could I defer the relation of so happy a change? Receive it I beseech you with that satisfaction, which you ought to be sensible of, and if you look upon it as a thing that has happened by the death of a person that was dear to Placidia, consider him as the person that ravished your happiness from you, and let not the generosity of your soul, disquiet the content of your heart.

I must confess, said the King of Suevia, that the Britain arrived very opportunely for Con- stance’s consolation, and that Theon could not have wished for an accident more just, to Authorize his predictions. ’Tis most certain, replyed Varanez, that this was a very extraordinary precedent, and as such a one, we looked upon it with astonishment, every one testifying his surprise as they were variously affected. Theon, notwithstanding that moderation, of which long experience had made him Master, seemed to be not a little glad: and Constance having much ado to believe the news, that brought with it so great a change in his life; not only read Constance’s Letter over and over, but to put himself out of all doubt from the Esquire’s mouth; Will you do us the kindness, said he, to give us a more distinct relation of a persons decease, the circumstances whereof your Master seems to have committed to your care. The Britain then preparing to obey, related to us (though not so succinctly as I shall do) that the Goths incens’d, that Antalph through the persuasions of Placidia would no more wage war against the Romans; rebel’d against their Prince, and slew him as he was preparing to reduce them to obedience. And while he recounted other particulars of that accident, we discovered certain beams of hope and joy streaming upon Constance’s face, and dissipating that gloomy cloud of long sadness that covered it before. His forehead appeared more serene, his hair eyes more lively and sparkling, however he could not forbear sighing, so true it was that his soul was not yet capable of tasting pleasure without some perplexity. Passionately do I love the Queen of the Goths, said he, I fancy her to my self to be fairer than ever she was, and I find her now in a condition to make good to the Emperour her promise, so infinitely honourable to me. But if the satisfaction which I receive from so sweet and pleasing a thought, were without a mixture of grief, it would be unworthy of Constance's heart. It beboves me to mourn, in short I must bewail Autalph's misfortune, out of a sence of humanity that requires us, to have compassion upon all those that are miserable. I am sorry for a Prince that has lived in good correspondence with Honorius, and had a high value for Placidia: And though Autalph's misfortune had no reason, to disturb the happiness which is befallen me, may I not for the Queen of the Goths sake be sorry? Who can assure me that she has preserved at Barcinnona for a miserable creature, that affection which the Princess Placidia had at Rome, for the fortunate Constance whose services were not unprofitable, either to his Country or to his Emperour? Who can assure me that Placidia, who truly loved the King her Spouse, and who labour'd incessantly to strengthen that legitimate love in her breast, hath not quite expelled from her mind, that kindness which she was forced to banish? In short, can Placidia forget a Prince, that rather chose to see his people rebel against him and to lose his life, than to displease her by invading her Country. No, no, let me not flatter my self in this particular, I know too well the malice of fortune, to suffer my self to be deceived with this seeming reconciliation, without having cause to fear some new misfortune, which will be however so much the more insupportable, by how much the less I am accusom'd to it. I will assure you, said I very impatiently, you are more unjust at this time, than that blind Deity of which you complain. She begins to favour you, and it seems to be you your self who will not be at peace with her, while you poison her favours at first with a cruel prognostication, which makes you have an apprehension of those evils which are no way threaten'd you. I am of the same opinion with the Prince of Persia, said Martian, that you ought not so much to study how to afflict your self, but considering the correspondency between the King of England's Letter, and Theon's predictions. to expect a famous issue of so happy a beginning. Had I not labour'd with all possible exactness, replied the ancient Sage, and were not the observations which the learned Leontin has made, absolutely conformable to mine; I had spoken more sparingly of your adventures, the most important in the world. But as I have often made the same computations, and still arrived at the same knowledge by different ways; I make no longer any doubt but that all things, will fall out as I have said.

Those words uttered by a person of profound learning, and already confirm'd in part by the experiment we had seen, having something resettled Constance's thoughts, I told him, how glad I was to leave him more happy than I found him, and that I would be gone as soon as I had seen Bellamira, and had offered her my service to conduct her to Rosamond. "Sir, replied the Stranger who was in our company, if you please to credit me I would not, that you should mention any such thing to her: For to tell you truth; though Bellamira has an infinite esteem for the Queen of the Cimbrians, there are several weighty reasons, that will not permit her to wait upon her, or it may be to hear her discourse with any great satisfaction. You would be of the same opinion, were I permitted to let you understand them, as well as I may declare to Cleon without failing in my fidelity; that it was at Hippo where Bellamira heard tidings of Alexander, in the house of the great and venerable Austin, to whom the famous Cyril had written concerning him. Those words having caused me to change my resolution, I only took my leave of Bellamira, without making her any proposal.

After which I had no sooner embraced Constance, but I took horse: And being followed by some of the Greek Officers that intermix'd with mine, I return'd hither, while Martian and Theon went to meet the Army, that is come from Constantinople.

"But, Sir, replied the King of Suevia, I hear you say nothing of the Knight that came along with you, and who by the description they have given me of him, deserves to have some place in your relation. "Had I not seen at Francfort persons so extraordinary, replied Varanez, you might have some reason to accuse me of a silence, which would have been so unjust: But Sir, as in all my journey I have met with strange accidents, and for that it was but this day that I met this stranger; it seems to me soon enough to speak of him now.

This morning entring into the Forest, I met there a Knight, whose haughty and fierce Aspect did no way displease me. His Arms besprinkled with blood, shewed him not to have been long out of some dangerous encounter, so that being come near me; and having after certain complements demanded of me, whether I had not seen a Chaiot; I answered him No: And then farther pursuing my address, Though I can tell you no news of what you desire to know, permit me to give you other satisfaction, and to conduct you to the Camp of the Cimbrians, where you shall find that repose and assistance which is necessary for you. I am troubled, replied he, that it is not in my power to accept these obliging offers, but I cannot go to a place where I must see one of my most implacable enemies in high esteem. I will rather betake my self to the Army of the Franks, that I may meet opportunities to encounter a person whom I mortally hate, since he hath made me miserable, who at the same time had in my hands wherewith to make me absolutely happy.

As he concluded those words, a certain Knight who was hid before by a Tuft of Trees, appear'd in an instant before us, and he no sooner knew the Stranger that spoke to me, but he laid his hand upon his Sword, and challeng'd him with a menacing look: Perfidious Traitor, he cryed, thou shalt die, unworthy of thy Birth, and our Friendship. He could utter no more he was so transported with choler, and he flew impetuously into the midst of us to attacque his Enemy, without regarding the number of Defendants that might oppose him: I would have oppos'd his fury, when the other unknown person seeing my intention, Stop, said he, and instead of seeking another dangerous revenge, accept one of the greatest alliances in the world. Thou knowest me well enough that 'tis not out of fear that — At those words, the incens'd Knight having interrupted him, Thou demandest a reward, cryed he, when thou oughtest to expect rather the punishment that is due to thee. He was about to have fallen upon him without any more words, but seeing me ready to impeach his fury, at first he gave me a fierce look, afterwards that motion of anger giving way to other thoughts more rational; I see well, said he to me, that only Generosity moves you thus to act, and that such a person as you cannot be an accomplice with the most treacherous person that ever was: Consider then, that they who protect the Criminals authorise the crime. That Criminal in appearance (replied the unknown person who was accus'd to be so) shall need no other Arm than his own, if thou continuest obstinate to condemn a passion which thou rather shouldst approve. Try then, said I to his adversary, whether you can put an end to the difference. That can never be determined, replied he, but by the death of one of us, and therefore if you desire to see the end of it, leave to my revenge the person whom I am bound to pursue over all the world. Thy enemy, replied the other Stranger, shall save that labour; for thou knowest whether he be one that seeks to avoid the encounter or no. Keep then thy hatred; since thou preferrest it before the preservation of thy life, and the quiet of thy people, seek no more for peace with a Prince whom thou hast so obstinately offended, and who refusing thee those advantageous reparations which he has offered thee, will seek thee out in the farthest limits of all thy Territories to satisfy his just anger,

He would have seconded those words with his Sword, had not I oppos'd his intention, while mine was seconded by all those that followed me. Thus the two Warriours finding an obstacle which interrupted their design beyond their power to remove, cast a terrible look one upon another, and manifesting in that manner the constraint which I had compelled them to endure, they took several Roads, yet before they parted, expressing thus their resolutions, I make no question, said the Stranger who is in our Camp, but that thou wilt retire to Pharamond's Army; and if thou hast not enfeebled thy heart by dishonouring thy Arm, thou wilt not avoid the opportunity which I shall seek for to come to a speedy decision of our quarrel. No, no, I shall never flie the least occasion, replied the other Stranger, whose Arms were stain'd with blood, and thou knowest we shall see one another in the first Battel that shall offer it self, where we shall have the satisfaction to fix our particular hatred upon the general enmity of the sides which we embrace.

Those words having confirm'd me in the belief which I had already conceived, that those two Champions were of an illustrious Birth, and of an elevated courage; I accosted him whom I found engaged in our Association, and having considered his aspect, and tasted his converse with an augmentation of esteem: I shall be received in the Camp whither we are going, said I, with more joy than I ought to have expected; and many thanks will be returned me for the assistance which I bring along with me, though it were none of my procuring. "They will rather apprehend," answered he, that an unfortunate person seeks for Sanctuary "in a great Army: for if yours have Captains like your self, I see no reason why they "should wish for assistance. On the other hand, though the assistance which I bring to the "Cimbrians should not prove altogether unprofitable, I do not believe they would be much "oblig'd to me, since the life which I shall hazard for their interests, is no other than such "a one that I condemn, and which at present too many misfortunes render too odious to "me to take any care of its preservation.

Concluding those words, he sigh'd, and I took notice that a cloudy melancholy covered his face, where so lately I saw a warlike ardour flame. For that reason he spoke but little afterwards, afterwards, nor did he hearken to me without distraction, when I discoursed to him of the most considerable persons in the Army. In regard he rode without any equipage, having but one Esquire to attend him, I conjectured he was unwilling that his real quality should be known, to the end perhaps that he might enjoy himself with more freedom, at a time when his discontents rendered him incapable of repose, and an Enemy to all society. For that reason I would not presume to enquire his name, though after he understood mine, he shewed himself very obligingly complaisant toward me.

However Sir, replied the King of Suevia, be pleased not to neglect to draw what advantage you can from this adventure, for it is necessary to know with what forces we can furnish so eminent a stranger, whom we cannot permit to pass for an ordinary Knight. "Sir, you judge very right, replied Varanez, and besides you know my passion to be such; that I shall never omit any thing that concerns the Queen of the Cimbrians interest: And as I am persuaded that you are fixed to mine, I have resolv'd to open my heart to you fully and frankly. Let us therefore rivet the chain that links us together, let us this day solemnly engage to satisfy each others interest, obtain for Varanez the enjoyment of Rosamond, and the Prince of Persia promises you the overthrow of the King of the Franks. If the Queen of the Bohemians has not a Soul large enough, to prefer the most puissant Monarchy of all Asia, before a petty Country of Europe; if she be not moved with my orders, nor persuaded by your counsels, then I shall take another course, and I make no question but to carry that away, which Rosamond would afterwards be overjoyed to grant me. For in short, Sir, it would be a shameful thing for Varanez to fight in vain, how illustrious or how charming soever should be the cause of his passion: Nor shall it ever be said that she refused to give her hand to a Prince, who did not think he could give his, without debasing himself, to the fair Athenais, whom the Emperour of Constantinople afterwards espoused. I desire only your forces and the King of the Basternes, whom Albisinda will easily persuade to be of our party, and when those forces shall be re-inforced, that are to fight under my command, we will make our selves so absolute here, that the united power of the Cimbrians, Burgundians, Alains, and Gepides; though supported by the valour of Balamir, Gondioch, Arderic and Godegesile, shall be too weak to——

———" Ah Sir, (said the King of Suevia interrupting him) let us not talk of dividing our selves, for if you look upon the four Princes whom you have named as Rivals, I beseech you Sir consider, that the King of the Franks is both a Lover, as well as an Enemy of Rosamond. And therefore because he is an enemy, replied Varanez, I do not look upon him as a Lover, that can ever hope to be happy: yet if the death of Theobald cannot render him odious to the Queen of the Cimbrians, my pretensions shall more forcibly impeach his claim, than the loss of a Brother.

The End of the Third Book of the Ninth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

WHile the fierce Varanez was boasting in this manner, a Herulian Knight who came from the Franks Camp, entred the King of Suevia's Chamber. But because he was sent by his Master Godegesile, who was a Lover of Rosamond, the Prince of Persia went his way. In the way to his Quarters he understood, that Pharamond, Adelaida, and Cleomira, had written to the King of the Tongres, that Albisinda had received letters from Viridomar, and that proposals were made on both sides for the exchange of prisoners, and to sign the treaty which was propounded. They added farther that Cleomira and Blesinda, to oblige the Cimbrians to take care of Taxander and Genebaud, sent often to visit and sometimes were themselves visited, by their most considerable Enemies, so that the fortune of war, seemed to have submitted to the puissance of the Franks: But above all Gondemar and Gontran were most respected, whose hearts were as full of acknowledgment toward those fair Princeesses, as the humour of the King of the Herulians, appeared froward and untractable. Godegesile naturally turbulent and fiery, could not behold himself so far absent from Rosamond, and so near Pharamond, without a double access of inward vexation, when he considered the double mistortune that was befallen him, through the victory of a Prince whom he mortally hated, both as his common Rival and common Enemy, which made him abandon himself to transportations of joy, little different from madnes.

Varanez when he had understood these particulars, and had demanded some others that concern'd the King of the Franks; went on: but was all of an instant surpris'd when he saw the Knight, that he intended to have carried to the King of Suevia; walking along with Ambiomer toward the Castle. He went to him in all hast, when the Stranger having perceived him and as quickly meeting him; Sir, (said he with less melancholy, than he had for some time shewn) Agelmond finds his Sister in your Camp, and for that reason sets himself more powerfully engaged in that interest with which you have chosen to side. The Prince of Persia hearing the famous Name of the King of the Lombards; felt a new access of surpris: declaring in a most obliging manner, that all the Army would be overjoyed, when they heard that Agelmond, famous for so many victories, was come to be one of their Captains, and most valiant Champions.

Saying those words he walk'd on, that he might not delay the satisfaction, which those two renowned persons would suddenly enjoy at their meeting, and no sooner were they all three arriv'd at the place of so agreeable an enterview, when Agelmond running with open Arms toward the Princess of the Lombards; "Is it possible, said he, that I should ever see you again, my most dear Sitter, or that Heaven should intermix a happiness with so many mistortunes, as have for so long time persecuted me?" Agione, for so was that fair Princess called, immediately knowing her Brother that was so dear to her, notwithstanding that his countenance was changed, received his Caresses with an extraordinary joy, and if the marks of her tenderness seem'd not to be so vehement as his, yet they flow'd from as fervent an affection, being only moderated by an Air of modesty and decency, which accompanied all Agione's actions. Varanez and Ambiomer having manifested, how much they were concern'd in the joy of that meeting, speedily retired, lest their presence might interrupt a converse, which they were desirous to leave free and private, to the King of the Lombards and his Sister.

This

This news was not spread through the Camp without great rejoicing. The Queens of the Cimbrians and Turingiens went to visit Agione, and the Princess Albisinda taking her opportunity, followed soon after. Agelmond was also visited by all the great Captains of so numerous an Army; and those Princes who could not stir forth by reason of their wounds, sent their principal Officers. The King of the Lombards admirably acquitted himself of whatever he thought to be his Duty, giving to every one the marks of his acknowledgment, according to the Merit of the persons, the Grandeur of their Quality, and the difference of their Sex. Above all he lovingly embrac'd Ambiomer; for besides that he had long since understood the reputation of his person, Agione had inform'd him in what manner he had reliev'd her. The generous Knight blush'd, and look'd down with his eyes, and hearing the obliging expressions of the King, and considering the little he had done, and how little capable he was to do, he was ashamed to receive from so great a King such return of thanks for a piece of service so inconsiderable. For that reason he disengag'd himself from Agelmond as soon as possibly he could; and making a reflection upon the condition of his life, he sigh'd to see himself always in the company of the greatest Kings of the world, and to be in danger either to reproach the uncertainty of his Birth, or to hear it spoken that it was not splendid enough for his Honour, Unfortunate person that I am, cryed he, shall I always live in an ignorance so cruel, shall I not know at length whether my extraction be illustrious enough to have merited a more favourable reception from the Queen of the Turingiens? Or whether the actions which I have performed deserve no other recompence than to repair the default of my Birth, and make me only suffer for Amalazontha, without being able to authorise my too aspiring flames? Take up a resolution worthy of thy self, Ambiomer, (said he all of a sudden) 'tis time; and that thou mayst not serve in the Camp as a mean Volunteer in the sight of thy haughty Queen: bring back to the Camp those Troops that have elected thee for their General, and send for the Gaul that had the charge of thy infancy. For besides that thou wilt be more considerable in the party which thou hast chosen, shalt thou not also strengthen the Enemies of thy Rival? Shalt thou not render thy self in appearance at least more worthy the civilities of Agione?

But then so many different thoughts turmoiled his mind, that to the end he might not be interrupted, he took Horse, and rode forth of the Camp, being glad that he had disengag'd himself from going to the King of Suevia, where there was a Council to be held, and where he could not expect but to be ranked in a place not correspondent to his courage. So soon as he was out of the Trenches the sight of the Wood allur'd him, whither his own contemplation conducted him. Amalazontha took up all his thoughts, and as he pass'd by the place where he had formerly fought Sannon, the remembrance of that encounter call'd to his mind the services which he had done for the Queen of the Turingiens. Immediately he accus'd himself of feebleness and folly for loving an ingrateful Princess; but then his heart lifting up its self against his reason, he repented of his thoughts as criminal. While he laboured under those discontents, he rode forward into the Wood, where fortune led him insensibly to that part where some days before he had met the amiable Sister of Agelmond: Here it was, (cryed he, after he knew the place again) that I found the fair Princess of the Lombards, here it was that she receiv'd that succour from my hand, for which she believes her self so much engag'd to me, though I underwent neither danger nor trouble: Alas! Can I perform nothing that may avail me? I have expos'd my life more than once for a person that is altogether insensible, that remembers not my services, but after such a manner as is rather injurious to me, and only to put me in mind of her Dignity, which she believes ought to destroy all my hopes: if on the other side Agione considers that little I have done, ought I not to be mov'd with the acknowledgment of so fair a Princess? Why, said he immediately alter, why should I not be mov'd, why shall I not love Agione, since there is a kind of fate that forbids me to love any other than persons of her degree? Let us give over the Queen of the Turingiens, let us serve the Princess of the Lombards, and chuse a yoke that will not doubtless be so ponderous as that which to this very hour thou hast too patiently born. But who assures thee, (said he, pursuing his complaint) that thou canst change, or that Agione's Chains would be lighter than the Fetters which thou wouldst break? Ah, Ambiomer! all inconstancy is unworthy of a heart like thine; far therefore from renouncing thy pretensions for fear of difficulties, measure the honour which thou shalt obtain above the obstacles which it becomes thee to surmount. But then, added he, if my heart be still resolv'd to love the Queen of the Turingiens, does not my reason command me to disengage myself from a servitude too rigorous? Alas! What resolution shall I take?

He held his peace, having expressed some part of his grief; then in an instant determining with himself, Let us love Amalazontha, cry'd he, since our destiny will have it so. But let us endeavour to avoid the sight of her, let us endeavour to deprive her of the opportunity of exercising cising a tyranny so insupportable, let us diligently wait upon the Sister of Agelmond, let us serve so fair a Princess with all the zeal which we had for the Queen of the Turingiens; and if by our performances we can gain the esteem of the charming Agione, we shall have the satisfaction to let the disdainful Amalazontha see that all persons of her high degree do not despise her too faithful Ambiomere.

He rode on, confirming in his mind the design which he had contriv'd, when he perceiv'd a Knight, who being alighted from his Horse, was sitting upon the Grass at the foot of a great Tree to take his rest, of which he seem'd to have great need. Ambiomere had no sooner fix'd his eyes upon his countenance, but he felt some sparks of kindness begin to kindle in his Breast; and when he reflected upon the motion that surpris'd him, he attributed the cause thereof to that esteem or compassion men might generally have upon the sight of such an object. Indeed the Stranger looked pale enough easily to persuade him that the condition of his health was bad, and yet that symptom of indisposition did not so cloud his face, but that there appeared an air of Grandeur that had something extraordinary. On the other side, the Stranger mitigated some part of his natural haughtiness in beholding Ambiomere, whether it was out of those secret sympathies that Friends sometimes experiment upon their first meeting, or that the Stranger desired some assistance. At length he spake these words, addressing himself to Ambiomere, I guess, said he, that you are one of the Cimbric party, and that you can tell me tidings of certain Ladies that were conducted thither, if my information be true. There is no person, said Ambiomere, that can better inform you of that Adventure than my self. But since it is apparent that you mean the Princess of the Lombards, and that I know she has enemies abroad, if you be of their number, do not expect that I should take your part against her, though I find my self well enough inclin'd to befriend you upon any other occasion. Alas! replied the Stranger, sighing, I am so far from hating her, that I love her but too well, as insensible as she continues; and it is only to see her, that I desire of you the means how I may remain in the Cimbric Army without being known. That this circumstance may not hinder you from acting according to my intentions, nor make you unwilling to grant me so fair a courtesie, know that I am Mundisic, the Son and lawful Heir of the great King of the Huns. By the knowledge of this you easily judge that my pretences are not injurious to the Sister of Agelmond, that you expect a recompence proportionable to the rank of a Prince whom you will oblige; and that I desire not to conceal my self in your Camp, but only that I may not be obliged to see the rash Balamir, who not considering the right of eldership has caus'd me to lose the Princess of the Goths through the obstinacy of his passion. You have heard without doubt that once passionately lov'd Hunnimonda, that to obtain the possession of her I was driven to most extravagant extremities, and you have heard how mortally I hated Balamir; and I hate him still; and that for one heart that he has robbed me off, he shall not be assured of his life, as long as Mundisic enjoys his own. But let not this confession work in your mind an effect contrary to my designs; for since it only declares how sensible a heart I have, it is certain that I shall be no less exact to acknowledge a benefit, than I am eager to pursue my revenge.

While he thus talked, Ambiomere beheld him with astonishment, making no farther doubt but that it was Mundisic himself, who, accustom'd to acts of violence, had us'd Agione after that manner, so unworthy of her Sex and Dignity, inasmuch that he immediately felt an antipathy against him, and remembering the resolution that he had taken to embrace the Queen of the Lombard's interest, he was about to have acted accordingly, and to have reproach'd the persecutor of Agione, but a secret force restraining him, he accus'd himself of weakness; and it may be he had at length quarrell'd Mundisic, if the persuasion of kindness that hindered him had not been supported by sense of Generosity which forbid him to attack a person whom he saw in a condition rather to crave his assistance than the effects of his anger. On the other side, the Prince of the Huns conjectured by the looks and silence of Ambiomere that he should not obtain what he aim'd at; so that in a rage, Is it this, cryed he impatiently, that thou acknowledgest the truth and confidence of such a Prince as Mundisic? Though I was less feeble than I am, I would not leave unpunished such a denial, the marks whereof I too plainly discover in thy face; however, I was dispos'd before to let thee partake of that kindness which I shew to few persons.

Upon those words Ambiomere more earnestly beheld Mundisic, and considering the haughtiness and misfortune of that Prince, he paus'd a while what answer it behov'd him to make: but soon after declaring his mind, 'Tis neither the Grandeur of thy Birth, nor the pride of thy heart that protects thee from any resentment. I have met more than once great and valiant Princes arm'd against me; and I suffer only from unhappy Mundisic that which I would not take from the Prince of the Huns in his Father's Court, in the midst of all his Guards. But, (said he, taking notice that Mundisic's strength began to fail) 'tis more seasonable now to suc-

our, than repress thy fury. As he spake those words he alighted, and went toward the Prince to pull off his Arms, and use his endeavour to give him ease. However, he was not long in that employment, for one of Munditic's Officers coming just in the interim into that side of the Wood, assisted Ambiomer with so much diligence and success, that the Prince came suddenly again to himself. After that casting his eyes upon Ambiomer's countenance with more moderation, Generous Knight, said he, I am glad that this last of your actions has settled in my heart those thoughts which I had at first to your advantage: I return to the Camp of the Franks, where I should not have been, but that the Princess of the Lombards is in the Army of the Cimbrians. But in whatever part of the world Munditic shall be, you may be sure always to find a grateful Prince. And you, Sir, replied Ambiomer, shall find that Ambiomer will take your part in all things where justice will permit him to obey your commands.

They were no sooner parted one from the other, but Ambiomer pondered in his mind upon this Adventure. What, said he to himself, *shall I no sooner resolve to adhere to the interests of the Princess Agione, but I must meet her Ravisher, without having any power to punish him? Must I see my self obliged to do good offices to an enemy that provoked me with his pride? Is it for this that Heaven decreed me to be born among the Huns? Is it because he is one day to rule that Nation, that I have so deep a sense of respect for Munditic? Ab, Ambiomer, said he with disdain, How miserable wouldst thou be, wert thou to live under the laws of that Prince, thou that canst hardly submit to his illustrious Brother! But what authority canst thou submit to, if Balamir's be not supportable? What extraction dost thou require, wouldst thou owe thy being to some great King, that is to say, wouldst thou wish that which is impossible, since there is no Sovereign Prince in the world that complains for the loss of a Son? There is more probability that I descended from a mean Family, whose complaints for the loss of me were not worth taking notice of.*

The thought thereof very much discontented him upon the Road; so that to drive it out of his mind, as soon as he was return'd to the Camp he went to the King of the Burgundians to learn what was done in Council; there he learn'd that there was a Truce for one Month, that in three days there was to be an order taken for the exchange of the Princes; and that there would be suddenly a general satisfaction to see the Officers of both Armies pass from one Camp to t'other, to visit those persons for whom they had the greatest kindness. That last particular was not very pleasing to Ambiomer, who apprehended that Suxnon would not neglect to wait upon Amalazontiba. But immediately upbraiding himself for this fear, he went to kiss the Princess of the Lombards hands on purpose to weaken the passion which he had for the ingratful Queen of Turingia. However, he thought it expedient first to visit the King of Suevia to let him understand that it was not because of the place that he refrain'd from being present at the Council. Coming then to his Apartment, he there found the King of the Lombards, Balamir, Varanez, and divers other considerable persons, among whom the Persian Mitranez, and Viginizus Agelmond's Esquire held no mean degree. The King of Suevia receiv'd Ambiomer very civilly, and after he had very obligingly rebuked him for an absence that deprived the illustrious company of his good advice. However, you shall easily make amends, said he, and as the preserver of the Princess Agione, if you can but obtain from the King her Brother to give us that satisfaction which he can hardly deny us, I believe you may easily obtain the pardon of your injustice. In truth, Sir, replied Agelmond, it will be a very difficult thing for me to satisfy your desires as I would myself, and to speak as I should of all those cruel Adventures of which you request the repetition.

Instead of proceeding any farther he held his peace, when the King of Suevia being the first that spake: However, Sir, said he, it behoves us to know in what condition your Country and people are, and what is the cruel cause of your sorrows, to the end we may either assist you, or wait for your relief. Nevertheless, said Varanez, if the King of the Lombards be not himself dispos'd to repeat his own famous Actions, I know that Viginizus can ease him of the task, and that he will acquit himself so much the more to our content, in regard his renowned Master would have been unwilling to have been so exact in these parts of the Story, wherein his humour is most concern'd. Sir, then, added the King of Suevia, do us the favour we beseech you, to permit him to inform us more precisely what we only know as yet confusedly, and by report. Truly, replied Agelmond, I may expect so pleasing a consolation from the compassion which you will afford me, that I ought not to refuse the means of obtaining it, which you offer me: only I am to advertise you before hand, that Viginizus loves me, and may perhaps attribute great part of my success to my own courage, which is due to the warlike Nation that fought under my Banners. But, alas! added he sighing, though Viginizus may aggravate upon what I have said; how incapable is he to represent to your compassion all that I have suffered?

He took his leave after those few words, and then his Esquire being seated at the request of the Princes that heard him, recollected his memory for a while, and presently after addressing himself to the King of Suevia, he began his relation in the following words:

The History of Agelmond.

Your Majesty puts me upon a hard task, in commanding me to repeat the Adventures of the King my Master: You see, Sir, that the most renowned among the miserable, dares not presume to undertake that himself, which you engage me to perform, and that it is evident that he does not observe a silence so doleful, but that he is perswaded he should open his lips in vain, and that it would never be possible for him, to find out words to express the sadness of his misfortunes. However, Sir, I shall shew my obedience, and the difficulties which I have reason to fear, shall give way to the respect which I owe to my Master's commands: Nor shall they hinder me from undertaking a recital, which would require more of art, than without doubt can be expected from a person that has been always bred up among the tumults of war. I shall not stand to repeat the original of our Nation; persons of your degree know already the concernments of all considerable Kingdoms, at least they are not ignorant, by what victories all people have established themselves in the Countries of their Conquests, or by what misfortune they have been constrained to submit to foreign yokes. I will only tell you that it is about some fifty years since, that our Ancestors forsook the Island of Scandia, a famous Region out of which those terrible multitudes of Armies have swarm'd, that have inundation'd all Europe. As for the name of Longobard or Lombard, you know, Sir, that according to common fancy, we derive it from the length of our hair, whether it be that we wear it so at this time as a mark of liberty, not only upon our heads but upon our chins, or whether the opinion were grounded some time since, upon some extraordinary accident. In short, it is ascertain'd among us, that our Ancestors crossing Germany, to seek out habitations in some pleasant Country, and finding themselves weakned by many Battels, though they had been almost every where victorious, were at length constrained to have recourse to policy, after they had given a thousand testimonies of their valour. Understanding then that an Army far more numerous than their own, was coming to attack them, they arm'd their women, and to make them seem more like men, they caused them to comb down their hair over those parts of their faces, that required that Masculine covering. So that their Enemies fear'd by the report of their Scouts, who at a distance took those new Troops to be a part of the famous Veteran Body, sent to the Camp of the Longobards (for so our Ancestors were call'd) to make them propositions of peace, which were immediately accepted, as being very advantageous to us. But those that are now curious among us, look a great way more backward, and assure us that the name of our Nation has been known, and famous for above a thousand years ago, about which time they say there reign'd a very potent King among the Gauls whose name was Longo, whose Son that was called Bardus rul'd after him, in the Island of Albion. That those two Princes having extended their conquests, to the farther end of Germany, to the end they might keep those remote Countries under their subjection, sent Colonies from both places into those parts, that soon joyned together, whereupon the people of which they were composed, took upon them the name of Longobards, either as a mark of their union, or else to immortalize those two Princes, whose puissance they had in veneration. Thus the Longobards or Lombards as they are more commonly called, finding themselves far remote from their Princes and their Country, and apprehending that they had no fewer Enemies than Neighbours, gave themselves wholly to war. It was a good while before they were govern'd by any other than Captain Generals, who in process of time having gained the hearts of the Soldiers, by degrees took upon them the controul as well of civil as military affairs, and at length quite renounced their obedience to their Sovereigns. Our two Captains that were most famous, Agion and Ibor were the last that were only contented with that Authority, and you well know how many victories they gained, and in how many battels they overthrew the Vandals our particular Enemies. Agion dy'd laden with renown, leaving behind him as a consolation for our Loss, a Son who had already signaliz'd himself in many encounters. Thereupon all the Lombards soon agreed to confer upon that Son, that is to say the famous Agelmond, all the commands and employments of his illustrious Father, and charm'd with the greatness of his courage; they went a little farther and created him King, at the same time that the Franks raised Pharamond to the same dignity. We immediately became prosperous under this form of government, and soon grew to be the terror of our Enemies. The formidable Agelmond having given them many overthrows, invaded their Territories, and like a torrent that no strength of nature can stop, he overturn'd whatever oppos'd the fury of his Arms. Inſomuch that Embaſſadors were ſent from all parts, either to compoſe ſome war or enter into ſome alliance or other: And there were few Princes in Germany, that were not glad to embrace the friendſhip of a Nation, ſuſh'd with victory. The Vandals, maugre their haughty pride, ſued to us for peace, and other Nations that were at war with us, followed their example; even the potent King of the Huns himſelf, deſired to be our confederate: after he had loſt the moſt conſiderable part of his forces, in the abſence of the invincible Balamir. After that for ſome time we enjoyed a ſecure peace, which tranquillity it ſelf was not unprofitable, for it ſoon brought forth plenty and civility. In ſhort, Agelmond governed his Kingdom with an admirable prudence, he took care to eſta bliſh the religion of his Fathers, and the moſt noble Arts and Sciences: and to temper that auſtere ſtiffneſs which we had contracted by the wars, he ſent for perſons of learning, and excellent Artiſts from Rome and Conſtantinople. In ſhort, he thus eſta bliſh'd the 'dominion that he had purchaſed by his valour, gaining as well the love of his Subjects, as the hearts of his ſouldiers. On the other ſide, the beauty of the Princeſs Agione encreaſing from day to day, ſhe became the delight of the Court, and attracted all that was noble and gallant in the Neighbouring Kingdoms: But while we are talking of nothing but magnificent feſtivals, while the publick paſtimes and divertiſements take up all our preparations, while that the calm of peace flouriſhed in our Provinces, where nothing was to be heard formerly but the noiſe of war, we ſaw a cloud gathering from Sarmatia, that threatned us with a furious Tempeſt. Nevertheleſs it ſtrikes no terror into the hearts of the Lombards: on the contrary, they look upon it with joy as an opportunity to win fame, yet from that cloud they likewiſe ſee a clap of thunder break forth, that cauſes their diſconſolation, while it becomes the original of their Prince's miſfortune.

Though the difference between the Huns and Sarmatians has occaſion'd all our miſeries, I ſhall forbear to ſpeak of their firſt falling out, for as it is not poſſible, Sir, that you ſhould be ignorant of the main circumſtances, I ſhall only relate thoſe whercon thoſe adventures are grounded, which you are chiefly to underſtand: You know that the Huns invaded and vanquiſhed the Sarmatians, that they extended their Conqueſts far into their Country, and that that Nation was a terror to all its Neighbours, while the two Princes who were the ſupport thereof, fought unanimouſly for the common intereſt. But it was expoſed to ſtrange revolutions, when the Royal family was divided, and that Mundſic had raviſhed away the Princeſs of the Goths, the enjoynment of which Lady was promiſed to the enamour'd Balamir, as the glorious reward of his noble Actions; I paſs lightly over theſe circumſtances, by reaſon the Prince himſelf is here preſent, and hinders me from dilating upon particulars, which perhaps he thinks, would appear too much to his commendation and ſhew too plainly the injuſtice of Hunnimonda's Ravisher. For I muſt needs ſay, that among all the other virtues of the renowned Balamir, he has one which makes him reject thoſe applauſes, that others are ſo greedy of, and that that generous Prince ſtill acknowledges a brother, in the perſon of his perſecutor: But I am only to entertain your Majeſty, with what concerns the King my Maſter. Know then Sir, when the enamour'd Balamir was conſtrained to renounce all his hopes for the preſervation of Hunnimonda's life, he took a reſolution to abſent himſelf from the fair Princeſs, that he might not be expoſed to the danger of ſeeing her in the power of his Rival.

To that purpoſe he forſook a Country, that he could not but look upon with horror, and left the Army which he ſo dearly loved, ſtriking a conſternation among thoſe whom he had ſo often lead to victory. On the other ſide, Mundſic looked after nothing elſe but to ſoften Hunnimonda's heart: His heat and love of war now changed its object, and that Prince ſo fierce and haughty, ſpent many days in vain at the feet of the moſt immoveable Princeſs of the Goths. However I ſhall ſay nothing of the ſucceſs of that paſſion, for beſides that it would only renew the grief, wherewith Balamir's ſoul was ſo reſtleſly afflicted, I muſt confeſs, that I know but confuſedly my ſelf the circumſtances. It ſhall only then ſuffice to tell you, that this change produced another more conſiderable, that the Sarmatians found themſelves ſtrong in the weakneſs of the Huns, and that their courage was raiſed by the return of their valiant Prince.

The King his Father had ſent into his Dominions into Aſia, ſo that Agathirſis, (for that was the Prince's name) was engaged beyond Tanſis, when the Huns that bordered upon Dacia had invaded the Sarmatians, and very much enlarged their Conquests. But no sooner was he arrived at Tamyrague, where the King of the Sarmatians usually kept his Court, but all the people of that vast Monarchy, prepar'd not only to expel the Huns, but to carry the war into their own Country, and to assail them more vigorously than they had been assaulted themselves. The Prince overjoyed to find so general an inclination to war in the people, immediately hatches his levies, while the King on the other hand took extraordinary pains himself, desirous to share in the honour which they both expected to acquire. While the Prince of the Venedes his Brother, went to the Sea-side to the Provinces allotted to his Government, to raise forces in those parts. While all things are in a hurley burley in the vast extent of ground that obeys the Sarmatian King, and that the people talk of nothing but Arms and Engines of war, all the neighbouring Nations beheld those preparations: and though they conjectured, that in probability this Tempest threaten'd only the Huns they neglected not however to prepare for their own safety, and to put themselves into a posture of defence, against so formidable an Enemy. The Burians, the Didurians, the Omanes, and the Deluceons, and in a word all the Nations that drink the waters of the Viada and Vistula, behind Corrodon and the Mountain Afaborges, to the Countries of the Sidenians, and Ruticians, all these people fortified their frontiers toward the Gytbons and Phymians being a part of Sarmatia, and raised a great Army which they rendezvous'd near Calisia.

On the other side, Mundisc lost not one moment of time, he assembled all the forces of the Huns, and to render them equal to those of his Enemies; he drew out all the people out of both the Pannonias, Dacia, and the higher and lower Mesia. The Prince of Sarmatia having intelligence of all this, would neither stay for the King his Father nor for Harmaxes, that was the name of the Prince of the Venedes, but march'd with impatience toward the Plains of the Ombrons. Mundisc judging he might have some design to fall into Dacia, advances with all speed, intending to make Sarmatia the seat of a war, which he knew could not but prove very bloody. The two Armies met in the Province of the Avarines, where they came to blows without delay, maintaining the fight with so much fury and oblinacy, that above sixty thousand men were sacrificed to the ambition of their Princes. The Sarmatians lost a far less number than their Enemies, so that they remained Masters of the field, and the Huns were forced to retire in disorder toward Carpathus, being Masters of all the Avenues at that vast mountain.

In the mean while the Nations whom I have mention'd, lying upon the Viada and the Vistula, being joyned in a confederacy together, not only saw themselves in an instant out of all danger, but so observing that the Sarmatians were wholly bent against their ancient Enemies the Huns, they resolv'd to employ the forces they had rais'd some other way and to that purpose invaded the Territories of the Batenians our Allies, desirous to extend their Dominions toward the River Elbe.

Agelmond who was then in the Country of the Chirusquians in the City of Lispia, presently heard the complaints of his Confederates, and having assembled all the old Soldiers together, to which he joyned his own Guards, he march'd toward the Elbe, and pass'd the River, notwithstanding the opposition of a potent Enemy. Afterwards being reinforced by the Batenians, he fell into the Territories of the Confederates, and gave them battel with so much valour and good success, that he cut the Burians to pieces who had the Van, afterwards breaking in among the Omanians, he slew their Captain with his own hand, put to flight the Didurians, wounded the Prince of the Alveons, and finding no resistance march'd directly to the City of Calisia, which he assaulted so vigorously, that he took it in a few days, though the place were sufficiently fortified, and furnished with provision to have held out, against an Army that was too much weakned and wearied, had they not fought under the conduct of the valiant Agelmond. He had no sooner left a Garrison in the City, but he march'd forward toward the Vistula, there he encamp'd for some time, but finding no Enemy appear, and that the season was unfit for Action, after he had put his Army into winter Quarters, he return'd to Calisia, whither the Princess Agione was then come, with some part of her Court. I have made a brief relation only of these great Actions, in regard it behoves me to speak more at large, of those that are more important, nor will I say any more concerning them but only in few words, that the King my Master had no sooner concluded a peace with the vanquish'd, but he was oblig'd to prepare for a new War, more dangerous and of greater fame.

You know Sir, that the Prince of the Sarmatians having once more overthrown the Huns, forced their Trenches behind the foot of the Mountain Carpathus, at the head of the River Tyras, that he entred Dacia, while the King his Father and the Prince of the Venedes, advanced on the other side toward the Province of the Arseres, with an intention to march on as far as the Danubius. Mundisic finding with a more than ordinary vexation that as fast as his Enemies Forces increas'd, his own as fast diminish'd, resolv'd to seek to the King of the Lombards for aid; and that he might obtain the more considerable assistance, he was resolv'd to intercede in person for it: and this the rather, seeing his presence in the Army was not so useful in a season unfit for action, besides that he had left the famous Keva his Lieutenant to command in his room. To Calisia therefore he came, and there finds Agelmond, where, though he had but an ordinary suit to make, yet the interview between those two Princes was doubtless very extraordinary and magnificent. Mundisic preparing to speak with that respect which perhaps he would not have shew'd at another time: Sir, said he to the King of the Lombards, if the Huns have been overthrown by the Sarmatians, they have this consolation for the sorrow of their defeat: for by reason of their alliance with the great Agelmond, they may assure themselves to vanquish in their turn by virtue of his assistance. "Sir, answered the King my Master, we shall never refuse to aid the Confederates of the Lombards, since we never deny it to any Nation that is in distress, though they have no other right but their misfortune to demand it. I confess also that you may perhaps have better success with a considerable reinforcement; for that the valiant Prince of the Huns being overcome by multitude, the Sarmatians will soon lose their advantages when the number of their Enemies shall increase by the accession of our Forces to your Army.

After such obliging expressions as these, the two Princes not only continued their familiarity, but also for two days consulted together of every thing that might concern so important a War. I shall not however recount the particulars of their Conferences, nor the circumstances of a fatal engagement that afterwards occasioned so many dire mishaps: only this I must not omit, that Mundisic obtain'd whatever he request'd of Agelmond; only he departed from Calisia not so well satisfied with Agione: for if he spake of her as of the fairest Princess of the world, yet he complain'd of her as the most insensible person that ever was. In short, Sir, it may suffice that you will see by the sequel of this Relation the effects of that journey which the Prince of the Huns made to the King of the Lombards, to how many Royal Families they were tragical, through the over-ruling force of destiny. So soon as the Spring of the year permitted them to take the Field, Agelmond ordered his Soldiers to their Rendezvous, to the end he might make a general Muster; and finding his Army to consist of above sixty thousand fighting men, he took a resolution to pass the Visula, and to invade Sarmatia. But he was no sooner there arriv'd, when he felt a disturbance in his mind, to which he had not been accustomed, and reflecting with surprize upon those unusual commotions, he conjectured them to proceed from no other cause than the vastness of those extraordinary designs which he had undertaken, upon the sight of that mighty Monarchy which he was about to assail. Prepossess'd with those thoughts, and full of that haughty confidence that accompanied him in the most hazardous enterprises. He exhorted his Army in these few words with an aspect sufficient to infuse courage into the most timorous of his Soldiers.

Most valiant Lombards, having triumph'd over the Vandals, and so many other Nations, you see that the Huns, famous for many Victories, sue for assistance, and that we are now come into Sarmatia to declare open war against the most potent King in Europe. See here, my generous Friends, what was wanting to complete our Glory, here behold that which will purchase us a perfect immortality, which we may gain with less trouble than success. I confess that we are going to assail an Enemy who has no less Provinces in his Dominions than we have Cities, but which they will hardly defend against a warlike Army accusom'd to Victory. Are they not a multitude of people undisciplin'd, which their own number puts into confusion, and which we shall disorder before we can charge? Along then my Friends, and cheerfully let us vanquish this multitude, and then we shall extend our Conquests so far, that advancing to the remotest Climates of this vast Empire, we shall cause our power to be acknowledg'd in those places where our name is hardly yet known, how famous soever it be among those Nations that are known to us already.

He had no sooner spoken, but the Lombards with loud shouts and acclamations testified their noble impatience to follow their valiant Prince wherever he conducted them. So that Agelmond according to the resolution which he had taken with Mundisic, aiming to make a Diversion, and having march'd very hard to meet the King of the Sarmatians, he resolv'd to give him Battel, notwithstanding the inequality of their numbers. While he was marshalling his own Troops, the Enemies omitted nothing on their part; and Harmaxes a hardy and bold Prince shew'd a very great deal of activity and experience in execut-

cutting the orders of the King his Brother, but all his diligence prov'd in vain; and his valour, as extraordinary as it seem'd to be, gave way at length to the invincible Agelmond. The Sarmatians were overcome, they left upon the place sixty thousand men, their King was taken by ours, and the Prince of Venedes saving himself by flight, shut himself up in Tamyraque with the remainder of his shattered Troops. Agelmond not only pursued him with more heat and vigour than he was wont to shew after the defeat of his Enemies, but march'd directly toward the City of his retreat. Though it was strong and full of men, he resolv'd to carry it in a few days without laying a formal Siege to it, that the Sarmatians might have no time to gather again, nor the Prince any opportunity to give them assistance. To that purpose he brought his Rams and other Engines to the Walls, and maugre the Showers of Arrows and Stones, he battered them without intermission for three or four days. When the breach was wide enough, he entred it himself, followed by some Volunteers that ordinarily fought near his person; and the Prince of the Venedes appearing on the other side, the Conflict grew bloody and terrible. But the irresistible Agelmond after a stout resistance wounded Harmaxer, kill'd and put to flight the most courageous of his Enemies, entred and took the Town. Being Master thereof he became its Protector; for understanding that a party of the Lombards, greedy of pillage, were running to the Temple where the most considerable of the Sarmatians were fled for refuge, he made haste thither himself, and not only prevented the Soldiers from breaking open the doors, but so ordered it, that they that were within opened them willingly themselves: when a venerable person, devoted to the service of the Gods of that Country, appeared at the head of several others of the same profession. He was clad in the Vestures of his Priesthood, and the Majesty that rebounded from him was supported by that of his age and aspect. Having fearlessly beheld the Conquerour of the Sarmatians, he began to speak with a gravity that shewed the constancy of his mind: "King of the Lombards, said he, if thou approachest these sacred Altars to commit any act of violence, retire, and provoke not the Gods who are favourable to thee. But if thou comest to this Temple only to render thanks for the victory which the Gods have given thee, enter, and when thou seest the persons that the chance of War surrenders up into thy power, judge thou whether thou canst abandon their defence without drawing upon thee the anger of Heaven, and putting an end to thy success.

The King having dropped the point of his Sword, and listened attentively to the old man: when he had made an end, "Fear not, Father, said he in a very obliging manner, Agelmond is an enemy to violence; and where his commands are acknowledged, it suffices to be secure, only to be feeble without being constrain'd to flee to the foot of the Altars. If it be so, Sir, said the Old Man, I do not wonder at what renown has spread broad concerning the great Agelmond, and I dare hope for you in this war a more happy success than the beginning thereof seems to promise. Let us go then, said he, and give thanks to the immortal Gods, you for your victories, and we for your Generosity.

Concluding those words, he turn'd about to go into the Temple, and led the King to a Magnificent Altar, where the Sarmatians were wont to sacrifice to the chiefest of their Gods. As I had the honour in the Combat to follow my valiant Master, and was at that time very near his person, I took notice that there were many handsome persons in the Temple, notwithstanding the characters of fear that might be read in their faces. But we were no sooner in the place whither the Chief Priest intended to lead Agelmond, but we perceiv'd two women which we guess'd to be of no ordinary extraction; for besides that, notwithstanding the confusion of the place, they were separated from the rest of the Crowd, the negligence of their Drefs did not at all obscure the Magnificence thereof. Their shapes were lovely, yet differing in proportion, but we could not see their Faces, they having both Vails, either to hide their sadness, or to wipe away the tears which the misfortune of their Country made them shed: Sir, (said the ancient Priest to the King my Master) you see two great Princesses, Gilsmene and Dorcira. The first, as without doubt you already know, is the Daughter, the other the Sister of our King, of whom we may say, they are endowed with extraordinary advantages by the favour of Heaven. I will advertise them, if you please, that you have caus'd murder and pillage to cease, and that you are not come into this Temple but only to make it that Sanctuary which they seek; and that if they have any thanks to return, or any Suit to make, you are ready to bear them, and perhaps inclin'd to grant them some kindness to appease their melancholy.

Agelmond feeling in his heart, a new commotion of pleasure and disquiet intermix'd, answered in few words, that he had sufficiently explained himself for him to know his mind: when the chief Priest coming to the two Princesses, obligingly perswaded them to pull off their Vails. Dorcira was the first that took away her hand with which she hid her face:

whether it were that having attain'd her Two and Twentieth year, she was more courageous than Gilismene, who was not above seventeen years of age; or whether she had less pity and grief in her heart. The King of the Lombards looked upon them with surprize, and then going toward them, yet with a great respect; Madam, said he, since fortune could not favour me, with rendring me at the same time the Author of your misfortunes, I should not dare to present my self before those Princesses, whom my Actions have questionless provoked against me: were I not emboldened by full intention to make them reparation for those losses, which they have thereby received: For besides that you know, Madam, that I am no particular enemy of the Sarmatians, I have only entred their dominions to succour my Allies. And therefore in regard Prince Agathyrhis has obtained great advantages against the Huns, there will be no difficulty to make a peace between two Kings, that have mutually tryed their strength which they find to be so equal, as not to desire the hazard and chance of many Battels. While he spake, Dorcira not only began to look more assuredly, but also more earnestly beheld the King of the Lombards, than 'tis to be thought it became her to have done at such a time.

After she had considered a while; Sir, said she, the success that accompanies you in fight, may render us miserable, but it shall never hinder us from being just. For my part, I cannot cast my eyes upon the reliques of our scattered Troops, nor turn them toward those Towns which you have won, without affirming at the same time that never any Conquerour was more generous, than the valiant King of the Lombards, nor did I ever find any thing more obliging, than your manner of behaviour toward those persons, who have offered up their prayers for your confusion, and still bewail your victory.

She thus concluded, when Gilismene to whom the chief Priest had also spoken, discovering her face; displayed a thousand charms and darted a dazzling Lustre from her eyes. The star that ushers in the day appear'd not half so bright, after she had dispell'd those clouds, that had overcast her face. Nor could the apparition of a Goddess environ'd with splendor, have displayed more lively beams, nor have astonish'd a mortal with more surprize and veneration. I need not tell you that Gilismene's shape is streight, her deportment fierce and noble, only this I must say that she deeply wounded the heart of Agelmond. For you must know that all the lineaments of the Sarmatian Princess are regular to the very exactness of proportion, that her complexion is beyond imagination, being adorn'd with that whiteness, that vivacity, that freshness, and that flower of youth which is usually the soul of beauty. Admirable was the proportion that opened her vermilion Lips, and certain Tears that flow'd thither and there stopp'd, seem'd to me as if they there sought to terminate, their course with honour, having taken their source from two tountains altogether celestial. For in short, never was seen any thing more beautiful than Gilismene's eyes, their colour blew, and though sweet, large, and fairly distanc'd, yet they sparkle and are full of vigour. The flames which they darted forth even in that time of sadness, instead of being quenched by her Tears, brake through these precious clouds, and received a brighter Lustre from their Eclipse.

All these wonders of which I ought to have given a more eloquent description, were accompanied with a grace that most admirably became them, and which the present misfortune had in some sort augmented: But then the careless attire of Gilismene's head, let fall upon her Neck and some part of her Shoulders several curling locks of white fair hair, which though it were a Treasure so profusely scattered abroad, yet had a secret charm to move those persons that were least covetous of such kind of riches: at first the astonish'd King of the Lombards stood like a Statue, afterwards he greedily survey'd the Beauties of Gilismene: And as he had the fatal command, he had the leisure to see to be engaged and lose himself. He seem'd to feel several other passions, which seem'd only to increase for the strengthening of that, which had got possession in his soul. He could not think upon Gilismene's sadness, but with an excess of grief, nor could he without as great a satisfaction behold himself in a condition to render such extraordinary kindnesses, as lay in his power, to that beautiful Princess. And if compassion and repentance softned his heart, his blooming joys opened it to love, and all things at length made way to admit that cruel passion, or rather served to establish its tyranny.

Agelmond already desperately enamoured, could neither speak nor think what he had to do, when the chief Priest to put him out of that melancholy fit, desired leave to sing a Thanksgiving Song. The King had no sooner given his consent in two words, but he betook himself again to feed his eyes, with that miraculous beauty which destiny laid open to his view, but afterwards transported with a violent passion that he could not moderate; Madam, said he, if you be the divinity of this Temple, as those Celestial Rays that dart from your fair countenance, are apt to perswade me; you may see into my Soul and there discover, how great is my grief to have been the cause of yours. You may see with those divine eyes that penetrate every where, whether I would not sacrifice the last drop of my blood, to stop those Tears that I have caused to trickle down your fair Cheek. Ah Sir, answered she, offend not the Gods I beseech you, take notice that you are in a place consecrated to them, and that you only speak to an unfortunate Princess, upon whom Heaven only looks in anger. But how incens'd soever it may be against me, though it has rais'd you up to destroy the Royal House of the Sarmatians; your behaviour has been so generous, that I question not but I may speak in the behalf of the King my Father. Yes, Sir, (added she with a melting languishment, that had something in it infinitely moving) I conjure you to have that kindness for that unfortunate Prince, which my Sex may oblige you to have for me. In the Name of the Gods suffer me to wait upon him, that I may carry some part of his chains, and link my fate to his.

The Air wherewith she spoke all this while, having made an impression far more powerful in the soul of the passionate King, he cast an Amorous look upon Gilismene, he sigh'd without being able to return her an answer. But then when his eyes had promised more than the Princess request'd, and that he was preparing to speak; he durst not proceed, seeing himself obliged to turn toward the Altar, by reason the Anthem was begun. So soon as it was ended, he offer'd the Princesses to conduct them either to their Palaces, or to what other place they would chuse, and to that purpose giving order that those Ladies who had the principal charges about their persons should attend; he presented his hand to Gilismene, and gave me command to lead Dorcira. He went out of the Temple, the High Priest going before, and followed by an infinite number of people, blessing and praying for him all the way. But the pleasure which he had, to lead his adored Gilismene by the hand, was mix'd with a discontent, that he could not discourse his affection to that fair Princess: For he was continually hindred by the throngs of people, that threw themselves at his feet, or by the Lombard Officers who came to receive orders: And this perplexity lasted not only to the Palace of the King of the Sarmatians, but also in the Princesses very Apartment. In the mean time my Master felt the violence of his passion increase, by how much the more he tasted the humour and spirit of the Princess. However, instead of shewing any sign thereof, he found himself constrained to depart, not only to give orders as to what concern'd the Army and City, but also to give the Princesses all the time and freedom, to cheer and repose themselves. So that after he had caus'd the Room to be cleared of all unconcern'd persons, and found there were none with Gilismene and Dorcira, but only such as attended them, he was about to take his leave: when the Princess of the Sarmatians addressing her self to him with an Aspect, that was able to move the most insensible heart; Sir, said she, will you give me no answer, as to what concerns the King my Father. 'Tis in your power, Madam, said he, to dispose of his fate, Yes, most divine Princess, the liberty of the King of the Sarmatians is in your hands, and I find at the same time, added he after a very passionate manner, that you will have the Sovereign command of all things that are in Agelmond's power.

When he had so said he departed, without expecting any return of thanks from Gilismene, and lest Dorcira should delay him also by concerning her self with the Princess, presently he sent to know of the King, whether he might be admitted to give him a visit, and while he expected an answer, I took that opportunity to perswade him to put off his Arms, and betake himself to his rest. He had much ado to permit it, so impatient and disquieted was he already: But at length he yielded, and some slight wounds were dress'd, which he had received when he enter'd the breach: And so soon as he had rested himself, the Officer whom he had sent to the King of the Sarmatians returned, and gave him an account of his Errand. He told him that he should be received, as a Generous Conquerour ought to be by a grateful Captive. Which words, as they had nothing but what was to be expected upon such an occasion, so pleas'd the enamour'd Agelmond, that he caus'd them to be repeated with all the circumstances. Afterwards calling for Horses, he determin'd to go to that Quarter, wheré the King of the Sarmatians was guarded, and thither he would ride; notwithstanding all our entreaties to take a little more rest and be more careful of that health that was so necessary and dear to us all.

As he enter'd into the Tent where the Princesses Father was guarded, his heart fail'd him, being the first time he had found himself liable to fear. Agelmond was at first surpris'd at those new motions, but afterwards he call'd to mind, that he might be undaunted in battle, yet tremble upon such an occasion: That that courage which made him venture, upon an Army of a hundred thousand men, ought to give way to other passions, in encounters of a different nature: And in short that he ought not to think it strange, if he did not present himself so boldly before the King of the Sarmatians, when he consider'd that the Princess who had reason to hate him, had also the sole right of disposing the admirable Gilismene.

The two Kings had a mutual respect one for the other at their first Interview. So that the King of the Sarmatians received Agelmond as his Conquerour: and on the other side, my Master looked upon him not only as a great Monarch, but as the Father of that divine person whom he ador'd: Sir, said he, you are free, go and receive into your protection all those your Subjects who have submitted to our power; but while I abandon to you both my Interest and my Conquests, give me leave to plead for my Allies when you shall be out of our Camp, and at liberty to act without controul. Ah, Sir, (cried the King of the Sarmatians, charm'd with Agelmond's Generosity) what an Enemy have the Gods raised up against me, and what success can I hope for, having so much virtue to fight against. But it is not reasonable that you should vanquish me in all things, or that after you have overthrown me in Battel, and taken my Towns, you should triumph over my Generosity. There remains yet sufficient hope for me to recover my self, by means of the victorious Arms of Agathyrus, and by reason of the vastness of my Dominions; for as yet only those Countries lying upon the Vistula have felt the force of your Arms. Those Nations that drink at the two heads of Borylthenes, that obey me on both sides the Tanais are all yet entire, and are able to furnish me withal to act either for the Lombards, or the Huns, whatever the great Agelmond shall command me.

My Master answered him in few words, That Prince Agathyrus would easily spare him that pains; and therefore as he desired nothing more than to restore the King of the Sarmatians to the Princess his Daughter. He gave the King to understand, that he might depart when he pleas'd, and that he was impatiently expected at home by his children, and by his people. Thus the two Kings return'd from the Army to the City, where but two hours before desolation raged in a most terrible manner. Dorcyræ testified her satisfaction to see her Brother; and Gilismene, who had an inconceivable affection for the Prince, was not Mistress of the motions of her own heart, gave evident testimonies thereof, which she intermixed with those of her own respect.

Many other advantages attended upon the present favours shewed to those illustrious persons. For Agelmond drew off his Army from the City where his Princess resided, intending they should take their march toward the Vistula after some days of repose and refreshment. On the other side, Harmaxer's wounds not being found dangerous, he was brought to the King his Brother's Palace: and in a little time after came a Courier from Agathyrus that completed the joy both of Court and City. He inform'd the King of the Sarmatians that the Prince his Son had once more overthrown Mundisic and that after he had cut the greatest part of his Army in pieces, he had carried his victorious Arms as far as Albæ Julia, if the report of Agelmond's victorious progress had not compell'd him to make haste back into Sarmatia. The news hereof very much troubled me; and when I considered that our Allies were beaten, and that Agathyrus was making all the speed he could toward us, I was griev'd to think that my Master had quitted all those advantages which his valour had given him over the most puissant Kings in the world. Agelmond found by my countenance that I was not very well satisfied; and therefore as it was usual for me to tell him my thoughts, I let him frankly know what my opinion was at that time: "I very well see, Viginizus, answered he, that our opinions are very different at this time, if you think that the War can continue between the Sarmatians and the Lombards; or that my designs, which you approve not without doubt, can be prejudicial to our Nation. On the contrary, an act of Generosity done to a Prince that is himself generous, usually produces better effects than the most prudent foresight, or exactest cautions can assure us. But, Sir, replied I somewhat impatiently, who has undertaken that the King of the Sarmatians will not prove ungrateful. "The Princess Gilismene, replied he very readily, for I imagine it would not be as strange, that a Prince who gave a being to such a divine person should fail in his acknowledgment, as it is impossible for Agelmond to fight against the Brother of Gilismene. Then doubt no more, Viginizus, of the success of our Army, and I wish to Heaven, added he sighing, that I had as much reason to hope for success in those other designs which I have. Ah, Viginizus, how charming is the Princess Gilismene! But alas! the King her Father is a powerful Potentate, in comparison of a Prince that only reigns in one corner of Germany.

Instead of expressing himself any farther, he blush'd and looked discompos'd, afterwards walking about the Room in a great passion, he studied for some pretence to visit the King of the Sarmatians, not being able to live long absent from the Princess his Daughter. He was very much perplexed in what manner he should make this visit; for it was not regular to go among those that were rejoicing for a Victory which they had obtain'd over his Allies; nor would the Laws of good Deportment permit that he should shew himself sad in a place place where there was nothing but gladness, especially before a Princess whose passions he desired should sympathize with his. While his mind was thus perplexed with variety of thoughts, a Sarmatian of great quality from the King his Master, who told him that the King still preserv'd the same inclinations, and that he looked upon the victory of Agathyrfus only as a means to bring down the haughty fierceness of the Huns, and make them more willing to come to terms of accommodation, and that he would have come in person to give him the same assurance, had he thought it convenient at a time when their interests were so contrary.

Agelmond was overjoyed at this complement; for besides that it came from the Princess's Father, it determin'd his irresolution, and gave him an occasion to visit the King of the Sarmatians. Thither therefore he went, but when he was just ready to see Gilismene, his heart labour'd under a new agitation: for the amorous Prince not being able to keep enclos'd in his Breast all the violence of his passion, hop'd for some ease by giving the incomparable person, who was the real cause of it, some knowledge thereof: but then considering that Gilismene was the Daughter of one of the greatest Kings of the world, and that she might have received some time before some impressions of hatred against the Huns and their Allies. He changed his mind, being troubled with a deadly fear lest he might provoke the Princess that he so much ador'd. But that he might not hesitate upon an uncertainty which appear'd so cruel, he took an immediate resolution, and considering how much the Royal House of the Sarmatians was oblig'd to him, he perswaded himself that it was absolutely necessary that Gilismene should understand his passion. For thereby he thought the Princess would not only take into consideration what he had already done, but also what he might farther do out of his affection to her, especially since there was such probability of a Treaty likely to begin. That such a publication of his love would also be of great weight to justify his proceedings before all the world, that he might not be accus'd for not knowing how to prosecute his victories, but rather be with some kind of pity excus'd, when people understood that imprudence had no share in his Actions, seeing that love was the only cause of what he had done.

Thus the Prince suffering himself to be guided by a persuasion so pleasing, and which he apprehended so conformable to reason, resolv'd without delay to let Gilismene understand that she only reign'd with sovereign controul in the heart of Agelmond, so that having visited the King of the Sarmatians, and excus'd himself to him that he durst not presume to wait upon Harmaxes whom he had wounded with his own hand, he went directly to the Princess's Apartment, he found her in a cheerful humour, with only one of her Maids of Honour, with whom she was talking of Agathyrfus's victory. Dorcira was in the Prince of the Venedians Chamber, whom she tenderly lov'd; insomuch that Amasis (for that was the name of Gilismene's Favourite) being retired to the rest of her Associates, Agelmond saw his opportunity to speak to the Princess without being overheard. He render'd thanks to love, but instead of having the power to open his lips, all that he could do was to admire the fair eyes of Gilismene. He beheld them with such evident signs of a violent passion, that the Princess blush'd and looked down upon the Ground: but at length fearing perhaps that Agelmond should farther express his mind, she took the confidence to begin the discourse, and to ground it upon a subject contrary to what intentions she thought the King of the Lombards might have. To that intent she chose an argument that was generally talk'd of; and believing there was nothing more proper than to talk of a victory which was the only news at that time, Sir, said she, you see that we are not altogether unfortunate, and that — — — Ab, Madam, said he, interrupting her with a sigh, I know very well that the King of the Sarmatians is very formidable, I know he has a power sufficient to overcome all the Nations that shall arm themselves against him, that he has in his own Family sufficient to defeat them, and that he has vanquish'd Mundisic by the valour of Agathyrfus, and triumphs over Agelmond through the charms of the divine Gilismene. Yes, Madam, your eyes won him a triumph over the King of the Lombards: from the first time I saw those celestial eyes, I felt my heart engag'd to do them homage; and it ceas'd to be free while you load-ed me with fetters in the midst of my Conquests.

Though there were nothing in these words which the most scrupulous virtue could disapprove. The Princess of the Sarmatians however could not forbear to appear discompos'd, and as it were somewhat offended, insomuch that my Master fearing to receive some severe answer, instead of giving Gilismene leave to reply, proceeded in these words, I beseech you, Madam, said he, let not the confessions of the most respectful passion that ever was, provoke your anger against a Prince that adores you. Consider I adjure you, that cruelty will become a Conquerour to whom the Captive yields with an entire submission. And if you think that the King of the Lombards has not altogether made an ill use of his victory, can you, most angelical Princess, dishonour yours by an Action so inhumane? would you imbrue it in the blood of Agelmond, in the death of a Prince who must renounce his life, if you permit him not to be obedient unto your laws.

He spoke with so much vehemency, and beheld Gilismene with eyes so brightly sparkling with the fire of his love, that the Princess was in a greater perplexity than before. At first the King of the Lombards protestations seem'd a little too bold, and perplexed her: but as she was about to have shewed the marks of her resentment, the soft whispers of equity balanc'd that pretended injury, with the effectual obligations which she owed to so generous a Prince, and perswaded her at length to return this answer. Sir, said she, I still bear in mind with so much acknowledgment, what you have done for our Family; that I am willing to pass by what you have now said to me, on condition that you never speak more of it, or that you never see me more. Rather, (cried he with a new discomposure in his countenance) rather forget what you tell me I have done, but without intermission, bear in remembrance that Agelmond adores you, and that if he could demean himself after such a manner, as was not altogether displeasing, before he was animated with that noble passion that controuls him, there is nothing now which he dares not enterprise, for the divine Princess that reigns in his heart. He is ready to lay down his life for Gilismene, he is ready to sacrifice even his honour for the life of that fair Princess.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but Dorcira entred, and perceiving the fire that glinted in Agelmond's Eyes, she cast her own upon Gilismene's face, and there observ'd a disturbance not usual, with a person of her moderation and prudence. At the sight thereof she appeared surpris'd and troubled, but her natural courage quickly ridding her out of that amazement, she interrupted the silence which Agelmond and Gilismene still observ'd. Or I am deceived, (said she to my Master, not tying her self to any exactness of circumstance) or else your discourse has not been common. 'Tis very true Madam, replied Agelmond, (labouring to recollect himself) that we are deeply pleas'd with the subject of our discourse, it being as true that Agathyrus's victory gave us the occasion. I cannot tell (replied she, in language too disobliging to Gilismene) whether it were the Princess that began the discourse of the success of our Arms against Prince Mundisic: but I confess for my part, I should never have chosen the defeat of the Huns, wherewith to entertain the King of the Lombards. And she had without doubt pursued her piquant beginning, had not the King of the Sarmatians interrupted them by coming into the Room, who immediately addressing himself to my Master; Sir, said he, when you came to this Chamber I went to my Brothers, and in regard the humour of that Prince is not altogether conformable to mine, I was desirous in person to let him understand the kindness you had for him, lest he should be the only ingrateful person in a family, where there are none, but those that are ready to justify all the acknowledgment and gratitude which is due to your Generosity. My Sister seconded my intentions, she spoke as she ought to do of the famous King of the Lombards, nor would she leave us to share in the visit wherewith you have honoured us, till she found Prince Harmaxes, notwithstanding his wounds and his misfortune, inclin'd to look upon the Great Agelmond, rather as a Generous Conquerour than a hateful Enemy.

How prepossessed soever my Master were, he omitted not however to answer, with that deep sence of the obliging words of the Sarmatian King which they justly merited, and seeing that Dorcira kept him from entertaining the King in particular, he went to Harmaxes's Apartment, not only because his prudence seem'd to require him, but also the better to conceal his flame. The Prince of the Venedians courteously received him, striving with his natural fierceness out of respect to his Brother: But Agelmond taking notice of the constraint, that Harmaxes put upon his own humour; took his leave of the Prince, not to keep him any longer under a forced violence: As also that he might have time to examine by himself, how far the severity of Gilismene's answer extended. After he had been in the Camp, and given all necessary order in relation to our marching toward the Vistula, he retired to his Chamber where he desired to be alone, relying upon the care of Grimouldus and mine, as to what concern'd the Army. There it was that the brisk Image of Gilismene, took possession of his imagination, he fancied that Princess with all her charms: then reflecting upon the severity of her humour, Too fair but yet too cruel, Gilismene, cried he, sighing, must I be either absolutely deprived of your sight, or must I else forego the pleasure which I tasted, in making known the passion which it has produced in my Soul? why do you not command me rather not to live, than to forbear your presence? I should more gladly obey you, and you would revenge the injury done the Sarmatians more speedily and more notoriously than by an inhumanity, only known to the unfortunate Prince that adores you. How Gilismene, fear you not to inpenſe a paſſionate King, a King that commands a victorious Army, which you ſtill behold at your Gates? At theſe words he ſtopt'd, and having pauſed a while; Ah fair Princeſs, I ſee too well (ſaid he purſuing his ſad complaint) I ſee that our hearts at the firſt enterview, mutually ſympathiz'd, that they ſoon underſtood to what they were deſtin'd, and that at the ſame time mine ſubmitted to your laws: Yours, through thoſe perſuaſions that made you perceive the power which you had over Agelmond's will, gave you a confidence that renders you cruel, and me miſerable: But reign however, divine Princeſs, reign in the heart of the Lombard King, and never ſuffer a revolt in a place where your power is ſo abſolute. Since you have forbid me to expreſs my ſelf in what concerns my paſſion, I will only make uſe of my tears and ſighs, and only employ my reſpect and diligence. But inſenſible Princeſs, I will ſpeak in that manner and of ſo great ſervices, I will ſpeak with ſuch an entire and abſolute reſignation of my ſelf to your commands, that without doubt you will underſtand my language, and at length perhaps bear me without reluctance. Behold Gilifmene, after what manner I intend to combat your Antipathy, behold the weapons which I will make uſe of againſt you. To morrow I will begin to aſſail your heart, by cauſing my Army to remove, and not being able to abſent my ſelf from that which I adore, return my ſelf to Tamyraque: There will I ſurrender my ſelf up into the power of the King your Father, and that of your fair eyes, thoſe Celeftial Eyes that are more dreadful to me, than all the forces of Sarmatia

In ſhort; We broke up the next day, and the Amorous Agelmond being deſirous to ſtruggle with himſelf, in favour of an Army that was ſo dear to him; not only forc'd himſelf to take leave of the Court of Tamyraque and to depart; but alſo for two days together, marched at the head of us very chearfully. True it is that at laſt giving over the Combat, with a paſſion that wholly raign'd in his ſoul, he yielded to its imperious paſſion, inſtead of contriving any farther violence to rectify it. Then the tendereſs of that Prince evidently appear'd, as well by the frequent ſighs which it forc'd from his breaſt; as by a ſoft languishment that diſplayed it ſelf in his looks and in his actions. After that, a profound melancholy ſeizing his mind, and oppreſſing his heart ſo much the more, by how much the farther he remov'd from Gilifmene, we perceived in an inſtant an alteration in his health, being our ſelves immediately ſurprized with ſadneſs. In ſhort, as our Army kept their eyes fixed upon the King, and that their Prince was really the ſoul of that great body, it was no wonder that Agelmond's grief ſoon became the ſorrow of all the Lombards: or if they earneſtly fought the cauſe of an alteration ſo ſudden and ſo ſtrange. Every body made their conjectures upon it, when my Maſter mov'd with the love which his Army had for him, and beſide that, not being willing to ſuffer the growth of an evil, that every day gathered new ſtrength; ſent for me into his Cloſet, and after he had earneſtly beheld me; "Viginizus, ſaid he, I believe you will not be ſurprized, when I ſhall tell you that I paſſionately love the Princeſs of the Sarmatians. The Luſtre of her quality and beauty ſufficiently Authorize my flame, and I talk the leſs of my paſſion, to find whether you approve it, to the end you may ſecond me with your care and aſſiſtance. We muſt therefore return to Tamyraque, ſince it is impoſſible for me to live abſented from the ſight of Gilifmene, which I may the better do in regard the treaty of peace, which we are ſuddenly to begin with the King of the Sarmatians, is a good excuſe for me for having ſent away my Army, without expoſing my proceedings to cenſure. Sir, (answered I without making any wonder at his confeſſion) it is no extraordinary thing that the charms of a fair Princeſs, ſhould have ſome power over the heart of a young King: Or that the ſame heat which carries the valiant King of the Lombards to meet the greateſt of dangers, ſhould render him capable of receiving thoſe impreſſions which a beauty may make. Nor were we ignorant before, what were your thoughts for the Princeſs Gilifmene, for by all that you acted to the advantage of the Sarmatians, it was no difficult thing to ſee what love added at that time to your mutual generoſity, of which you gave every day ſuch ſignal proofs. But Sir, ſhall I preſume to tell your Maſtety, that you too much neglect thoſe cautions which you might take, and that the paſſion which rules over you, deſtroys your hopes by theſe means, whereby it may be you think to eſta bliſh them? What advantages have you not won? You were Maſter of ſeveral places and of a great Army, you carried in your hands the fate of the Royal houſe of Sarmatia, and when the Father of Gilifmene could have recovered neither the Cities which you had taken nor his liberty, but by yeilding the Princeſs his daughter to be Queen of the Lombards; think you he did not believe himſelf very much beholding to Gilifmene's beauty and Agelmond's affection? Could he accuſe a Conquerour for reſtoring his priſoner to his Throne?"

Upon theſe words, my Maſter fancying to himſelf that he might perhaps have eaſily obtained the poſſeſſion of Gilifmene, pleaſed himſelf in the content of ſo ſweet a contemplation.

But

But when the thought of having lost so fair an opportunity had disturbed that pleasure, No, no, Viginizus, said he, It is not just that we should purchase so great a felicity at so easie a rate; or that the fairest conquest in the world should cost so little. I agree, Sir, said I, that the Princess of the Sarmatians is a Princess altogether extraordinary. But I believe at the same time that your manner of acting has not been so very common neither, nor can I tell whether there be many Princesses that have let go so many advantages as you have quitted; for — But, said he hastily, interrupting me, are there many Gilifinenes in the world to produce such experiments often? No, Sir, answered I, there is but one, no more is there but one Agelmond; so that if few Princesses are comparable to the Sarmatian, few Kings are equal to the valiant King of the Lombards. Ah, Viginizus, replied he sighing, how far art thou prepossess'd in favour of me! But how soon wouldst thou know the difference between the celestial Gilifinene and the Prince that adores her, had you less good will for Agelmond! Were you your self, said I, somewhat less prepossess'd with the love of the Sarmatian Princess, it may be, Sir, you would find that I speak reason, and that you had payed sufficiently for the alliance of a Prince who was your prisoner upon the defeat of his Army. How, replied he impatiently, do you think then we were able to pay for a treasure of so infinite a value? Would you that Agelmond, whose humour you know, should have made those pretences out of a false Generosity to receive more considerable? Think you I had been perfectly happy, had I obtain'd the enjoyment of Gilifinene without having mov'd or merited her heart? Or that the only misfortune of the Sarmatians had forced a consent from that beautiful Princess that ought to be always voluntary, and that should proceed only from the meer motion of the inclination? Ah, Viginizus, it is that fire which I must labour to kindle in her heart, instead of seeking to obtain that Angelical Princess by interest of State; and to the end I may attain to an end so glorious, I am resolv'd to perish, or else far to outdo whatever you say I have hitherto perform'd: let us go to Tamyraque, whither my fate calls me to what I love, let us go and offer to Gilifinene — But, Sir, (answered I, not being able to forbear interrupting him) will you leave your Army? Will you go alone into a City where your Generosity has not yet absolutely obliterated the remembrance of those losses which they sustained by your valour? As for my Army, said the King, that shall march under the conduct of Grimoaldus, and take you no care for my person when I am at the Court of a King whose virtue is so well known. Besides, I know that for my sake he has sent for Agathyrus, who has also sent himself to offer peace to the King of the Huns: though if nothing of this were true, or that I were to meet a certain death at Tamyraque before I could possibly see my Princess, I would rather chuse to run to my destruction so near Gilifinene, than preserve my life by absenting my self from that angelical person. After all this oppose not my resolution, but if you love me prepare to follow me. Those words imposing silence upon me, I was glad of the opportunity to shew how zealously I would endeavour to maintain that precedence with which he had honoured me, making it my only business to rivet that chain which linked me to a Master so great, and so good withal.

The next day the King of the Lombards having bestowed extraordinary Gratuities among the Soldiers, and taken order for every thing that was convenient, committed them to the conduct of Grimoaldus, giving it out that he was going to the general peace, which was true in part, though it was not his particular design. He departed then for the Court of Sarmatia with a fair and numerous Train: whether it were that he thought to make out the pretence of his going by that preparation: or whether it were that he was willing to follow the instigations of a passion, which oftentimes delights as much in Magnificence and State, as it is usually pleas'd to act mysteriously in all its concerns. When we arriv'd at Tamyraque there were none that were not overjoyed at the sight of Agelmond, unless it was Harmaxes; and yet the King instead of sharing in the joy which he had caus'd, felt a new access of discontent. The constraint which he was obliged to put upon himself was more cruel than before, by reason that after an absence he saw to his thinking new charms in his Princess's eyes, or at least he saw them in earnest, at a time when peace and tranquillity had return'd all those Graces to her eyes, which the misfortune of her Country had eclips'd. But notwithstanding all those transportments of love caus'd by that access of Beauty, Agelmond's lips were faithful to the will of Gilifinene, so that the silence which he kept, though insupportable, made up only a part of my Master's sufferings; for Dorcira began to love him much more, and to hate the Princess; and Harmaxes, who had a passion concealed at the bottom of his heart for Gilifinene, of which he was not aware before, knew then by the Competitorship of an illustrious Rival what it was that troubled him, and at the same time conceiv'd an antipathy against the King of the Lombards, and a more strong affection for the Sarmatian Princess. Thus Dorcira and Harmaxes crossed Agelmond's design, though their intentions proceeded from contrary instigations, and they no sooner mutually discovered the thoughts which they severally had for the Lombard Prince, but they entered into a strict league, and finding themselves united by interest, as they had ever been by friendship, they promised to act unanimously together, and to have recourse to all sorts of means to support those pretences which their ambition did as little authorise as their love. And another thing was, that besides that the Prince of the Venedians really loved Gilismene, he looked upon her as the Heiress of Sarmatia, since Agathysus expos'd himself every day to extraordinary dangers. And as for Dorcira she would not have been discontented to have obtain'd a lovely and valiant King for her Spouse.

After they had made an agreement so fatal to the King of the Lombards, that unfortunate Prince found Dorcira and Harmaxes continually in Gilismene's presence, and observ'd that they watch'd her in such a manner, that not only he could not entertain the Princess by her self, but he was never in her company but he found himself constrain'd to all the exactness imaginable, and not so much as to look awry. As he was much more sensible of all that concern'd the incomparable Gilismene, yet when he perceiv'd that disaffection of Dorcira by such evident signs as put him beyond all doubt, he was infinitely discontented at it. He foresaw that the peace and quiet of the Princess would be every foot disturbed by a fierce and cunning wit; and he found himself in a strange perplexity how to carry himself toward Dorcira. He considered her Birth, her Sex, and the kindness which she had for him. On the other side he beheld that Princess with all the resentment against a person that hated Gilismene that his love could infuse into him; but if he were in this racking torture in relation to Dorcira, he saw himself yet more unhappy when he was fully assured of Harmaxes's affection. At first he thought that the kindness which the Prince had for Gilismene, was but the love of a Kinsman; but taking notice that that pretended friendship was accompanied with vehemency and tenderness, he began to conceive an affection for Harmaxes, and suffered the rudeness of his disposition with more moderation. So true it is that fortune intermixes folly with the conduct and prudence of the wisest men. 'Tis very true that this Calm endured not long; for as the same fire that enflames Lovers gives them light, and that it is a difficult thing for them to deceive one another long, Agelmond suddenly perceived that Harmaxes was his Rival, how surprising soever an engagement of that nature might be. Then diving more deeply into the business out of an ordinary effect of love, he fancied that the Prince of the Venedians was not at all disdain'd by Gilismene, and to make good this persuasion, he called to mind those proofs of friendship which the Princess had given to a near Kinsman, and upon those he look'd as the marks of a real passion: nor did he attribute the Princess's fierce answer which affected him every moment, to any thing else but to Gilismene's being possess'd in favour of Harmaxes, and that cruel thought casting despair into his heart, had like to have made him break out extravagantly against his Princess, and in the midst of his troubles to have a slighter opinion of her beauty than it became him. I confess this injustice did not long continue in the heart of the Lombard King, and though it might have held out against the frail equity of that Prince, yet the faireyes of Gilismene would soon have overcome it. The charming sight of her was so powerful, as sometimes to suspend all my Master's discontents: but that calm soon gave way to those Tempests which the severity of Gilismene's, Harmaxes's hatred, and Dorcira's love immediately rais'd.

While those different causes concurred to render the amorous Agelmond unhappy, there were many Councils held about the choice of a fit Minister to be sent to the place of Treaty; and Dorcira's Faction proving the more prevalent, a Sarmatian nam'd Alicarsis, entirely devoted to that Princess, was sent to Carroduna upon the Frontiers of Dacia, near the Spring of the River Tyras (for you know, Sir, there are three or four Cities of that name in Europe.) To the satisfaction caus'd by the departure of Alicarsis succeeded that which the return of Agathysus gave the Sarmatians, the whole Court and City were overjoyed once more to see their Prince, even Harmaxes himself dissimbled the secret malice which he bore him, and by many testimonies seem'd to partake with the same reality as he ought to have done in the publick rejoicing. I will not repeat the Caresses of the Sarmatian King, how he embraced his Son, nor the marks of tenderness which Gilismene bestow'd upon her dear and illustrious Brother; yet I may say that there was not ever any thing more remarkable in those publick ceremonies of gladness, than the interview of Agelmond and Agathysus. Those two Princes being young, handsome, and laden with renown, beheld one another at first with surprize, and having already a high esteem one for the other without any intermixture of jealousy, they appeared not only well satisfied, but by their looks it was evidently seen that their presence confirm'd the high opinion which they had mutually conceived of each other. Agathysus believing himself obliged to speak first,

Sir, said he to my Master, I know you have so generously oblig'd the Sarmatians, that if it be true that our losses have gain'd us the amity of the great Agelmond, we are so far from bewailing our misfortunes, that we ought rather prefer them before the greatest success of our Arms, and that the most famous of our Victories was never of that consequence to us as one happy overthrow.

The enamour'd Agelmond was moved with that air wherewith Agathyrus address'd his speech; and having discovered certain lineaments of Gilismene in the face of a Prince that spoke so obligingly to him, he was so highly pleas'd, that not being able to moderate his passion, he resolv'd to give the Generous Agathyrus a glimpse of it. So that after he had both earnestly and pleasingly beheld him, Sir, said he, you judge too favourably of a Stranger, of whom you have yet but a slight knowledge, and I am afraid you will change your opinion when I shall open my heart with all that frankness which your familiarity deserves; and I cannot tell whether you will not find under the pretended liberality of Agelmond the most insatiable ambition that ever was.

Having said those words, he appeared more discompos'd than before; so that instead of proceeding he held his peace at the same instant, fearing to provoke Gilismene by a confession which he thought might prove no less offensive to that severe Princess, than that which she had forbid him already to make. The Sarmatian Prince took notice of Agelmond's discomposure, and though he had a suspicion of the cause, yet he would not put the Lombard King to explain himself, whether it were that so young an acquaintance would not permit him, or that in common prudence he did not think it convenient to speak first of his Sister's Conquests. Thus at this first meeting, and at many others was my Master depriv'd of that ease which he expected; nor did he ever after that declare himself to Agathyrus, but then when he could not help it, as you will find in the rehearsal of those strange revolutions which overwhelm'd him in an abyss of misfortunes.

You must know then, Sir, that the Deputies of the two Kings had no sooner began to confer together, but they drew a general draught of the Treaty, and sent Copies thereof to Tamiraque and Alba Julia. The King of the Sarmatians having receiv'd that which Aliearsis had sent, read it in the presence of Agelmond, Agathyrus and Gilismene: neither Harmaxes nor Dorcira were ambitious to be there, she being desirous by that carelessness to conceal how much she was concern'd in that Negotiation, and the Prince of the Venedians not being able to brook that civility which the King his Brother shewed the King of the Lombards. The principal Articles upon which the Embassadors agreed, were much to this effect.

That both sides should restore all the Towns and Prisoners which they had taken: that King who had gotten most being to pretend to no other advantages than the honour of shewing the greatest marks of Victory and Generosity.

That the River Tyras and the Mountain of Carpathus should be the Limits of each others Dominions.

That the City of Carroduna should be under the protection of the two Kings, and remain Neutral, as a place for general Treaties and Interviews.

That the King of the Lombards shall not only be comprehended in this Alliance, but also in regard he did not enter into the War, but only to assist the King of the Huns, he may insist upon his damages, and send to Carroduna to state his losses.

That to render this important Alliance more firm and lasting, the three Royal Families should mutually bind themselves in a double tye, not only of Friendship but Affinity.

That the Sarmatian King shall give the Princess Gilismene to Prince Mundisic, and the King of the Huns shall give the Princess Theodolinda to Prince Agathyrus.

And that the Sarmatian King shall bestow the Princess Dorcira upon the King of the Lombards, and the King of the Lombards, the Princess Agione to Harmaxes.

So soon as the Sarmatian King had done reading, he fixed his eyes upon all those illustrious persons who had heard him with all the attention that a powerful interest required; and then addressing himself to Prince Agathyrus, Son, said he, I believe you have heard of Theodolinda, Theodolinda, and that it will not be a trouble to you to consent to our happiness. I know Sir, most certainly, replied Agathyrus, that the Princess of the Huns is a most beautiful Lady, but without I know that she is adored by Prince Wallia; and if he cannot move her heart, Agathyrus will but flatter himself too much, to hope for better success. On the other side, if Wallia have gained the good will of Theodolinda, would you, Sir, break the Chain of so fair an affection: or would you command me to disturb the happiness of two such considerable persons, to be never a jot the more fortunate?

At those words the Sarmatian King paused a while, afterwards turning toward Gilismene, instead of making a reply; "And you Daughter, said he, have you the same reluctance to accept of Mundisic's service? Speak and take all the liberty, that ought to be allowed upon such an occasion. You know Sir, answered she, blushing out of modesty, that my obedience only ought to answer for me; but since your Majesty gives me leave, to declare my thoughts after another manner; I will tell your Majesty, that if you have forgot how Mundisic behav'd himself, toward the Princess of the Goths and Prince Balamir, I humbly beseech your Majesty, that I may revive it in your memory. You may better consider these things (replied the Sarmatian King to Gilismene and Agathyrus) and afterwards we will send our answer to Carroduna.

Concluding these words he gave them a sign to retire, and as soon as they were gone forth of the Room; "Sir, said he to the King of the Lombards, I am very much troubled that the two ways propos'd to unite mine to the family of the King of the Huns, prove altogether fruitless. But Sir, you know we ought not to put a constraint upon the liberties of our children in such cases as these. So that all that I can do out of my gratitude to your self, will be to cause Gilismene to espouse Mundisic. As for Agathyrus, you will excuse me, if I make not use of all my Authority to force his inclinations, and I hope you will consider that he is of a Sex and profession, which tie him not to that exact obedience, that I have reason to expect from the Princess his Sister. But, Sir, I wish you would your self discourse Gilismene in favour of Mundisic: She is a person that has that acknowledgment and esteem for the King of the Lombards, which is altogether due to so great a King and her preserver, and besides that in regard you will intercede for your Ally whom you know, but whom I never saw; your words will be favourably heard as the counsel of a Friend, while mine being only looked upon as the commands of a Father, will not be so pleasing.

This Language surpris'd the enamour'd Agelmoid in such a manner, that not being able to mitigate the anguish which he felt all of a sudden; "Ah Sir, answered he, you could not have given me a worse commission, nor do I believe any person in the world more incapable to discharge it. The Sarmatian King fearing he had displeas'd my Master; "Sir, said he, in taking a Liberty which you have not approved, I not only thought that the King of the Lombards, would have been glad of the opportunity to speak in the behalf of his Confederate, but that I was oblig'd to make you the Judge of Gilismene's reasons, and consequently the witness of my proceedings. Agelmoid being aware of the effect of that discomposure, that had appear'd in his Countenance, labour'd to recollect himself: and being desirous to change the Sarmatian King's opinion; Sir, said he, I answered you in that manner, that you might well think to be strange, only to let you know that I am not fit to propound things, that may not be well taken: For besides that I may be suspected in speaking in the behalf of Mundisic, I think I may be excus'd of that office, and that my Alliance with him does not oblige me to contend with the affections of the Sarmatian Princess.

They would not long continue a discourse, wherein they seem'd to be tyed up by the several courses they were both to follow, so that having taken their leaves of each other, my Master retir'd to contemplate upon this whimsical adventure that had befallen him, and the cruel design that was intended against his love. However he felt some consolation when he call'd to mind, as well what the Sarmatian King had told him concerning Gilismene's thoughts, as the unwillingness which the Princess had testifi'd to espouse Mundisic. But in the mean time that he was taking resolutions conformable to his designs, and that he determin'd openly to oppose all those that should be contriv'd to overturn his hopes, the Sarmatian King apply'd himself to Dorcira, and having shew'd her what concern'd her in the Articles, which had been sent him from Carroduna; Sister, said he, you know the King of the Lombards, you are sensible of his generosity as well as I, and I believe you would not be troubled to be happy in so renowned a husband. Sir (answered she with a kind of satisfaction, which she could not altogether dissemble) you have so great an esteem for that Prince, and we have so much reason to be grateful for his kindness, that there is no ground to imagine why I should murmur at the obedience which I owe your Majesty. I did expect this answer from you, replied the King, and I could wish my Brother were of the same mind as you. Come then dear Sister, let us go and seek to overcome that obstinate antipathy, which he has to the King of the Lombards, and let us no longer suffer, I beseech you, that injustice to abide in the heart of a person so nearly related to us. Sir, replied Dorcira, in regard my Brother and my self have always lived together, with that true confidence in each other, correspondent to the equality of our degree, joy'd to that nearness of blood which ties us together, I know his humour too well, to think there is any taming the fierceness of it, and that instead of persuading him into a compliance, we should but provoke him and but drive him on, to assume upon himself an absolute Authority, to take resolutions quite contrary to those, which he would have embraced of his own proper inclinations. "But, replied the King, what can he do with his haughtiness and his obstinacy? He may displease you by some disobedient language, replied Dorcira, he may be so far outrageous as to offend the King of the Lombards, and therefore in my opinion your Majesty will not do amiss, to avoid both the one and the other. In the mean time I will go and see my Brother, and try to dispose him to a concurrency with us, and I will endeavour to make him understand, how Generous the King of the Lombards has been to him in particular.

After these words leaving Dorcira, he went to the Prince of the Venetians Apartment: and having spoken to him concerning the Articles which I have recited; "I know not Brother, said he, observing him to be somewhat troubled, whether you approve the double Alliance which is to unite the Sarmatians and the Lombards. "Sir, replied Harmaxes, I know that Agelmond is a person of great courage; and therefore 'tis not without reason that you seek to purchase his friendship. But I also believe withal, that he will be sufficiently engaged to our interest by espousing Dorcira, without any necessity of my desiring his Sister, considering what has fallen out already. "Seeing Agione is so very beautiful, replied the King, what will Agelmond think of your refusal? Will he not believe that you have still a hatred against him, though he has acted so obligingly in all things that concern your self. I am a witness in person that he would have given you a visit, but durst not presume to do it, because he apprehended that—— "Ah Sir, (said the fierce Harmaxes interrupting him) that this behaviour of his should conceal such an insufferable pride, under an outward shew of civility. Agelmond did not affect to shew that reservedness which you praise, but to let you understand that he had wounded and overcome me, and that his valour had obtained those advantages, which are oftner got by the favour of fortune than the conduct of Commanders. "You turn all things to a strange sense, cried the King, yet I will overcome your obstinacy and you shall espouse Agione, because I will have it so. You are my King, replied Harmaxes with a confident behaviour, yet I do not believe your power extends farther than that of the Gods, or that it can deprive me of the liberty which they have given me.

He had no sooner uttered these words, but the King beheld him with an angry look, and so leaving him on a sudden; he went to complain of his humour to Dorcira. Well Sister, (said he, continuing his former discourse) and have you found out any way yet, to soften the ruggedness of his disposition. I have been seeking a great while, said she, and having fancied many ways to no purpose, at length I may hit upon one that may be suitable to your design. But I would fain (said she very cunningly, and laying her hand upon her face to hide her blushing) that you would think upon some other your self, that I might not be obliged to tell you that my self, which modesty forbids me to think. Speak, dear Sister, speak, replied he: But Sir, she replied, is there a necessity for me to speak to be plainly understood, and in a business of this nature? Have I not sufficiently expressed my self in saying, that I dare not well presume to express my self? I partly guess your meaning, replied the King, you are willing we should begin to fulfil the Articles, by the disposal of you first: And in truth I see no better way to accomplish our designs. For in short, either Harmaxes will follow your example, or at least he will cease a hatred toward a Prince whom you have made his relation: and if he espouse not the Princess of the Lombards, Agelmond will never have any cause to complain, that we refuse to unite our family to his, when we have already done it in your person. I have no reason then said she, to make any farther dilemma's, for since it is for your satisfaction and for the interest of the State; I shall be very glad to teach the rest of the Royal Family, to obey your Majesties Commands without reluctance. The Sarmatian King was overjoyed at this compliance, redoubled his Careffes, and told the Princess Dorcira that he would endeavour, to understand Agelmond's mind by Agathyrus's means. But Sir, replied she, I beseech you discover not our intentions, yet omit not any thing to accomplish them with success. Let it not be made publick to our disgrace, that the King of the Lombards would not vouchsafe to accept of the Sarmatian King's Alliance. In short, added she moreover, engage neither your honour nor mine, I conjure you, and either speak, not at all, or speak

Speak like a great King. I confess, replied he, that these cautions were not amiss, had I not to deal with Agelmond. But as we know that generous Prince, and know him to be inclin'd to friendship with our Family, we hazard nothing in engaging him by degrees by the persuasions of Agathyrus: and therefore rely altogether upon my care, never fear my wounding a kindness with which I am so well acquainted, and know to be so ready to serve persons of your Sex: and I promise you besides to manage this affair with more exactness than the humour of the Lombard King requires.

After he had thus satisfied Dorcira he left her Apartment, and no sooner was he come to his own, but he sent for the Sarmatian Prince. He gave him charge dextrously to dive into Agelmond's thoughts, in relation to a Princess which was design'd him for a Wife; and to let him know withal, that the Royal House of Sarmatia would be always ready to consent to those Articles which concern'd him. Agathyrus being fully instructed by his Father, went to find out Agelmond, and understanding that he was in the Palace-Garden, he overtook him walking by the Bank of a Rivulet so prepossess'd in his thoughts, that he hardly took notice of the fair stream upon which his eyes were fixed. The Sarmatian Prince accosted him with an obliging aspect, and after he had earnestly beheld his countenance, Sir, said he, the condition wherein I find you, makes me believe that your mind is not well at ease, and perhaps out of a dislike of those Articles concluded at Carroduna in reference to the peace. If that be it, open your heart I beseech you to a Prince who is altogether at your devotion, and who will assure you on the behalf of the Sarmatian King, that the whole Court is more inclin'd to submit to the King of the Lombards will, than to agree to any thing done at Carroduna.

The enamour'd Agelmond hearing those words so frankly and obligingly uttered, looked upon Agathyrus, but in regard he only sigh'd without returning any answer, the generous Prince of the Sarmatians confirm'd in the suspicion which he had already, I see very well, Sir, said he, that I am not deceiv'd in my conjectures, be pleas'd then to speak, and if there be any reason that hinders you from espousing Dorcira, I will deliver you out of that perplexity wherein your own good nature may involve you, in breaking off the Treaty my self, how great soever my desire may be to see you allied to our Family, or whatever satisfaction a Princess so nearly related to me may receive from the consent which she has already given. I protest, Sir, and I take the Gods to witness, at length replied my Master, that Agelmond looks upon the alliance of the Sarmatian King to be the most honourable in the world: but I am constrain'd to declare to you at the same time, that I cannot aspire to that happiness which you propose, that I am an unfortunate person, that Dorcira knows me not at all, and that if she knew the thoughts of my heart, she would soon change those which she has for a Prince, who not being Master of his own heart, is not in a condition to render back that acknowledgment which is due to so fair a Princess.

Those last words and the air wherewith they were uttered putting Agathyrus out of all doubt, Well, Sir, replied he more cheerfully and pleasantly than before, I am free to consent that the King of the Lombards may withstand the beauty and kindness of the Princess Dorcira. But to say the truth, I should not be so well pleas'd should I find him insensible of Gillismene's charms: and on the other side, I should not know how to pardon my own Sister, should she be wanting to purchase us the friendship of the great Agelmond. Ah, Sir, replied my Master, that you should so little know that divine person: Would it might please Heaven, since you will have me disclose the very bottom of my heart, yes, Sir, would it might please the Gods to permit me but to spend my days at her feet, devoted to the service of the Sarmatian King, how happy should I be! Then far from aspiring to that honour to which you would have me presumptuously advance my self, I should content my self without any other claim than that of not being hated by the person whom I adore. I know, replied the Sarmatian Prince, after what manner those persons express themselves, who are prepossess'd with that passion from which I believe you not exempted: so that instead of staying to hear you speak any farther in praise of my Sister, I will go and labour my utmost in your behalf by making known your intentions to the King my Father. How, Sir, replied the enamour'd Agelmond, do you think your Sister will ever pardon me, when she understands that I have—— I believe, said Agathyrus, interrupting him, that she will obey the King my Father, and that if he commands her to give her heart to the King of the Lombards, she will not be troubled to submit to his will. Concluding those words he left my Master, not staying for an answer, and went a good pace to one of the Garden doors that led to the Palace.

Agelmond accompanied him with his eyes, but stayed behind himself, full of the extremity of anguish. His mind was toss'd between hope and fear, and the last of these motions being almost every day the stronger, the distressed Prince felt those torments that were answerable to the importance of his concern. Having walked about for some time in a kind, of passion, he went to a little Grove, and retired into the thickest part among the Trees, that it might be as long as possible before he heard the news, so strongly was he persuaded that Gilismene was above his pretensions. But while his cares increase, he is surpris'd to see from between the Trees, that the King and Prince of Sarmatia were looking up and down for him. Immediately he went toward them, labouring in vain to settle his countenance, which when the Father of Gilismene perceiv'd, running to him with open Arms, Sir, said he, I praise the Gods for the love which they have infus'd into your Breast; I give you Gilismene, or to say better, I have provided for my Daughter a renowned Husband, and for my Dominions a formidable Defender.

The King of the Lombards was struck so suddenly with such language, that promised him so great a felicity, at first could neither return an answer, nor believe what I saw, but when he began to give credit to what they most obligingly repeated over and over again, he turned thanks to the Princess's Father with all acknowledgment and submission, yet not sensible of all the joy which so charming a promise ought to have excited in his heart. Agathysus who was acquainted with the power of love, and the different effects which it produces, when it is once become absolute in the heart, saw that there wanted yet one word of kindness from Gilismene's lips to persuade Agelmond, and calm all his disquiet. He whispered his thoughts therefore to the Sarmatian, so that my Master was immediately led to the Princess's Apartment. But though he saw himself in the midst of two persons so dear to that admirable person, yet he could not believe himself in safety; he thought that he had not yet deserv'd Gilismene's heart by services great enough; he also feared lest the Princess should either refuse the consent which he demanded, or that she should not give it but only in obedience to her Father. But when he came into a Chamber glittering with the lustre of his Princess, his passions became more lively, and he felt a new access of love. Though when he drew near Gilismene, he trod with a guilty step, with his eyes all the while fixed upon hers, where he consulted his destiny with all respect imaginable. Immediately the Sarmatian King with a satisfied countenance, addressing himself to the Princess, and presenting my Master, Daughter, said he, it is no longer Mundilic that I design for your Husband; I have considered that there is nothing more recommendable than Birth and Valour, yet the fame which he receives from those virtues is eclipsed by the extravagancy of his disposition, I have an affection for you that will not permit me to expose your life to the injustice of that Prince, I have better provided for your felicity; and I am persuaded you will make no dispute, to accomplish my design, when it is my desire with your consent to engage your fortune with that of the Lombard King. You know very well what his virtues are, and we are too much obliged to that great Prince to forget those Actions which all Sarmatia will preserve in eternal remembrance.

Agelmond would not without doubt have heard all this discourse without interrupting him, but that instead of listening to the Sarmatian King, he abandoned all his attention, to behold the Princess: for her part she immediately blush'd, and that there is a certain kind of fear from which Lovers cannot free themselves, my Master examined with all the care that his passion could infuse into him, whether he could observe any signs of displeasure or unwillingness in the effect of Gilismene's modesty. After he had sought in vain what he desired not to find, he took notice that the fair eyes of the Princess were in no sort incens'd against him, only he perceiv'd in her looks both fearfulness and sweetness. Then my Prince's heart gave a full reception to his joy, but afterwards he was sensible of more extraordinary transports when he saw that Gilismene testified by her respectful behaviour, that her will was altogether agreeable to the will of the Sarmatian King. True it is that her modesty had not the confidence to express her mind in any other manner upon such an occasion: but the three Princes who knew her humour, were satisfied with that confession, instead of offering any farther force to the reserv'dness of so prudent a person. The King of the Lombards charm'd, and altogether in an extatic, abandoned himself in such a manner to the inspirations of his content, which his good fortune had infus'd into his heart, that notwithstanding the presence of a Father and a Brother, he would have thrown himself at her feet, to have rendered thanks to her whom he loved, but they not permitting him; in a most passionate tone, and with a profound submission, Divine Princess, cry'd he, is it possible that you should consent to the felicity of Agelmond?

He could only utter those few words; for the passions that hindered him from proceeding, seem'd to stop his mouth, that they might give his eyes the liberty to express themselves more fervently and more feelingly. In short, his eyes sparkled with a new fire, and a mixture of love, hope and joy, enlivening his air and his countenance, his aspect appear'd more amiable and more lofty, as it were taxing Gilismene for not having spoken enough in favour of so lovely a Prince.

In the interim the Sarmatian King went his way, attended by Agathyfut, desirous that the two illustrious Lovers whom he purpos'd to unite in one, might have an entire freedom to discourse their thoughts, intending to tell Dorcira himself what had pass'd, to mitigate the circumstances which might inenue the mind of that haughty Princess. The enamour'd Agelmond was at first overjoy'd, to find himself alone with Gilismene, and as it were already happy by the consent of her Father. Nevertheless when he considered how favourable those two Princes who were gone from him, had been to him; he sigh'd: And by reason of some thoughts not conformable to love, he was constrain'd to with within himself for their sudden return. He perceiv'd that boldness, which their presence had inspir'd into him, began insensibly to wane, and the fear of displeasing Gilismene assailing those pleasing passions that possess'd his heart, he beheld the Princess with an Air less confident, and respect producing in a Prince entirely submissive the effect which modestly had produced in the heart of Gilismene; they both blush'd, looked down upon the ground and remain'd silent.

Some few minutes after Agelmond first adventuring; Madam, cry'd he with an amorous utterance, shall I be assured that you will not oppose my happiness? Then seeing that Gilismene had not yet confidence to speak; Ah for Heavens sake dear Princess, (pursued he beholding her with eyes inflam'd) vouchsafe me an answer, and grudge not a few words I beseech you to a Prince, to whom you are so much desired to grant so great an honour, and so large a share of felicity. Then Gilismene growing less bashful; rear'd up her eyes just so high as to look upon my Master: but not being yet adventurous enough to open her lips; the Lombard King thus passionately pursued his protestations. Madam, said he, had I had the presumption to have desired, to be made choice of by the divine Gilismene, I should have rendred my self unworthy of so great an honour: But, too severe Princess, will you remain so cruel, as not to tell the Prince that adores you, that you are not discontented that others have made choice of him, To these he added other words so urging, that the Princess at length recovering her courage; You heard Sir, answer'd she, that I could not forbear to utter my mind, when they spoke to me concerning the Prince of the Huns. But when they presented to me the King of the Lombards, I had nothing then in my memory but my obedience to my Father, and the obligations of the Generous Agelmond. After all this, (said she, laying her hand upon her fair Checks to conceal her blushing) ask no more I beseech you, but permit me to retire to my Closet, for in truth I am involv'd in that perplexity, which I never was acquainted with before.

Thereupon my Master taking notice that the young Princess endur'd the same pain which those persons suffer that struggle with their inclinations, after a profound reverence took his leave, satistied that he had observ'd both in her looks and and in her language; a certain sweetness that could not proceed but from an instinct of kindness. So soon as he was return'd to his Apartment, he sent for me to let me participate of his joy, and no sooner had he repeated those things which I have rehears'd to your Majesty, but he began to contemplate upon what he had said: And then beholding me very earnestly; Methinks, said he, I am promis'd too much honour: For my part, Viginizus, I cannot yet believe my self to be sure of Gilismene, for notwithstanding the probabilities that persuade me to it, I feel from time to time a certain kind of fear in my heart. To tell you the truth, fortune seems too favourable not to be suspected, and I question whether I am not threated with some misfortune as terrible, as the felicity is sweet that flatters now my hopes.

While these ominous presages too severely made out by the sequel of my discourse, disquieted the Lombard King, the Sarmatian King goes to Dorcira: He finds her discompos'd, and in deep consultation with Hirmaxes, insomuch that to appease the passion of the fierce Princess, he thus address'd himself to her. "Dear Sister, we found that the King of the Lombards had all those thoughts of high esteem for your person, that you could reasonably pretend to, and our design had infallibly succeeded, had not that Prince been prepossess'd with an affection, that prov'd an obstacle to our intentions. 'Tis certain that we must not omit to purchase the favour of that great personage, seeing it is only his Alliance, that we seek, and therefore since his affection permits him not to be yours, being already fix'd upon Gilismene, I question not but you will be willing, that by the means of a Princess, your so near relation, I may obtain that which I too much wish for, and that you will be satistied since I am contented, understanding that you did not act at our first consultation, but for my interest. I confess Sir, answer'd she, that I studied only to please you, when I gave my consent to espouse Agelmond, and if that Prince had not had an insatiable ambition, of which you may see perhaps too soon the sad effects, he would have stoop'd without doubt to a lower prize, and then after you had gain'd him by that means which you aim'd to make use of, you might have chosen for the Princess, some one of the great“est Kings in the world. But I see too well (said she, pursuing her complaint with a kind of malice, that she could not altogether conceal) that I am too sincere hearted, and that I ought to have acted with as much cunning, as those persons that abuse my integrity. Not that I blame you Sir, for I know you are deceived as well as I, and that your power and your diligence is made use of, to discover what Harmaxes and Dorcira think of your proceedings. For in truth, Agelmond and Gilismene did not find us inclin’d to favour their secret correspondencies, so that they are glad to———Princess, (said the King impatiently interrupting her, as not being able to endure the tart expressions of Dorcira) I will have no division in my family, I will have you continue in friendship with Gilismene, and I will have my Brother cease his spleen against Agelmond. How Sir, replied Harmaxes very briskly, do you believe that I have an Antipathy against Agelmond? Did I oppose your intentions when you would have espoused Dorcira, who has the honour to be the daughter of the Sarmatian King and your Majesty’s Sister, to the Son of a Lombard Captain? I agree with you, replied the King very coldly, that Agione was a Captain, and methinks you should not forget that Agelmond is a Captain too. But if that great Prince whose merit had advanc’d him to a Throne, had not had as much generosity after his victories, as valour in fight, I cannot tell whether you would have been in a condition, to have talked so sharply against him. Take the part (replied the Prince of the Venedians blushing) take the part of a Stranger against us, effect a resolution of so much weight, without vouchsafing to see the consequences, despise advice and hearken to no counsel. You may do it, Sir, the Sovereign power is in your own hands: Nevertheless, since Kings are more obliged than their Subjects to mind the future, will you not weigh the importance of what you go about so suddenly to accomplish? For my part I’ll maintain that the marriage of the Princess is of so great consequence, that the marriage of the Prince her Brother, is not to be advis’d upon with so much deliberation. For in short, Agathyrus gives the precedency of course to that person whom he espouses, and all Sarmatia will acknowledge her Queen by consent, when you are gone to that place which is design’d you among the Gods. But if our misfortunes deprive us of the renowned Agathyrus, in those dangers into which his valour precipitates him every moment; think you Sir, that the famous Monarchy which you command, will submit to the Sovereignty of the Lombards? No Sir, the Sarmatians will never acknowledge Agelmond for their King. On the other side if while that ambitious Prince refuses to renounce his Right, we shall see the two Nations which your Majesty endeavours to unite, all together by the Ears, and it may be engaged in a war to their mutual destruction. Very good, replied the King with his first indifferency, and to prevent all these great evils and to make advantage of your foresight, I will suddenly settle Agathyrus in a condition, to furnish me with successors before a new war deprive me of him, and you shall suddenly see the Daughter of Agione, so unworthy Prince Harmaxes, Princess of the Sarmatians.

After he had spoken these words, he departed out of the Room not staying for an answer, and soon after it was reported all about the Court, that Agelmond and Agathyrus were to espouse the two Princesses, Gilismene and Agione. But while the people spoke of nothing but pomp and rejoicing, Harmaxes and Dorcira left no stone unturn’d to break off these matches, incorporating their hatred with a violent jealousy, which they always had of a Brother that was their Matter: For they looked upon the grandeur of that Prince, with a rage which they laboured to disguise, nor could they endure that he should be beloved, either by the people or by the Army. They found they were not able to raise a sufficient force among the Venedians and Igilions, (Territories that were allotted for their own proper portions) to sustain a war against a Monarch so puissant, and whose Authority was more absolute than theirs, even in their own Allotments: So that their hopes were but very small. However to leave nothing unattempted, they kept Cabals both in Court and City, they sent to solicit insurrections where they had any favourites and Soldiers, and dispatching Courriers away privately to Carroduna, they order’d Alicarsis not only to create such niceties and difficulties, as might break off the Treaty; but also to let Mundisc understand, that Agelmond had treated privately with the King of the Sarmatians without his knowledge, and that they had made a league together to ruine the Huns, and that to strengthen their union they had agreed, that Agelmond should marry Gilismene, and Agathyrus espouse Agione. That however yet he might divert the effects of that confederacy, and that the only way was for the King of the Huns, to joyn with the Prince of the Venedians. That to begin, Dorcira would by her faction disturb the Court at Tamyrasque, and that Mundisc should enter Sarmatia, while Harmaxes caused the several Countries to take Arms, and surprisè the King’s forces. That by that means he might take an accommodation, or at least obtain Gilismene for Harmaxes, and Agione for Mundisc, whose passion for her was already made publick.

Though there were ground enough to apprehend the consequence of this secret alliance, nevertheless there would have little or no danger ensued, had not Prince Agathyrus innocently furnished those concealed Enemies with Arms. He was prepossessed with a violent passion, which for reasons of great importance he would not make known to his Father, inasmuch that he appear'd very much disturbed for some days, and at length resolv'd to follow the motions of his own heart, and to get out of the way, before he should be forced to declare himself in relation to that fair Princess whom he was not in a condition to love. The Evening that preceded his departure, he came to see my Master, and made him a hundred protestations of an inviolable friendship; after that he went to Gilismene's Apartment, where he stayed all night: the next morning the Courtiers that were most diligent to attend his rising, not finding him there, and no person being able to tell any certain news of him, all the whole Court was surpris'd with melancholy; and their sadness had questionless increas'd, but that two hours after, an Officer of the Prince brought Letters which his Master had charg'd him to deliver, it is not necessary for me to remember all that they contain'd, it will suffice to let you understand that in that which he directed to Gilismene, he conjured the Princess to pacifie the King, and that the Letter which was sent to that afflicted Prince was to this effect.

Prince Agathyrus to the King his Lord.

Since you have Agelmond in your Family, and peace in your Kingdom, I thought I might take the liberty to absent my self from your Majesty, and that I should not have been wanting in the duty which I owe you, by undertaking a journey which I had not done, (how deeply soever it might concern me) had I thought my presence any way serviceable. But in regard the war with the Huns is at an end, and that the King of the Lombards is truly united to us, I see no Nation that can trouble us, nor why I should not be permitted that curiosity which my age and the peace of Sarmatia may excuse, and which other considerations imperiously justify in my heart.

This Letter very much afflicted the Sarmatian King, he read it over and over, and though he were accustomed to the absence of the Prince, he could not brook this without being touch'd to the quick. While he complains to Gilismene, and labours to comfort himself with Agelmond, whom he looked upon as another Agathyrus, Harmaxes and Dorcira triumph at the news. But how extraordinary soever their joy were, they cunningly dissembled it, and fram'd their countenances to the sorrow which they observ'd in the Court. In the mean while they have their meetings, they consult, they promise largely, and liberally bestow; in a word, they attempt all things, and omit nothing. To gain Agathyrus's Officers, they delude them with false suggestions, telling them that Agathyrus had never left the Court, but only that he could not endure to see a Stranger more powerful than the presumptive Heir of the Crown. That Agathyrus did really love Agelmond, but that after he had examined his proceedings, he found all his actions suspicious and dangerous, that he took notice that the King of the Lombards had not renounc'd a new Kingdom and little considerable, forsaking his Army which was the support thereof, but only to establish himself more firmly and honourably in Sarmatia: that being the only person that sway'd the King's Counsels, and having espous'd his Daughter, it would be no difficult thing for him to rid himself of the only obstacle that could obstruct his pretences.

Harmaxes prething at last with more vehemency than before, Let Agelmond return into Germany, cryed he, let him let us alone to live in our own Country according to the Laws of our Ancestors, and if he desires our alliance, the Princess of the Igylions shall consent to give him her hand, but if he refuse so great an advantage which we are ready to grant him, shall we not have reason to question his insatiable ambition, that makes him aspire to the very Throne of Sarmatia? Shall we not thereby conclude that he return'd to Tamyrac only to possess himself of Gilismene, destroy Agathyrus, and make way for his succession to one of the greatest Kingdoms in Europe? Let us then vigorously oppose such pernicious designs, the interest of our Country presses it, our honour requires it, and the safety of Agathyrus commands it. It was only to conceal his flight that the Prince would not that you should follow him. He has left you at Tamyrac to strengthen our party, which is his; and while he hastens toward Tanais to arm those people which are at his devotion in his own defence, he would have us make our selves Masters of the Court and Army, which remains upon the Coast of Dacia. By such speeches as these accompanied with great gifts, he engaged the principal Officers to gain their friends, to publish cunningly the pretended reason of Agathyrfus's departure, and to perswade those persons that could observe it, that there was a particular friendship between the King of the Lombards and the Prince of Sarmatia, that if the pretended generosity of Agelmond had gained the heart of Agathyrfus, that Prince had chang'd his opinion, having discovered the dangerous practises of the Stranger.

At the same time that they put in execution so pernicious an order, the King of the Lombards spent the happiest hours of his life with the Princess: For no sooner had he comforted that charming person for the departure of Agathyrfus, but he had the satisfaction freely to entertain her with the protestations of his own passion. He discovered to her the violence thereof, how much he had suffered, as well since the fatal moment that he had seen her in the Temple, after the taking of Tamiraque; as after the answer with which she had mortally afflicted him. "Divine Princess, said he pursuing his suit, by what offence had I merited that cruel language? What cause had I given you to hate Agelmond that ador'd you? He sought even to the very bottom of his heart, if there were any thought that might offend you, but he found it was altogether at your devotion, that his thoughts were all such as he ought to have for those persons that are above the condition of mortals. I beseech you therefore my most dear Princess, permit me to understand that which yet I could never find. Declare your mind, answered she, I conjure you: For in short, if you have given your consent that I shall be yours, you ought to suffer nothing in me that you disapprove. How Madam (she continued with an impatience mix'd with grief) will you not vouchsafe me an answer? Alas Sir, replied she most obligingly, what can I say, if I must speak of nothing but your faults! You may Madam, replied the King of the Lombards, discover to me the reason of your hatred, and their impose silence upon me. It may be, replied Gilismene, you will not see so many marks of my Aversion, in a behaviour with which you tax me so often, and I believe Amasia can tell you some things to that purpose, of which you will have no reason to complain. Ah Princess (said he interrupting her, with a new access of joy both in his heart and countenance) if it be so, permit me to hear the same from your own fair lips.

He urg'd her at length in so passionate a manner, that Gilismene at last thus return'd: "Sir, I have been always perswaded that my will ought to depend so absolutely upon my Fathers, that I have laboured to preserve my heart, that it might be at his entire disposal, so that when I took notice that you were about to deprive me of that liberty which I was willing to defend, and that you assail'd it with such a remarkable act of generosity; I borrowed from my reason all the weapons that it could furnish me withal. But when I saw that they were too weak, and that I already perceived in my heart, the first beginnings of an affection that pleaded on your behalf, and acted by consent with your honour; I strove the more with my self, and perhaps not without some trouble: And therefore to deprive you of the means of disturbing the resolution which I had taken, I thought with my self that it behoved me not to hearken to those words, which to tell you true, were terrible to me from the lips of the Lombard King, and of which I should have been less apprehensive, had they been uttered by any other Prince, for whom I had not had that acknowledgment and esteem. "If I so rightly conjectured, most incomparable Princess, replied the King of the Lombards, when I took you for a Deity, by those sparkling fires that darted from your eyes, the farther proofs which I meet now, will not permit me longer to doubt the truth: For is there any mortal person that could plunge me into an Abyss of torments, and at the same time raise me to a heaven of joy, and oblige me to be thankful for the cause of my sufferings! No, no, Madam, there is nothing but a Goddess could have extracted so much joy out of so much grief, or so delude me that I should mistake a testimony of kindness, for a mark of severity. But fairest Princess, act no more in that manner I beseech you, for I must confess I am so fearful to displeas'e you, and so unapt to believe that I do not still offend you, that I should rather dye for grief upon the first act of your cruelty, before I could find a favourable interpretation of your favour. "Alas Sir, replied she with a most obliging aspect, I shall have no more need to make use of that caution, since the knowledge of my Fathers will, permits me not to resist that innocent affection which I feel in my heart, nor to disoblige the King of the Lombards, from shewing me the marks of his.

The enamoured Prince charm'd with those expressions, that gave so much ease to his passion was about to have proceeded, when word was brought both to him and Gilismene, that the Sarmatian King was taken very ill. They were equally afflicted at the news, and immediately they went both together, to see a Prince that was equally beloved of both.

The

The Sarmatian King no sooner saw them enter the Chamber, but he spoke to them with a hearty utterance, to shew them that his indisposition was not considerable, and when they were come near the bed, and that all the croud was retired; “Sir, said he to my Master giving him his hand, look not upon this sickness as an obstruction of my intentions, you shall espouse Gilismene within three days, and it Harmaxes and Dorcira, whose designs I begin to understand, continue obstinate in the opposition of mine, I know how to reduce them to that obedience which they owe me, and to punish those Rebels that have taken their part. Agelmond return’d thanks to the Princesses Father, with all the acknowledgment that a passionate Lover, could summon up for so fair a promise: And after he had made him a protestation, to spare neither his pains nor his life, for the interest of a Prince to whom he really believ’d himself so highly engaged, he left the King and Princess full liberty to discourse of the Divisions of their Family.

Not being willing to lose a moment of time in this important conjuncture, he thought fit to wait upon the Prince of the Venedians, to let him know that his designs were discovered, and to persuade him to make his peace. He thought to have represented to him, how difficult it was to attempt great things with small forces, and the impossibility which was generally observed in keeping private great confederacies. But if neither reasons nor entreaties, would prevail upon the resolutions of Harmaxes, that then the fiery Agelmond was equally resolv’d to dispute the enjoyment of Gilismene with him, to the last drop of his blood, and that it became him not for a private difference, to make a general quarrel to the disturbance of the whole Kingdom and the Royal Family. That it was enough for the two Rivals only to venture, and that in exposing their lives for the Princess, the object of their Love should become the recompence of their valour. However, these good intentions of his prov’d fruitless, for as he was going to Harmaxes, he was inform’d that the Prince was gone out of Town some three or four hours before, and that most probably he was gone a hunting.

Agelmond suspicious of his departure, gave an account thereof to the Sarmatian King: and in regard they could not tell precisely in what place to find Harmaxes, they dispatched several Messengers several ways to enquire after him, nor was it long undiscovered but that he was gone to the Army, and that it was not to be question’d but that he would gain the Soldiers, during the King’s sickness and Agathysus’s absence. The Sarmatian King was vex’d and his malady augmented, the Princess was troubled, and Dorcira seem’d to be surpris’d and disquieted: But Agelmond incens’d against a Prince that was both his Enemy and his Rival, and a Rebel to the father of his Princess, did not stand to make complaints nor to cheer up those that made them. On the contrary, he advis’d the Sarmatian King to send fresh orders to the Lieutenant Generals, that had served under Agathysus, and not only to forbid them to obey the Prince of the Venedians, but at the same time to give them the chief command of the Army, which would be a means to make them refuse Harmaxes, to preserve their own Authority more absolute. Nevertheless they knew not upon whom to pitch for the trust of so weighty a commission, in a Court where there were so many different factions, when the hardy Agelmond, to signalize his courage, thus bespake the father of Gilismene. Sir, said he, I would beg of your Majesty an employment, in the discharge whereof I would contend with Harmaxes, did I not believe that the quality of a Stranger, would rather serve as an excuse for the revolters, than to strengthen your party. But Sir, I will go along with those Officers, whom you shall send to the Army, I will look after the execution of your orders, I will exhort the Soldiers to preserve themselves in that fidelity which they owe their Sovereign, and endeavour to reduce the Prince of the Venedians to his obedience. If he will be neither mov’d with my persuasions, nor the respects which I shall pay to his birth, he shall try the strength of an Arm that he has but little reason to despise, and perhaps he may find that Agelmond will perform that for the Sarmatian King, that he never did for the Huns or the Lombards. The Father of Gilismene transported with acknowledgment, threw his Arms about Agelmond’s neck, and embracing him with an extraordinary tenderness; The Gods defend me, said he, from suffering Agelmond to expose himself to so great a danger. No Sir, you shall not go to an Army, where without doubt Harmaxes is by this too powerful, and since you are the object of his hatred, ought I to consent that you should become a victim to his revenge? What must I do then Sir, replied he, shall I remain shut up immur’d within the walls of a City, when your Enemies and mine are Masters of your Army and of the field? Or shall I seem to forsake you, while I go to fetch that succour which I cannot bring time enough? No, it is better for me to go try an Army where the generous Prince of Sarmatia has left behind some remains of a good opinion of the Lombard King: whither I shall not go without your orders, and the most faithful of your Officers, and where it may be I may not find any one except Harmaxes, that dare lift up his Sword against a King.

In short Sir, my Master spake with such a graceful assurance, that the father of Gilismene would no more oppose his resolution, so that he went forth of the Chamber, animated with a noble pride that sparkled in his very eyes. Nevertheless that heroick heat soon gave way to a profound melancholy: For while they were preparing all things necessary for a journey of so great importance, the enamoured Agelmond visited the beautiful Gilismene, from whom he found himself constrained to absent himself. At first that he might shew no ill omens of his enterprize, he laboured to suppress his grief, but strove in vain, for he no sooner came into the Princesses presence, but having sed his eyes with all those beauties of which he was now to take his leave, on a sudden he resolved not to forsake them, and he maintained this change with all the arguments that could flatter his love. He thought that it behoved him not to forsake, neither the Princess nor the sick King, nor the Capital City of the Kingdom. Nor did he want several other reasons, by vertue of that active intention, that furnishes Lovers fancies, which crouded to strengthen his new resolution. But with the same quickness he considered, that if he stayed in Tamyraque, Harmaxes's authority would increase in the Army, and that consequently his Rival would soon appear before a City, that would certainly submit to his power, rather than undergo a civil war in favour of a stranger, against a Prince of the blood. And therefore determining to follow those motives, that were most suitable to the Conjunction of affairs, and the promise which he had made the King; I must be gone Madam, cryed he fully resolved within himself, yes dear Princess, we must part and I must leave you, but never fear lest my sorrow should enfeeble me, or that our enemies shall gain any advantage thereby. On the contrary, I find it accompanied with a despair that will prove fatal to them, and perhaps they may see themselves punished for separating the King of the Lombards from the divine Princess whom he adores. I would not Sir, however, (answered she with an obliging sadness) that such a generous Prince should abandon himself entirely to the heat of his courage, I would have him expose himself less than he was wont to do, and that he may return with success to the King and to a Princess, that is not a little concern'd both for his life and glory. Ah if it be so, (replied he with an extasie that he could not master) then I shall overcome Harmaxes, for were I alone and be at the head of an Army, I desire but my Arm and my love to triumph over such a Rebel. But alas, added he, how shall I be able to hasten to this victory? how shall I be able to seek it at a distance from my Princess?

With that he stopped, and perceiving that his passion raised new troubles in his soul, he was afraid of his reason, and therefore out of that generosity that commanded him to withstand his love, he resolved briskly to depart and to leave Gilismene, without making any farther reflection: Yet could he not exactly do what he intended, and were I not in the sequel of the discourse, to describe more considerable circumstances of the same nature; I would have less succinctly declared the particulars of this separation, let me only add this, that my Master having manifested to Gilismene all the marks of his love and sorrow, was forced at length to take his leave of her, and in point of civility gave a visit to Dorcira, with whom he stayed a little while, and discoursed but with a cold indifferency. When he was ready to depart, the Lombards that were in Tamyraque, took horse; and all the Horse-guard of the Sarmatian King were ready to attend him. But Agelmond unwilling to weaken the City wherein his Mistress resided, took no more than a hundred Lombards and as many Sarmatians, leaving the rest after he had recommended the King and Princess to their valour, and exhorted them to an immoveable fidelity in their defence. On the other side the Sarmatian King sent after Agelmond, those Troops which the Prince refused to take along with him, and having declared his desire that the King of the Lombards might have a considerable Convoy, immediately the young Nobility of the Court, that were not tainted with faction, made hast also to overtake him. Thus my Master at the head of two thousand Horse, marched to meet an Army of sixty thousand men with that speed, as if the chief Commander of that vast number, had had as much kindness and affection for him, as he had mortal hatred against him. We found what we sought for sooner than we expected, for the Prince of the Venedians desirous to lye near Tamyraque, advanced toward us: So that Agelmond dispatched away two Sarmatian Officers, who had the King's orders in charge, accompanied with several horsemen of their own Nation, to add the more credit to their solicitation. However he linged not far behind, to the end that by countenancing them he might add the greater Authority to their commission, as also if occasion required, to astonish the Rebels by some daring or surprizing Action. The deputies met Harmaxes, who rode before the Body of the Army, with about four thousand Horse, the impatient Prince being desirous to reach the City with all expedition, where he pretended to satisfy his love and his ambition. He made no question but that Tamyraque would suddenly submit to his summons, Summons, and if the power of his Faction, the strength which he brought along with him, and the King's sickness made him confident, the great Army that march'd slowly after to execute his commands, gave him yet more certain assurances. He receiv'd Toxanes and Indyfes (for so were the Deputies nam'd) but in regard they were to deliver him from the King those Letters which only serv'd as a pretence for their journey, they discharged themselves of their Commission as soon as might be, that they might not engage in a dispute which might bring them to any prejudice. Harmaxes instead of receiving the King his Brother's Packet, fiercely beholding the Sarmatians that presented it, I shall be suddenly, said he, at Tamyraque, where the King may tell me his mind himself. In the mean time tell him that I am advancing toward him at the head of sixty thousand men, who may perhaps be able to proteſt me from the power of a Stranger whom he prefers with ſo much injuſtice.

Thus he ſent back the Deputies, whom he had ſeiz'd without doubt, but that he durſt not begin a war by a violence that was contrary to the Law of Nations, the conſequence whereof might be dangerous in an Army where Toxanes and Indyfes had ſo many Friends and Favourites. So ſoon as thoſe two Sarmatians were return'd, and had given an account of what had paſſ'd, my Maſter commanded them to wheel about, and put themſelves into the Army, there to confer with the Lieutenant General, to whom they were particularly ſent. While they manage that affair, Agelmond makes it his buſineſs to obſerve the ſituation of the Country, among the reſt he ſpies a ſmall ſlip of land where a ſmall number might engage, without danger of being environed; of that Poſt he makes himſelf Maſter, and poſſeſſes it. And in regard he was exactl, inform'd of the diſtance between his Troops and thoſe of Harmaxes, he commands his own to take their reſoſe, while he for his part ſtudies all the while how to bring all the danger of the Encounter upon himſelf. To this purpoſe calling a Trumpeter, Go, ſaid he, tell Prince Harmaxes 'tis yet in his power to ſettle a calm in the Dominions of his Brother, and that if his hatred of me hinders him from conſenting to a firm and entire peace, I am ready to break a Lance with him for the deciſion of our differences, without involving in our quarrel ſo many millions of men who are no way intereſted therein. After that when he thought 'twas time to embattel his Troops, he ranged them in an inſtant, and march'd at the head of them with a fierceneſs in his looks able to inſpire courage into the moſt timorous of Cowards.

On the other hand, the Venediſh Prince could not determine what anſwer to make, his natural boldneſs, and the neceſſity that engages a General to purchaſe a good opinion of himſelf in the beginning of a war, perſuaded him to accept the challenge which my Maſter ſent him. But on the other hand, conſidering that he ſhould commit the probable ſucceſs of a Battel to the chance of a particular Combat, he chang'd his opinion, yet not knowing what to reſolve. During this turmoil of his thoughts, the Scouts on both ſides meet, they know one another, make a ſtand and fall to parly. Immediately thoſe of our party upbraid the other for Rebels, they accuſe them of marching againſt their Prince, while theſe that ſided with Harmaxes revile the Sarmatians that followed Agelmond as Traitors to their Country, and for ſerving a Stranger that was an Enemy to it; from words they fell to blows, and fought with an obſtinate fury, as is uſual in a civil war. The victory was for ſome time doubtful, but at length declared it ſelf for us, and in regard that ſome of our party purſued the Enemy, the Prince of the Venedians to relieve his own, commanded off ſome few Troops from his main Body, which the King of the Lombards obſerving, was forc'd to do the ſame thing; ſo that they prepared for a general Encounter, and the two Generals advanced with the groſs of their Cavalry. The fierce Agelmond exhorted his Soldiers in a few words, flies upon his Enemies with an unparallel'd fury, and at one blow cauſing the Sky to ring again, threw to the ground two Sarmatians with their Horſes, and all with his Lance that ſhivered in a thouſand pieces, being too weak to ſecond the Arm that gave the ſtroke. Then our undaunted Champion drawing his Sword, throws himſelf among the thickeſt, and ſeeking for Harmaxes, calls him by his name, challenges him, and at length eſpying a certain Knight no leſs remarkable for his brave Exploits, than for the Magnificence of his Arms, he made no queſtion but that the hated Rival that oppoſed his felicity was there, he reſolves to cloſe with him, he redoubles his blows, he opens a paſſage for himſelf by his valour that outbrav'd number and reſiſtance, and fought with that fury as every where begat terror. Delay incens'd the haughty Agelmond, he ſecretly reproach'd his heart and arm, and at length diſcharged ſo weighty a blow upon the head of his Enemy, that his Helmet ſtruck fire, and the Knight reeling a while in his Saddle, at length fell under his Horſes Belly; however he was ſet upon his feet again in an inſtant by ſome of his own men, when the haughty King ſeeing him in that lamentable condition, inſtead of finiſhing his Victory, turn'd the fury of his Sword another way. His Sword glittered in his hand like Lightning, and that Lightning is accompanied with a Thunder that kills, overturns, and strikes such a terror, that the Enemy fled, and left us Master of the Field. Agelmond fearing lest the Enemies might draw him into the Body of the Army; and taking notice that the slip of Land where they had fought began to widen into a wide and large plain, he stopped the forwardest of his men, presaging by what had happened, that he should prosper in what remain'd. He sent therefore to the two Lieutenant Generals with whom he thought that Toxanes and Indyres had already conferred. He desires a suspension of Arms for the day, and easily obtains it, for indeed the Agents of the Sarmatian King had been favourably receiv'd, and their proposals were the rather listened to, by reason that Harmaxes was wounded, and their Vanguard of Horse defeated; insomuch that my Master advances, attended by considerable Knights, and sitting up his Viser that his face might be observ'd, he address'd himself to the Officers that crowd'd to see him, and thus bespake them with much vehemency and Majesty:

Soldiers too much abus'd, too credulous Sarmatians, open your eyes, and consider the crime which you commit in marching against your King, consider the miseries you will fall into by fighting one against another: 'tis a King that speaks to you, and that gives you his advice, 'tis a King that Harmaxes accuses to be the author of all your dissensions, and has questionless made you believe to be a Stranger detestable for his practices. But examine Agelmond's proceedings, and Harmaxes's Actions; consider that a Stranger advises you to obey your King, and to live in peace, that the Prince of the Venedians goes about to kindle a civil war, that he marches against his Brother, against his Country, against the Father of Agathyrus your beloved and renowned General. After all this will you stand to consider which side to take? Rather will you not forsake the high way to Disorder and Rebellion, and chuse the Road that brings you to your Duty and your Honour? They that so much deceive you, as to persuade you to this revolt, under the appearance of a particular quarrel, let them still persuade you, provided that they spare your blood, and that the Prince of the Venedians only will maintain his interest against the King of the Lombards. If he accept the challenge which I make him, I shall be content, and your troubles will be soon at an end. If he refuse it, and to save his own would expose the lives of so many valiant men, I hope you will change your minds, and that an Army furnish'd with so many victories will not obey a Prince so unworthy to command them after he has manifested a cowardise so notorious.

So soon as the King of the Lombards had done speaking, there was heard a humming noise quite through the whole Army, when the generous Prince having caressed the principal Officers in a most obliging manner, on a sudden the confused buzzing of voices was accompanied with many cries of GOD SAVE THE KING; while the Shouts of all that multitude made the Sky resound, Harmaxes recovered out of his Swoon, for it was with him that my Master had encountred, and becoming desperate to see the change which he too well observed, wounded as he was, mounts his Horse, and flying for his safety slips into Tamyraque; he is not only received there, but shewing himself to the people, speaking to them, and letting them see his wounds, he mov'd them to compassion, and to take part with him. Thus in regard the King was sick, and the most faithful of his Nobility with us, and that the Princess Dorcira's party joyned with Harmaxes, that Prince instead of losing an Army gains a City, and becomes Master of his King's life, and of the Princess whom he lov'd. To establish his power he rewards the most forward of his Cabal, and exercises a cruel tyranny over those that he could not move. Agelmond is inform'd of his outrages, at the same time seiz'd with grief, and transported with choler, but afterwards comforts himself by the assistance of his reason, and seeing himself absolute, and belov'd in the Army, finds himself in a condition still to vanquish the Venedian Prince, and suddenly to restore the Sarmatian King and the Princess his Daughter to their liberty. But alas, so far was fortune ready to favour him, that the now displays the most terrible of his persecutions: for in his hasty march towards Tamyraque, one of Gilismene's Attendants brought him a Letter that fully inform'd us of all those revolutions of which we had heard but imperfectly before. The Letter was to this effect.

BE gone, Sir, be gone from an ingrateful Land where your noble Deeds are so foully requited, abandon a Country where your Generosity is the innocent cause of our misfortunes. It has endangered the life of my Father, it renders me the object of the rebellious peoples hatred: and I fear it will at length hamper you likewise in the snares of our Enemies. For Heaven's sake shun this last misfortune, and be not the cause of more; you may pacifie all things by your departure; and if you are unwilling to absent your self from Gilismene, I give you leave to believe that Gilismene is no less troubled to be deprived of the sight of the Lombard King.

How obliging soever these last words were, they could not mitigate my Master's despair, No, no, cruel Princess, cryed he, I shall not absent my self from you; for notwithstanding your inhumanity, so passionate is my love, that though the whole earth should conspire with Harmaxes against the miserable Agelmond, I would rather cease to live than forbear to see you.

At those words he felt himself too sensibly oppress'd with grief, he walked in a passion to and fro; and at length addresting himself to the Sarmatian that brought the Letter from the Princess, he made such mournful complaints as mov'd all that heard him to compassion. Nevertheless, we took the liberty to speak; as well to justify Gilismene, as to persuade Agelmond, we represented to him all the miseries of Tamyraque; we told him that it was but prudence to give way to the necessity of the times; and that the journey which seem'd so severe, yet promised no unsuccessful consequences. But all these reasons did but the more provoke him against us, he looked upon us as the common Enemy, and was about to have march'd the Sarmatians against the Sarmatians, and against the Metropolis of their Country, had they not suddenly made use of the only means to avoid those miseries with which that potent Monarchy was threatned. To this purpose there was an interview of both parties propos'd, and the Princess obtain'd her self what no person else could, inasmuch that the day, place and other circumstances were agreed upon. They chose a Bridge which is not above three miles from Tamyraque, and a part of the Bridge was beaten down to separate those two renowned personages that were to hold the conference. The enamour'd Agelmond was there before the hour appointed. But as soon as the Princess of the Sarmatians appear'd, the King of the Lombards ran to meet her, transported with the violence of his passion, and as soon as he was come as near as the cruel prevention would permit him, he appeared so forlorn and disquieted, that instead of speaking first, as he had intended, he stood mute and motionless. 'Tis true, that he observing Gilismene to be sad, and carelessly habited, he from that received some consolation, which though it were not strong enough to dissipate his disturbance, yet at least it empowered him to interrupt his silence: Is it possible, Madam, said he, that you should command me to absent my self from you? Sir, answered she, they contrain me to it. They contrain you to it, (cryed he impatiently, interrupting her;) Ah, Madam, rather say it is your pleasure: for in short, while Agelmond beholds the Beams of Day, and leads an Army, who is so hardy as to controul your will? Harmaxes, who commands in the City, replied she, Harmaxes who is absolute Master of the life of the King my Father. Do you believe, Madam, said he, that he commits on purpose the attempt which causes your fear? I believe, said she, there is no extremity to which his rage and ambition will not transport him; and yet I must tell you I did not yield at the first blow: for the Gods above know what I have suffered from the people of Tamyraque, and the Prince of the Igylions, before I consented never to see you again. Never to see me again! (cryed he with an utterance that shewed his despair) Ah, Madam, I will see you again; nor is there any power in the world that shall make me renounce that felicity. Questionless it must not be with my consent that you ever see me more; for I have solemnly engaged, (said she with a doleful aspect) to calm the troubles of Sarmatia, and restore the life of my Father to safety and repose. This last promise, said he, does not at all oblige you to performance; for besides that it was forc'd from you against your will, you know I have already receiv'd a promise that prohibits you from making any contrary engagement. Nor will I, replied Gilismene, ever give my hand to Prince Harmaxes, to whom I have testified with sufficient constancy that I would prefer death before marriage, though thereupon the re-union of the Royal Family, and the peace of all Sarmatia would have ensued. Yes Sir, for your sake I let the cause of our troubles continue, but it is not necessary for me to recount the particulars, of which you would be too sensibly apprehensive. Nor is it fit for me to discover to you all my affection, at a time when it is for your repose to lose the remembrance of a Princess, whose thoughts you cannot but suspect, and who seems to act by consent with your enemies. How Madam, replied he sighing, can you wish that I should forget you? I cannot tell, said she, whether I can, but I know well that I ought. Ah cruel Princess, said he interrupting her, if you are capable of doing your self that piece of service, then am I still more miserable than ever I thought my self, and the niceness of my heart finds more of inhumanity in your last words, than in all the persecutions of my Enemy: So that now being only to follow the instigations of my despair, I will appear to morrow before these walls that enclose a power which you favour, I will throw to the earth those cruel Barricadoes, that separate you from me, and after I have triumphed over my Rival, and set at liberty a generous Prince, to whom I am so infinitely engaged, I will expire at your feet, if you will not permit me to be the most happy among men.

He pronounced these words with such an aspect, that it was easie to conjecture thence, that he intended what he said, so that Gilismene fearing lest Harmaxes should be transported, to use more violent extremities, sigh'd, and let fall some tears from her fair eyes. Then looking upon my Master with a languishment, not to be denyed whatever it requested; "I make no question Sir, said she, but that you are in a condition to overcome all your enemies, and to carry whatever Cities you assault: But what success soever you may promise your self from your valour, it can never be possible for you to secure the life of the King my Father. That unfortunate Prince must undergo the fate which is threaten'd him by the Rebels, and Prince Harmaxes by his death and the absence of Agathyrus shall be looked upon as King of Sarmatia, it may be by those very Troops that at present obey your command. I need not tell you after all this that if you march against Tamyraque, the people will certainly accuse me of having betrayed them, and being once incens'd that I incited you to my revenge, will without doubt sacrifice me to their fury. "Let me perish first, cryed he in an Agony, Let all things go to ruine first, but let my dear Princess live and live in peace. I will quit Sarmatia since it is your pleasure, and in regard it will not be difficult for me to dye, when I find my self condemned to be exiled from your presence, 'twill be easie for Harmaxes to dispose of the body of the unfortunate Agelmond, that abominated body deprived of his soul because deprived of his love.

Concluding these words and beholding those charming beauties of which he was now upon the point of losing the sight, his eyes fix'd in his head, when I seeing him begin to stagger, ran to uphold him in my Arms. Gilismene became so sensible thereof, that the same assistance which I gave him, seem'd almost as seasonable from other hands for her. But that prudent person upbraiding the symptoms of her weakness, and using her utmost endeavour to begin again; "You would then dye Sir, said she, and is it not enough for me to endure every moment the insultings, and bear the threats of my Enemies, but that the King of the Lombards himself must afflict me with his despair, and expose me to more cruel persecutions? I confess I have consented not to see you while Harmaxes lives, yet that I neither do or ought to desire the death of the Princess. But nature and honour required of me to strive so far against my love, for the safety of my Father and the security of his dominions. Let us then suffer since Heaven ordains it so to be, and instead of impatiently winning the change of our fortune, let us wait that happy resolution, with a constancy that may render us worthy of it. "What not a word of answer, (added she; observing that my Master had not the power to speak) will not your reason permit you to resolve———" Ah Madam, replied he, you must not seek either for reason or resolution in me, for there is nothing in my heart but love and grief.

He could utter no more so was his soul oppress'd with sadness, but Gilismene still urging him; "Had you a real kindness for me, you would grant me that tranquillity, as well for my Country as my self, but since you refuse me so obstinately, I must return to a City up in Arms, or———" Stay my Princess, said he interrupting her, I beseech you stay a moment. With that he held his peace, he beheld Gilismene, he sigh'd, and at last determining with himself in an instant; "Well Madam, said he, I will obey, I will leave Sarmatia, and I will live because you command me.

While he thus spoke, love had the honour to draw some tears from his eyes, and the Princess who observed him, began to be so deeply sensible, that she was afraid she should not be Mistress of her own heart, unless she put an end to a conversation that wrought so powerfully upon her mind. Upon that she turn'd away, but in regard her motion was slow, she could not forbear to look back upon the unfortunate Agelmond, and to give him this Farewel, Adieu, Generous Prince, preserve the remembrance of a Princess that never will forget you. My Master quite forlorn and disconsolate, called aloud after her, and conjured Gilismene to stay yet a little longer; but as she made a sign to him with her hand to return, Farewel then, cryed he, too beautiful, but too severe and cruel Princess.

Viginizus was about to have continued his Relation, and to have proceeded to the most moving passages of the Story, but he was interrupted by a great noise and Hurly Burly in the Army, which obliged those illustrious personages to leave the King of Suevia's Chamber, and to shew themselves in the Camp where the cause of the tumult required their examination.

PHARAMOND.

The Tenth Part.

BOOK I.

He Princes who had been hearkening to the Story of Agelmond's Adventures, were no sooner departed out of the King of Suevia's Chamber, but they saw a certain person in pursuit of another, He shall die, cryed he, the Traitor shall die, nor shall the rescue of any one prevail in his favour, that seeks to rob him from an Arm strengthened with the justest indignation that ever was. Thus spoke the fell Briomer, not only endeavouring to accompany his threats with blows, but, so blind was his rage, to make his way also at the same time through an infinite company of armed men that oppos'd his fury. The implacable Enemy of Pharamond understanding that that Prince had sent some propofals to the King of the Basternes for the exchange of Prisoners, was got out of his Chamber, notwithstanding his wounds, to break off the Treaty, to the end he might prejudice those persons whom the King of the Franks demanded, only because he thought they were belov'd by the unfortunate Vanquisher of Theobald: but when he saw and knew a certain Knight that was sent back to Pharamond, a particular interest intermixing with that famous aversion that surpris'd all the world, his rage augmented after so strange a manner, that they who favoured not his passion, were hardly safe in the company of that furious Cimbrian. True it is that Balamir came just in the nick of time, being one of the first that hastened to the Hurly Burly, either in regard it concern'd a Lieutenant-General of the Army of which he had the command, or else because his Generosity delighted in the preservation of any person in misery. Briomer no sooner cast his eyes upon the Prince but he grew pale, and fain would have disengag'd himself out of the Crowd, but the fierce Balamir taking notice of his behaviour, Stay, cryed he, and seeing he made no haste to obey him, Stay, said he again with a more commanding utterance, and force me not to make use of the authority which I have receiv'd from your Sovereign Mistress. I acknowledge not, insolently replied he, the power which you have from the Queen of the Cimbrians, while you employ it to the advantage of her Enemies against her most faithful Subjects.

Upon that contumelious answer the incens'd Balamir cast a menacing look upon the outrageous Briomer, yet afterwards considering him to be an object unworthy of his anger, Know, said he, that such violences as these are not permitted during the time of a Treaty. I know, replied the obstinate Cimbrian, that a Treaty suspends acts of Hostility between two Armies, but does not protect a Villain from the punishment of a thousand crimes which he has committed among us. Let him speak, cryed the Prisoner, let him speak on, accured by the presence of Balamir, to whom he address'd himself, so much it concerns you more than you think for, to examine the cause of an assault which I had no reason to have suspected from Briomer's hands, bands, considering what has pass'd. Perhaps it may concern you more than your life; at least it will be some satisfaction to you to know it the same time, by the examination of our difference, what the Generous Pharamond has done for the renowned Balamir.

At those words Briomer grew pale a second time; whereupon the Prince of the Huns, who observ'd him, conceiving that he was to omit no part of his Duty at such a time, sent to give Rosamond an account of all that had happened; and turning himself toward a Trumpeter that came from Pharamond upon his dismissal, Tell the King your Master, said he, that it is only to understand how much I am engag'd to his favour that I keep this Prisoner two or three days longer; and that when I have discovered what I seek for, I will conduct him my self to the Camp of the Franks: and in the mean time I shall not fail to take care of a person who, for ought I know, is not indifferently esteem'd by the King that sends to demand him.

While Balamir spake in this manner, and that the Soldiers gathered from all parts to the noise of the tumult, the Queen of the Cimbrians was not a little vexed to hear of Briomer's outrageous deportment: and in regard that incomparable Princess had a very great value and kindness for Balamir; and that Pharamond was more deeply fix'd in her heart than was convenient for her repose, all the inclinations of her mind contended within her to arrest Briomer, and to leave him to the rigour of the Law if he were convicted of any crime that deserved punishment. But while she was sending for the Captain of her Guards to give him order to execute what she had resolv'd upon, several persons came into her Chamber to speak to her in the behalf of the furious Briomer, whether it were that they were already his Friends, or that they desired to gain his friendship, by preserving him from a disgrace which they knew was not enough to ruine him quite: Madam, said one of the principal Officers to Rosamond, I am too fearful that what you are about to do may prove an action of too much severity; nor can I tell whether the simple accusation of a person already guilty, and already misus'd by Briomer, be enough to force you to that resolution which you have taken against the Lieutenant General of your Armies. You know, Madam, how great an esteem the King your Father had for Briomer, and that the valiant Cimbrian has been very vigilant in your service. You also see, Madam, that he is only accus'd by a Traytor as unworthy to be believ'd, as incapable of fidelity, and who accuses him at a time when he was about to punish him for deserting his Colours, and running away to the most irreconcilable of your Enemies.

These arguments made some impressi'on in Rosamond's mind, and produced at length a good effect, being seconded by a complement sent to the incomparable Princess from the King of Suevia: for that Prince was soon inclin'd to protect a man whose humour was so conformable to his own; so that he having entreated the fair Queen of the Bohemians in favour of him, she would not resolve to execute altogether what she had resolv'd, though her heart sollicit'd her to give an entire satisfaction to the two Princes whom she preferr'd before all the world: yet because she resolv'd not to leave altogether unpunish'd a fault of which Balamir had reason to complain, she commanded an Officer of her Guards to seek out Briomer, and take him into custody. The furious Cimbrian so soon as he understood his Commission, could not forbear to cast a fierce look upon him, and to lay his hand upon the Hilt of his Sword: and 'tis verily thought his fury would have transported him to a Rebellion, if the strange antipathy which he had for the King of the Franks, being the prevailing passion of his Soul, had not staid his Arm, when he considered that his death, which would be the issue of such an attempt, would be the best of tydings that could glad the ear of a Prince whom he hated so mortally. He submitted therefore to the execution of the Queen's commands, but trembling for madness; and the multitude that was gathered together, not only beheld his disgrace with astonishment, but also expected some more extraordinary consequence. The Princes and great personages whom the tumult had either drawn together, or who heard it discours'd of, were differently affect'd in taking some one part, and some another. Varanez and all those whom the charms of Rosamond had rendered Rivals to Pharamond and Balamir, were not over glad of a change which they saw likely to happen in the fortune of a Cimbrian who had always oppos'd the Prince of the Huns, and was the implacable enemy of Pharamond. But Ambiomer and all they whose Generosity acted at full liberty, were well contented to see the insolency of a violent man brought down and curbed, which was always quarrelling with some great Prince or other.

So soon as the Officer had executed the command which he had receiv'd from the Queen his Mistress, the multitude presently dispers'd. Varanez went up to the Castle to visit that renowned Beauty that reign'd Sovereign Mistress of his heart, notwithstanding the natural fierceness of his disposition: and Balamir went to the King of the Batarnes, to return into his hands, and to recommend at the same time to his care, the prisoner whom he had promised to send back in a few days to Pharamond's Army. As for Ambiorix, he had no sooner turn'd himself about, but he seem'd to be surpris'd to meet the Knight, whom he had dispatched toward Ambiorix (which was the name of the Gaul who had bred him in his infancy) and being impatient to know the cause of his so sudden return; Clagesilius, said he, what obstacle have you met with in the journey which I sent you? Sir, (said he presenting him a Servant of Ambiorix) This Gaul whom you know, will tell you the reason of my sudden return, by informing you that Ambiorix is coming himself, with all the speed that his aged years will permit him, to give you information of a Father, whom you have so long time desired to know.

Which being confirmed by the Gaul, and repeated with several other circumstances; Ambiorix who was of an excellent disposition, received no small satisfaction; and the cause of his joy was no sooner spread through the whole Camp, where his vertue was generally esteem'd, but he was complemented by all the great personages. Yet how great soever Ambiorix's expectations were, he resolv'd to obey Amalazombha's orders, and to put himself presently at the head of the Turlingiens, unless she would permit him to tarry two or three days for Ambiorix, if it might not be prejudicial to an obliging Queen whom he loved with all. As he was going to the Apartment of that Princess, he perceiv'd himself as it were train'd along to Agione's: And thereupon following the imperious motion of his heart, he was received by the fair Princess of the Lombards, with all the civility which he could expect from a person of her sex and quality. Generous Ambiorix (said she after a most obliging manner) I make no question but that all the world is glad of that good fortune which is promis'd you, but I assure you, with that frankness which your kindness and your obligations merit, that there are very few that more rejoyce at it than my self.

These words pronounced by so fair lips, fill'd the soul of Ambiorix with a pleasure that diffus'd something of an unusual novelty into his heart, and as he was about to give such testimonies thereof, as apparently appear'd not to be the effects of a single acknowledgment, some persons of quality entred at the same time, and chang'd the subject of the discourse. Ambiorix also for that reason, in a short time took his leave, and notwithstanding all the joy that fill'd his thoughts, he was not a little vexed that he had not time to answer Agione after that manner which he desired, insomuch that after he had examin'd what kind of discontent it was, he found it to be a symptome of change which his generosity upbraiding, he went to Amalazombha's Chamber, as it were to fortifie his former passion. There he found a Turlingien Officer sent by the General, to give her an account of what concern'd the march of her Army. He told her that Prince Sunnon had made a hundred obliging offers to the Turlingiens, yet that not so much as one among them had accepted them, after all the Compliments that had pass'd, But Madam (said Ambiorix so soon as he understood the Turlingien's Errand) your forces will not be so unwilling to serve me, for besides that they have been successful already in obeying my commands, there is no particular cause that can make them have any aversion to me.

Those words caus'd Amalazombha to blush, renewing the remembrance of Amalaric, and causing her to meditate upon the strong affection which she had for a Prince, who had deprived her of her only Brother: However having somewhat recollect'd her self; 'Tis not the death of the King of Turlingia, answer'd she, that hinders us from receiving the assistance of Prince Sunnon, he is no way guilty of it, nor can I complain of the valour of the King his Brother, as the only cause of my affliction. There are other reasons that perswade me to carry my self circumspectly toward the Brother of Pharamond, and oblige me to shew the same reservedness to Ambiorix. Those reasons which you speak of, Madam, reply'd he, were in force while you were in Turlingia, yet they produced not the same effects, which I have observ'd in your Majesty's mind, since your Arrival in this Camp. At that time, reply'd Amalazombha, I was under a necessity, that put me out of a condition to consult the law of decency, so exactly as I would have done: But since I have no more enemies that can force me to put the same restraint upon my soul; I am altogether perswaded that it is no longer lawful for me to act with the same liberty. Besides that I have forgot to talk to you concerning Ambiorix, or to tell you that it would be a very unjust thing to send you from a place, where they say that famous Gaul will arrive in few days. Upon these words pronounced with such a visible indifferency, Ambiorix, a generous contempt about to take possession of his soul, and to drive out of his mind the remainder of an affection so ill bestow'd, and beholding Amalazombha with an aspect that apparently upbraided her disrespect; I must confess Madam, reply'd he, that you have exceedingly oblig'd me, and that you could not speak more engagingly to a person so useless as Ambiorix, of that which concerns the discovery of his birth.

. Having so said, he took leave of the Queen of the Turingians, and the better to meditate upon the behaviour of that Prince, he resolv'd to go forth of the Camp, and to seek a place proper for his intention. In the mean time he revolv'd in his mind, wherein he observ'd a certain negligence, which seem'd to be so injurious and cruel to him, that being no longer Master of his anger; Unjust Princess, cryed he, ingrateful Amalazontha, is it thus that you slight the most important of all the happinesses of my life? I have forgot methinks, do you say, to talk to you of Ambiomex: Is this all the acknowledgment which you have reserved for Ambiomex? How! you not only forget to speak to him of that, for which all the greatest persons in the Army have wish'd him joy, but with such a Methinks, so scornful as not to be endured. You shew that you vouchsafe not so much as to remember whether or no you spake to me, about the clearing the nobility of my birth. Well disobliging Queen, take no more care for what concerns the life of Ambiomex: Forget that he restored you to your Kingdom, forget that he established your Throne with the price of his blood, and to carry your ingratitude yet further, forget also that Ambiomex had a passion for you, which he infinitely preferred before the most important services he ever did you. For my part, insensible Princess, yet perhaps too sensible for some other Lovers good, that is to be more happy than Ambiomex, I will deface all those impressions which the charms of your face had printed in my heart. Or if by accident I come to think upon the chains which for your sake I have worn, I will never call them to my memory but to remember their weight, or to reproach my own faint-heartedness, that wore them so patiently.

When he had uttered these words, he went forth of the Entrenchments, and took notice that the distance between the two Camps, seem'd rather to unite than separate them, by reason of the pleasing effect of the Treaty then on foot. An infinite number of Soldiers and Officers fill'd the Plain, seeking for one anothers friends, to give some proofs of their kindness, that had given so many of their Animosity. In short, that Plain that had been so fatal to so many thousand men, began to change the Copy of its countenance, and instead of those dreadful sights of horreur, which it had display'd some days before, there was nothing then which offer'd it self to the eye, but objects of divertisement and various marks of reconciliation.

Ambiomex was extremely pleas'd to cast his eyes upon such an infinite multitude of various Nations gathered together, but instead of standing to consider the variety of their Arms, Weapons and Habits, he perceiv'd that the charms of Amalazontha, and the beauty of the Lombard Princess had begun a Combat in his heart: So that he went a good way into the wood, to the end he might with more convenience examine his thoughts, and know the precise nature thereof. But not being able to find out a place retir'd enough for his purpose, he took notice that those great Trees, which had been the occasion of so much dread and fear, by favouring so many murders and robberies; extended then their fair and large branches but only to afford a cooler Air, and to draw a greater number of people to their delightful shades, so many personages of the highest quality of both Sexes, were to be seen in that part of the wood. Among the rest, Ambiomex saw two or three Magnificent Chariots, out of which several Ladies were alighted to walk, in a place where since the Cessation of Arms, their Tranquillity was not disturb'd with the least appearance of fear.

The prepossess'd Knight would not stay, either to behold the women nor to inform himself whether they came from Cologne or from the Camp of Pharamond. The sight of them wrought only this effect, that it brought to his remembrance that in that wood it was, where he first met the fair Princess of the Lombards. After that he thought with himself, that the Heavens had shew'd her to him, to the end her charms might uphold the generous resolution which he had taken, of banishing the Queen of the Turingians out of his heart, And at the same time perceiv'd his heart more violently turmoyl'd; Questionless, cryed he, my fate ordains me to break my former Chains, and to put on the fair Agione's fetters, fortune desires at length to be reconcil'd to me, she is upon the point of putting into my hands a happiness which I have sought in vain until this hour. For certain it is, that she had not brought me to Agione's Chariot, but that she intended I should only serve so fair a Princess. More than that, have I not already observ'd more ample marks of acknowledgment from the Sister of Agelmond, than I have found ingratitude in Amalazontha's behaviour? After two such opposite experiments as these, is it lawful for me to take a moments consideration? and ought I not presently to determine to prefer that lovely sweetness, that spreads a secret charm through all the words and actions of the Lombard Princess, before Amalazontha's indifferency.

At the same instant he thought himself to be no longer subject to the laws of the Turingian Queen, so that he impatiently desir'd to see Agione, to whom he thought himself behold-ing for the repose which he hop'd to enjoy. But so soon as he was got out of the Wood upon his return to the Army, that constancy that fortifies the hearts of great men against all sorts of change, caus'd him to make new reflections, and was at length the occasion of new discontents: Unhappy Ambiomer, cry'd he sighing, what is that which makes thee conceive such flattering hopes? Unless they let thee know the person that gave thee life, who can warrant thee that thy Birth is illustrious? Who knows not but that it may obscure the lustre of some Actions that have spread thy name so far? And although the Lombard Princess may testify some kindness for a Dutiful Knight that has faithfully serv'd her, who can assure thee that she will preserve the same thoughts for a presumptuous Lover, the first marks of whose passion may offend her?

He entred into the Camp with his thoughts turmoiled, and his mind altogether unresolv'd; but as he was going both to visit Amalazontha and Agione, to fix according to the favour which they shewed him, he understood that they were both with Albisinda at the King of Suevia's Apartment, whither the Queen of the Cimbrians was gone to justify her self to that Prince, in reference to what she had acted against Briomer. Ambiomer therefore believing that the lustre of those four renowned Beauties might dissipate some part of his melancholy humour; or rather considering that there was more than one Magnet that drew him to that fair Assembly, went to the King of Suevia's Apartment, where besides those renowned persons before-mentioned, he found the famous Balamir, the Prince of Persia, and the King of the Tongres. They were talking of news which they had lately receiv'd, that the King of the Huns was sending a most magnificent Embassy to the Queen of the Cimbrians; which for that the fair Princess possess'd a large Kingdom, and in the choice of a Husband preferred virtue before power, was sent to her to negotiate in favour of Balamir. The haughty Varanez made his interpretations upon it, with all the heat that a Rival could be thought to make use of upon such an occasion: and the famous Balamir not being able to keep within the bounds of his usual moderation when he met with so furious a Competitor, had answered him in such a manner, that there was no small reason to fear the ill consequences of the dispute, when Ambiomer entring, brake off the violence of the contest: and Taxander, to hinder them from continuing the same, briskly undertook the discourse so soon as decency would permit, and falling upon a subject far different from that which they had left, he began to talk of the renowned Theon who was come to the Camp but that very day, together with several other considerable personages whose names they yet knew not. Do you not acknowledge, Sir, answered the Queen of the Cimbrians, that Theon is truly worthy the reputation which he has acquir'd? All persons agree that he foretels very justly what he can either hope or fear; and if you would take our part, I cannot tell whether we might not engage you as well as Balamir and Ambiomer, and as well as Varanez also, to visit so great a person, from whom we may learn the knowledge of such things which cannot but be very advantageous to us. Madam, replied he with a courtly aspect, if my curiosity be not strong enough to carry me to visit Theon, 'tis not so much because I am no where engaged in your Army, as because Adelaiada resides in Pharamond's Camp, whose fair eyes are the only Stars which I must consult to know my good or evil fortune. For my part, replied Balamir, taking notice of Rosamond's design, though I expect the sentence of my destiny to be pronounc'd against me by other lips than Theon's, yet would I not forbear to see him, though it were only to know whether his judgment be conformable to those appearances which we have observed in relation to the issue of this famous War that has equally divided all Europe into two parties. As it is lawful for every one to follow his own inclinations, or his own interest, replied Varanez very haughtily, in my opinion I am no way forbid to renounce a curiosity that can be no way profitable for me, let the cause be what it will that nourishes it in my heart. In short, the only Heir of the King of Persia is not to seek after other presages of his Grandeur, than those which his Birth affords him, Besides what necessity can there be for a Prince that finds himself undaunted upon all occasions, to perplex his mind with an idle curiosity to know the success of his Enterprises. 'Tis sufficient for him to consult his own courage, to examine the strength of his Forces, and then without farther considering, he may boldly venture upon the most bazardous designs. But, Sir, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, when there is some other passion besides ambition, or the desire of Glory that prevails in the heart; when this passion becomes violent, and is as violently crossed, is it not natural to be somewhat impatient to know the Issue? I confess, answered he, that such a curiosity as that whereof you speak, does not seem to be very strange or improper. But, Madam, it may be you will agree with me, that such a Prince as Varanez is so far above the common sort of men, that he ought not to allow all those things which are not generally condemn'd. I am not at all surpris'd, said Agione, that a Prince who is suddenly to be one of the greatest Monarchs of the earth should so little care to know future things: but I cannot tell but that a Knight of a sublime courage, yet of an uncertain fortune may be

'excus'd for being a little inquisitive what he may hope from his destiny. You may guess by this discourse, pursued Albisinda, addressing her self to the famous Ambiomer, that the Princess of the Lombards would fain persuade you to visit Theon, and that she would not be troubled to bear him ascertain you some great fortune answerable to your merit and our wishes. For my part, added the Queen of the Cimbrians, I should be very glad to see a high and ample merit rewarded in the person of Ambiomer; and that Fortune whom he so often accuses, would be just in favour of him.

She had no sooner concluded those few words, but she kept silence for some time; and questionless Amalazombia would have proceeded to have spoken something to the advantage of so valiant a person to whom she was so much beholding, had not Agelmond entered—who although he were an afflicted Prince, whose heart was prepossess'd with grief, and that instead of seeking company he carefully avoided it, yet did he not omit to visit personages of his own rank, when decency obliged them thereto: and at such meetings he always locked up close in his heart all those marks of despair that had taken possession of it: and his melancholy being rather accompanied with a soft indisposition than a raging discontent, his humour was ordinarily very taking and sociable.

The King of Suevia having receiv'd him according to his merit, gave him an account in few words of the subject of the discourse, and still addressing his speech to him, Sir, said he, hitherto we have seen none but misfortunes the most insupportable, that have turmoiled the great Agelmond's life to the utter ruine of his quiet; but in regard that only the most wonderful and terrible blows of fate could not so much as shake your resolution, when you think it convenient we will entreat Viginizus to inform us the rest of your unhappy Story, and Theon shall undertake to put an end to your sufferings. Neither Theon's Art, answered the pen-sive King, sighing, nor all the power of nature can put an end to my misfortunes: and since I see the person at liberty whose concernments are so considerable to me as to make me endure the world, so long as my assistance can do her any kindness, there is nothing that can retain me here in this life, but the consolation which I expect of dying suddenly for that party which I have embrac'd. We have too much confidence in your valour, replied the King of Suevia, nor are our Enemies so sufficiently formidable that we should fear the misfortune with which you threaten us. Besides that you will be so vigorously seconded, replied the fierce Varanez, that you will prove no less a Vanquisher among the Cimbrians, than you have always been at the head of the Lombards. I question not, replied Agione, but that so many valiant Princes as are in this Army will fight with all their Generosity for the preservation of an Ally who exposes his life in their quarrel: and I wish to Heaven that they could as well defend him against the cruel enemy which he always carries in his heart. I cannot think, replied Rosamond, that so great a personage as the King of the Lombards has need of any other succour than his own reason to triumph over that secret adversary that wages so terrible a war within his Breast. But, replied Amalazombia somewhat impatiently, can they have all their reason about them that have such powerful enemies? Ah, Sister, replied the Queen of the Cimbrians, I beseech you do not quote this general excuse, for authentick, of which all people that are fainthearted make use. For my part I am perswaded that reason is never weak in us, but when we are resolved to forsake its assistance, but that on the contrary to render it victorious, we have no more to do but only to take its part.

“ However, Madam, replied the King of Suevia, you know that we are to act after a different manner in the behalf of reason, according to the difference of those persons that are to acknowledge her Law, guided also by the variety of accidents that may fall out during the whole course of an indifferent life, 'Tis for that reason, Sir, added he, addressing himself to the King of the Lombards, that we desire that Viginizus may finish the Relation, whose beginning we so much admire; and we may know what we have to do, in order to the consolation of a valiant Ally from whom we have so much reason to hope for a powerful assistance: and in regard the unfortunate oft-times receive some kind of ease when we discourse of the subject of their sadness; the afflicted Prince let them know the cause of his despair. The reason the Queens of the Cimbrians and Turingiens testified their eager desire to know the most important of his Adventures; and having entreated the Princess Albisinda to remember the most remarkable circumstances of which they would put her upon the repetition, they took their leave together with Agelmond's Sister, to make use of the liberty they enjoyed of walking forth of the Trenches. However, they were attended on by a numerous Guard, not so much for their security, as out of that respect and honour which was due to persons of their extraordinary Dignity. The King of the Tongres, the Princes of Perfiz and the Huns commanded the Convoy. Rosamond was led by Taxander, of whom she made choice for so great an Honour, not only by reason of his Royal Dignity, but for fear of kindling a dangerous jealousy in the minds of two such furious Rivals. While this noble company were going to take the Air beyond the Trenches, Agelmond and Ambiomer stayed with the King of Suevia, as coming last to visit him. But the King of the Lombards withdrawing soon after, sent his Esquire to finish the relation, which they had so earnestly entreated. Viginizus, who was never better satisfied, than when he was talking of the great actions of the King his Master, soon put himself into a posture to satisfy those Princes that desired his rehearsal, and pursued his Repetition as follows.

The Continuation of the History of Agelmond.

SOON as the King of the Lombards had lost the sight of the charming Princess of the Sarmatians; Alas, (cried he with a mournful utterance) she is gone, then instead of saying any more, he turn'd his eyes upon me in a most languishing manner, pausing for some time and sighing, and after that resuming his lamentation; Let us be gone, said he, let us be gone, Viginizus, let us submit to the divine Gilismene's commands: And having uttered these few words he came to his Convoy, and without letting the Officers that presently flocked about him understand the success of the conference, he marched toward the Army not having any farther power to speak.

Toxares, Indyrfes, and several of the chief Commanders of the Army, kept their eyes fix'd upon his face, to consult the motions of his eyes, and conjecturing by the deep melancholy which they there observed, that some extraordinary accident had happened in Tamyraque, they murmured against the Prince of the Venedians, and threaten'd to cut in pieces all those Rebels that adhered to his party. It will be your better way, replied the King of the Lombards sighing, to quit those thoughts of revenge. There is none but Agelmond who ought to be unfortunate: 'Tis he alone that ought to bear the punishment of Harmaxes's revolt, while he must sacrifice to the quiet the felicity that he had promised himself.

Then having repeated all that Gilismene had told him, concerning the power of the Rebels; You see, said he, the danger wherein your King now is, that King whom you so highly esteem: You see the necessity that compels poor Agelmond to return to his Dominions, and while he renounces all his pretensions and his life, he gives you leave to reunite, and takes away from the Prince of the Venedians, all cause of complaint against a Stranger whom he so mortally hates. How Sir, replied Toxares, shall we be guilty of upholding a hatred, which is but an effect of ingratitude and rebellion? No, no, Sir, pursued Indyrfes, we will never commit so foul a piece of treachery, and since we have the power in our hands, if Harmaxes refuses to obey his King, his obstinacy must be his ruine, and not the removal of so great a Prince, who has so highly oblig'd the Kingdom. It shall never be said, replied my Master, that Agelmond ever plung'd you into the miseries of a civil war, when it is in his power to keep off the Storm. Rather forsake a miserable wretch, on whom the Heavens visibly display their anger, rather abandon an unfortunate creature, whom your fair Princess abandons her self. She ordains my departure; is it in my power to stay? Can my heart revolt from that divine person whom I adore? But on the other side, (pursued he sighing, after he had paused upon what he had to say) ought I to forsake a Country which I cannot but look upon with delight, or rather with a kind of veneration? Can I depart out of a Country where I may every moment see and serve her, and where I have receiv'd such honourable hopes. Yes, yes, it must be so, said he all of a sudden, there's no considering since my Princess commands me, being afraid of our Fathers life.

The chief Leaders of the Sarmatians, moved with this Generosity and my Prince's entire resignation of himself to Gilismene's will, began to be the more furious against Harmaxes, and protested that they would have him in their power in less than three days. "Sir," cried they, we desire no longer time to revenge the injury done you, to give you the possession of our Princess, and to restore the King to his power and dignity. Upon those words the enamour'd Prince, felt a secret joy that surpris'd his heart, and at first his inclination, flattered by the promises of the Sarmatians, perswaded him to attend the success of their Enterprize. But he had no sooner reflect'd upon this motion of his heart, but he condemn'd it, and repented of it as of a crime, that contended with that obedience which he had promised. And therefore that he might not be expos'd to hear discourses, that the more pleasing they seem'd to be, were still so much the more dangerous; he resolv'd no longer to defer his departure: So that all the Lombards that were in the Army, had orders to march the next day toward their own Country.

He passed the Night in strange disquiet, and before his departure appearing upon a little hillcock where he might be heard by the best part of the Soldiers, he testified to them all the acknowledgment of their kindness that they could expect; he commended their fidelity to their King, and after he had conjured them to preserve their obedience and affection for their King that so well deserved it, he gave all his jewels even to the very Trappings of his horse. After that he gave particular treatments to the principal Officers, he promised them his friendship, assured them of his assistance, and to give them excessive rewards. And as if all that he had done till then, had only been to dispose the Sarmatians to lend him a more favourable Ear; when he came to talk of Gilismene, he began a discourse after such a manner, as if he had never intended to finish it. For though he addressed himself to persons that knew the Princess, yet he omitted not to describe her to them, such as he had always fancied her in his mind. And his passion ingenious to set forth the praises of that which he admired, persuaded him that to render Gilismene the more considerable, it behoved him to describe exactly all her transcendent qualities: So that he had the pleasure to run over part by part the several charms which he adored, and taking notice that the heat that enflamed him, touched the very hearts of the Sarmatians; "What my honoured friends, (pursued he, zealous to perfect the acquisition of their friendship). will you suffer the Daughter of your King, the Sister of the generous Agathyrus, in a word your divine Princess, to be exposed to the Tyranny of her Enemies, and to be exposed for no other reason, but "because she was born with those advantages, that ought to win the esteem and affection of those persons that persecute her? Shall Heaven have bestowed those rare endowments upon her, only to render her unhappy. What though those graces wherewith Heaven has favoured her, cause her to be envied by her nearest relation, shall they not excite in your breasts a veneration, able to protect her from all sorts of violences?"

He pronounced these words after so passionate a manner, that all the Soldiers felt a new access of zeal, and testified by their loud shouts that rent the very Skies, that they would all either perish, or restore their King to his former dignity. This transportation of the Soldiers, filled the heart of Agelmond with a secret joy, which for a time suppressed the grief that master'd it. However being passionately in love, and consequently never without fear, he still recommended Gilismene to them over and over again, and spoke several things that were altogether needless, lest he should omit any one that might be of advantage. At length, after he had reiterated many things several times over, to make the deeper impression into the memory of the Sarmatians, he took horse, but with so many marks of sadness, that there was a universal pensiveness in the Camp, where he was so generally beloved and fear'd. But being so extremely unwilling to leave Sarmatia, instead of making haste he made a stop every moment, he sigh'd and turn'd his head with a languishing aspect, but I resolv'd to withstand this dangerous passion, that had overturn'd all the repose of his Soul; I endeavoured to awaken in his heart, those thoughts of love and kindness which he had for his people and his Army: I laboured to renew that affection, of which he had so often given such tender proofs to his Sister, and the more powerfully to move him, I laid before him all that Honour still promised, would he but turn his thoughts toward her. But alas I spoke in vain, for all that I could say made no impression in his heart, which was wholly filled with the image of Gilismene: So that, Sir, instead of troubling your Majesty with the story of a journey, wherein there was nothing extraordinary but the grief of an afflicted Lover, I conceive it more pertinent to repeat what happened in Tamyraque, while we were Travelling homeward.

Notwithstanding the zeal of some Sarmatians faithful to their Prince, Harmaxes power increased together with his Brothers indisposition of body, whereby the Princess was soon reduced to a most deplorable condition. She was threatned with the loss of the Prince from whom she had her being, and with the persecutions of a Lover, whose passion was more terrible than the hatred of the most implacable Enemy. In the midst of these misfortunes which she had reason to apprehend, she found her self without any support or consolation: Her illustrious Brother the generous Agathyrus, was perhaps in Asia upon some design which he had entertained before his departure: And though Agelmond, her faithful and disconsolate Brother, removed but slowly from her, yet since it was by her order that he absent-ed himself, his return (considering the troubles that ensued) was looked upon as an effect of inconstancy: to which that incomparable Princess, ought not to have shewed her self subject. In this condition she found no comfort but at the feet of the Altar, and in attending upon the person of the King her father: But when they began to despair of the life of that Prince, she no longer stood to consider but determin'd to send for Agathyrus. Not but that same secret Lover when he opened his heart to her, had conjured her never to recal

him: but she made that consideration give way to another more important, believing that the presence of the only Heir to the Crown might produce some happy revolution; so that she concluded at length to write to that person who was most highly concern'd in the change that troubled the Court of Sarmatia: but then she found her self at her wits end about the choice of a faithful Officer whom to trust with a Letter of so much confidence. For Harmaxes and Dorcira had won to their side almost every person that belonged to her Family: so that she was in no small fear lest a packet upon which Agathyrfus's life and fortune in a manner depended, should fall into the hands of some of their creatures. At length she saw her self oblig'd to cast her eyes upon Thyscon, who was Brother to Amasia the best belov'd of all her Maids of Honour, and who had already given her several proofs of her fidelity upon several occasions. For Thyscon therefore she sent into her Closet, and after she had well prepar'd him, she gave him the Letter, charging him withal to omit nothing that might persuade Agathyrfus to return. In the mean time the Prince of the Venedians and the Princess of the Igylions lost no time in strengthening their party, and kept such a continual watch upon the actions, words, and very looks of Gilismene, that they were soon advertis'd of the private conference in her Closet: and judging thereupon that Thyscon could not be put upon any enterprize in a City that was so absolutely in their power, they made no question but that Gilismene reduc'd to the utmost extremity had at length sent for Agathyrfus or the King of the Lombards. So that Harmaxes beholding the Princess his Sister, By what means, said he, shall we find out this contrivance, which it so much concerns us to know, and how shall we do to examine a person that we could never gain to our party? There is no studying upon the matter, replied the fierce Dorcira, since we have endeavoured fiercely to win Thyscon to our side, why may we not kill him out of the way? Is there any necessity for us to examine him, provided we can get into our hands the packet with which Gilismene has entrusted him; 'tis sufficient that he die, and for those of our people that way-lay him upon the Road to rid him out of the way, and bring us hither carefully what they shall find about him for information.

Harmaxes approving Dorcira's resolution, they chiefly took care how to execute their design; and two days after Thyscon having taken the Road toward Tanais, was set upon by a Troop of armed Soldiers of the Rebels party. At first he defended his life with an exceeding valour, he felled to the ground two of his Assassins, and wounded Lycorax their Captain. But how extraordinary soever his endeavours were, he was forc'd to yield ro number. No sooner was he fallen to the ground, run through and through the body, but Lycorax himself search'd the pockets of the faithful and unfortunate Sarmatian, and having found the packet, he carried it with all haste to Dorcira, triumphing as much in his treachery as if he had won some great victory. The Princess of the Igylions very hastily open'd the packet which he presented to her, and was very well satisfied; finding a little Note under Gilismene's hands, she presently knew that the Letter was directed to the Prince of the Sarmatians, though it had no subscription, and having read it over and over again very attentively, she walked about the Chamber in such a deep contemplation, which sufficiently testified that either she was most highly concern'd in what she had seen, or that she intended to make some other advantage of it more considerable. Harmaxes finding her in that condition, looked upon her very much surpris'd. Is it possible, Madam, said he, that you should be melancholy when you have succeeded so prosperously as I understand you have done? I cannot tell, answered she, whether you observe any thing of sadness upon my countenance, but I am sure my heart is very light: and when you have seen, said she, giving him the Princesses Letter, what I have read, you will agree with me that we have an infalible way to triumph over Gilismene and Agelmond both together.

While she spake in that manner, Harmaxes read on very seriously, and in regard he apprehended not presently Dorcira's design, and testified as much by his eyes: What, Sir, replied she, do you not take notice that in the Letter which Gilismene sends to her Brother, there is not one word that she might not write to the King of the Lombards? You may then conjecture that she may recall Agelmond as well as the Prince of the Sarmatians, and with more probability, in regard the King of the Lombards is not so far off, if he be not still in our Territories.

Upon those words Harmaxes cast his eyes again upon the Princess's Letter, and having read it, and paus'd a while, he found that Dorcira was not deceiv'd; for that Gilismene wrote nothing to Prince Agathyrfus that she might not have written to the King of the Lombards. Thus abusing the intentions of that admirable Princess, they resolv'd to send for Agelmond, and to make themselves Masters of his life and fortune. This they might easily do, inasmuch that it was all their care to execute a design wherein they had so great hopes. For the accomplishing whereof they send for Lycorax, gave him instructions; then giving him him Gilismene's packet, they sent it with him to the King of the Lombards, as if it had come from the Princess, with order to play his part with Agelmond, as if he had been sent to the Prince of Sarmatia in the unfortunate Thyfen's place. Lycorax overjoyed to see himself put upon such an extraordinary employment, made all the vows and protestations to Harmaxes and Dorcira that could be made to confirm their good opinion of his fidelity: and so taking Horse he potted so diligently after us, that he soon overtook the King who mov'd but slowly and unwillingly. So soon as my Master was advertis'd that the pretended Officer of Gilismene was come, he perceiv'd no less than two or three violent and contrary passions at one time assailing his heart; Joy and Grief, Hope and Fear assail'd him at the same time: so soon had the only name of that divine Princess rais'd a tumult in his heart that was wholly subjected to her: Dear Friend, said he to the Traytor Lycorax so soon as he appear'd in his Chamber, what is our Princess's pleasure? Requires she some new proof of my obedience, having impos'd that cruel tryal to which you see I have submitted? Sir, answered the dissembling Sarmatian, you will not find the least unwillingness to obey the Princess's desire upon this occasion: for Harmaxes and Dorcira continuing still their persecution, and not restoring peace to Tamyraque according to their promise, force her to break her word with them, and oblige her to call you back to a City where your presence may—— How! said the enamour'd King, interrupting him, Does my divine Princess recal me? Does she consent that I should see her again? Will she deliver me out of a heap of miseries, wherewith I find my self overwhelmed to raise me to the top of all felicity? Ah, no, no, 'tis impossible: nor do I find my heart capable of flattering it self with a change so happy. I am not to be the Judge of your happiness, replied the Traytor, but I am sure you will have no reason to doubt of the good news which I bring you, when you shall have read what the Princess her self has written.

Concluding those words he presented the King with Gilismene's packet, which the enamour'd Agelmond having taken and kiss'd with a transportation of joy answerable to the violence of the passion that reign'd in his heart, he greedily open'd it, and read these words that Gilismene had sent to Agathyrus.

SO odd and unfortunate a change has succeeded your departure, that I find my self constrain'd to recal you, whatever resolution you saw me take to the contrary. Return then I conjure you, Sir, return then to a City where your presence may cause some favourable revolution. Flatter not your self at all, for here the lawful authority groines under the weight of Rebellion. Our Enemies give Laws to disconsolate Tamyraque, and you may easily fall under their potent tyranny. Shun not I beseech you this last blow of misfortune; enter only in the night time, nor appear till you have made your party considerable, and in a word follow the advice of the bearer. He is the most faithful person among all my Servants.

Once more I beseech you take care that you be not surpris'd by our Enemies. Consider how terrible you are to them; and that they will leave no stone unturn'd to ruine a Prince whose valour they so well know, and whose anger they have so much cause to fear.

Agelmond transported with joy could not make an end of reading without kissing again those characters written with Gilismene's own hand. He was overjoyed to see the care which that fair Princess took of his preservation: he hop'd to be suddenly with her where he might cast himself at her feet, to return her thanks, and to venture in her quarrel a life which he had wholly dedicated to her service: How am I bound to your kindness, most divine Princess, cryed he, not being able to utter any more. Then of a sudden making answer to a thousand thoughts that thronged into his Breast; Is it possible, pursued he, that the most divine Gilismene should vouchsafe to call me back; and commit the defence of her most important concerns to my Arms? What Honours does she intend to heap upon me after the loss of all my hopes? Will she raise me to a felicity that I never could expect? Ah, this is too much happiness at once for one miserable wretch: You are too generous, dear Princess, so that Agelmond has reason to complain in the midst of his good fortune: what is he able to offer to the divine Gilismene? His life, his Dominions are to inconsiderable for this last favour which she hath done him: nay, has he not already devoted his life and his Dominions to his divine Princess. At those words a noble motion of choler joyning it self to the heat of his love, Let us flie, cryed he, to the assistance of that person whom we love: what can Harmaxes, what can all his party do, when Agelmond fights in the defence of his Princess?

He would have made himself ready, taken Horse, and been at the same time in Tamyraque; yet how eager soever he were to perform all those things which his heart tumultuously inspired into him, he forgate not to testify his acknowledgment to the Traytor Lycorax. He gave him all his Jewels which he had at that time at his disposal, and acting according to that disorder which the excess of his love and joy produc'd, he promis'd the perfidious Villain recompences above measure, and gave him that kind entertainment which was above all his promises, or his presents. After that he gave order to the Army to continue their march, and he himself departed with so much haste, that the Lombards seem'd to be all surpris'd, nay, I my self was astonish'd at it, as well as I knew the cause of his precipitation.

We were no sooner upon the great Road to Tamyraque, but Agelmond's mind seem'd to be still more tormented than before: so that abandoning himself to the violence of his passion, he rode after that desperate rate that he got ground of us every day: Lycorax and I changed Horses at every Town where we could without losing time. And I dare safely say without any Romancing, that the enamour'd Agelmond rid more way in a few hours, returning to Gilismene, than he had done in as many days while he remov'd from her. We began to discover the Towers of the magnificent City of Tamyraque, when we understood that the King of Sarmatia was dead, and that Harmaxes's power was so absolute and so establish'd, that those few persons that stood faithful to the Princess were constrain'd to quit their Houses, to avoid the persecution of the Tyrant. Those fatal tydings griev'd Agelmond beyond expression, so that his impatience to be with Gilismene as well to comfort as to serve and assist her, caus'd him to redouble the haste which he already made, that notwithstanding the design which we had not to let our selves be seen, we were constrain'd to ride with our Vipers up, only for air. 'Tis true that my Master and I pulled them down when we met with any people who as we thought might know us. But Lycorax did not think it necessary to be so cautious to his own inconvenience; so that we were no sooner come within two miles of Tamyraque, but a certain Knight of a very comly presence, accompanied with six others, knowing Lycorax by his face, presently laying his hand upon his Sword, with a countenance inflam'd with anger, Ab, Traitor, cry'd he, thou shalt die, nor do I make use of this advantage, which I would scorn at another time, but only that I may punish thee the more speedily for thy crimes.

Concluding these words, he flew upon Lycorax with so much violence, and his companions seconded him so vigorously, that my Master had been delivered from that perfidious Villain who was leading him to the brink of a terrible precipice, if his Generosity, seeing him so near a cruel end, had not oppos'd his own happiness by causing him to fight for the author of all his misfortunes. In short, Sir, Agelmond not conceiving it for his honour to stand to inform himself of the occasion of a quarrel at such a time as a stronger party than his own assaulted his friends, oblig'd him to defend them; and perhaps not attributing the subject of the quarrel to any other cause than the animosities of the Factions, he took no farther care than only to succour him whom he thought faithful to his Princess; which he did with so much valour and ready activity, that with the two first blows he gave, having slain two of Lycorax's enemies, he turn'd to the rest in so terrible a manner, that he either wounded or terrified them all in a short time. When he perceiv'd them in a condition no longer to resist him, he felt the fury of his anger begin to slacken, and addressing himself to the chief of the company with a more moderate fierceness, Retire, said he, if thou wilt not undergo the fate of the most unfortunate of thy companions, and forbear to seek a particular mischief in a general quarrel.

The unknown Sarmatian instead of being obstinate, where he saw his life so much in jeopardy, spurred his Horse forward, yet not being willing to part with Lycorax before he had given him some farther testimony of his vexation; for losing the opportunity of his revenge, Perfidious wretch, cryed he, thy ruine is but delayed; for Heaven is too just to raise thee up such defenders always. But though as he pronounc'd those words, he rode away in very great haste, yet Lycorax would fain have pursued the advantage which he then had to have rid himself quite of such an enemy, had not my Master hindered his intention, willing to continue his journey, it being now almost fit time to enter into Tamyraque, according to the Princess's orders.

So soon as day-light had given way to so much night as was dark enough to keep us undiscovered, we were conducted to the Palace of the King of the Sarmatians, and Lycorax led us into an Apartment that looks into the Garden. 'Tis impossible to represent to your imagination after what manner Agelmond's heart was mov'd, when he thought himself so near his admir'd Gilismene. The enamour'd Prince instead of resting after such a tiresome journey, walked up and down the Chamber, casting his eyes every moment toward the door, in expectation still of some person or other to come and carry him to the Princess; and every moment of delay gave him so much disturbance, that it appeared not only in his eyes, but over all his countenance. At length the King of the Lombards having waited long, fav'd Lycorax enter, and advancing toward him with an aspect that testified his impatience; Is it not yet time for us to see the Princess, cryed he. No Sir, replied the Traitor, 'tis impossible for me to bring you to her Apartment this evening, for Harmaxes with most of the Sarmatian nobility, are with her treating upon a general accommodation.

At these words the enamour'd Agelmond blushed, and seem'd very much disturb'd, he could not endure to hear that his Rival should be with his Mistress, nor was he contented that the differences in Tamyraque, should be ended by an accommodation, which would secure the Rebels from his just revenge. I do verily believe that the inclinations of his heart were for war, while he aim'd to revenge the affronts put upon Gilismene, by a way so conformable to his disposition, besides that he could the higher advance her interest, by signaling in her quarrel that renowned valour, whereof he had given such noble proofs, upon occasions of less importance than that. But reflecting upon his first thoughts he condemn'd them; for preferring the repose of his Princess before all other considerations, he found that he could pardon the Rebels, provided they would return to their obedience. With less trouble he looked upon Harmaxes's happiness, imagining that he was present with Gilismene for no other reason, but to reestablish the quiet of the Kingdom. But as those persons that violently love, can never remain long in the same calm, he was afraid lest the Prince of the Venedians should move Gilismene's heart, by means of some remarkable compliance, in surrendering into her hands all the authority which he had usurp'd: so that he could not forbear enquiring of Lycorax the particulars of Harmaxes and Gilismene's interview. Took you no notice, said he, after what manner the Princess received her new Lover, that has given her such strange proofs of his passion? Could she preserve all her moderation entire, when she beheld in her presence her Lover, her Enemy, her Kinsman and her Persecutor? In short tell me Lycorax, did you observe in her divine countenance, either joy or anger, kindness or disdain? Sir, answered he, I am not able so subtilly to distinguish between the different passions of his heart, but, added he according to the instructions which he had received, yet I could with ease discern that the Princess and Prince Harmaxes beheld one another, with that satisfaction, which it is proper for persons nearly related to have, when they would reunite their families and restore peace to an unsettled Kingdom. This is all I could observe, and for what relates to the visit which you so earnestly desire to give the Princess, I believe that at such a time it will be no less against the rules of decency, than according to the dictates of safety, but that rather Gilismene will come her self to this Apartment, for fear you should be discor'der'd by going to hers.

Upon a promise so pleasing, the enamour'd Agelmond felt some part of his disquiet to diminish, nor all the night was his rest disturb'd, but only with his impatience to see the promised satisfaction of his hopes: Upon the first appearance of day he made himself ready, and prepared himself to meet that happiness with which his soul had been so sweetly flatter'd. But while he expected that the Traitor Lycorax should come and inform him of all things; in came a Sarmatian Officer, who no sooner drew near him; But Sir, said he, I am come by order of the Princess, to attend at your Chamber door with twenty more of my company. You have free leave, answered the King of the Lombards, since it is the Princess that sends you: For I shall never oppose her will which is to me an inviolable law. 'Tis not, (added he after he had observed the Sarmatian's aspect) but that if it were lawful for me to examine the proceedings of a person whose actions I reverence, I might quarrel at this as something extraordinary. For in short, whatever design the Princess may have, 'twas to little purpose to give you that commission which brought you hither: For if it were to keep me from stirring out of this place, one of her commands should have done more than all your weapons can do. If on the contrary it be for my preservation what need I to fear, what occasion have I of your assistance, if Gilismene be kind to him, that has nothing else to be afraid of but the misfortune of displeasing her? You know Sir, replied the Officer, that it is not for me to dive into the Princess's designs: I am only to obey, and to tell you that if I be not deceived, you will be very suddenly better inform'd of her intentions.

Having so said, he took his station, and while the King of the Lombards was seriously musing by himself upon this adventure, in comes Dorcira magnificently habited, and glittering with Jewels. I question not Sir, (said she after the first complements had pass'd between them) but that you are surpris'd at this visit, and that you rather expected to see the Princess of the Sarmatians, than the Princess of the Egyptians. I must confess Madam, replied he very coldly, that I cannot tell what should be the reason of this honour which I receive, and indeed it is a wonder to me to see a Princess in my Chamber, who perhaps ought not to have known of my being in the Town. Gilismene and Harmaxes, cunningly she replied, who sent for you back, did not conceal from me a thing——— Ab Madam, said Agelmond interrupting her, it is not possible that the Princess of the Sarmatians and the Prince of the Venedians, should have advis'd, by consent upon this occasion. No, no, Madam, Gilismene would never have recalled me by the advice of my Enemies, and it was rather for the punishment of a Rebel that I was sent for to Tamyraque, than to be sacrificed to the hatred of my Rival. If that confidence, replied Dorcira, would serve for the tranquillity of your mind, I would give you leave to remain entirely undeceiv'd and instead of contending with it, let you wait till the proceedings of the Princess her self alter'd your belief. Till the proceedings of the Princess alter'd my belief, (cryed he with an astonishment mix'd with an extravagant discomposure) How Madam, are you able to say that a Princess so divine, can be capable of actions unworthy of her birth? Who I Sir? I say nothing (said she with an affected reservedness) nor am I ignorant but that all I could say would never be believed, while I spoke of the Princess of the Sarmatians. Ah Madam, replied the enamour'd Prince, speak I beseech you, if it be of Gilismene that you have any thing to say. By what I (perceive replied she with a kind of disdain) the reason that urges me to this discourse, is altogether an obligation to my self, 'tis no matter however, I will speak on since you desire me, but I shall speak with that freedom, which may make you perhaps repent your curiosity, and shew you the difference between mine and the Princess's heart, whom you have always preferred before me.

How great soever were the esteem and veneration, which the passionate King of the Lombards had for the fair Princess of the Sarmatians, he could not hear Dorcira's last words without an extraordinary discomposure, which the dissembling Princess no sooner perceived, but she continued her discourse as follows.

So soon as you were upon your march toward the Vistula, in order to your repassing into Germany, our troubles began, and the fire of civil war brake forth more furiously than before. In a word, Sir, the desolation was so fatal, that the Princess took pity of a City which she highly respect-ed, and perhaps she also looked upon the actions of Harmaxes, rather for proofs of his love than marks of his rebellion. To this purpose she no longer oppos'd the propositions for peace, and being at more liberty to act by reason of your absence, she consented to a treaty, the principal condition whereof you would never have granted. The people desired to joyn Harmaxes and Gilismene together, they could not endure that you should be preferred before a Prince, who was in a probability to be their Sovereign; and the Princess her self, how unresolv'd soever she might be at the beginning, felt at length that the love of her Country prevail'd in her heart, above the kindness which she had for a Stranger, whom she had already banished from her presence.

My Master hearing those words more attentively, beheld Dorcira, while there appear'd in his eyes, that sought for nothing more than some clearer evidence of the truth, the several excesses of love, anger, grief and jealousy. Ye Gods, cryed he, could you suffer that so prodigious an example of inconstancy, should dishonour the fairest piece of all your workmanship. Having spoken these few words he held his peace, standing in a deep study for a while, but the thoughts of esteem which he had for Gilismene, prevailing still in his heart above the disorders that she was going to raise; No no Madam, pursued he, Gilismene is not capable of so strange a piece of infidelity: Nay Madam I will tell you more, it is impossible that a Princess so accomplished, should deport her self after a manner so little conformable to those inclinations, whereof her ordinary proceedings are a continual testimony. You speak reason, coldly replied the dissembling Dorcira, and 'tis I then whom you would persuade without any ground, that you have given over your pretences to the Princess of Sarmatia. 'Tis I whom you would make believe, that Gilismene sent you back to your own Territories, that being ready to marry Harmaxes, she has recalled you, that she has set a guard upon you, to protect from your anger the person who is to be her Spouse, and to confirm the courage of a people, who have already but too well experienced your valour. But, Sir, you must begin to understand that all this is but an illusion, that Gilismene never desired you to quit Sarmatia, nor to return thither again, that she never wrote to you afterwards to draw you into a place, where others might be the controllers of your life and fortune, nor is it true that you see Soldiers at the dore. There is nothing of reality in any thing that has happened to you, nor in any thing that you have seen, 'tis only Dorcira that bewitches your eyes and your imagination.

While she spake in this manner, Agelmond perceived that despair began to take the place of those passions that had turmoy'd his mind. The unfortunate Prince recalled into his memory, all the circumstances, that seem'd to fortifie the discourse of the crafty Dorcira, and fatally assembling whatever could augment his grief, his colour changed after a strange manner. He grew pale, his eyes lost their lively lustre, and after he had fixed them for some time upon the Princess of the Igylious, without being able to make any answer, he sunk down upon a seat that stood nearest him. Dorcira seeing him in that condition, touch'd with some kind of repentance, could not forbear to strick out, and to run to the assistance of the afflicted Prince.

For my own part, seiz'd as much as I was with an affright which I never felt before, I followed the Princess of the Igylions, and many of the Officers taking our example, we assisted her most readily and zealously. Nevertheless we laboured at first in vain, for the disconsolate Agelmond came not to himself in a long time after, nor that without a double application of remedies. So soon as he was able to discern the difference of the objects, he testified as much as his weakness would permit him, how impatiently he endured our assistance. But when he saw that he could not easily disengage himself, from the diligence of those persons that encompassed him, nor execute the resolution which he had taken, never to survive his misfortune, he acted otherwise than he intended, and with eyes not so full of provocation as languishment, he laboured rather to attract the effects of complaisance, quite contrary to these effects of compassion, which he found so troublesome to him. On the other side, the Princess of the Igylions taking notice of the danger, into which she had reduced him by so cruel a relation, was willing to sweeten the lowest part of her discourse, and cunningly to manage the affection of a Prince, whose life she was afraid to hazard. Sir, said she, what is become of that great courage of yours, of which you have given such eternal proofs? Do you believe that the pretended misfortune which you apprehend so much, can so readily throw you into an abyss of despair, and that you cannot still expect some change of humour in a person, that has already changed quite contrary to so much probability? "What Sir," said I, will you undergo the torment of a crime which you never committed? "And must Agelmond dye," said Dorcira, because Gilismene proves unfaithful? "Yes Madam," he mull, answered he with a feeble yet passionate utterance, for I declare that I adore the Princess as unfaithful as she is. Not but that I am satisfied and too visibly satisfied in the bloody injury she has done me, but I find withal, that my suspicions are all stifled in their infancy, and that whatever cloudy and froward thoughts rise in my heart against the incomparable Gilismene, her bright Image that continually hovers in my thoughts, feathers them like so many mists.

Dorcira was unimaginably enraged at this constancy of Agelmond, but politickly dissembling her spite to the end she might be the less suspected, and take her opportunity the better another time; "I am very glad," replied she, that you banish all such thoughts as may disturb your rest, and I will even be gone too, that I may be no farther a trouble to you myself. But Sir, permit me to leave with you such attendants, that may take all the care that may be of your person, till you have recovered your former health, and who in serving you shall obey no other orders but those of Viginizus.

As she had concluded these words, and was turning away to go toward the Chamber door; "I protest to you," added she with a positive ingenuity, that I would have concealed those things which it so much concerned you to know, had I thought that my frankness of which I only made use to give you the better satisfaction, would have produced an effect so contrary to my intention. But since it is impossible without so deeply afflicting you, to discover those truths which concern Gilismene, I promise you Sir, not to speak a word more of that Princess, but when you shall allow me. I will go yet a little farther, Sir, and to render you a kind office, which I see will be so very acceptable, though you will reap no advantage by it, I will do all that in me lyes to bring hither the Princess herself, to the end you may understand from her mouth, what you have to hope or fear in reference to her favour.

The dissembling Dorcira had no sooner made this promise, which she never had any intention to perform, but the enamoured Agelmond more vehemently than before; "How much shall I be bound to your kindness," said he, if I may but obtain so great a favour by your means. In the name of the Gods forget not to grant me but this, and if alterward you demand my life as an acknowledgment of so great a benefit, I will surrender it freely, and sacrifice it with joy: For yet once more Madam, I passionately love the Princess of the Sarmatians, whatever injury she may have done me, and how unfaithful soever she be, I will adore her to the last gasp of my breath.

Those words did so stagger Dorcira's dissimulation, that she could hardly forbear to shew her distast, but being resolved to lay her plots at a great distance, she took her leave without manifesting the least mark, of that cruel jealousy which devoured her heart. When I found I had the Liberty to speak to my Master, with that freedom which I had the honour always to use when I was alone; "Sir," said I, after all this that you have done in consideration of Gilismene, after you have———"Ah Viginizus," said he hastily interrupting me, keep your self within bounds, and do not cast any reproach upon the Sarmatian Princess, for I only permit you to bewail the misfortune of a Master whom you love: For I can never endure that either you or any other person in the world, should fail of your re“spect for so divine a person whom I adore, notwithstanding all the proof which I have heard of her inconstancy.

He pronounced these words with such a resolution, his countenance appeared so discomposed, and his health so alter'd; that I durst not presume to open my lips to set forth the injustice which they did him. But on the contrary, that I might deprive him of all occasion of continuing a discourse that so much tormented his mind, I retired out of his presence, and called in the most considerable of the Sarmatians that Dorcira had left to attend him: for I had some reason to believe that Agelmond's wisdom would moderate the transportments of his grief before such persons with whom he had no acquaintance, and after the first instigations of his passion were over, he would become more capable to hear what should be said to fortify his reason against the violence of these commotions that reign'd too tyrannically in his heart. This course that I took, though it were not altogether fruitless, yet did it not contribute a jot more toward the repose of the King of the Lombards: for though the Prince did not so much bewail his misfortunes in the presence of the Sarmatians, yet the constraint which he put upon himself was but a redoublement of his torment. In short, Sir, the violent agitation of his heart, the heat of his temper, the fire of his youth, and the restless disquiet of his thoughts threw him into a very great fit of sickness, enflaming his blood with that foreign heat that usually contends with the heat of nature. They immediately advis'd Dorcira thereof, who was much afflicted at the news. She sent at the same time to visit the King of the Lombards, and to tell him, that since she had been the innocent cause of his sickness, she durst not presume to come her self to manifest how sensible she was of the injury she had done. She also sent him Physicians, but such as she had instructed, and who all the while my Master was under cure, omitted no opportunity to speak according to Dorcira's intentions.

While the Princess of the Igylions thus abus'd the poor King of the Lombards, Harmaxes as cunningly deceiv'd Gilismene: for he no sooner understood that Agelmond was sick, but he went to the Sarmatian Princess, and after some general discourse, You have so great an esteem, said he, for the King of the Lombards, that I do not wonder you cannot believe his affection to be changed with his fortune. However, true it is that he has turn'd his love toward the Princess Dorcira, finding that you were not in a condition to favour his pretences, should I refuse to grant my consent, which you well know I never will. But, Madam, I am more surpris'd that you should not believe Agelmond to be in this City, nay, in the very Palace, and that he is every day with the Princess of the Igylions: for in short, to disabuse you, I do not much care if I shew you the King of the Lombards, that you may see how strangely you are prejudic'd against a Prince that strives to serve you, and how averse you are to believe those truths which are advantageous to him: if therefore you will send to his Chamber either Amasia, or some other person whom you can trust, you will be soon satisfied, seeing that Agelmond is in no condition to conceal himself being dangerously sick in his Bed.

This cruel assurance caus'd the Princess of the Sarmatians to blush; but after she had paus'd for some minutes, she began with a Majesty that easily conceal'd the troubles of her mind: Sir, answered she, I have several times protested to you, that I should be glad that Agelmond would return to Tamyraque without my consent, that I might be oblig'd never to see him more; but after that, restore the people to their former quiet, and talk no more to me of a Prince that I am willing to forget. How, Madam, reply'd he, then you bear Agelmond in your remembrance still, for all his infidelity. Alas, he has too still settled a habitation there, (reply'd she with a sigh that escap'd from her fair lips) and since I must openly declare my self to disabuse you altogether, I must acknowledge with that sincerity to which our consanguinity obliges us, that to this hour I have labour'd all to no purpose to banish Agelmond out of my mind; He was so settled in my heart, so established by so many considerable services, by so many marks of affection, by the earnest importunities of a dear Brother: and in a word, by the command of a Father to whom I owed an entire obedience, that I know not whether it be in my power to rase out of my heart that innocent affection which I thought my self oblig'd to grant him. What becomes then, briskly reply'd Harmaxes, of that great courage wherewith I thought you so amply endowed? That little constancy which you call greatness of courage, reply'd she, will serve me to no other end than to hinder me from changing my thoughts for the King of the Lombards, or at least from yielding my heart a second time, if I can at length recover the free disposition of it.

Upon these words the fierce Harmaxes beheld the Princess with eyes enflamed with choler and madness, and though he broke not forth into any extravagancy against her, 'twas not so much through an effect of moderation, as to compass his designs according to those consultations which he had held with the Princess of the Igylions: indeed it behov'd him not to jar with Gilismene, for fear of quashing the report that was already spread abroad, that he was to espouse her, on purpose to deceive the King of the Lombards with more probability: and therefore stifling the rancour which he carried in his Breat, Madam, replied he very cunningly, 'tis most necessary, to the end you may give some satisfaction to the Sarmatians, that you should declare that you have now some kind of inclination to render me happy. " Ah Sir, said she interrupting him too discomposedly for so wise a person, that you should so little know Gilismene, to believe that she can speak these things which are not in her thoughts. " But Madam, impatiently replied he, what is it hinders you from declaring what I desire while you tell the truth? " I have so often toid you, replied Gilismene, that methinks you should not labour thus to pluck words out of my mouth, which you know to be altogether unpleasing to your humour, if it be true that you aim at those pretences to which you so often court me.

Concluding these words she was about to go into her Closet and leave Harmaxes, but the Prince holding her by the Garment; " How Madam, said he, do you not then understand what my design is: You refuse to gratifie a people that adores you, but only with an outward condescension, and will you not consider that I engage you to nothing by those bare promises which I request. I consider, said she, that I am not to betray my own thoughts. " But since your intentions are not evil, and that I am not obliged to contradict you before all the world, you may give out what you think convenient, so long as I open my heart to no other person than Amasia, and that I am not compelled to bewail my misfortunes, but only with her alone.

Thus it was that the Prince of the Venedians parted from the generous Princess, nevertheless by his countenance and by his discourse, he could not chuse but discover that he had surmounted those obstacles that opposed his happiness. To give the better credit also to the report of his being married, which he was going about to fling abroad, he made a most magnificent preparation, as for some remarkable solemnity the better to prepossess the people: And in regard I had my liberty to go in and out as I would my self, I was the more easily abused, and imposed my own error upon the King of the Lombards. In the mean while the Prince's Physicians put me into most terrible frights, they waver'd between hope and fear, and could give me no assurance till after the seventh day of his sickness. At that time nature reinforced her self, and growing more powerful than the distemper, that had almost got the upper hand, gave us symptoms of a favourable change, and made me hope that Heaven would at length restore Agelmond's life, as the Guerdon of my Tears and prayers.

The Princess of the Igylions went often to visit him, nevertheless she did not entertain him with any thing of discourse that might disturb his thoughts as before, being willing to preserve the person whom she loved, out of hopes that she might obtain him in the end. But when the disconsolate Prince began to recover his health, when he was permitted to talk, and that his weakness having left him, his afflictions only stook by him, he sought after nothing more than to speak to Gilismene. He enquired after her of all persons that came near his bed, and I had order my self to try what I could learn concerning the Princess. I was presently toid that she was resolved to marry Harmaxes, that her own indisposition of health and the King of the Lombards sickness, was the cause that they deterred so magnificent a solemnity. I was displeas'd at the news beyond expression, I ran from place to place and attempted every way to speak to Gilismene, and in regard no person was permitted to come into her Chamber, I resolv'd at least to speak to Amasia. I waited for her so long in a little Gallery, joyning to the Apartment belonging to the Princess's Maids of honour, that at length I met with her. But so soon as she saw me she blush'd, went into her Chamber, and hastily locked the door after her, which testy behaviour of hers I then attributed to the effect of her shame. But from that day forward it was no less impossible for me to see her, than to speak with Gilismene: so that all my pains took no effect, and all the account I could give my Matter, was only of a report that I heard in the City, the most troublesome circumstances whereof I laboured to conceal.

Dorcira, and the persons that attended the King of the Lombards by her order, no way thwarted my intentions, but so soon as the passionate Lover had recovered some strength, finding himself but half inform'd of that which most concern'd him in the world, he put us into a very great perplexity, by reason of certain speeches which he uttered. For he determinately averr'd, that he would either see Gilismene or dye, then darting from his eyes certain looks that had something of more than ordinary terror; " If they think, continued he, to keep me from the Princess whom I adore, their weak endeavours shall prove all in vain, to hinder Agelmond. Though without any Arms but my despair, I will seek Harmaxes

“ in the midst of all his numerous Guards, and either die at the points of their Javelins, “ or reaching the usurper of my happiness, I will tear out that unjust heart that causes all “ the misfortunes of my life.

Then seeing the Princess of the Igylions enter the Room, Wherefore, Madam, continued he, addressing his speech to her, wherefore will you not at length to all your other kindnesses add that only favour which may render them profitable to me, and which is the most important of all that I can receive? Wherefore, added he, shall I not see the Princess? Or do you think me able to live without seeing her? Sir, replied the dissembling Dorcira, I have omitted no persuasions to persuade her to give you but one visit, I have entreated Gilismene even to importunity, I have made use of all Harmaxes's credit: in a word, I have left no means unessayed to obtain that which I desire so earnestly: but not to flatter you, Gilismene is inexorable. She is inexorable, cried he, Oh, Heavens, what is my crime, that I am thus barbarously dealt withal? If you desire that I should perish, is it not in your power to ruine me? Am I not return'd alone to a City among a million of my Enemies? Is there a necessity that I must taste all the bitterness of that fortune which is prepared for me? And must I be reserv'd for a death so strange and cruel? Ab, too charming, but too inhumane Princess, have you recall'd me only to betray me to the most terrible punishment that ever was endured? Is this your reception of a Prince that returns only by your orders? Is this your kindness to that Agelmond which the King your Father by your own consent was willing to advance to the sublimest height of his felicity? That Agelmond so often recommended to your ears by the generous Agathyrus? That Agelmond that adores you notwithstanding your infidelity, even at the same time when you overwhelm him with sufferings intolerable? Ab, said he, it is too much, endeavouring to raise himself up in his Bed; and as they went about to hinder him in an attempt that seem'd prejudicial to his health, he beheld the persons that stood about him with so terrible an aspect, and so majestic withal, that he fill'd their hearts with fear, and their thoughts with respect, inso-much that there was not any person, unless the Princess of the Igylions, who durst lay before him the ill consequences of such an attempt: but the disconsolate Prince immediately interrupting her, Is there any regard to be had, cried he, to a miserable creature that desires to die, and whom they are throwing headlong down a precipice? “ So far are we
 “ from casting you from the precipice, that in despite of your self we labour to draw you
 “ out of the danger. “ That, replied he, is only to prolong the torments that tear my “ heart. But, Sir, replied she, — “ But, Madam, said he, interrupting her again, what “ reason is there that I should be thus miserably persecuted? If there be any remembrance “ left of that fortunate success which my Arms have obtain'd in Sarmatia, and that there “ be any desire of being revenged on me for that, let them take it all at once: have I so ill
 “ us'd my Victories, as to deserve thus to be kept in a lingering pain. “ On the contrary, “ replied Dorcira, we are all ready to confess the acknowledgment which we owe to your “ Generosity. “ I beseech you then, Madam, replied Agelmond, explain your self, and since
 “ you have been pleas'd to tell me the cause wherefore the Princess sent for me back, let me
 “ also know to what fortune she designs me. “ In few words, replied she, to unfold the Riddle
 “ which you so earnestly desire to understand, I will tell you, that the Princesses of the Igylions “ and Sarmatians preserve a great esteem for the King of the Lombards, which will never “ let them consent to the loss of such a Prince: I will go farther, Sir, said she, Harmaxes “ himself no longer hates his Rival, not finding any probability that he will ever be hap“ py to his disadvantage. “ I would he did hate me, cried the enamour'd Agelmond, and “ that I should come to dispute with him the possession of a heart that has been so solemn“ ly promis'd me. But, Madam, if he hate me not, if he do not desire my death, what is “ it that he demands from the King of the Lombards? “ His Friendship, and his Alliance, “ replied Dorcira: But I cannot tell, Sir, so she continued, laying her hand upon her face to “ hide her blushes, whether modesty will permit me to declare to you the means which they “ would make use of to unite the Royal House of Sarmatia to your Family. However, “ added she, to give you a hint out of a manifest Generosity I am obliged to make you this “ protestation, that all those little offices of kindness which I have rendred you, as well by “ their order, as by my own inclination, I have not performed out of any aim to engage “ your Gratitude: for I must publicly declare, that a Princess of my humour and incli“ nation would scorn to ascend the most glorious Throne in the world by any indirect “ means unworthy of her Birth and Courage. Having made you this ingenuous confession, “ which you could not have expected from me, I would willingly be so kind as to leave
 “ you, that I may not give you the trouble of returning an answer upon a subject no way “ grateful, if it prove not a greater perplexity. Nevertheless, permit me before I go to re“ quest you that you will be pleas'd to moderate those passions which may hazard your life

“in the least. If you will do that, and observe those instructions which I am obliged to give you, I despair not of bringing the Princess of Sarmatia into your company, and to tell you the truth I have thought upon a way that cannot fail.

Those last words having in some measure, recovered my Master out of that astonishment into which the last discourse of Dorcira had put him; “Ah generous Princess, cried he, labour to obtain me but that one happiness, and doubt not but Agelmond will yield to all the proofs of obedience, that can be required to accomplish your most obliging intentions. For your part Madam, I am perswaded that you pretend not to a heart, prepossessed already by another beauty. And though I were not an utter enemy to all dissimulation, think you I would betray the Princess Dorcira, after so many kind offices as she has done me. No no, Madam, I shall never be capable of so black a piece of ingratitude, and the only protestation I can make you, without wounding the sincerity whereof I make profession, is that I preserve in my breast all those thoughts of acknowledgment and respect, to which you can pretend. But Madam, for so he presently went on as if he had done some injury to his Princess, I am bound to acknowledge at the same time, with that frankness your proceeding merits, that I reserve all my affection for Gilismene, and that it is impossible for me to wear any other chains, but those which that unfaithful, yet overcharming Princess imposed upon me, after the taking of Tamyrasque.

Dorcira making as if she had been satisfied with that answer, though she were inwardly deeply engaged at it, left the King of the Lombards and went to her own Apartment, where she was advertised that the Prince of the Venedians impatiently expected her. At first they beheld one another without speaking a word, and with an aspect full of disquiet and shame, but at length Dorcira beginning the discourse; “And well Sir, said she, have you met with as much obstinacy in the heart of Gilismene, as I have met withal in Agelmond's constancy? I wish for your satisfaction, replied he, that the King of the Lombards may be more easily moved than the Princess of the Sarmatians. How, said she interrupting him, is it possible that a Lady so moderate in outward appearance, can make so stout a resistance as a young Soldier, whose heart is so fiery and passionate? I cannot tell, replied he, but if you have gained no ground upon the King of the Lombards, I do declare that the Princess of the Sarmatians has not granted me an Inch. I must confess, replied Dorcira, that Agelmond has still an obstinate love for Gilismene, and it is too true, continued Harmaxes, that Gilismene cannot hate Agelmond.

Upon those words they beheld one another again, with a new access of inward malice, and after they had mus'd for some time in a deep silence; What shall we do then, said the Prince of the Venedians, shall we always spend our time in vain? There is a necessity of an interview, replied the Princess of the Igylians, between the King of the Lombards and the Sarmatian Princess, but that they may have no opportunity to clear their mistakes by speaking together, you shall be with Gilismene while I accompany Agelmond; so shall the Princess be perswaded that the King of the Lombards and I are in league together, and Agelmond be brought to believe, that you and Gilismene are inseparable, and perhaps spite and madness will cause that operation in their hearts, which neither the kindnesses we have shewn them, nor all the testimonies of our esteem which we have given them, could ever effect to this hour. The Prince of the Venedians being of the same mind that this last means was to be tryed, they both consulted and agreed upon those cautions, which were to be observed for the accomplishing their design. But in regard they were not assured to labour with more success than before, they parted not till they had fully agreed that if their pains took no effect, they would have recourse unto violence, and regard no other laws but what their resentment should suggest.

To lay the foundations of this new treachery, Dorcira went to my Masters Chamber, when the enamoured Prince who thought upon nothing else but Gilismene, presently addressed himself in this manner to the Princess of the Igylians. Well Madam, said he, shall I see the person whom I adore, and have your entreaties obtained the favour which I so passionately desire? You are in so ill a condition to go abroad, replied she, and the Princess testifies such an aversion to come to your Apartment, that there is no necessity of your being so earnest, after a satisfaction which you cannot enjoy: besides that, not to deceive you, the content which you expect will be attended with that strange disquiet, since you cannot see Gilismene but you must see Harmaxes at the same time, and the joys you will reap to behold a Princess whom you deem so charming, will be overbalanced by the affliction, which the presence of a more prosperous Rival brings along with it. Nor is this all, Sir, for Gilismene will by no means endure that you should speak to her, for I could not obtain what I entreated on your behalf with so much importunity, but upon a condition that I know would appear to you very severe. “How, cried he, can I not see Gilismene but in Harmaxes's company, and must I see Gilismene and not speak to her? “You will never be able, I find, to see her at all, replied Dorcira with an affected negligence, and whatever pains I have ta“ken to accomplish your most ardent desires, this would be my comfort for having so “frankly and willingly laboured to none or little purpose, could I but see my self deliver’d “from the trouble that still remains for me to take. So let us talk no more of—— “Ah Madam (said he interrupting her in a most passionate manner) I had rather see the Prin“cess of the Sarmatians, without the hopes of enjoying her, I had rather see her in the com“pany of Harmaxes and dye for grief, than not see her at all. But Madam, (added he some “few minutes after, with an aspect that would have obtained any suit but that which he begged

 “for) is it impossible for me to obtain by means of that diligent mediation of which I have “received such obliging testimonies, but one quarter of an hours discourse with that Prin“cess whom I adore? “Sir, answered she, I have already told you that it is a thing impossible.
 “Gilismene will not stand to hear her self upbraided, nor tye her self to a converse that may “give the least suspicion of jealousy to a Prince that is to be her husband: So that of ne“cessity you must either utterly refuse my offer, or accept it upon these conditions only,
 “which she has commanded me to impose upon you. “Well then, said he sighing, I will “obey Gilismene, I submit to her commands how cruel soever, and also I submit thereto
 “with that veneration, which I ought to have for whatever concerns that divine Princess.
 “I will see her then, but Madam, let it be suddenly I conjure you, and refuse not this last “favour to a Prince whom you have already so much obliged. “That which you request, “said she, depends not so much upon the will of Dorcira, as upon Agelmond’s health, so that “as soon as I am assured, that you may without danger walk down into the Garden, I shall “endeavour to satisfy your desires.

Thus Dorcira left the King of the Lombards, upon whom the promise she had made him wrought more effectually than all the Art of the Physicians. While the enamoured Agelmond gathered strength, Harmaxes perswaded Gilismene to take the Air, to dispel that melancholy that hung upon her brows: And by degrees he engaged her when he saw it convenient, to walk out into a great Balcony, as Dorcira and she had agreed, that they might observe a fit place whither to bring Agelmond. Harmaxes spoke nothing at first of my Master, but as he was discoursing the Princess about some affairs, that related to the people of Tamyraque, he cast his eyes as well as she upon one part of the Garden, that offered to the sight whatever almost could please the eye. In short, at one glance they saw borders of flowers, Streams, Meadows, Woods, and among several great Trees a great number of Arbors, falls of water, and Statues. I must confess, said the Prince of the Venedians, that a more charming variety was never seen, and that we cannot chose a place more proper, to shew us whatever is most delightful in so beautiful a Paradise. True it is, added he as the plot was laid, that our pleasure will soon be disturb’d if I be not deceived, for I am afraid the King of the Lombards and the Princess of the Igylians, will be both together there by and by. They use to walk together in yonder Alley, and I wonder that they are not there already, since Agelmond is in a condition to go abroad.

No sooner had he said the words but my Master appeared indeed, being led, ere he dreamt of it, by Dorcira, to the same place of which Harmaxes was speaking: so that he beheld the Princess of the Sarmatians, standing with the Prince of the Venedians, which two objects of his love and hatred had no sooner pierced his eyes, but his heart began to be mov’d with an extraordinary violence, and his countenance manifested the trouble of his mind, by many visible alterations.

Dorcira observing the vehemency of the commotion, and willing to avoid the consequences that she had reason to fear; Sir, said she, since your heart is not fortified with that resolution that I thought it was, let us mind our walk I beseech you, and not concern our selves with persons that will but excite your choler and your indignation. Agelmond far from returning any answer, held his eyes fixed upon that face which was his only delight, a face that soon rendred love and joy the Mistress of all those other passions that disputed the Empire of his heart, insomuch that the King of the Lombards not being able to moderate these transportments, began to walk toward the Balcony, when Dorcira surpris’d and somewhat affrighted; How Sir, said she, have you forgot that you promis’d——— I have not forgot, said he, that the Princess of the Sarmatians is the fairest person that ever was in the world, and that it will be more easie for the King of the Lombards to renounce his life, than the hopes of enjoying what he loves. As he was thus talking and still moving toward Gilismene, Dorcira laying hold of his Arm; What is it you are about to do, cryed she? To bewail the cruelty of my fate, replyed he, and to dye at the feet of my divine Princess.

He was about to have stung himself out of Dorcira’s hands, but Gilismene at the same time beholding him with disdain, turn’d away her eyes, and return’d in haste into the Chamber with Harmaxes. The King of the Lombards touch’d to the quick with that department of hers, sigh'd, and like a Statue stood immovable. Certainly, had he only followed the instigations of his love and despair, he would have left Dorcira, he would have ran into the Palace, and in despite of all his Rival's Guards, I question not but that he would have opened his way to the fair Princess of the Sarmatians: but the fear of displeasing her was of greater force to restrain him, than all the force of his Enemies; for that fear had so much power over his enamour'd heart, that the pentive Agelmond, uncertain what resolution to take, remain'd as before expos'd to the Artifices of the Princess that betrayed him; insomuch that she easily perswaded him to return to his Apartment, whither he was no sooner come, but the dissembling Lady complain'd of his behaviour: Well, Sir, do you think you have done well to fail of your promise; or would you be glad that Gilismene should accuse me for breaking mine? I know not, Madam, replied he, what I promised you, nor in what I have offended you: I only know that Gilismene is the most amiable person that ever was, and that she is exasperated against the unhappy Agelmond.

Dorcira prick'd to the heart with these words, quitted the King of the Lombards, having much ado to keep her self from breaking forth into a rage, and shewing her resentment as well against Agelmond, as against the Princess whose Empire he acknowledged with such a firm fidelity: nevertheless, because she had some hopes left to accomplish her design, she betook her self to policy; and having instructed Lycorax, she sent him as from Gilismene. The perfidious Traytor went to the King of the Lombards, and conforming his countenance to the commission which he had in trust: Sir, said he, the Princess was very much surpris'd, that you should venture to come so near and speak to her, contrary to the promise which you made. Be pleas'd to consider the consequences of such a discourse, seeing that if the slight which she put upon Harmaxes had come to the ears of his party, they might thereupon in a rage have taken Arms. If the fear of a tumult, replied he, were Agelmond's only misfortune, I have Friends in Tamyraque whom my presence would encourage to declare for the juster side: and though Sarmatia should refuse me Forces to punish the Rebels, I would return at the head of my own Lombards, but I should return far more terribly irresistible in Gilismene's defence, than when I fought for the King of the Huns. We have had sufficient experience of your valour, replied Lycorax, to question the support of whatever interest you maintain. But, Sir, whatever Forces you bring against Harmaxes's Faction, you will still employ them against the Sarmatians; and I leave you to guess whether the Princess would be pleas'd to see her Cities ruined, and her Subjects cut in pieces. And indeed she takes so much care above all things, since the death of the King her Father, to keep Harmaxes's humour steady, that she conjures you by all the esteem and kindness which she still preserves for you, not to interest your self against a Prince of the Blood, nor to shew your self openly in a City where your presence may cause some disturbance, but to follow as much as in you lies the advice of a Princess, who by the kindness which she manifests towards you every day, does not shew her self unworthy the trust which she desires you to repose in her.

The King of the Lombards believing that the Traytor spoke according to Gilismene's true intentions, "Ah, Lycorax, said he, I will obey to the end: but if I have a respect to Gilismene's Relations in the person of my Rival, if I remain clos'd up in this Chamber, and with reverence act according to the Princess Dorcira, what may I hope for as the recompence of such an absolute submission? Shall I afterwards see the Prince of the Vendians triumph unpunished over the King of the Lombards? Shall I see him advanc'd to that happiness that was promis'd me: and do they think that I shall be a peaceable Spectator of Harmaxes's happiness? No, no, Lycorax, let them not deceive themselves, I will pursue Harmaxes as the person that ravish'd from me all my joy: nor will the command of Gilismene that withholds my Arm at present, be powerful enough perhaps to protect that unworthy Lover from my despair. In short, let them determine among themselves, now they have an opportunity, let them put Agelmond to death, if they intend to assure Harmaxes his life, unless Harmaxes will renounce his claim. However, replied Lycorax, to me there seems to be a great deal of danger in acting overhastily in such a weighty affair as this, seeing there is a moderation to be observed as well in reference to the King himself whose memory all Sarmatia adores, as also in relation to a Prince of the Blood, and who in the absence of Agathyrfus we look upon as our Sovereign: and therefore the better way will be to give way to the Season, and far from running upon desperate courses, to stay either till the return of our Prince, or that the Kingdom be better settled. In the mean time, I make no question but the Princess will frequently send me to give you an account of affairs: Besides that, the Princess Dorcira will continue her visits, and instead of keeping close in your Chamber, you may have the liberty to walk in the Garden wherever you please.

Thus had Dorcira instructed him to speak to the King of the Lombards; for she was afraid lest too much grief should deprive her of the Prince, and therefore she was willing to moderate and sweeten his sorrows, hoping at length to move that Heart which she could not believe altogether insensible of acknowledgment. But my Master after he had seriously ponder'd upon the message which Gilismene's pretended Officer had sent, and had gathered from thence some kind of consolation, he return'd this answer to the dissembling Sarmatian, Lycorax, said he, assure our Princess that I will obey her commands with all the exactness that she can expect from a Prince that only lives to serve her: but tell her withal, that she must not think to depend upon Agelmond's promises, could he apprehend that she would espouse Harmaxes: for I cannot answer for my own heart, should she deliver it over to despair by so cruel a piece of injustice.

By and by, not being satisfied with what answer he had made, he called Lycorax back more than once or twice, and having given him several commands and instructions, In the name of Heaven, said he, let the Princess know, that 'tis impossible for me any longer to live a life so deplorable; and that I shall suddenly seek to put an end to it, if Gilismene her self do not speedily tell me what she intends to do with the unfortunate Agelmond; that Agelmond whose life ought to have been so happy, but now groaning under the weight of intolerable sufferings. Sir, replied the dissembling Sarmatian, rely upon me in every thing that concerns your interest in this affair, my diligence shall be extraordinary, and I only beg of you a little longer patience, that I may have time to act with success.

Concluding those words, he departed, and I understood an hour afterwards, that there was express order given not to let any person, without any exception, enter into that part of the Garden which was under the King of the Lombards's Apartment. That day the Prince and Dorcira having been together, I made use of the liberty I had of going abroad, and went into the City to try if I could learn any news that might concern a Master whom I so dearly loved: I coined several pretences to get into several places, and in the Evening I gave him an account of what I had learn'd: Sir, said I, there runs a report in Tamyraque that you are return'd, and that they cannot imagine wherefore you should keep your self concealed: some say you have no reason to shew your self in those places where your Rival has the sovereign authority: others more bold, and less affected to Harmaxes, say if you would appear in publick, you would be soon more powerful than your Rival. "I do not wonder," answered he, that they talk of my return in a City where to many persons have not seen me since my arrival, and I also am induc'd to believe that my appearance in publick would cause some change: Gilismene is beloved, Harmaxes hated and perhaps I my self am not in a little esteem; so that the Princess's private party only want a Commander to head them, and then if they should openly take Arms, they would put the Rebels into a very great confusion. But Viginizus, this would be to arm the Sarmatians against the Sarmatians, and whatever advantages the Princess might gain thereby, she would look upon them as losses, being purchas'd with the blood of a people so dear to her: besides she has commanded Lycorax to forbid me — — — Ab, Sir, said I interrupting him, 'tis concerning Lycorax that I have much to tell your Majesty; most people accuse him not to be faithful: but all people agree that he is far more real to Harmaxes's and Dorcira's interests than to the Princess's. "You know, replied the generous Agelmond, that Lycorax wants no wit, and perhaps because he believes that he may the better serve Gilismene by keeping a fair correspondence with her Enemies, he labours to preserve Harmaxes's good will, so that 'tis no wonder if persons whose flattery is not so prosperous, or who dive not so far into Lycorax's intentions speak either out of envy or ignorance. But, Sir, said I, 'tis most certain that Harmaxes has bestowed a most considerable command upon him. "Can any person," replied he with the same goodness, think it strange that Harmaxes should gratifie Lycorax, if Lycorax can serve him with the Princess? I must confess, replied I, that your Majesty's reasons stop my mouth: but, Sir, to tell you the truth, I am not absolutely perswaded of his fidelity, and yet I cannot tell wherefore. "Ah, Viginizus, replied he, Agelmond never taught thee to be jealous without a cause. "I know very well, Sir, answered I, that my thoughts are not conformable to the high Generosity of your Soul: nevertheless, I cannot but believe that your Majesty would do better not to confide so much in people of whom your knowledge and experience is so uncertain. "I will not deny, replied my Master, but that it is a piece of imprudence to give credit too slightly: but Viginizus, I can justify my proceeding, and demonstrate that I am not deceiv'd when I believe that Lycorax is faithful to Gilismene. You know the Princess's writing, read over the last Letter which I received from her, and remember that it was Lycorax himself that brought it me.

Concluding

Concluding these words he shewed me the fatal Letters which I have already mention'd, and I had no sooner seen the words which were most to be interpreted in favour of Lycorax, but the King of the Lombards thus continued. Well Viginizus, said he, when you see that choice that Gillismene made, the words that she has so obligingly written in his behalf, can you be so unjust as to question the Sarmatian's fidelity?

Though by these Arguments and some others of the same nature, the King of the Lombards had in some measure convinced me in favour of Lycorax, yet I could not forbear to have something of a secret aversion against him, which I could not put out of my mind. In so much that I was not a little troubled, to find my Master so unapt to receive those impressions which I endeavour'd to imprint in his mind concerning a person, whose behaviour was so generally suspected by all good persons. And therefore I ponder'd all the night long upon those circumstances, which most strangely harass'd my thoughts. In the first place I could not apprehend why a wife and generous Princefs, should send so far to bring a potent Monarch back, and never come near him, not so much as to speak to him when he was return'd.

Then the reasons that Dorcira had so plausibly given my Master, began to appear very weak, for though Gilismene's Letters kept me from accusing Lycorax openly, however they did not absolutely justify him in my opinion. Every day some new doubt or other arose, which made me desire to examine the Princefs's Letter, and I had no sooner weigh'd and considered every word, but I observ'd that Lycorax's name was not set down in the writing. By degrees I began to think that the Letter might be intercepted, and that certainly so judicious a Princefs, could never cast her eyes upon a person of whom she had so little knowledge or experience, for the management of an affair so nice and of so extraordinary consequence. At the same time that these suspicions began to fortify themselves in my fancy, the King of the Lombards how generous soever he were, began to be of an opinion little different from mine: But his natural frankness and ingenuity, would not permit him to fix his thoughts seriously, and not only quitted Lycorax of all manner of collusion, but also infused into him an obstinate opinion, that all those persons that sent him could not be guilty of any injustice. However this is true, that being in his Chamber when he rose and having discovered my thoughts, he made a more considerate reflection than he had been accustomed to do, and at length began to think it necessary not to neglect the discovery of an Affair, that most concern'd him of any in this work.

As he was considering which way to proceed, Lycorax entred, and accosting my Master with a countenance more confident, than became a person so much an offender; Sir, said he, while I was seeking an opportunity to do you some small piece of service, I met with a Lombard, who passionately desires to kiss your Majesties hands. However it is requisite that with your leave I present him first to Harmaxes, who is at present entrusted with the Sovereign Authority, especially since the dispute will be about introducing a Stranger who keeps himself private, yet whom the other more vigorously and earnestly seeks after. Take you a care of that. (replied my Master seriously fixing his eyes upon Lycorax) For you would be very ingrateful should you so soon forget your duty to a Prince, to whom you were so lately engaged, for so considerable an Employment.

Upon those words Lycorax seem'd surpris'd, and Agelmond giving him to understand that he began now to take better heed of him, the politic Sarmatian reassuring himself with that dissimulation, that had rendred him so worthy to be trusted by Harmaxes and Dorcira; I confess, said he, that you may perceive me to be somewhat amazed, but Sir, I have too much cause, nor can I apprehend why a generous King should privately suspect me, when I make open profession of taking your interests. Nor will your Majesty I hope judge me a criminal, for having received a benefit from the hand of a Prince which I durst not refuse, and which I intend to surrender up again for fear of being obliged to live too remote from my Mistress. And yet you might have had a better opinion of her than you have, coldly replied the King of the Lombards, had she given you a clearer testimony of your fidelity, by putting your name into a Letter which she wrote to a Prince, who had never any knowledge of your person. Ab Sir, presently replied he, would you that so prudent a Princefs should be tied to a formality so unnecessary, and which might have proved very dangerous to me. For if I could come to give you the Letter myself, there was no need of mentioning my Name, but had it been lost by any accident that might have easily happen'd, would not the sight of my Name have procur'd me as many enemies, as there be Sarmatians in Harmaxes's party, or in Dorcira's faction.

These Arguments though outwardly propable enough, yet did not fully satisfy the King of the Lombards, which when Lycorax perceiv'd; "I find Sir, said he, that you are not sufficiently perswaded of my innocency: But that you may better understand a disposition

"upon

“ upon which you look with some disadvantageous prejudice, I leave your Majesty, to take “ yet farther pains for your sake, while you are jealous of my proceedings: I am going to “ speak again in your behalf to the Princess, and I will carry the Lombard who is so eager to “ kiss your hands to the Prince Harmaxes.

Thus this dissembling Sarmatian parted the last time from my Master, leaving the Prince strangely agitated and tormented: I confess, said he, that Lycorax's discourse is grounded upon something of probability: Yet on the other side, there are so many other likelihoods that destroy it, that I make no farther question that I am abused and Gilismene betrayed, and therefore without any farther meditation or consideration, it behoves me to know the truth from the mouth of my Princess her self. But unfortunate as I am, what greater proof can I have than what I have already? Have I not Gilismene's Letter, do I not there find that she recalls me, and after that do I not find, that instead of letting me understand how she intends to dispose of my destiny, she will not suffer me so much as to speak to her? Alas she beholds me with indignation, she flies my sight, she retires from me in the band of my Rival.

At the same time the afflicted Prince ponder'd upon all the circumstances that might augment his grief, and by and by all of a sudden; How know we, continued he, that this Letter was directed to the King of the Lombards without a subscription: Or if it were really directed to me, as the words seem to imply, why may not Lycorax be thought to have betrayed me, brib'd by Harmaxes? May not he have perswaded me to act contrary to Gilismene's thoughts, on purpose to incense that divine Princess against the unfortunate Agelmond. Having uttered these words, he held his peace, turmoyl'd for some time with variety of uncertain thoughts, but at length he resum'd his first intention, which was to speak with the Princess of the Sarmatians.

At that time his natural boldness filled his imagination only with hazardous designs, in so much that though a Prince so mild, so amorous and so amiable, of a sudden he felt himself animated with that noble courage, that always accompanied him in fight, and rendered him so formidable. But as he was considering what ways to go, for the removal of all those obstacles that might oppose the execution of his design, he saw a stranger coming into his Chamber, whom he presently knew to be the Nephew of that Grimoaldus, whom Agelmond had entrusted with the Command of all his Forces. My Master received the Lombard with many Testimonies of affection, and taking notice that his Countenance was clouded with many symptoms of sadness, he was unwilling suddenly to demand the cause of his coming. But considering that no news how delectful soever that did not concern Gilismene, could augment his sorrows in that deplorable condition, to which he saw himself reduc'd; Garibaldus, said he, I see too apparently that fortune has forsaken us, for the language of your eyes too loudly tells me, if I am not deceived, that my Army in my absence has not been able to preserve its renown entire. That victory, said he, which is always bound to follow you, has not yet forsaken us, for though perhaps we have not fought with that success, which advances the renown of our great King, yet we have no reason to complain of any cross misfortune: And therefore Sir, that is not the cause of my coming. This little Letter from Grimoaldus, will inform your Majesty so well, that I hope your Majesty will dispense with my declaring what I cannot relate without an exceeding sorrow. Having so said he presented a Letter to the King of the Lombards, which he had no sooner opened, but he read these following Lines.

Sir, I am at present in a condition so disconsolate and forlorn, that these few words must now suffice to inform your Majesty, of a misfortune that has begat a general consternation in the people. Mundisic is accustomed to Rapes, and to violate all the rights of Nations, has ravished away the Princess from us, I am making all the haste that may be after that perfidious Traitor, and I protest before all the Gods whom we adore, that I will not give over the pursuit of him as long as he lives, unless he restore the Sister of my King.

Upon the tydings of this new misfortune, the afflicted Prince lifted up his eyes to heaven, and then cast them again upon the paper, which he read over and over, to see if he could find out the least reason, to doubt the truth of this his last misfortune. But finding it too certainly testified, he turned his head toward Garibaldus, and with a look that demonstrated both trouble and sadness, he seem'd to require the circumstances of the mishap, that had befallen befallen the Princess Agione. The Lombard understanding the King's intention more inspired with melancholy than eloquence, he thus began.

It is now, Sir, said he, about fifteen days since Mundisic came to Lupia, rather as one of our Renowned King's Allies, than as a Lover of our fair Princess. And the first thing he did was to offer himself to head the Lombards, and to march against the Sarmatians for your delivery, or to revenge any wicked attempt which they should make upon your sacred person. The Princess not only refused her acknowledgment to the perfidious Traitor, but understanding that he desired to take a view of our Troops, she caus'd his commands to be obeyed with all extraordinary diligence. The politick Mundisic ordered the Rendezvouz in a large plain some twelve miles distant from Lupia, to remove all the Lombards, from whom she might receive present assistance, far enough from her. Afterwards, that he might the more easily commit his intended crime under the advantage of a long journey, he perswaded the Princess to shew her self at the Rendezvouz to the Lombards, to the end, she might the better encourage them to fight for your Majesty's interests, but she had no sooner rode a hundred furlongs from the City, when he ordered those of his party whom he had already employed and rewarded to take a quite contrary Road from that which he led to the Rendezvouz. In short, Sir, what can I tell you more but that the faithless Mundisic carried away the Princess, and was got a great way off with his Royal Prey before Grimoaldus, who was at the head of the Army, understood the least tittle of the news. So soon as he was advertis'd thereof, he flew after Mundisic, and I followed him. But notwithstanding all our extreme care, and the swiftness of our Horses, we understood two days after by such as we met upon the Road, that it would be a very difficult thing to overtake the Ravisher whom we pursued. Grimoaldus was very sorrowful to hear it, yet he followed Mundisic's steps with the same diligence, and according to his Duty sent me away with this Letter to give you an account of all things. But, Sir, as if one misfortune were linked to another, your absence, and Grimoaldus being so far out of the way, has so inflam'd the ambition of many of the Lombard Princes to take upon them the Government, that as I came along through our own Country, I found nothing but faction and disturbance, and every one striving for the Sovereign Authority.

While Garibaldus made this Relation, Agelmond walked up and down the Chamber, pondering upon the cruelty of his mischievous misfortune: he found how destiny and fate seem'd to take pains to trouble and perplex his life; that they seem'd ingenious to persecute him so many ways, and that at the same time that they kept him at Tamyraque for his love's sake, they recalled him into Germany for his own honour to the succour of Agione, and the good of his people. Through this contrariety he felt a pain which he had not till then experimented; for though the consideration of Gilismene most strongly prevailed in his heart, 'twas a very hard thing for him to determine what course to take: and then his reason not being at liberty, while all his thoughts were in a tumult he retired into his Closet: but the disturbance that followed him thither, soon after having as it were fetch'd him out again, he went down into the Garden, whether it were that he desired to be lets observ'd, or whether it were that while he walked, he thought he should put a less constraint upon his mind that was so violently turmoiled. And though persons were suffered to come into that part of the Garden, yet he chus'd the most remote and lovely walks, and there in the midst of a thick Tuft of Trees he abandon'd himself to his despair: Unfortunate Agelmond, cryed he, unhappy Prince, wilt thou not put an end to a life that thou shouldst have determin'd long since? If thou fliest after the Ravisher of Agione, will it be possible for thee to live absented from Gilismene? If thou cowardly abandonest Agione to the power of him that has taken her away, canst thou, having once renounc'd thy Honour, endure the presence of that Lady whom thou adorest?

Having pronounc'd those few words, he sigh'd, cross'd his Arms, and walked slowly: "Alas, said he, since love and fortune first joyn'd together to make men miserable, was ever Prince more expos'd to the rigour of their strokes? Did ever unhappy wretch more cruelly feel their tyranny? Ah, Agelmond, 'tis not for thee to consider so much as one minute; flie from Gilismene that flies thee, flie Gilismene that looks upon thee only with the looks of an ancient Enemy: run to assist Agione that loves thee, run to a Sister that calls thee to her succour, to a Sister that will receive thee with tears of joy and affection. Ah, treacherous Lover, presently replyed he, perfidious Lover, canst thou frame a thought so criminal? What seest thou in the whole world which thou oughtest to prefer before the divine Gilismene? How canst thou pretend that that Princess should owe thee any thing of acknowledgment, and give her but a heart divided? Consider that she is not to reign in thy heart unless she reign there alone, and Sovereignly; and to manifest a Loyalty worthy of her divine qualities, it behoves thee to be always ready without repugnancy

“ to sacrifice to her interest thy Armies, thy people, thy Sister, and thy own honour. But, miserable Prince, is it for thee to lodge so fair and illustrious a Princess in a heart dishonour’d ? Ah, Agelmond, blind Agelmond, what an error art thou running into? Canst thou abandon Agione, and not cowardly renounce Gilismene at the same time? Satisfie both those Princesses, ’tis in thy power, visit the Sarmatian Princesses, try whether she abuse thee or not, and whether she have any kindness yet left for thee; if that be true, deliver her from the tyranny of her Enemies, and then hasten to the relief of thy Sister, that with extended Arms implores thy assistance: but if Gilismene hate thee, die miserable, since how unjust soever she may prove, thou canst not but always love her passionately; but afore thou diest, according to the obligations of consanguinity revenge and deliver Agione.

To this resolution, Sir, at length the King of the Lombards came: but in regard it was not easie for him to execute it, how undaunted soever his courage were, he sat down at the foot of a great Tree, that he might in quiet consider of a way to satisfie himself in reference to Gilismene, and bring the well affected Sarmatians to take Arms. While he was in this deep meditation, he heard a kind of a noise, and turning his head, he beheld two men that came and sat down upon the brink of a little Fountain on the other side of a thick Tuft of shady Trees; at first they looked upon one another without speaking a word, but by and by he that was most advanc’d in years beginning the discourse, You see, said he, that I have the sole power over him that looks to the Gardens, and that he made no difficulty to bring us through his house into this place, where you know no person has been suffered to come since the last order which was given to the contrary. At those words the prudent Agelmond listening more attentively than before, he heard the Sarmatian who first began, proceed, We may make choice of this Garden as a most convenient place for our conferences, and we can stay here till Toxares comes hither to tell us his resolution. In the mean while, instead of prosecuting your revenge too hastily against Lycorax, ’tis very inconvenient for you to appear in Tamyraque, nor that your Friends should meet together for fear of giving our enemies too great a cause of suspicion. How, Indyrfes, replied the other Sarmatian, interrupting his Friend, shall Lycorax that treacherous Flatterer of Harmaxes always abuse us, and escape unpunished? Shall he cause us to be exiled? Shall he enjoy our Goods and Estates? Ah, no, no, either he must die, or I perish: he will not always meet with valiant Defenders, and though he were lately rescued from me upon the great Road to Tamyraque, I may light upon him with more success a second time. In short, I will never endure that my Father’s employment shall be taken from him, because he stands firm to his allegiance, and takes part with the Princess to recompence a Villain for the treasons which he commits. But, replied the former, Toxares’s advantage, and our common security require us to moderate a heat that may prove dangerous to us all in the consequences. We have no long time to be Sufferers, Agathyrfus will suddenly return: and certain it is, that the King of the Lombards lies somewhere concealed in this City; could we but make known our intentions to that generous Prince, I make no question but that he would head our party, and that—— You have no reason to doubt it, (replied my Master, and accosting Indyrfes with whom he was acquainted) for here you see Agelmond ready to joyn his zeal with yours for the interest of the Princess.

The younger of the two, who was most passionately concern’d, would have cast himself at the King’s feet, had not Agelmond, who took notice of his intention hindered him in a most obliging manner: and as he rais’d him up he no sooner cast his eyes upon his face, but he knew him again to be that fierce Sarmatian against whom he had defended Lycorax: in somuch that he admir’d at the fantasticks of his Destiny, that had arm’d his hand against so faithful a servant of Gilismene, to save the life of a Traytor that only laboured to make his own miserable. While he was making this reflection, he omitted not to give his hand to Toxares’s Son, and addressing himself in particular to him, Generous Knight, said he, you behold a Prince of whom you had once reason to complain, yet one that now desires to gain your friendship by actions quite contrary to that through which he merited your hatred. In short, it was Agelmond, who deluded by his own fate, fought against his own proper interest, and rescued Lycorax from your just indignation. True it is, that fortune was not altogether unkind to me at that time; yet though she made me take part with your enemy, she was also no less the cause that now I know you sufficiently to have a better confidence in your valour when we come to draw our Swords for our Princess. “ Sir, answered the Sarmatian, I had absolutely conjectured by the blows that fell from your Arm, that you were either the invincible Agelmond, or the formidable Agathyrfus; but the injustice of the Sarmatian whom you protect’d oppos’d that belief of mine: nor could I apprehend that the King of the Lombards would have fought for the Agent of Dorcira and Harmaxes, that is, for the chief Minister of Gilismene’s “persecutors. You will not be surpris’d, answered my Master, for having seen me in the Lycorax’s part, when I give you to understand that it was he with whom the Princess entrusted the secret of my return, and that it was Lycorax himself whom she dispatched with this Letter to recal me: But you will wonder to hear that Gilifimene has never permitted me to visit her since my return, and not contented with so injurious a proceeding, one time when I had the happiness to see her in the Garden, that she should behold me as an Enemy, and the only object of her hatred. Ab Sir, replied Indyrfes, it must necessarily be that he has betrayed both you and her, nor will it be difficult to understand by what tricks and devices, and this very Evening will I be better inform’d of all these things from the Princess her self. You know very well, that she has some confidence in me, for besides that I have been always devoted to the service of her Father, Amasia is my Niece, and I know that she has given Gilifimene notice of my being return’d to serve her, into a City where I can promise very little security to my self: So that it behoves me to confer with her, what course we ought to take to oppose Harmaxes’s Tyranny, and I promise you, Sir, that I will find out, by what juggle they have deluded so wise and quick sighted a Lady, and to morrow in the same place and at the same hour, I will give your Majesty an account of all things.

The End of the First Book of the Tenth Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

AT the time that Indyrfes concluded these words, and that the grateful Agelmond was about to reply, one of the Princess of the Igylians Pages; was seen coming toward the Wood, to seek for the King of the Lombards in the behalf of his Mistress. His appearance not only caused the two Sarmatians to retire, but so thorowly vexed my Master that he blush’d, and that so remarkably that his colour was observed by Indyrfes and Ateras, for that was the name of the other Sarmatian. Agelmond therefore return’d to his Apartment, where he found the Princess Dorcira who stayed for him; to testify how much she shar’d in his sorrow for the loss of Agione. Their discourse was very sad, tedious, and ill hung together, but in the mean time, Indyrfes, desirous to acquit himself of the promise which he had made to the King of the Lombards, went accompanied with Ateras to the Princess’s Chamber, into which Amasia had introduced them. Gilifimene received those two Sarmatians with many marks of her affection, and notwithstanding the melancholy that raign’d in her fair countenance, she seem’d to be touch’d with some kind of joy. Indyrfes, and Ateras, said she, why do you expose your selves thus to no purpose for a Princess destin’d to be unhappy? You see I am alone, forsaken by all the world unless Amasia. The King my Father is dead, I hear no news of Agathyrsus, my enemies environ me on every side, and what is yet more dreadful, I receive daily injuries from those persons from whom I expected all my support and consolation. Reserve your selves therefore, I beseech you, and signalize your fidelity lity when the King my brother returns. It suffices Madam, said they, that we have Agelmond to head us——— Ah for Heavens sake, said she interrupting them, never talk to me more of that very person whom it behoves me mortally to abhor, and whom I must be forced to look upon to my very death, as the object of my hatred. 'Tis my opinion, Madam, that you are most certainly abused and betrayed. 'Tis your Agelmond himself, replied she very hastily, that has so dealt by me as you say, and that you may be fully convinced in reference to a discourse, which I cannot endure to hear, as it is not true that Agelmond is return'd to Tamyraque, contrary to the promise which he so solemnly made me. But Madam, replied Ateras, did not you recal him your self, and did not Lycorax carry the Letter from your hand? Who I? replied Gilismene very much astonished, Did I write? Did I send Lycorax? He assured us so, replied Indyrfes. I see very well, answered she, that his crimes cost him nothing now he has begun to commit them, and that he can easily add imposture to infidelity. However it would have better become him to have invented his untruths with more likelihood, and not make you believe that I recalled him, when he is never out of Dorcira's company. He should have done better also to have nominated some other carrier of his pretended Letter than Lycorax: For in short what probability is there, that ever I should chose Lycorax with whom I was never concern'd, and whom all the world knew to be a creature of Harmaxes and Dorcira's. Thus you see Indyrfes, thus you see Ateras, that the ambitious Agelmond had no longer any love for me, when he saw that Fortune had forsaken me. It may be also he despised me, when he saw that I being a person not given to study fraud and deceit, expos'd my self every day to the devices of my Enemies, and believing my disposition to be more moderate and just than his, he has preferred Dorcira whose Genius I must confess is much more suitable to the humour of a young Soldier than mine. Is it possible, Madam, replyd Indyrfes that Agelmond, the great, the generous Agelmond, should be guilty of such a Treachery as this. 'Tis not only possible, replied Gilismene, but there is nothing more true, I am assured that Agelmond has not been out of Dorcira's company, not a moment since his return to Tamyraque. And it was but once that I step'd forth of my Chamber to take the Air, when I observed him my self walking with that Princess. I observ'd also that he spoke to her after a very passionate manner, yet he no sooner saw me but he stood like one that had been struck dumb, as much accusom'd as he had been to injure me: He strove also by what I read in his eyes to have paid something to common civility, and I believe he would have come to me, with an intention doubtless to have put off some of his pitiful excuses in my hearing, had I not retired into my Chamber, or that Dorcira had not stop'd him to prevent the consequences of a Confusion which she saw in his face. "O ye Gods, cried Indyrfes, what reliance is there upon the faith of man, if the most honourable among men are capable of so ungrateful a change. Well, Madam, I begin to be convinced, and now I remember that we had not been long in Agelmond's company, but there came one from Dorcira to seek for him, and I found that he was very much troubled, when he saw the Princess of the Igylians Page. "I remember far better, said Ateras, that Agelmond fought for Lycorax, and that he ventur'd his life to preserve Dorcira so necessary an Agent. "Well then, added Gilismene, will ye open your eyes, will ye at length confess that the King of the Lombards is unfaithful to the Princess of the Sarmatians, though a kind servant to the Princess of the Igylians? We are not only of the same mind, answer'd Indyrfes much perplex'd, but for my part I believe that Ateras and I shall not do amiss for our better security, rather to leave Tamyraque than to meet where we appointed Agelmond.

The Princess approv'd Indyrfes purpose, and after she had fully instructed him by what means to hold a correspondence till the return of the new King, the two Sarmatians stole out of the Town, and went to all the principal of their friends, to let them understand the pretended inconstancy of Agelmond. Indyrfes also went to the overseer of the Gardens, and having related all things to him, engaged him to quit his house and follow him: whereupon Telchir, for so was the Officer called, consented to obey Indyrfes, yet that his flight might be the less suspected, he left his Wife at home sick abed. However before he departed, he instructed her what answers she should make to such persons, as either Harmaxes or Gilismene should send to make any enquiry there.

Thus my Master who failed not to be at the place, where Indyrfes and Ateras had appointed to meet him, waited for the two Sarmatians: But when he saw it was to no purpose, they being gone out of Town, he was extraordinarily troubled at it. At first he imagin'd, and that with probability enough, that Harmaxes had seiz'd upon them, and therefore all his thoughts and actions, having no other aim than only the service of Gilismene, he design'd altogether the delivery of two persons so faithful to the Princess. To that purpose he commanded me to try all ways, to learn what was become of them, and to that intent I went to their Lodgings, and to all the nearest of their Relations. I enquir'd also of a hundred several ral persons, but could by no means be inform'd of what I desir'd to know. All people deny'd that Indyrfes or Ateras, were return'd to Tamiraque since they last left it, and observ'd also that their aspects were full of fear, and that they looked upon me with a strange kind of aversion: So that when I gave my Master an account of the little success I had had; he was prodigiously afflicted at it, and making a sad reflection upon every circumstance when he was alone; How, cry'd he, are there none that will come near me but they that betray me, and do all that are faithful to Gilisimene flee me, and refuse to see me again? Indyrfes and Ateras, who shew'd themselves so free to join with me, who desired Agelmond only for their Leader, who appeared willing to obey my commands, the very Indyrfes the same Ateras, that appear'd so willing to follow me, they also break their words and shun me. But alas they neither break their words nor shun me, till they have spoken with Gilisimene. After those words he ponder'd a-while, and then he darted forth such terrible looks, that I was perswaded my self, that he was forming some dreadful resolution in his thoughts.

Nevertheless how disconsolate soever his condition were, and how inflam'd soever his courage seem'd to be, he did not go about blindly to precipitate himself upon the execution of his design: On the contrary, before he absolutely abandon'd himself to despair, he resolv'd to try all things, that he might not have any thing wherewith to upbraid himself. He went therefore to Telchir's house, but not finding him, he address'd himself to his wife, who as I told you before lay sick abed. Can you tell me, said he, no news of Indyrfes? Of Indyrfes, answer'd she with a counterfeit surprize, Ab Sir, is it for such a person as I to satisfy your curiosity in such a particular? It is certain however, said he, that the Master of the house could inform me what I desire to know. He concerns himself, reply'd she, but very little in any other affairs but his own: For since the troubles in Tamiraque have produced so many different factions, we never discourse of any person at Court, for fear of begetting enemies to our selves that might make a bad construction of our words.

She utter'd these words with such an evident ingenuity, that my Master had not urg'd her any farther, could he have confin'd his moderation, in reference to Gilisimene's concerns, or had he not possibly known that the person whom he sought, had brought Indyrfes into the Garden: So that he resolv'd to inform himself yet more exactly. To which purpose he related all that he had heard, and proceeded with all the cunning that a noble courage could make use of, without having recourse to deceit or dissimulation. But all his industry was ineffectual, he could get no intelligence of any thing, so that being touch'd to the quick at his ill success; Poor Princess, cry'd he sighing, is it impossible for those persons who are most faithful to thy interests, to testify their zeal but to thy prejudice, is there a necessity that they must be thought to do thee mischief, at the very time when they labour most to serve thee?

He accompanied these words with an aspect which demonstrat'd such a visible sincerity, that that transportment of his passion wrought more of a sudden, than all his protestations that preceded. In short, the Wife of Telchir more exactly observ'd his countenance, but so far she was from beholding any thing that might render him suspected, that she discover'd there nothing but the symptoms of Grandeur and ingenuity, in the midst of those other effects of love and grief. My Master thereupon taking notice that she began to totter, redoubled his intreaties, repeated the particulars which he had learn'd from Indyrfes mouth, and to those incitements added the perswasion of a considerable jewel. Thereby she that was inclin'd to answer him with more freedom, began to make him a clear confession of all things, being strongly prepossess'd that it would be an absolute betraying Gilisimene, to act otherwise with a person, whom she saw so devoted to her service. Afterwards more earnestly beholding Agelmond; Sir, said she, you see how candid I am with you, nevertheless I do not believe I shall have any cause to repent, or that you will ever reveal this secret to the Prince of the Venedians or the King of the Lombards. To the King of the Lombards, cry'd he altogether astonish'd, do you then think that Agelmond is not faithful to see the Princess. Oh Sir, reply'd she shaking her head, I see you are abus'd as well as many others at the Court, since you believe that the King of the Lombards loves the Princess of the Sarmatians. But 'tis too true that that Prince having changed his affection as well as his party, without any ground or cause, is so ashamed thereof, that he speaks of Gilisimene still as if he had the same passion, which caus'd so much joy in Tamiraque. And thus that dissimulation, which was thought to be incompatible with Agelmond's generosity, only serves to lead many people into error. Among the rest Indyrfes was so deceiv'd, that the Princess Gilisimene her self had much ado to convince him of the truth, he was so far prepossess'd in favour of a Prince, that gains the hearts of all that know him.

How then, replied the pensive Agelmond, does the Princess believe that the King of the Lombards has renounc'd his love to her? She not only believes it, replied the other, but she has with her own eyes seen such assured signs thereof, that for that reason she looks upon him as her greatest enemy; and at length Indrycis and Ateras confirm'd by those reasons, cal'd to mind several circumstances which confirm'd the Princess much more in what already she had too apparent grounds to believe. But, (replied he, labouring to conceal some part of his grief) may not we for the advantage of the Princess, and the justification of the King of the Lombards——
Al, Sir, cried she, spitefully interrupting him, and turning to the other side of the Bed, I begin to know who you are, and if I be not deceiv'd in my conjecture, take your Jewel again—I will not only not take it again, replied the King hastily, interrupting her, but I will take care of your advancement. I had rather chuse a quiet and innocent poverty, replied she, than riches that will every moment upbraid me with a crime. 'Tis very strange, replied he, that you will continue in an error; and that you should refuse so obstinately a satisfaction which can never do you any damage. For in short I will tell you now, and I must say it as long as I live, that I adore the Princess, that I am as faithful to her as any person under Heaven, not excepting King Agathyrus himself; and I desire to talk with her but for one moment, or with any of her Attendants whom she shall make choice of: I will go to her Apartment alone, and disarm'd, if you will but introduce me in such a manner as may not be displeasing to her.
The Gods preserve me, replied she with an utterance more constant than before, from promising to meddle in an affair of this nature: no, no, Sir, I have been forewarn'd, I know how delusive you are in persuasions, and I should never deserve to be pardon'd, should I act for your interests after all the advice that I have had.

For all this my Master would not yield, he prayed, he entreated, he promised, he urged, but all to no effect; so that at last he was constrain'd to depart without any farther information. He beheld that resolute woman with a most sensible anguish of mind; nevertheless, instead of breaking out into any extravagancy against her for her obstinacy; for so nice was his love, that his heart was rather pleas'd to see her so well affected to the Princess whom he admired. So soon as he came into the Garden he crossed his Arms, and lifting up his eyes to Heaven, Thou providence, cryed he, whom I have always adored, content thy self to have rendered me the most miserable among men; but extend not thy anger to the most perfect person that ever was. After that he pondered as he walk'd, then of a sudden, Good Gods, cryed he again, let my prayers prevail, that you would let a fair and innocent Princess rest in tranquillity, who better deserves the effects of your protection than those misfortunes with which her life is continually turmoiled: if you afflict her to make me suffer the more dreadful torments, trouble not the repose of her life, Agelmond will put an end to his, he will remove out of your sight the only cause you have to render Gilismene unhappy: Nay, it behoves him to die, pursued he, infligated by his despair, since there is no longer any doubt of the continuance of my misery: for in short, adoring Gilismene as I do, notwithstanding all her cruelty, it is not my Duty to deliver from the odious object that troubles the tranquillity of her Soul? Let us then no longer stand to deliberate, let us die, let us overturn all those obstacles that separate us from Gilismene. If Heaven, so much our enemy, will permit us at length but to present our selves before the feet of that Princess, we will sacrifice to her the victim which she demands. Happy in that last misfortune, if the loss of our life may appease that implacable hatred with which the Gods torment my miserable days.

Having taken this resolution, he marched toward the Palace with a haughty and furious Gate; for my part, as I had attended him together with Garibaldus, not willing to forsake him in that disconsolate condition, I was confirm'd in my fears, observing the terribleness of his looks, and how he began already to stare somewhat wildly with his eyes, wherefore we resolv'd to keep sight of him, and following him at a distance, I heard the undaunted Prince demand leave to see the Princess. The Officer that commanded the Guard answered him with little or no respect, having strict order not to let any person enter: Did you know who I am, replied Agelmond, doubtless you would believe that my quality deserves a more particular consideration, and perhaps I may teach you, if you deny a more peculiar privilege to the King of the Lombards. I must not omit my Duty, replied the Commander very briskly, and it suffices that I know that among all the men in the world I am only to except the Prince Harimaxes.

My Master hearing the name of his more fortunate Rival, felt a new access of anger, and laying his hand upon the Hilt of his Sword, force me not, cryed he, to make thee repent of thy behaviour, and know that if I have recourse to that means which is in my power to open my self a pass'g—— I shall never repent, cryed the Officer, interrupting him, of doing my Du- ty, and to shew you that I intend to acquit my self with all fidelity, if you forget that you are out of your own Territories: I shall it may be remember better than you would have me, that you are not here King of this Country.

The enraged Prince then losing the remainder of his patience, drew forth that formidable Sword which the Sarmatians had so often felt to their cost, and as he was about to fly upon that piece of insolence that had excited his rage, Ten or Twelve of the Guards presented the points of their Halberds to his Breast, notwithstanding that sacred Character that claims obedient reverence, in whatever condition it be. But the number of his Enemies augmented my Master's courage, for being at the door he had this advantage, that he could not be encompassed round, but fought with less inequality notwithstanding their multitude.

Garibaldus and I hearing the noise of this hurly burly, ran to the assistance of our Master, crying out aloud that succours were coming: Not so much to encourage a Prince that was one of the most daring persons in the world, as to terrify those Cowards that assailed his precious life. The furious Agelmond who had at our approach, already beaten to the ground two of the stoutest of the Guards, no sooner heard our voices but that thinking himself engaged, instead of fighting with less vigour, to do something extraordinary, he flung himself in among the Sarmatians with an incredible fury, and having singled out the Captain, he gave him such a blow thwart the head, that he cleft it in two. They that beheld him lay on so desperately were so affrighted, that Agelmond might have easily enter'd into the Princess's Chamber, if at the same time the perfidious Lycorax, destin'd to do him continual injuries, had not opposed him with seven or eight Armed men. For he apprehended that the enterview of Agelmond and Gilismene, would be worse than death, conjecturing very rightly, that it would produce a revolution to his ruine. Besides that at that time preferring Harmaxes advantages before Dorcira's interest, he thought it no time to dissent, seeing that nothing now remain'd but only for him openly to withstand my Master's designs, as he had already secretly countermin'd him in all his purposes, and therefore addressing himself to those that accompanied him, left us to revenge the dishonour of Sarmatia, and destroy a Stranger that never came among us but to our damage. The undaunted Agelmond beheld with a new supply of courage, the new recruit, whose number in all likelihood threatned his ruine, and having spied Lycorax among them; "Ah Traitor, cried he with a menacing utterance, thou shalt dye, for heaven has not brought thee before the King of the Lombards, but to receive the punishment of thy crimes. With those words he reinforced his fury, and how formidable soever he had always appeared before to me in combat, I can safely averr, that he outdid all the former acts of his valour, at that very time.

In short Sir, Agelmond excelled himself fighting for his own justification, and the service of Gilismene. But while he strikes, while he kills, while he overturns, notwithstanding his weariness and the wounds which he had received, he finds the number of his enemies increase, and though there seem'd no great probability, that he could preserve his life in the midst of so many dangers, however he despaired not to revenge himself, and to perform what he had threatned against Lycorax. Garibaldus and I followed him prosperously, but I fear that neither all our endeavours nor all our zeal, could have warrant'd him from an inevitable death, had not Dorcira her self understanding what had pass'd, hasten'd to his succour at the head of several of her own servants and Attendants.

The valiant King of the Lombards had by that time made his way to Lycorax, and vigorously pressed upon him, so that at the very instant that Dorcira appeared, he had sheath'd his Sword in the bowels of the perfidious Sarmatian, though unluckily for my Master, Lycorax did not expire upon the place, but reeling off he recovered to much strength as to get to Gilismene's Chamber, "You see Madam now, said he, that Agelmond no longer conceals his designs, you see that he aims as well at your life as at the life of Harmaxes, and that his intentions are to advance to the Throne of Sarmatia that Princess that has joyned with him in the midst of so many Swords Points.

Concluding these words he gave up his black Soul, and dyed like a Traitor as he had always lived, and Gilismene seeing the belief she had already so confirm'd by Dorcira's forwardness and the testimony of a dying man, felt such a violent agitation of spite, grief, anger and jealousy, that as wise as she was she forgot all her moderation, and suffred her self at length to break out into complaints and reproaches. Amasis for her part no sooner beheld Dorcira's Attendants fighting for the King of the Lombards, and Dorcira her self encouraging them with more than ordinary manhood, but her passions almost equal'd the force of her fair Mistress, that now she began to speak against a Prince, whose part she had always taken, at all times, that she found the least appearance of reason to defend him: Well, Amasia, said the Princess with a resentment that had inflam'd her lovely countenance, do you now any longer question the falsity of this ingrateful person? I am so far from questioning it, Madam, answered Amasia, that I palpably beheld it, and abhor it.

In this manner came Harmaxes also, and put himself into a posture to have overwhelm'd my Master with his multitude: Dorcira trembled at it, and believing there was no way to deliver the King of the Lombards from the greatest danger that ever threatned his life, but to cause Harmaxes to retire, she forsook the person whom she loved, and took Harmaxes along with her, who was the more ready to obey her will, fancying that in the absence of that Princess, Agelmoud would be expos'd to some new danger. But on the contrary that valiant Prince soon made way to Gilismene her self; and he no sooner came near her but he dropped the point of his Sword out of respect, that warlike fury that encouraged him changing into a profound submission. However, surpris'd at the sight of the most amiable Beauty which he so passionately lov'd, he had not power presently to draw near her, being first desirous to discover in Gilismene's Heavenly eyes the condition of a fortune of which they were the Sovereign Controllors. The prepossessed Princess took that mark of respect for an effect of shame, and the countenance of a pretended offender which she thought she had reason to abominate, excited in her Soul a new addition to her indignation. So soon as she perceiv'd that Agelmoud mov'd toward her, Approach, cryed she, approach perfidious wretch, to give me my dear's wound, which I prefer far before the sight of a Monster who is the object of all my antipathy.

Upon those words more terrible than the Thunder of the Sky, our disconsolate Lover tremblingly ador'd the Princess that pronounced them; he felt a mortal Ague run through all his Veins, and as he was about to throw himself at the feet of the exasperated Gilismene, she turn'd about hastily to have gone into her Closet together with Amasia: but Agelmoud holding her by the Garment, Stay, cruel Princess, said he, stay, see if you can suspect the testimony which I am about to give you of my love; see if you can question the despair into which a hatred which I have so little merited has thrown me?

Having so said in a most doleful, yet passionate manner, he beheld that lovely Princess who had reduced him to that strange extremity; then turning the point of his Sword against Breast, and throwing himself upon it, he tumbled upon the Floor before we could possibly hinder the execution of so terrible a design: Amasia gave a loud shriek, and I ran to my poor Master, whom I saw swimming in two Rivers of Blood, while a mortal paleness covered all his face.

How extreme soever my afflictions were, instead of deploring in vain so dreadful a misfortune, I made it my business to try whether I could do my Sovereign any service, if he were in a condition to be the better for it; I gently drew out the fatal instrument of our disconsolation, and if Amasia came not to our relief, it was because she was obliged to assist the Princess her self who was swooning away in her Arms; yet notwithstanding the trouble wherein the generous Amasia found her self, she sent me presently her own and the Princess's veil, wherewith I stopp'd both Agelmoud's wounds, then I caus'd the Prince to be carried to a Bed, expecting the coming of the Chirurgeons whom I had sent for with all the speed imaginable. Then it was that all my courage forsook me, having beheld my Master as earnestly as my love would give me leave, I watered his face with my tears; and not being in a condition to consult the Laws of good Manners, or of Reason, I spoke and acted whatever a kind of rage with which I found my self transported could infuse into me: "Poor Prince, cryed I, was it possible that thou shouldst put an end to thy renowned days in so deplorable a manner? Was it possible, that fortune having assailed thee so often with so little advantage to her self, should at length make thee thine own enemy, having no other way to triumph over thy great courage.

But then not able to speak a word more, oppress'd with a grief too quick and vigorous, I looked upon Agelmoud's eyes; but alas, the lovely fire was gone that always enlivened them; I could neither descry the sweet, nor the terrible which they had accustomed to display according to the difference of occasions. While thus I was recollecting my sorrows, the Physicians and Chirurgeons came; who, without losing a moment of time, opening the wound, were not a little astonish'd at the wideness of it, but when they had well search'd the depth of it, they all agreed that it was not mortal, and that the Sword that made it had not well answered the despairing hand that thrust it in. This opinion of theirs recovered my Soul, yet notwithstanding that consolation which I receiv'd, I was a little afraid of my dear Master's life; and every moment I consult'd the countenances of the Chirurgeons, to see whether they had spoken according to the truth of their thoughts. In the interim they applied their first dressing, and poured upon the orifice of the wound a certain Balsam of that wonderful efficacy, that in a short time he came to his senses. Then did he softly turn his eyes upon those persons that stood about him, and having discovered my face, he fixed his eyes upon me with a kind of earnestness which upon such accidents infuses into a man such a dread as cannot be well expressed. It may be, that having but a confused knowledge of things, he beheld me in that manner either to satiate himself, or rather to require some other kind of service from me, than he receiv'd from those that dress'd his wounds. In short, he was no sooner able to distinguish the objects of sight, and to judge of things, but perceiving that he had been dress'd, and that there was an intention to save his life, he looked upon all those that were diligent in his relief, as his most cruel enemies: nay, he went farther, so that when he was able to stir his Arms, he endeavour'd to tear off the plasters that were laid upon his wounds; and because it was an easie thing for us to hinder him, in regard of his weakness, he complain'd thereof with an aspect that forced our pity, seeing himself in a condition not to act otherwise against himself, or to obtain that by violence which we refus'd to his entreaties: And you also, Viginizus, said he to me with a feeble utterance, will you constrain me to live, that is, to be yet more miserable? Are not you a witness that Gilismene hates me? And would you then desire me to love my life? Live, Sir, answered I, live, for Gilismene has changed her resolution. she no longer has any unkindness for you, or to say better, she never had: they had deceiv'd her to incense her against you; but the Gods inspired you with this violent resolution that she might see her error, and to deliver you from those afflictions with which your life has been miserably persecuted.

Though the King of the Lombards had shut his heart against all the sounds of joy, yet he could not chuse but feel some kind of consolation, hearing those words to which his innocency gave credit. True it is, that not being able long to flatter himself, he cast his eyes once more upon me, and he was about to require some proof of what I told him, when the Physicians gave him a farther assurance of it, and conjured him at the same time on Gilismene's behalf not to obstruct the pains which they took to preserve his life. That assurance wrought as effectually as they could desire upon the enamoured Agelmond, so that he not only suffer'd them to attend his cure, but he refrain'd from talking as they had advis'd him, how great soever his desire were to talk, and to learn the particulars of all those ways which they had made use of to deceive the Princess.

In the mean time the afflicted Gilismene had a longing impatience to visit the King of the Lombards: but Harmaxes and Dorcira so artificially oppos'd it, that the fair Princess could not have compass'd a design so favourable to my Master, had not the King, out of an eager desire of so absolute a happiness, relaps'd into a dangerous languishment: whereupon the Princess of the Igylions looking upon the death of the person whom she entirely loved, as the greatest evil that she could expect, not only consented to Gilismene's desire, but she facilitated that very visit which she had so much cause to be afraid of; for my part I thought it convenient to give my Master some reason to hope for so great a happiness, and to prepare him insensibly to undergo without danger so sudden an alteration from the extremity of despair to the height of joy; so that when I had us'd all those cautions that might settle Agelmond's heart in some security, the Princess came to his Apartment, but she came in such a manner as had like to have overturn'd all the foundations which I had taken so much care to lay; for she was negligently habited, and grief having sweetened all that she had terrible in the lustre of her fair eyes, she was to be beheld with more delight than fear, and yet no person could behold her without being mov'd to compassionate that sadness that vigorously assailed her heart; she mov'd toward Agelmond with a languishing air, and that languishment shewing it self in her Majestick Gate, had such an unutterable charm, that it powerfully commanded all the hearts of those that stood by. As soon as she perceiv'd the King of the Lombards, she sigh'd; but when she came near him the tears stood in her fair eyes, notwithstanding the flames that enlivened them. The enamoured Agelmond no sooner saw her, but, not being able to contain his joy: Ah, 'tis too much, dear Princess, cry'd he, and though I suffered a thousand deaths for the divine Gilismene, yet should I accuse myself of too much pride, if I durst presume my self deserving the favour which I now receive. 'Tis you, most Generous Prince, reply'd she, whose perseverance is too obliging toward a person that reduc'd you to this extremity: true it is, that several probabilities made me collect that you had changed your faith, and you might have the same opinion of Gilismene. In short, we have been both guilty and innocent: or, to say better, we have mutually both preserved an inviolable faith, not knowing the sincerity of each other; let us preserve to the end so fair an affection, and be confidently perswaded, that if the King of the Lombards continues his favour to the Princess of the Sarmatians, the Princess of the Sarmatians will never be engaged to any other person ban to the King of the Lombards. She said no more for fear of injuring a Prince, altogether transported with love and joy, while the passionate Prince instead of returning an answer, kept his eyes fixed upon the fair eyes of the Princess, there to consider that affection which it was no difficult thing to discover.

Some few days after my Master finding himself in a better condition, to resist the powerful effects which Gilismene's visits produc'd, the fair Princess came again, and I had no sooner caus'd those persons to withdraw, whom I had any reason to suspect, but those two illustrious persons began to give each other that satisfaction, which they had so long desir'd. Agelmoud shew'd her the Letter which the perfidious Lycorax had given him, and the Princess having looked upon it with an extraordinary surprize, declared to whom and to what intent she had writ it. After that they mutually gave each other the absolute knowledge of all things, wherein as I have told you, they had been abus'd, when the incens'd Prince not being able, as he desired to have done in Gilismene's presence, to restrain the violence of his resentment; Ab Traitor, cryed he, unworthy Rival, dishonourable Harmaxes, Thou wilt find one day by the success of thy perfidy, whether it be by such treacheries as these that thou art to pretend to that fair Conquest which thou wouldst ravish from me? Thou wilt one day see, whether it be possible to prosper by such ways as these, so contrary to those that lead to the accomplishing of all generous enterprises?

He would have spoken more in that extasie, nor can I tell whether a Sex for which he had a general respect, could have protect'd Dorcira from his just reproaches, if the prudent and moderate Gilismene out of the effect of her admirable virtue, had not interrupted him, to put him beside all thoughts of revenge. Sir, said she with an incomparable sweetness and Majesty, what is become of that magnanimous courage, of which you have given so many fair proofs upon so many various occasions? Ought not that to set you at this time above all those injuries which you have received, as it has always taught you to despise the greatest dangers? I find the courage of my soul, replyed he, sufficient to pardon all those wrongs that have been offer'd to the King of the Lombards, and do really pardon them every one: But, Madam, it troubles me to suffer those persecutions to go unpunished, which they have made my Princess suffer, nor can I remember them without a just indignation, without a just desire to revenge the injuries, done to that fair Princess whom I adore. Ab, Sir, replyed the generous Princess really moved, can you think upon the proceedings of Gilismene and Dorcira, without considering at the same time the proximity of blood that unites them to Gilismene? Think you that it were possible for me to see them miserable, without being my self afflicted? And in a word Sir, can you assail them without spilling my blood? Besides that after all this, neither the Prince of the Venedians nor the Princess of the Iglions have offended us, but as they were capable of an affection, which is not always grounded upon reason. If they had recourse to those contrivances that are beneath us, are we not in a manner obliged to pity their errors and their ignorance? Ought we not instead of offering violence for violence, rather bewail the persons of an illustrious extraction, whom the immortal Gods have not favoured with these advantages, which we have received from heaven?

The King of the Lombards hearing such evidences of a prodigious virtue, beheld his Princess more earnestly, and transported with admiration; "Madam, cried he, how does the Grandeur of your Soul advance you above the degree of mortals, even as the beauty of your eyes, exalts the excellency of your charms above whatever was charming upon earth? But my dear Princess, amorously added he, is it to be imagin'd that in so generous and so great a Soul, there should be so much tendernefs with so much moderation? Can I believe that a wisdom, the exact regularity whereof I cannot chuse but fear, will ever suffer in your heart those motions of affection, which a Prince that adores you may be subject to require? Rather Sir, replyed she, can you imagine that the Princess of the Sarmatians, can fail of a true kindness for the King of the Lombards? No no, Sir, Gilismene can never want an affection for a Prince, to whom she is so much engaged: For this real kindness is so well founded upon eminent services, so firmly establish'd by the consent of a Father to whom I owed an entire obedience, so well fix'd by the sollicitations of a Brother infinitely dear, that I know nothing able to shake it, unless it be the infidelity of Agelmoud. How happy am I divine Princess, cried he interrupting her, taking her by one of her fair hands, which he kiss'd with a deep respect before she could withdraw it, Yes my divine Princess I am happy, and since the Mistress of my destiny has spoken these words of comfort to me, I desire all that the malignity of fortune can raise against Agelmoud, to trouble those joys that have taken possession of his Soul. However Sir, replyed she, I cannot tell whether it be just that I should give you this assured satisfaction, since I have still some ground to fear your repentment against the Prince of the Venedians and the Princess of the Iglions. Well Madam, replyed he, since you forget that Harmaxes and Dorcira were your most

“most cruel enemies, and only remember that they are your nearest relations next your Fa“ther, I am willing to sacrifice all the anger which I had conceived against the persecutors “of your life. Yes, Madam, I pardon both the Princess of the Igylions and the Prince of “the Venedians, nor is it more true that I adore you, than it is certain that they shall never “receive any damage or injury, by consent of the King of the Lombards.”

The generous Princess was satisfied with this my Master's protestation, and in regard her virtue had banished from her Soul all thoughts of revenge either against Harmaxes or Dor-cira, she still behaved her self as she was accusom'd, toward those enemies of her repose.
 This made the Prince of the Venedians and the Princess of the Igylions believe, since they saw no change in Gilismene's carriage, that their wiles and cheats were not discovered, which was the reason that neither did they change their manner of acting. In the mean time, the Princess of the Sarmatians having rather shut up, than dispell'd the violence of her grief, by means of that constraint which she had put upon her self, perceiv'd by little and little the effect of a profound melancholy, which was retired to the bottom of her soul, so that the conceal'd poyson had no sooner gathered new strength, but it cast the incomparable Gilismene into a troublesome fit of sickness. The Prince of the Venedians was very diligent to provide her attendants, and to serve her himself: But Gilismene's heart was not to be touched with any acknowledgment for all his pains, for though the prudent Princess would not testify any disgust against a Prince so nearly related to her, yet she little regarded whatever he did for her, and denyed all courtesies at his hands, which decency would permit her to refuse. In the same manner was Dorcira received by the King from the Lombards, for it was only out of respect to her Sex, which that Prince naturally honoured, that he shewed her any countenance, or that he did not appear unmannerly to rid himself of the importunity of her visits. This she took so hainously, that she never met Harmaxes at the usual places of caballing, but with violent resolutions. At first they beheld one another without speaking a word, but with eyes wherein their passions seem'd lively colour'd forth, Soon after the Princess being the first that brake silence, Sir, said she, I am quite weary of acting in vain, nor can I endure that an ingrateful Stranger should receive as injuries all the good offices which I labour to render him every moment. 'Tis much more grievous Madam, (replyed he in a tone that testified his malice, that a person so nearly related to me, should slight and contemn me in this manner: But my misfortune astonishes me worse than yours, that I should meet with as much constancy and resolution in the heart of a young Virgin, as you find in the brest of a haughty Soldier. Well Sir, replyed the Princess of the Igylions, then let us cast off this Yoke which they have imposed upon us, so little conformable to our degree, and the grandeur of our courage. Let us hate at length what we ought not to love, and since our power is absolute in Tamyrake, let us destroy what we cannot purchase to our selves. Praised be the Gods Madam, replyed the Prince of the Venedians, for having inspir'd you with this generous resolution; now it is that you shew your self to be that illustrious Princess, whose constant and elevated thoughts have struck an admiration over all Sarmatia. For indeed there is a necessity for us to destroy a common Enemy, that refuses you a heart which you have so well deserved, and that robs me of the Princess whom I adore. How, said she interrupting him and blushing, would you that we should begin our Revenge upon Agelmond? Would you draw down all the forces of the Lombards and the Huns, into a Kingdom where we are so ill assured of the Sovereignty, and where that very person, far more popular than you, is able to raise all the people against your faction. No no, Sir, 'tis more secure for us to destroy Gilismene, she has more Right than you to Sarmatia, and her death will not only establish you in the Throne, but will facilitate a way for you to purchase an Alliance with the King of the Lombards. “But Madam, cried he shewing his dislike of her advice, will “it be possible for you to purchase this Alliance, rather do you not believe that Agelmond “will arm all the force of his Kingdom against us? Can you otherwise think but that he “will be more ready to sacrifice your life to the Ghost of Gilismene, than to yield you a place “in that heart, which she with so much Sovereignty possesses. “And you Sir, (boldly re-“plyed she, being touched to the quick at Harmaxes's words) think you that you shall sooner “overcome Gilismene than I gain the good will of Agelmond? That friendship, said he, which is “ordinarily among kindred, may at length perhaps encline the Princess of the Sarmatians, “not to hate the Prince of the Venedians. Quite on the contrary, replyed she, there is no“thing so opposite to love, as that friendship of parents from which you hope so much re“lief. And it may be boldly maintained that Gilismene will never have that affection for “Harmaxes which he aims at, seeing that from her infancy her affection has been of a “another nature. “That's your opinion Madam, replyed he, but since mine is quite contra“ry to yours, I declare to you that I will not quit my hopes: And therefore that we may “lose no time in proving which of our opinions is best, let us take such courses as may be “equally

“equally advantageous; let us leave which of these two persons we love to the determination of fate, and which of us two fortune shall favour, they shall labour for the others satisfaction. Dorcira having consented, they went forth both together, and conferred privately in the Garden, very likely with an intention to deceive each other.

However, some few days after a report was spread abroad that Gilismene's first Physician was discarded: that Amasia had receiv'd orders to be gone; and that because that generous Virgin would not obey her Mistress's Enemies, she was taken away by force, and carried to a House which her Father had built upon the River Borythenes; the news hereof very sensibly afflicted me, and I remember it struck me with such a secret terror that might well pass for a preface of the misfortune that threatened us. However, I spoke not a word thereof to my Master till some time after, that upon the arrival of one of his Subjects which came to Tamyraque upon extraordinary business, I did not bind my self to so strict a silence. That Lombard having undertaken a voyage, and meeting by accident with a Knight of the Hun's Nation, had quarrell'd with him, and briskly encountered him, being encouraged by the interest which his fidelity to the Royal Family of his own Country made him take. The Hun less stout than he was forc'd to desire Quarter after he had received three or four wounds; and whether it were that he thought more easily to obtain Quarter out of the hopes which he gave him of some great reward, or that he desired to charge his Enemy with the troublesome commission which he had in trust, and was weary of by reason of his wounds: the Hun delivered into the Lombard's hand a packet, which the famous Keva General of the Huns had sent to the King his Master: also to shew the importance of the packet, he told the Lombard that Keva did therein give an account to the King of the Huns of the Negotiation that kept him at the Court of Honorius; and gave him intelligence besides of a fair Princess that Mundisc had taken away by force. At those last words the Lombard was overjoyed, and preferring the fidelity he owed his Prince before any other act of duty or promise, he posted with all haste to Tamyraque. Keva's Letter was very welcome to Agelmond, who having opened it with great expectations of news, to the best of my remembrance read therein these following words.

Keva to the King of the Huns.

Sir, we have continued our private conferences, and I have obtain'd almost all those things which I demanded in your Majesty's name: I make no question, but together with the alliance of the two Nations, to make another, which may unite your Royal Family to that of the great Theodosius, and to settle the Princess Theodolinda upon the Throne of the most famous Empire that ever was. I did believe that Honorius would make some obstruction in that important affair, for I was certainly inform'd by Heraclian, that the Emperour was passionately in love with a Stranger who was called Bellamira. But, Sir, can you believe it? For Bellamira does but slight the lofty Title which the Emperour of the Romans so submissively offers her; and that which I more wonder at, was, that that noble Stranger is no other than the fair Princess which, to the great displeasure of your Majesty, Mundisc carried away by force through the impulse of his love, the violence whereof he could not moderate.

The King receiv'd some consolation, understanding in what place he might find Agione, and that she was treated with respect by the most potent Monarch of the West: nevertheless he resolv'd to send Embassadors to Honorius as soon as possibly he could, to demand her back again, or else to invade Italy with a powerful Army, should the Emperour, possess'd with too strong a passion, refuse to deliver a Princess so near and dearly related to him.

But while he desires so earnestly to see Gilismene, and to deliver Agione, while so just a desire contributes so visibly to his cure, and that Gilismene her self began seemingly to mend, at the same time, Sir, that incomparable Princess dies, and her sudden death caus'd a general consternation among all the Sarmatians. But in regard Harmaxes and Dorcira were very much dreaded in Tamyraque, the people durst not openly accuse them to be the authors of her death: so that those persons who spoke with most freedom, did but only mutter that the death of Gilismene was the fatal effect of some poison prepared by the disorderly rage of ambition and jealousy. The discarding Amasia and the Phylician whom the Tyrants could not entice to their party, sufficiently confirm'd the suspicion, but the orders which the Prince of the Venedians afterwards gave, put them almost quite out of doubt. For in short, Hymixes would not permit any person to come near the Princess, not the very principal of her own Servants, causing her to be carried out in the night, and to be buried without any State in the Tomb of her Ancestors, for fear, as he said, that the sight of so sad an object should augment the affliction of the Sarmatians. 'Tis true, that the next day he ordered sumptuous preparations for Gilismene's Funerals, and counterfeited a shew of all the signs of sorrow and heaviness; whether it were that he were really grieved, or that he thought it necessary to appear so in the sight of a people that were sincerely dejected for their loss. In the mean time I was obliged to advertise my poor Master of the most terrible of all his misfortunes: 'twas expedient for him to understand the extremity of his miseries, and the most dismal stroke that the most dreadful Thunders of Heaven had ever given him. To this purpose I ponder'd for some time how to prepare his fancy, and how I might in some measure qualify that mortal grief which I knew would seize his heart upon the first bad tidings of the accomplishment of his misfortunes; I forbid all persons to go near him, but by order, to the end, that being alone with him, I might with less difficulty take such opportunities as might give the fairer success to my design. First therefore I began to tell him that Gilismene's sickness was more dangerous than it was thought to be; and because the sorrow of my countenance agreed with my words, the enamour'd Prince impatiently interrupting me, Ah, Viginizus, cryed he, as if he had taken some alarm, What is it that you tell me? That which I ought not to conceal, answered I sighing. But, Viginizus, pursued he, is my Princess in any danger? Though she were, Sir, replied I, and though it were the will of Heaven it self to take from the earth that ornament that so adorns it, is it for me, Sir, to tell you the news? Is it for me to bring the tidings of such a direful stroke of fortune?

Upon those words Agelmond appearing much more troubled, earnestly beheld me, and with a trembling utterance, I beg of thee, Viginizus, said he, to explain thy meaning fully. While he spake in that manner he kept his eyes fixed upon mine, and seeing nothing there that pleas'd him, nor indeed in any other part of my countenance; Yet once more, said he, speak, Viginizus, speak; and if I must die, pronounce my doom, without suffering me to linger out a life more insupportable than the most cruel death. Sir, replied I, I do assure you, that if the incens'd Gods do dispose of the destiny upon which yours depends, contrary to our expectations, I will not hide the misfortune from you, nor any part of its circumstances. It may be I may go a little farther than you think; for I do not believe that after so great a loss I shall have so much courage to desire you to take care of your own life, though my own have an inseparable dependency upon it.

Those words having surpris'd Agelmond, and as it were disarm'd his grief, he beheld me with more moderation, and in the language of his countenance seem'd to tell me, that he relyed with an absolute confidence upon me: that it was from me that he expected the determination of his fate: and that it was from my mouth that he looked to be inform'd of what he had to hope, or what to fear. When I found that my innocent wile had thus succeeded, and that my Prince was absolutely dispos'd to give credit to what I should say, Sir, said I, pursuing my discourse, since I have promised not to flatter a Master to whom I am entirely devoted, it behoves me to advertise you, that though you should lose the Princess of the Sarmatians, the Heavens have not decreed that you should follow her, and at the same time put an end to all your troubles. How, Viginizus, cryed he, interrupting me, do you change your opinion already. Quite on the contrary, Sir, said I, that which I say is a true sign of my devotion to your interests, since it is only for your honour, and the honour of the Princess that I speak as I do. In short, Sir, would you die, despoiled of your Kingdom, like a cowardly Prince whose low courage had submitted to his misfortune? Would you that the world should believe that you die for grief to see your only Sister Agione under the power of a Prince so potent, that you could never hope to reduce him to the necessity of restoring her? Do you not believe, Sir, that the world will attribute your death to these two great losses, the report whereof is already spread over all the earth? Think you that men will dive into your heart for arguments proper to excuse your despair, which only love can render pardonable in the Souls of great men? Ah, Sir, if that be your opinion, I beseech you chase it from your Breast, it is too flattering, it will injure you too much: all the world gazes upon your Territories, while your people harass one another with civil wars: all the world knows that the Princess of the Lombards is carried away by force; and after all these remarkable misfortunes can you imagine it honourable, that a passion known to so few should be the cause of your death? Your reasons, impatiently cryed he, are not without very good ground: but, Viginizus, how dreadful they are to me! How sadly do I suffer already from the dismal apprehensions which they have insus'd into me! For Heaven's sake hold me no longer in suspense, speak, explain your meaning; you have no more to do for a miserable wretch that endures a torment a thousand times more horrible than death.

Upon those words I resolv'd to make use of that favourable opportunity, for fear I should be constrain'd to renew my Master's affliction: so that I summon'd up all my strength to enable me to reveal to him at length that which I knew he could not long be ignorant of. So soon as he perceiv'd that I began to behold him with a pensive look, and that the tears fell from my eyes, O Gods, cryed he, Viginizus; like one distracted, what do your tears denounce? That all is lost, Sir, answer'd I sighing, and that Gilisimene——
How, cryed he, interrupting me, transported with despair, is Gilisimene dead? And observing that my countenance gave him too much assurance, not having the power to speak a word more, he laid his hand upon his wound to have tore it open, that he might not survive the greatest of his misfortunes, I no sooner conjectured his intent, but I laid hold of his Arm, and while he beheld me with a threatening aspect, and endeavoured to get loose, I called the Servants in, to the end that the disconsolate Prince losing the hope of executing his design, might at the same time moderate a violence no less dangerous than that from which I sought to avert his despairing hand. Thus disappointed, and darting wild and furious looks upon the persons that stood about him, Barbarians, cryed he, will you never cease to persecute me with your importunate double diligence? Will you never leave to do me kindnesses that only prolong my sufferings? And you, Viginizus, once so faithful to your King, but now so disobedient to his will; what is become of your affection? What is become of the Generosity of your Soul? Do you hate me because you see the Heavens and the Earth abominate me? Are you my Enemy when you see me encompassed round with none but Enemies? And do you conspire with those Enemies to prolong the torments which I endure? Sir, reply'd I with a more courageous and resolute utterance, I have already told you, that it is not for you to die like a mean and cowardly Sufferer. Reascend your Throne, Sir, reascend your Throne, and die like a King; deliver Agione, and then die honourably, rather than give the world an occasion to report any thing disadvantageous to our memory. But, Viginizus, reply'd he with tears in his eyes, have I not given sufficient proof of my valour, which may both assure your belief, and permit me to die without that nicety of which you would fain make me afraid? Though you have given those proofs of your courage, you are still Sovereign of a warlike Nation, you have a potent Army under your command, and you are now to declare a war against the Emperour of the Romans. But, Sir, now you are so far from all assistance, stripped of your Dominions, without Arms; while you have an honourable quarrel with the Successors of the Great Theodosius, what will all the world say, what will posterity say, if now you faint without doing something worthy that name which you render'd so famous, so renowned.

This discourse of mine having made some impression in the King of the Lombards's heart, he more earnestly beheld me; and after he had fetch'd a deep sigh, Is it possible, said he, that you will so obstinately constrain me to prolong my torments? And that I must be oblig'd to live for a Princess's sake that is dead? 'Tis not for Gilisimene's sake, reply'd I, that you prolong your life: it would be more noble to let the world see that you died for that fair Princess, than when it were in your power to live like a great King, when surrounded with all the fame that you have won, you might be said to forsake all that honour for her sake. But now all the world will attribute your death not to the death of Gilisimene, but to Agelmond's own misfortunes which he poorly faint'd under. Well, Viginizus, answer'd he, I will endure this miserable life a little longer, since it must be so; and that it is not just, that loving Gilisimene I should leave behind any suspicions after my death which may be prejudicial to my memory. After these few words he paus'd, and fetching several sighs, then of a sudden returning an answer to his own thoughts, Yes, yes, pursued he, I will live: the end of my sufferings is not yet come: it behoves me to surmount all those misfortunes that cross my life; and to shew to all the world, that the misfortunes of Gilisimene only had power to oppress the courage of Agelmond.

He had no sooner taken that resolution, but he requested the Chirurgeons to redouble their care, and for his part he contributed all he could to the success of their endeavours. And thus it might be said, that he desired the recovery of his health that he might die the sooner. But now having got a little time while this eager desire of his advanced his cure, I went abroad and walked into every Quarter of the City where I was not known, to learn what news were stirring that concern'd my Master: chiefly I desired to find out whether the people were not inclin'd to take his part, should the Princess of the Igylions be so unjust as to stop him in Tamyraque. But I could not hear of any design which they had upon his liberty, there being nothing more pryed into than Harmaxer's behaviour at that time:

All people wondred that he was less zealous than at first, in providing for Gilismene's Funeral, that he took such particular care not only to appease the exasperated Amasis, but absolutely to purchase her friendship: 'Twas therefore said that he would have given the Command which he had bestowed upon Lycorax to Amasis's Father, but that he would not accept it, and yet on the other side Lycorax's Father could not obtain it, though he sued for it as a recompence due to him, and a right already belonging to his Family. I gave my Master an account of what I had learn'd, but instead of minding such things as did not concern Gilismene, he continually bewail'd the loss of that fair Princess. He beg'd her pardon for not following her, and notwithstanding the great designs that made him desire to live, he could not but look with shame upon the remainder of his days. When he began to sit up, I made it my business to get all things ready, that there might be nothing to obstruct our departure, and notwithstanding my unwillingness to see the Princess of the Igylians, I omitted not to go to her Apartment, that I might discover what her intentions were toward my Prince. There I easily perceiv'd that though she did not visit him so often, as she had accus'd to do, out of meer shame and madness, yet she had the same affection for him as formerly, and that instead of putting any constraint upon him, she had a design to renew her kindnesses, with an intention still to try if she could stir his heart. In short, she not only offer'd me all things necessary for the King of the Lombards, but also study'd for all accommodations, that might make a tedious Journey more pleasant and easie.

When I came back to the unfortunate Lover, whose hope and joy were buried in Gilismene's Tomb, I observed that, mangre the resolution that he had taken, mangre the constancy of his mind and all the vigour of his courage, his mouth was open to his sighs, and that his eyes paid the tribute of their Tears, to the memory of his departed Princess. Cruel death, cryed he, that instead of darting thy Arms at a heap of persons inconsiderable, didst turn thy fatal Arms against the divine Gilismene? Since thou hast not power enough to hurt me, and that thou canst not restore me what thou hast taken from me, why dost thou not also take the deplorable remainder of that Princess of which thou hast robbed me? Then inveighing against heaven, though he were always very religious; Envious Deities, cryed he transported with the violence of his grief) why have you deprived the earth of its most glorious ornament? Did you fear that Gilismene received here below, those homages which are only due to your selves? Or was it only to make me miserable, that you have display'd all your malice against me? Why did you not throw down upon his abominated head your most consuming thunders, instead of meanly assailing the life of a fair and innocent Princess, instead of destroying the perfection of your own handy work, which you had fram'd with so much care and consultation? And You Gilismene, Princess altogether charming, if in quitting whatever you had of mortality, you have not altogether yet forgot all thoughts of earthly affairs, cast your eyes upon your faithful Agelmond. Nay I am still faithful, and if I live after your decease, 'tis not for any kindness that I have for a world that has nothing in it which I covet, unless it be to dye such a death as may not be unworthy nor beneath the virtue of a Prince who is entirely yours. I am willing to dye, dear Princess, I am willing to dye, and since you cannot be deceived in that immortal light with which you are environ'd, certainly you cannot question the desire which I have to follow you. While he thus entertain'd his sorrow, notwithstanding the strict injunctions, which his Physicians had laid upon him to be silent, I still made it my business to provide things necessary for our departure.

To relate the circumstances of a journey, which we undertook some few days after, would be to little purpose, it shall suffice therefore to tell you, that the disconsolate Agelmond sigh'd all the way, and continually bewailed the loss of his Princess. He took along with him no other Arms but what he always us'd to wear, only a black Plume shadowed his Helmet, and all the outward marks of his grief, were suitable to the sadness of his countenance. Thus we travelled through the vast Province of the Peucors, pass'd the Vizula, and arriv'd at Lupia. The nearer we came to the Territories of the King my Master, the more news we heard of what was act'd there: we understood that there were several factions, that there were two Armies on foot, whose Commanders aspir'd to the Sovereignty, notwithstanding a third party, which the friends of Grimaldus and mine oppos'd against the other two, for the interest of the Royal Authority. Nevertheless you may judge from hence, of the affection and veneration which the Lombards had for Agelmond their Prince, for no sooner had he set foot in his own Territories, but the report of his return being nois'd abroad, and successfully spreading it self through the whole extent of his Dominions, though his Face was grown pale, sad and lean, yet did his presence cause an universal joy, all factions united, and the conformity of their Allegiance, embodying them all together under the Standards of the valiant Agelmond, it seem'd as if they had not taken Arms, but only to furnish their King with a more numerous Army, without giving him the trouble of raising men. My

My Master seeing such a brave Army ready to follow him, sent Embassadors to the Emperour of the Romans to demand the Stranger Bellamira, whom he took to be Agione, and marched toward Menofgade with an intention to invade Italy, if Honorius should refuse to restore him the Princess of the Lombards. Twenty several Nations were alarm'd at our formidable preparations for War, being ignorant of Agelmond's design: and Rome it self also trembled, hearing that our invincible King was not satisfied with Honorius's Answer: for he being then at Ravenna, told the Lombard Embassadors, that it was not in his power to restore Bellamira, because Heraclian had carried her away by force; and not only gave them smart language, but also flew out against Agelmond himself, whether it were that he was vexed to think of losing a beautiful Lady, whom he so passionately lov'd, or that he thought to recover his reputation in that manner, who had shewed so little courage during the irruption of the Goths into Italy: Tell your Master, said he, that he need not have sought for such a pretence to declare a war against me: I know that the riches of pleasant Countries more happy in their Climate than his own, more powerfully invite him to invade our Lands, than his respect to Bellamira: but though the misfortune of Rome, and the absence of Constance embolder him to quarrel with the Emperour of the Romans, he shall know that it is not an easie thing for the Son of Agion to assail the Successor of the great Theodosius.

The Lombard Embassadors not enduring Honorius's language so contrary to his wonted mildness, return'd him an answer becoming the haughtiness of their Nation, Sir, said they, either you are ignorant of the King our Master's reputation; or we our selves may not understand with what success your fierceness against Agelmond may inspire you, since Rome's misfortune which you mention your self. But you are to know that the invincible Master whom we serve, was never engaged in any war wherein he was not absolutely victorious.

They uttered those words with such an undaunted aspect, that you might have easily perceiv'd in their countenances the confidence which they had in the valour of their King: and Honorius, though naturally gentle, having begun to raise his voice, had certainly flown out into a passion, had not the wiser and more considerable of his Favourites over-ruled his heat, for fear of consequences worse than these which they had yet any ground to apprehend. With this answer the Lombard Embassadors departed, and in regard they were no way satisfied with Honorius's demeanour, they gave out threatening speeches in all the Cities through which they travelled. But so soon as they came to the King their Master, they gave him an account of their Embassy, and not omitting the least circumstance fitting for him to know, they rekindled in the Breast of the Generous Agelmond a desire of Glory, which the death of Gilismene had almost extinguished. Well, answered he with a fierceness which his melancholy rendered more terrible, we shall see how bravely he will maintain the magnificent Titles of Emperour and Successor of Theodosius against the Son of Agion.

Nor did he say any more, his humour not permitting him to boast, or threaten a Prince whom so many several Kingdoms yet separated from his Army. Some Lombards there were that did not put so favourable an interpretation upon his silence, imagining that he did not march with that confidence which was wont to accompany him in the greatest dangers, being then to lead his Army against that famous people who had subdued all the world by so many remarkable victories.

But on the contrary, the haughty King felt a double augmentation of his courage, while he prepared to invade the Territories of the Cesars. The Glory of the enterprize kindled a new heat in his Soul, so that after we had marched through several Provinces, we drew between Menofgade and Marobude, and came at length to the Banks of the Danubius, without the least opposition. True it is, that at that time all the Forces of the Franks, Gauls, Burgundians, Cimbrians, Suevians, and several other Nations whom Resamond's quarrel had aim'd one against the other, were then as now they are encamped upon the Banks of the Rhine in the sight of the famous Cologne. So that Agelmond without any molestation marched through Vindelicia, not finding any resistance till he came into the Country of the Rhetians. There it was that the Lieutenant of Honorius, supported by a fell and warlike Nation, living at the foot of the Alpes, briskly oppos'd our Van-Guard. Their onset was so vigorous, that they might have made us give ground, if not absolutely routed us, had not the admirable courage of our Chief, who fought at the head of his Army, stopped their fury. But Agelmond having born the first brunt, broke in among their Ranks, drave them vigorously before him, and had cut them all in pieces, had not their Forests favourable to their flight, rescued them from his valour. Italy alarm'd at this success, but much more at the renowned name of the Enemy that was making long days marches toward her, assembled all her force to oppose a Conquerour whom victory followed every where; which when Agelmond heard, he resolv'd to give the Romans Battel before they recovered their courage: to which purpose, having pass'd the Alpes, he encamped his Army in a wide plain that enlarges it self at the foot of the Mountains, and having refresh'd his Soldiers for two or three days, he advanced towards the Enemy lying between Mantua and Mordena.

There it was that our valiant King perform'd Exploits far surpassing those which till then we had admired; whether it were that he fought with more contempt of his life, or whether it were his eagerness to deliver his Sister, to the end he might with the better excuse an end to his sufferings and miseries by a quick death. Nevertheless, at first he found a stout resistance; for Castinus, Aurelian and Ariobindus miraculously signalized themselves for their Country, and the young Ætius did wonders worthy the renown of ancient Rome. In short, he fell into our left Wing, and had questionless disordered it, had not the victorious Agelmond hastened to their relief, after he had wounded Castinus, taken Ariobindus, and forc'd the main Battel to give ground, notwithstanding all the bravery of a multitude of Voluntiers that fought there with an extraordinary valour. The fiery Ætius lost neither his courage, nor his judgment in the view of an invincible enemy; but on the contrary, he assailed him with all the vigour that a great courage could infuse into him, but being parted from his illustrious adversary, they forsook one another with more malice than advantage. However, victory was faithful to the King of the Lombards, and declared her self absolutely for us, inasmuch that Agelmond not only found himself in a condition to refresh his men in fairer Quarters, but also to march to Ravenna when he had rested some few days.

After that he led us into the fertile Country about Bononia for our greater refreshment; and indeed we Lombards were so taken with the pleasures of that soil, that we parted not from thence but with an extreme sorrow, and an eager desire to return again, and to settle a Monarchy in our own renowned name. But when the hardy Agelmond resolv'd to take his march toward the City where Honorius had shut himself up, to the great good fortune of that Prince, as we were about to sit down before it, Agelmond received a Letter that stay'd his Arm, and not only set a bound to his Conquests, but made him also repent that he had proceeded so far. The Letter was sent by the Princess Agione her self, who understanding what Agelmond had perform'd for her deliverance, was willing to divert the fury of the Tempest from a Country whereof she had no reason to complain: and at the same time to give the King her Brother an account of all things that concern'd her. The Letter was to this effect.

Sir, could I have sooner sent you this news, I had prevented the shedding of much innocent blood, and hindered you from declaring war against a Prince that never did you any injury. I wish to Heaven that I were in his power, rather than to be continually persecuted by the person that forced me from my Country. This Tyrant finding no Sanctuary in the King his Father's Territories, is gone to seek for refuge either at Cologne, or in the Army of Pharamond, not daring to adventure among the Cimbrians, where Prince Balamir is in high esteem. This is all that an unfortunate Virgin can inform you, who has not one moment of liberty. I conjure you to make use of the advice which I send you, and remember that I expect you with all the impatience that can torment a Captive Princess, who looks upon you as her only deliverer.

Agelmond just in all his actions, had no sooner read the Princess his Sister's Letter, but he found all his anger bent against Mundisic: so that he not only caus'd all acts of Hostility to cease, which we were constrain'd to exercise in an Enemy's Country for our subsistence; but he resolv'd also to send offers of peace to Honorius, and to restore him all those places which we held in Italy. The Emperour transported with my Master's Generosity, receiv'd his Commissioners with as much kindness and acknowledgment as he had shewed disobedience to our former Embassadours; so that that war was concluded with more haste and more joy than can be imagined. Agelmond almost the very same moment after gave orders for the march of the Army, and then left it; taking along with him only a small but select number of Horse, that he might with less trouble perform a journey, to the end whereof he might make so much haste, as also lest the news of his approach should come before his arrival to the ears of an enemy that had so much reason to shun him. We cross'd the Alpes, and travelled through Gallia with an extraordinary speed, and when we came into Belgia.

we began to enquire what news in all places, and to inform our selves of all particulars that might be of any advantage to us. Every morning our little Troop divided it self, with order to meet again at Night at the Rendezvous appointed. But though we did all that lay in our power, our diligence was all to no purpose, for we not only sought for Mundisic in Ten several Countries, and Thirty several Cities in vain, but we remain'd a long time either in Cologne, or in Pharamond's Army as volunteers, without any possibility of informing our selves any thing that might concern our Princess. At length Sir, which was but another day and in the Wood which parts the two Camps, we learn'd the news which we had inquired in so many places, and which we so ardently desired to know. For there we met with two Hunnish Knights, whom we defeated with their company, and by a prisoner that we took, we understood that Grimwaldus had met with the party that convoyed Agione, that he charged them, and notwithstanding the inequality of their number, put them to flight, being assisted by a body of Burgundian Horse, which the justice of heaven sent to his relief. You have heard already in what condition Ambiomer found the Princess of the Lombards, and I question not but you have heard all the particulars, in reference to Agelmond's meeting with Mundisic: So that Sir, to finish my relation I am only to assure you, that if it were no small joy to find so dear a Sister among so many beautiful Ladies as are in this Camp, yet the satisfaction which he has thence received, has but augmented the profound sadness that reigns in his Soul. For now in short he has bent all his thoughts toward death, either because that it alone can put an end to the sufferings that persecute his life, or else because he looks upon it as the only means, that remains to bring him to that charming and unfortunate Princess, whom he has always adored in despite of that cruel separation, which one would have thought might have made him dispense with some part of his Constancy.

Viginizus had no sooner concluded his relation, but the King of Suevia, the Princess Albisinda and the famous Ambiomer, beheld him without returning answer, whether it were to recollect the principal accidents of the story which they had heard, or whether it were that the adventures of the Lombard King, appeared so extraordinary as to put them into a kind of an amaze. But the King of Suevia first breaking silence, with an aspect more obliging than was to be expected from the ruggedness of his disposition, to testify his acknowledgment to the Squire of a King, whose friendship he so earnestly desired, We must confess, said he to Viginizus, that there have been strange intermixtures in the life of your illustrious Master. That great person has not triumphed upon all occasions, where he wanted no assistance but his own courage, but only to be the more unhappy in his pretensions to the Princess of Sarmatia, and Fortune that always favoured his valour in Combat, has been so ingenuous and so obstinate, to persecute him upon the score of his affection, that certainly, as great as he was, he had fainted under the burthen, had not your prudence prevented his fatal intentions. But Viginizus, added he infligated by his prevailing passion, seeing that it was through your care that Agelmond still lives, and that we enjoy his presence in our Camp, why should not we be beholding to you also for the assistance of so great a King: Since his Army must pass quite through Germany, and since his Kingdom is in perfect peace, the Lombards might as well joyn with the Cimbrians and Suevians, and win their share of honour in so memorable a war, wherein you see all Europe engaged, with all her chiefest potentates upon one side or other. "Sir, replied Viginizus, I shall make such proposals to my Master, as your Majesty shall think expedient, though my solicitation would be needless to a Prince, who so well understands the rules of duty and generosity, but that the weight of his particular misfortunes, has as it were stifled all those thoughts which he ought to have for the general interest of Nations. Truly I should think, replied the famous Gaul, that after the death of the person beloved, nothing could have gone to the heart of such a Hero as Agelmond. "We see however, said the King of Suevia impatiently interrupting him, that Prince Balamir whose courage is known to all the world, has here in our Camp met with the end of a sorrow, that in all probability would have lasted as long as he had lived, and I am easily perswaded that the same charms that wrought that change in Balamir, may at least give some consolation to the King of the Lombards. "I believe, replied Ambiomer, that there are few examples among great men of such a change, and I must confess that notwithstanding that veneration which I bear to the Prince of the Huns virtue, I always thought from time to time, that so fair a life was not always exempted from blemish. When I consider that he has forgot the most admirable Princess of the Goths, by whom he was so tenderly beloved, I could never endure that kind of infidelity, let the beauty be never so divine that caused it. "You are very precise, replied the King of Suevia, but should the eyes of the Lombard Princess steal away your heart from the Queen of the Thuringians, would you fear to be guilty of such an apparent

“parent inconstancy. Upon those words Ambioner blushed, but having recovered himself, Sir, said he, *If through the infligation of a heart too haughty for my fortune, I durst pretend to wear Agione's chains, after I had had the strength to break those Fetters which Amalazonth's has inhumanly imposed upon me, I should not only find my excuse in the different behaviour of these two Princesses, but I also believe that all my friends would rejoice with me, for so happy a change. If what is reported be true, replied the King of Suevia, I agree that the Queen of Turingia has not been over grateful to the valiant defender of her Dominions, and therefore, since that, contrary to the will of the King her Father who had a kindness for you, she has refused you the reward that was your due, you have no reason to continue your service to a person so unthankful. For my part I found something so strange in her behaviour, when she sent her forces away from our Camp, that I should be very glad to hear what you did for her in Turingia, that I might have the satisfaction to admire the actions of so brave a Knight, and to see the ingratitude of a Princess who has renounced her own honour, by separating her self from your interests. Those adventures whereof you require the rehearsal, replied Ambioner, are too considerable to be repeated after the great exploits of the Lombard King, but if your Majesty continue in the same mind to morrow, less possessed perhaps with those remarkable circumstances that Viginizus has rehearsed, a certain Gaul that knows all the particulars of my life, shall in a few words give you a full account, slightly passing over those which are more commonly known. In the mean time, said he, be pleased to let me take part in what concerns a fair Princess, of whose charms you would make me afraid, and to complain that Viginizus has not exactly told us, that which relates to the rest of her misfortunes. I did not believe it necessary, replied Agelmoud's Squire, to insert so long a relation into a Story tedious enough of it self. But since the generous Ambioner to whom all the Lombards are obliged, requires a particular recital, be pleased Sir, (continued he addressing himself to the King of Suevia) to give me leave to satisfy his curiosity, and to tell him what I have heard from the mouth of Guinoaldus, as also from the lips of our Princess her self. Having so said he pursued his discourse as follows.*

The perfidious Mundisic had no sooner got the Princess Agione into his possession, but he was uncertain what rode to take, Agathyrhis had retaken from him those places which he held in Sarmatia, whither he had carried the fair and unfortunate Hunnimonda before, nor was there any security in his Fathers Territories, whom he had provoked by a second crime. On the other side, all the Nations of high Germany were either allyed to the Huns or in amity with the Lombards, so that he resolv'd to travel either into Gallia, or to put himself into the Army of the Franks, thinking to find a Sanctuary there, after he had rendred himself remarkable by his valour.

To this purpose he bent his course toward Cologne, and had soon arriv'd there, but that the Princess after she had shewn an admirable constancy of courage, at length fainting under the burthens of her Travels and sadness, fell into a dangerous fit of sickness, that put her Ravisher into no small affright. The Tyrant seem'd to be very much afflicted, and not only for some time forbore to persecute the afflicted Agione, but observing in a few days after that her indisposition increased, he caus'd her to be carried to a Town quite out of any Rode, which he thought those that pursued him would take. In the mean time Grimoaldus who had got together with all the hast he could, such a company of Knights as he thought most proper to follow him, omitted nothing that lay in his power to set at liberty the Sister of his Sovereign, performing all things that a real fidelity could prompt him to, upon such an occasion: But all his diligence prov'd ineffectual for a long time, for Mundisic foreseeing that the Lombards would leave no means nor dangers unattempted to redeem their Princess, observ'd all the probable caution that might be, to preserve the beautiful prey which he had got in his clutches. He never travelled but by night, or if he appear'd in the day time, it was only upon the by-Rodes. But the indefatigable Grimoaldus after he had taken different Rodes, and us'd variety of means, joyfully at last received more precise information, and more apparent hopes that his Travels would be suddenly at an end, either by delivering Agione out of Mundisic's power, or by losing his life in so just and generous an attempt.

With this resolution following the tract of the Chariots, which he understood that Mundisic had order'd to drive toward Cologne, he conjectur'd that he should overtake the Prince in the wood, that is between this Camp and Pharamonds. Coming near the Camp he left one of his men at the entry into the Forrest, to bring to our assistance such parties as should appear in that Quarter, and to prepossess them to our advantage, and then vigorously made up to the persecuter of Agione. Upon the sight of the Prince his indignation grew more violent, yet notwithstanding the violence of his passion, he was so overjoyed when he saw the Princess, that not being able to contain himself; We are come to your assistance Madam, he cryed out so loud as to be understood, and Heaven has decreed this day to put an end to the persecutions which you suffer.

Upon those words the haughty Mundisc fiercely beholding Grimoaldus, and with a threatening utterance, Return, he cryed, if thou intendest to shun the death which thou wilt infallibly meet with, by opposing my intentions that will not be disadvantageous to thy Princess. Then turning to the most faithful of all his Followers, Go, Bela, said he, go and do that which I commanded you to do if ever I were assailed. Not having time to say more, he put himself at the head of fifteen or twenty Horse, while Bela with ten or twelve more caus'd the Chariots to drive on with an intention to get to Pharamond's Camp. But the Huns and the Lombards were no sooner fighting pell mell together, when the Officer who staid at the entrance of the Forest by order of Grimoaldus, had engaged the King of the Burgundians to succour a distressed Lady who had been taken away by force, and whom they were now carying against her will into Pharamond's Camp. Gondioch followed by a great Squadron of Horse hasted to Agione's relief, when Bela, who perceiv'd him at a distance off the Combat, incited by the zeal which he had to serve his Master, after he had studied a while what course to take, at length resolv'd to return with all his men to Mundisc, believing that the Prince would stand in need of assistance: yet fearing lest Agione, having so fair an opportunity, should make her escape, he followed the advice of his own cautious Barbarism, without considering whether the Sister of so great a King, or a fair Princess so passionately lov'd by Mundisc could bear it or no. True it is, that he knew too well the humour of that unjust Prince to think he could displease him by using any farther violence, having been accustomed to make use thereof upon occasions of this nature, wherein he had been already employed. For it was this Bela that formerly kept that incomparable Hunnimonda in Sarmatia, when the inhumane Mundisc had shut her up in the Castle of Paziris after he had taken her by violence, as it were out of the very Arms of her Mother the Queen of the Goths. Hence it was that this too faithful servant made nothing to use the fair Agione so disrespectfully; for to secure her, and carry back his men to the Prince of the Huns, he bound the Princess's Arms to the Chariot in that manner as the noble Ambiomer found her: nor did this cruel wariness fully satisfy him, for knowing that the illustrious Captive whom he was afraid to lose, might be relieved by the women who had been inseparably with her, he took them all from her, notwithstanding all their prayers, their tears, and their lamentations, and causing them to get into the Chariot that belonged to their companions, with an Intent to drive it along with him, he return'd to the Princess's Chariot, and took out the Horses, for fear they should draw it to some place less remarkable than where he had left it. Thus in few words you see, Sir, how the Sister of my Sovereign was quite forsaken and abandoned in this deplorable condition: to which, when the fair Princess saw her self reduced, it afflicted her to the heart, that what with weariness, and what with weakness, not having fully recovered her strength since her sickness, she fell into that dangerous swoon from which Ambiomer recovered her. And therefore, Sir, that generous Knight can better than I relate to your Majesty the circumstances of that last accident, since it was he who was sent by Heaven to succour Agione, and that it is to him that so amiable a Princess is beholding for the life which she enjoys.

I did so little for her, replied the famous Gaul, when he perceived that Viginizus had ended his short Relation, and it was so easie a thing for me to do that which all persons would have done for her, that had seen her in that extremity, that I wonder she should still preserve the remembrance of it, more especially that she should continue the marks of an acknowledgment so extraordinary. You know however, replied the King of the Suevians, that we do not always measure the importance of the service by the trouble to which he is put that performs it: for there be those happy accidents when we may do that without obstruction which at another time we should meet with strange difficulties to attempt. Thus did you save the life of the Lombard Princess, without exposing your own to any danger; and methinks for that very reason you have less cause to wonder at Agione's acknowledgment, than at the carriage of an ungrateful Queen for whom you have run so many hazards, and perform'd so many memorable exploits.

The King of Suevia was discoursing in this manner, at what time they heard certain Chariots make a stop, and by and by in came the charming Queen of the Cimbrians, and the amiable Sister of the King of the Lombards. These two Princesses were return'd from taking the air, whither they went before Viginizus began his Relation, and being desirous to take Albisinda with them to the Castle, they came to desire leave of the King her Father. To whom the King, having a most high respect for those two illustrious persons, not only consented that she should leave him that Evening, but that she should also resume her former Apartment, and live inseparably with Rosamond. Though Albisinda were not a little glad glad to hear her Father's resolution, yet the excellent temper of her disposition would not permit her to part without some marks of sorrow; of which pretty preciseness when the fair Queen and the Princess of the Lombards took notice, they cheered her up with a short discourse, and brought her to the Chariot where Amalazontha staid for them, who shunn'd the sight of the King of Suevia as often as decency would permit her.

It soon appeared that it was not possible for these admirable persons to be together, without giving each other mutual testimonies of their joy: nor could they behold themselves environed with so many great Princes that adored them, without appearing animated with a haughtiness equal to their charms and their quality: yet all this while there was to be seen in their eyes less satisfaction than languishment; and these lips in whose power it was to pronounce the destiny of so many great persons gave free passage to their sighs, and made it manifest that they did not altogether enjoy their own tranquillity, while they troubled the repose of the most illustrious hearts in the world. As for Agione, who had no other cause of grief than what proceeded from the misfortunes of the King her Brother, who was as incapable of receiving any consolation, as Theobald, Vindimir, or Amalarie capable of living again. The Princess of the Lombards seem'd to be less afflicted, having her thoughts at liberty, and her heart free from all those passions wherewith Rosamond, Albisinda and Amalazontha were prepossess'd. But on the contrary, the Queen of the Turingiens having seen that day several of the Franks, and cast her eyes towards the Entrenchments of their Army, returned from taking the air so prepossess'd with an imperious inclination, which she labour'd ineffectually to vanquish; that the Cimbrian Queen was really griev'd at her misfortune. However, she durst not presume for more than one reason, to speak a word to that unfortunate Princess concerning the extraordinary merit which had produc'd an effect so surprizing in her heart; insomuch that by degrees she parted with the company to discourse alone with her dear Albisinda, leaving the afflicted Queen of the Turingiens and the Sister of the Lombard King to entertain one another: for nothing hinder'd Agione but that she might freely talk of the King of the Franks, and of all the illustrious Princes of that Royal Family, without observing any thing of caution. Whereas Rosamond and Albisinda were obliged to be so cautious, not only as the Sisters of Theobald and Vindimir, but because it was publickly known that they were most tenderly beloved by Pharamond and Marcomire.

These fair Princesses, thus dividing themselves, went up to the Castle, attended by several Princes that followed like Captives tied to the Victor's Chariot. But by reason it was late, they all retired immediately, except Balamir, whom the Queen of the Cimbrians detain'd a while. Though there was no person but understood the passion of that Prince, Rosamond however did not deny to grant him particular privileges, so far as the rules of decency (which she exactly observ'd) would permit, and which she might the more readily condescend to, in regard that famous Soldier command'd the Cimbrians, and for that reason was by his employment engag'd to confer often with the fair Queen from whom he held it. True it is, that at that time Rosamond staid him not so much for the concerns of the Army, as out of a particular kindness, nor did she scruple to take him aside, and to lead him to the window, while Amalazontha and the Princess of Lombardy related to Albisinda what they had seen when they were abroad. The charming Queen cast her eyes upon Balamir's face, displaying an obliging trouble in those celestial lights which preceded her discourse, Generous Prince, said she with a sweet Majesty that always accompanied her words and actions, you have so much oblig'd us, that I dare not find any reluctancy to pass beyond those bounds which my Sex ought to prescribe to themselves, and to declare to you with all the confidence that your virtue merits, that I was this day more afraid for you than ever I was before; I could not call to mind the words of the Cimbrian Prisoner whom Pharamond demand'd of the King of the Balternes, without believing that your life was ill assured, and that I am oblig'd to protect you from the secret practices of a person whose violences and contrivances are sufficiently known. Ah, Madam, reply'd the grateful Balamir, my life is above all danger, since you take care of it; nor can I imagine that it is possible to injure a life protect'd by an Angelical Queen belov'd of Heaven, and reverenc'd over all the world. Question not, reply'd the obliging Rosamond, but that I am deeply interest'd in your concerns; and though you did not venture as you do every moment in our quarrel, I believe that I could not forbear to have some certain motions of affection for the illustrious Balamir which I should not have for any other Prince that fights for our interest.

Concluding those words, she perceiv'd an Officer coming in that she had sent to the King of the Balternes, and after him the prisoner whom she mentioned, and was about to have.

But for. The Cimbrian, how well soever he had prepared himself to appear before his Queen, durst not move toward her but with his eyes fixed upon the ground, and a guilty gate: so that he was no sooner come near the bright lustre of the Princess, but he cast himself at her feet altogether like a mute, and without being able to give any answer to what she demanded. At length, encouraged by his repentance, and the clemency of those illustrious persons whose displeasure he had just cause to fear, I am guilty, cryed he all of a sudden, and I confess that I deserve death. But, Madam, if I must die, rather let it be by the order of that great Prince who stands by your Majesty, than to conceal the devices of that person that encouraged me to the fact.

Upon those words his tears and sighs hindered him from proceeding; but the Queen, who longed impatiently to understand what the danger was wherewith Balamir had been threatened, to the end she might take the better care for his future protection, Speak, said she to the Cimbrian, but speak sincerely, and let not the fear of punishment, nor the hope of pardon make you disguise the truth which it concerns us to be inform'd of from your mouth. The Cimbrian perswaded by those words, and by that horror which proceeded from the remembrance of an evil action, appeared somewhat more confident, and rais'd upon his legs by the Queen's command, he paus'd a while keeping his eyes fixed upon the ground; but soon after he thus proceeded.

Some few days before the King of the Franks came to offer to your Majesty a life which he hoped you would have sacrific'd to the Ghost of the Prince your Brother, Briomer received a Letter from Alba Julia which extremely perplexed him: he lost his sleep, and his wild eyes testified that his thoughts were all discompos'd and roving: nor was it long before he carried Menebaldus and my self into the Forest of Lysurgis, to discover to us a secret, with which at first however he durst not trust us. So that it was not without an extraordinary circumspection that he declared it, nor till he had secured himself by promises which he made to us, and oaths which he exacted from us. Then he beheld us far more earnestly than before, and addressing his speech to us with a countenance which he labour'd to make a little more serene, You have several times had experience, said he to us, how dear your interests are to me, whereby you may easily conjecture what you are to expect from me, if you prove but faithful at this time, now that my life and fortune lie at stake. In short, either I am lost, or we will ruine a Stranger, to whom you never were obliged for any benefit in this world; you must not therefore stand to consider, nor waver in your resolutions. And for my part, after all those protestations which I have made you, I should give you cause to complain of my behaviour, should I go about to express my meaning in ambiguous terms, and not rather with an entire confidence tell you the downright truth, that it is Balamir who must be sacrificed to my security.

When we heard a name so beloved, and so adored among the Cimbrians, Menebaldus and I beheld one another with astonishment; when Briomer beginning to fear lest the veneration which we might possibly have for the Prince of the Huns, should cause a change in our resolution, pursued his discourse to hinder us from consulting our reason, which made him speak to us more vehemently than he did before, What, said he, do you deliberate upon a thing resolv'd upon? Or is it possible that the reputation of an unknown Stranger should cast such a terrour into the hearts of two such valiant persons, and who will be assisted by several others in the execution of their design. It is not, replied I, so soon as my surprisè would give me leave, that I am scared with the danger which you propose; for I could willingly attack Balamir, were he but only a formidable Soldier, and were he not also, as without doubt he is, a most generous Prince, and most lovely in all respects. And do you think, said he, briskly interrupting me, that I would desire the assistance of such men as you, and promise such ample gnerdons, if I were to rid my self only of an ordinary Enemy. No, no, Gilcer, do not abuse your self, I should not be so ready to sacrifice all things for your interests, were not you devoted to do the same for my advantage; nor could you ever think to be Master of a considerable fortune all of a sudden, were you not to perform some exploits the desert whereof might procure it.

After those words he spoke to me by way of aggravation, as to the power which he had in Bobessia, and laid before me the interest he had to fix me at Court, by reason that he had the disposal of great part of the Employments, and of the Exchequer it self: then he shew'd me how little danger there was in attacking a Stranger in a Country where all the Soldiers would take our part, so that I must confess my resolution was shaken, and Menebaldus drawing me aside, absolutely over-ruled me. He told me in few words, that considering how things stood, we had no time to deliberate, since there was a necessity that I must either serve Briomer, or else that Briomer must perish. In short, Madam, what shall I say, but only that I am guilty, as I have already confess'd, and that I have deserv'd death, for undertaking to destroy a Prince whose virtue is more worthy to attract the ve-

'Twas therefore in the Forest of Lysurgis, that we assaulted a life so absolutely devoted to the service of your Majesty, and I fear me that honourable life had certainly fall'n under the number of the Assassins, had not heaven brought the King of the Franks to his assistance, who generously fought for his enemy. Yes Madam, it was the renowned Pharamond himself, that threw himself headlong into danger, to save the life of a renowned Soldier, from whom his adversaries reap'd no small advantages, and fortune having thus united those two Princes, and oppos'd against us the two most valiant persons in the world, rendred all our great endeavours in a moment ineffectual. Briomer no sooner understood the ill success of our enterprise, but he foam'd for anger, and never standing to consider that there was a peculiar providence, that always waited for the preservation of Balamir, he tryed several other ways to execute his design, till at length he began to think of corrupting the Chirurgeons, that dress'd the wounds of that illustrious Prince whom he intended to destroy. But in regard all these ways took no better effect than the former, and that he imagin'd that considering what had happened, Balamir would not be so imprudent, as courageous as he was, to go without a guard, he began by degrees to despair of ever accomplishing his execrable design: So that after he had labour'd under an extraordinary disquiet of mind, he bent his violent thoughts toward Dacia, and would have sent Menebaldus and I to Alba Julia, with some men pickt out among those wicked villains, whom he was wont to entrust with such like commissions. He had no sooner spoken of that journey, and of the persons that he told me should bear me company, but I knew he intended to engage me upon some new desperate attempt: but in regard I began to abhor his wicked actions, I determin'd absolutely not to execute any thing whatever it were that he propos'd to me. However there was a necessity for me either to obey his will, or else by a speedy flight to save my self from his anger. Nor did I stand to consider what I had to do, for I chose rather to abandon my Country and all the right that I could pretend to there, than to stay expos'd to the revenge of the most violent of men. I considered then whither to retire, and not knowing any Sanctuary so safe, as under a great monarch who is the enemy of injustice, and has sufficient reason to be no less a foe to Briomer, I stole secretly away and put my self into Pharamond's Army. So soon as I came there, I desired to speak with Cloderic, to whom I was presently conducted, and no sooner had I given him an account of the reasons why I left the Cimbrian Camp, but he commended me, and presented me to the King of the Franks.

The generous Prince received me with all the marks of his wonted goodness, and not only by certain words which he let fall, when I spake to him concerning Balamir and my own crime, but also by the arms which he wore that day, I was confirm'd that it was Pharamond himself who had saved Balamir's life. But soon after I was fully satisfied from the mouths of Cloderic and Cleomer, whereupon I was struck with so great an admiration, at the magnanimity of that heroick Prince, as also for several other transcendent endowments both of his mind and person, that I resolv'd not to be idle in his Army, but to venture my life for his interest, in the battel which was fought the other day. True it is that I would not fight against the Cimbrians, yet on the other side I did not believe it to be any great forfeiture of my fealty to forsake a faction that shelter'd themselves under your fair Name, and to serve a Prince that adores you against several others, the greatest part whereof do but keep your Majesty a prisoner, under pretence of maintaining your quarell. But good intentions are not always favoured with success, for I was taken by some of the Bastern Officers, of which Pharamond was no sooner advertis'd, but he sent to demand me of King Humbert, before the quality of the prisoners came to be examin'd.

This Madam is the full of all that I can declare to your Majesty, for I make no question, but your Majesty has been inform'd, that Briomer no sooner understood that there was a Trumpeter come from the King of the Franks into this Camp, but notwithstanding his wounds that kept him in his bed, he rose only to oppose the intentions of that Prince, let them be of what nature soever, and that seeing and knowing me, he would have slain me, either to have had the satisfaction of sacrificing me to his anger, or for fear I should reveal the crime whereof it lay in my breast to accuse him.

Giler had no sooner concluded but he fix'd his eyes upon the ground, expecting with an extraordinary disquiet and shame, what answer those two illustrious persons whom he had wronged, and who had the sovereign power over his life, would return him. Rosamond and the Prince of the Huns stood still a while without making any reply, pondering very seriously upon what they had heard: Afterwards the fair Queen out of her love to justice, and incited by the good will she bare to Balamir, was about to have sent to apprehend Briomer in the field, and to leave him to the rigour of the law together with his Accomplices:

but her prudence would not tumultuously determine upon an affair of so much weight. Besides that, Giler's recantation mov'd her by degrees not to mix him in the List with the rest of his Confederates. And therefore with a Majesty that immediately bred veneration, Your change of life, said she to Giler, and the sorrow which I have observed in your countenance, have wrought the full effect which you could hope for; and that you may meet with favour for a crime that deserves the most severe punishment, I remit your destiny to the will of a Prince who never did you any wrong, though you have attempted his life. But can you not tell, continued she, the reason that transported Briomer to so horrid a villany? Could you never learn from whence the Letter came that was brought him from Alba Julia? Nor can you tell whether he has sent into Dacia or no, nor against whom he gave that commission that was the cause of your forsaking him? No, Madam, replied he, I cannot certainly inform you; for I must acknowledge that I can go no farther than only conjecture, to which several circumstances give little certainty. At first I supposed that there was no person in Dacia, unless it were Mundilic, that could have any cause to rid himself of the illustrious Balamir; for besides that he has no kindness at all for him, I heard say that there ran a report among the Huns, that in the Royal Family virtue was to be prefer'd before seniority in the succession of that Monarchy. So that he could address himself to no person with more probability for the execution of such a fact; not only because he is ambitious, bold, and one that never stumbles at any scruple, but also because there was nothing more desired of him than to destroy a Stranger in a Country where he was both feared and powerful. I am of the same opinion, replied Balamir, sighing, that the Prince of the Huns has not always that kindness for his nearest Relations that he ought to have; but had his fury transported him to acts of violence, I cannot conceive why he should rather have recourse to fraud and contrivance than to open force. Besides, replied the fair Queen, if the last attempt were an effect of the former, I cannot imagine that Mundilic should be any way concern'd therein, who could have no need of Briomer's people in a City where he has so many creatures of his own, and where he is looked upon as Heir presumptive to the Crown.

Concluding those words, she beheld Balamir with an aspect which let him understand that she gave him full authority to dispose of the prisoner, which the generous Prince refus'd at first; yet afterwards, directing his speech to Giler, Go, said he, and live: 'tis not just that you should return miserable from the presence of the Queen. I shall not inform you after what manner you may repair your past offences, since I am obliged to send you back to Pharamond's Camp, where the presence alone of so virtuous a Prince will be enough to inspire those thoughts into your Breast, which it behoves you to follow.

After Balamir had expressed himself in that manner, Giler was sent back to the King of the Basternes's Tents, when Rosamond manifesting in her countenance a certain kind of discontent which did not usually reside there, the Prince of the Huns earnestly press'd her to know the cause. Thereupon the incomparable Queen finding that the confidence which she repos'd in the virtue of that Prince did still from time to time encrease, no sooner understood what that eagerness meant that she observ'd in his eyes, but she resolv'd to tell him her real thoughts. But considering how long she had been kept from the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princesses who were to sup with her that night, she thought it convenient to return to them, and to defer till after Supper the giving Balamir that satisfaction which he so earnestly wish'd for, yet for which he begged only with his looks, whose eagerness was still accompanied with submission.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

THe fair Queen had no sooner made known her intentions to Balamir, but she return'd to her illustrious companions; and the Prince of the Huns departed with a design to return again so soon as decency would permit him, or that he could gather any pretence from his employment. At his own Apartment he found the King of the Tongres who waited for him with a more than usual impatience, the cause whereof when Balamir demanded in such a manner as testified that he was sorry to have made him wait so long, I acknowledge, Sir, said Taxander, sighing, that when I was walking to day upon the Road that leads to my amiable Adelaïada, I felt my impatience to see her, doubly reinforc'd: you know my engagement, and were my humour as well known to you as my passion, I might have some hopes suddenly to see the Princess of the Nemetians: for then I might be permitted to go to the Camp of the Franks upon my paroll, either to return, or send back to this Camp the King of the Herulians, who no less ardently than my self desires the exchange which I propose. Sir, replied Balamir, Telanor has told me how generously you dealt by him at the end of the Battel, I know that you rather chose to surrender your self a prisoner in a Camp whither you had only promised to suffer your self to be conducted, than to return with the valiant King of the Franks, who fought in your behalf, and rescued you from the Cimbrians that had the Guard of your person. After all this can you suspect that we should refuse you whatever you shall think fit to demand? Or do you believe that I would not grant it my self without the least hesitation, had I the absolute disposal of those affairs, seeing that all the power which I have in this Army depends upon the fair Queen only, on whom my destiny depends? This evening I will speak with her about it, and I make no question but she will do all things conformable to the Generosity of her Soul; and that you will have as much cause to extol her noble carriage, as many other Princes have reason to complain of the power of her charms.

Immediately those two Princes agreed upon what they had to do; so that they had no sooner supped, and understood that it was a seasonable time to wait upon the Queen, but they went up to the Castle with all the eagerness that the hopes wherewith they were animated could infuse into them. Balamir had all the leisure he could desire to entertain Rosamond, not only in the behalf of Taxander, but also to hear from her fair lips such expressions of her confidence in him, which she never had been capable to pronounce before. For as good luck would have it, none of the other Princes that us'd to meet there, came to the Queen's Apartment that evening. For Martian and Theon, who were but newly arrived with some of Theodosius's Officers, were already come to Prince Varanez's Lodgings. On the other side, Agelmond, contrary to his custom, and notwithstanding his profound melancholy, had put Ambiomer upon a discourse of War and Politicks; so that the King of the Tongres was alone with the Queen of the Turingiens, and the Princess of the Lombards, while Rosamond, Albisinda and Balamir entertained one another with all the freedom that might be.

Then it was that the Queen found her self sweetly inclin'd to speak her real thoughts, so that beholding Balamir in a most obliging manner; I must acknowledge Sir, said she, that I have no disposition to chose me a husband among so many great Princes, as put themselves to the trouble to oblige me, but I will tell you at the same time, with all the freedom that you could expect from the Princess Theodolinda, that neither Varancz, Gondioch, Arderic nor Godegefile have so great a share in my esteem and favour as Balamir. Yes, generous Prince, for you I have an affection which I never had for any of them, and that affection has made me more afraid for your life when I knew it was in danger than ever I thought I should have been. True it is that your honour which called you to the fight, and that modesty which so becomes persons of our Sex, would not permit me to manifest those marks of my apprehension. But since it is lawful for me at this time, to follow those notions which my fear inspires into me, and to cloath them with an action of justice, I will have Briomer punished according to the quality of his crime, though the King of Suevia should hate me for so doing. I beg my Sisters pardon, and if she be surpris'd to hear that I am grown more bold, to explain my self in reference to your concernments, than formerly I was wont to be, I must tell her that the thoughts which I have for you, are exempt from that passion which causes us for the most part, to speak with more reservedness. Moreover since I find they have inclin'd me to give Balamir that place in my heart, which I have resolv'd to refuse all those other Princes that fight to obtain it, I do not think my self oblig'd to such an exact circumspection. While she spake in that manner, Balamir very seriously beheld her, not being able to determine what answer to make.

He was at the same time about to complain of the fair Queen, and to return her thanks, he had an affection for her not to be expressed, but that esteem was balanc'd in a generous heart, by an acknowledgment and esteem that he held for the King of the Franks. I see very well, Madam, replied he all of a sudden, and I have already said it, that I was never born to enjoy that honour, the hopes whereof you are now going about utterly to take from me. You may remember questionless, that during the Truce which was made at the mediation of the great Constance, I began to tell you that which it behoves me now more perspicuously to unfold. I will no longer dispute with Pharamond a premium of that value, whereof he is far more worthy than Balamir, and whither it be that those favourable thoughts, that you have for that Prince do regulate mine, by virtue of that power which you have over my Soul, or whether I am guided by inspirations that I understand not, I perceive that I must adore you as long as I live without any hope, nor being capable to hate the most formidable of my Rivals. In short, I must acknowledge that heaven has not sent me into the world, only for the fair and unfortunate Princess of the Goths sake, nor bestow'd so many admirable endowments, upon the celestial Queen of the Cimbrians, but to recompence the deserts of the King of the Franks; But alas Madam, Hunnimonda is dead, and Pharamond has slain Theobald.

At those words Balamir sigh'd and Rosamond blusht, in somuch that the amiable Princess of Suevia, to break off a discourse that was but irksome to both, Do ye believe that the Gods, said she, have been so favourable to ye both, to no other purpose than to make ye both miserable? For my part I can never think it, nor do I despair to see a change in your present fortunes. Why Sister, replied Rosamond, do you think that the Tomb will restore me my only Brother again: Or though the same miracle should happen to the Princess of the Goths, continued Balamir, do you think that Mundilic's wife will return to the earth, to visit an unfortunate Prince, that was constrained to renounce his title to her? I ground my thoughts upon a little better foundation, replied Albisinda, for I do not believe it to be very impossible, but that a weighty reason of state, may make the Queen of the Cimbrians lay aside her displeasure against a family, which she looks upon as one that is more willing to dispense with her justice than her prudence: Otherwise could we think it strange, that Balamir should accept of the heart of a fair Princess, who for the love of his merit, readily consents to repair the loss of which he complains. But my Sister, (added she addressing her self to the Queen, and speaking with an aspect more cheerful to change the subject of the entertainment) for fear lest I my self also should have some reason to complain, tell me I beseech you, whether in the punishment of Briomer you will not observe such rules as may
 ———— Ah Madam, said Balamir interrupting her, how much should I have been assur'd of my self, for not having beg'd the Cimbrian's pardon of whom you are speaking, had I not been bound to give the utmost of my attention to a discourse, that absolutely possess'd my heart. Concluding these words he turned toward the Queen, and to obtain Briomer's pardon he beg'd it of her with so much earnestness, that more he could not have shewn for any person that had done him a signal kindness.

Rosamond could not but admire a generosity, of which she saw such evident testimonies every day, but she could not presently consent to let go so many crimes unpunished, of which she was so deeply concern'd to take notice. She could well call to mind without any repentment, that Briomer had always oppos'd her intentions, but she forgot her usual moderation, when she remembered that that violent Cimbrian had assailed the lives of Pharamond and Balamir, and that he had done a very great diskindness to her dear Sister, the incomparable comparable Princesses of Suevia; however Albisunds and Balamir gave her so many reasons, and urged her, after such a manner, that she could not withstand their powerful entreaties. Well, said she, I give you the offender whom you require, but it is my pleasure that he may understand, that 'tis to you that he owes the pardon which I grant him, to the end that Balamir's demeanour may disarm his rage, and then the King of Suevia may give my Sister thanks, who has been always so ready to promote his designs. Just as she had concluded these words, and was turning about to go to the Queen of the Turingiens, Balamir spake in the behalf of the King of the Tongres, and had immediately granted what the happy lover of Adelaiada had so passionately desired.

The illustrious company being got all together, the fair Queen addressed her self to Taxander, and having most obligingly given him her own grant, thereupon by degrees there began a discourse, concerning the forces on both sides. In short, the King of the Tongres having testified his acknowledgment to Rosmond, could not forbear to talk of the Camp, whither he was going to see the person that he so entirely loved. How overjoyed should I be, Madam, said he, how well satisfied as well in my defeat as in my imprisonment, now that I have the liberty to pass from one Camp to another, if I could but with Constance's assistance, bring things to a general accommodation: For in short how many thousand men must perish, how many great Captains must fall for the humour of a few Princes, who miserably drill their allies into the miseries of a long war? We find in a league made in your illustrious name, on the one side the Cimbrians, Suedes, Burgundians, Gepides, Alains, Herules and many other Nations engaged, besides that the Emperour of the East has sent considerable forces to this side, to which an Army of Saxons have also joyned, and they say that the Lombards make an additional strength to this party. But Madam, though this preparation be very great, though it be very formidable, the valiant Prince perhaps whom they would make you believe, to be your irreconcilable enemy, does not so much fear it: for besides the Gauls and Franks, potent and warlike nations, who have filled the world with the fame of their Arms, I am inform'd that he will have the Britainers of both Britains, commanded by Constantine himself, that the Vandals lead by Thrasimond are coming to joyn with him, that the famous Wallia brings him Twenty Thousand Goths, and that by the order of Honorius several Legions are advancing toward his Camp, which the renowned Constance and Artabure are to head. "How, replied the Queen of the Turingiens, does Wallia and Thrasimund take the King of the Franks part?" "Yes Madam, replied Taxander, and there are also in that Camp several beauties, which you may not have heard of perhaps, because they are not yet known but to few persons. In short, there is nothing noble or charming upon the earth, which the world has not now to display upon the banks of the Rhine, and I long to see the Princesses in both Armies all together, that a man might have time to view and consider them all at once. Azione told the King of the Tongres that he might easily accomplish his design, but Rosmond, the Queen of the Turingiens and the Princesses of Suevia, would not presume to express themselves upon that subject, so that it was only by their silence, that they gave Taxander liberty to act as he saw good.

He and Balamir then took their leaves, and the King of the Tongres having acknowledged his obligation to the Prince of the Huns for his last courtesie, he retired to his Apartment, overjoyed, that he should the next day see his beloved Adelaiada. Balamir also went to his Chamber not so much to repose himself, as to revolve in his mind the Queen of the Cimbrians words: But he had no sooner began his meditation, when Telanor presented a stranger to him of a comely presence, who was sent by Prince Wallia. Balamir very civilly received the Vigstob Knight, and having demanded of him how his illustrious Master did: "Sir, said Hilderic, for that was the strangers name, Prince Wallia believes that you will be very much surpris'd, to hear that he has taken the contrary interest to that which you have embraced: and therefore he has sent me to assure you that he is deeply sensible of it, and that he will never fight against those Troops, where he shall understand you to be in prison. And I have order also to make you this protestation in his behalf, that he would not have marched to the succour of your Rival, had he not been constrained thereto by the passion which he has for the Princess Theodolinda." "How, said Balamir interrupting him, does my Sister raise such formidable enemies to the Cimbrians? She did not engage Wallia to declare himself against Rosmond," replied Hilderic, but being reduced to a necessity, either to joyn with the Cimbrians or to reinforce Pharamond's Army, he durst not serve a Princess for whom, as we all knew, Theodolinda had no great kindness. "Can you not tell, said he interrupting him again, the reason of a prejudice that seems so strange? No Sir, replied the Goth, nor could Wallia ever learn it from a Princess, who is altogether very reserved, when there is any mention made of the Queen of the Bobemians." "I have more reason on the other side to complain of her," replied Balamir, for reposing so little trust in a “ Prince, to whom, as I am inform’d, she owes such vast obligations. And I should be very much obliged to you my self; would you but be pleas’d to let me understand the particulars of an affection of which I know so very few, though I am so much concern’d therein, and in reference to which I shall never oppose an illustrious Lover, whose virtue is to be preferred before those Crowns, with which his merit ought to be rewarded. “ Sir, replied he, you may command the relation when ever you shall think it convenient, not only because it is my duty to obey your commands, but also because there is a necessity that I should justify Prince Wallia as to this last action of his, which perhaps you may not absolutely approve. In short, I am to let you see that he hopes for very great advantages, and such advantages as may in time advance him to the Throne, and put him into a condition to publish his honourable pretensions to the King your brother, which he has respectfully concealed to this day. But in regard it was late, Hilderic retired for that night, but the next morning being introduced by Telanor into Balamir’s Chamber, after some few complements, and that he had paused a while to recollect his memory, he began as follows.

The History of Wallia.

YOU well know Sir, and there are few Princes that know so well as the illustrious Balamir what strange effects such obstacles, as oppose themselves to the execution of their designs, produce in the hearts of great men. Fierce and bold spirits are usually exasperated at the sight of difficulties that cross their hopes, and I am apt to believe that they never can behold them without a more violent desire, to enjoy the happiness to which they aspire. You will be easily convinced hereof, by the proof of those adventures which I am about to relate. Not to speak any thing of his birth or education, who was so near a kin to Alaric renowned for so many victories, and immortaliz’d by the taking of Rome, Wallia had no sooner learn’d the performance of all martial exercises, but he was resolv’d to practise them, transported with a warlike impatience that then only reigned in his soul, and signaliz’d himself so eminently upon all occasions that offer’d themselves, that the Goths as much accusom’d as they were to see great actions, beheld the exploits which he perform’d with a kind of astonishment. But Sir, after what an extraordinary manner did this admiration suddenly encrease? In short, he was no sooner at liberty to act, without consulting those persons who had the care of his youth, but he appeared like a Lyon let loose from his chains, he only followed the dictates of his courage, and continually throwing himself into danger, he ran on with an impetuosity that had something in it both charming and terrible. And in regard he always returned laden with honour, and for that there appeared in his face, what has something in it more than ordinary of great and lovely, caused either by the active heat of fight, or the satisfaction which proceeds from prosperous success, he became the love and delight of the Goths in war: And if the Soldiers looked with respect upon Alaric, they had an affection for young Wallia. This universal affection was accompanied with submissiou and respect, insomuch that the Goths were absolutely perswaded, that it was enough but only to march under Wallia to obtain the victory. Alaric also who was not easily led by the blind opinions of the multitude, better understood than all the Captains in the Army, the heroick qualities that adorn’d my Master, and not looking upon the Prince’s youth, as an obstacle to obstruct the recompence of his valour, did not stick to entrust him with the most important employments in the Army.

You well know Sir, that in the Reign of the Emperour Theodosius, our Nations left their cold and frozen Countries, to fix themselves in more pleasant habitations, under the leading of their two Kings, Atharic and Fridigeru: And that those two Princes return’d back into their Countries well satisfied, by the prudence of that famous Emperour, many of whose most pleasant Countries they had already invaded. We had not the same reason to commend the proceedings of Honorius, insomuch that Alaric and Radagaisus resolv’d some time since to invade his Territories, and the better to maintain the hideous multitude that followed them, they thought fit to divide themselves and to take different ways. Radagaisus fell into Italy at the head of two hundred thousand fighting men, either Ostrogoths or Herules, and the valiant Alaric led the Visigoths into Illyria and Palmatia. But after the defeat of the Ostrogoths and the death of Radagaisus, Stilicon puff’d up with his good success, for which he was almost absolutely beholding to Constance’s valour, advanced furiously toward toward us, and soon found us out; for we were no less eager than he to come to a general Battel. But the two Captains who had a mutual esteem for each other, minded nothing more than to watch one another's motions, and to endeavour to get all the advantages they could spy out for their own benefit; but at length after they had several times remov'd their Camps without attempting any thing, after they had sent out several parties wherein Constance and Wallia most memorably signaliz'd themselves, they came to a pitch'd Battel, which was fought near the City of Epidaurus.

Mesceca a famous Soldier, renowned for the defeat of the Rebel Gildon his Brother, led the Right Wing of the Romans, Eucherus Stilicon's Son commanded the Left; and the Cavalry was all under the conduct of the renowned Constance. The Right Wing of our Army was under Autalpb a Prince of great valour, the Brother of our King: the Left obeyed the orders of Sigeric, who at this day reigns over the Goths in Barcinona, and the Cavalry were commanded by young Wallia, who was esteem'd by the Enemies as well as by all our Soldiers the most valiant and most virtuous of all the Goths. Never any thing appear'd so lively and vigorous as his aspect and behaviour upon that occasion, his deportment thirsted to be engaged; and that noble emulation which he felt in his heart, excited by the reputation of the great Constance, encouraged him in such a manner, that he surpass'd himself in that Battel where we fought to preserve the honour of our Nation. Sometimes he brake in among the Romans with an unspeakable and most impetuous fury; sometimes he succoured those that began to give ground; sometimes he rallied those that were broken. In a word, he shew'd himself with that quickness every where, that instead of one Wallia you would have thought there had been thirty all the time of that desperate Fight. No doubt, Sir, but you have heard that Constance and the valiant Prince fought for one another at the beginning of the Fight, that they brake their Lances one against the other, with such a bravery as attracted the admiration of both the Armies, and that not satisfied with a course which so many great Soldiers had wondred at, they drew their Swords, and met with that terrour and fury as froze the hearts of those Spectators who were concern'd in their lives. And when they were separated by the great Bodies that came to meet, they fought with a double access of valour in all places where there Commands call'd them, shewing such experience and activity, that it may be truly said that they both vanquished, and both kept each other from vanquishing. In short, both Armies, after they had fought with great obstinacy till night, retreated with equal loss, and the next day, there being a truce granted for three days for the more convenient burying the dead, my Master and the valiant Constance, charm'd with each others mutual reputation, desired to see each other; nor did they only see one another with an augmentation of mutuall esteem, but they entred into a most inseparable league of friendship, whereof they promised to give each other the most signal proofs upon all occasions that were not injurious to the publick interest. After that, they laboured so diligently in both Armies, that they brought Alaric and Stilicon to confer together, and at last to conclude a peace for four years. Alaric promised to depart out of the Territories of the Empire; and Stilicon on the other side promised to fulfil the Articles which had been granted by Theodosius formerly to the Kings of the Goths. He also gave us some hopes of reparation for our damages sustained by a war which we had not entred upon, had not Honorius denied to fulfill several Articles that had been granted us by the Emperour his Father. Thereupon our King quitted the Territories, which were under the power of the Romans, with a resolution however not only to return, if they failed in the performance of their Articles, but to march directly to Rome with an Army sufficient to carry it by force.

You have heard also that we were no sooner departed out of the Provinces of the Empire, but Constance was chosen to oppose the Alans and Gepides, who under the command of Ardaric and Acaces were fallen into Spain; and that he was also forced afterwards to advance as far as Betia, to drive out the Vandals that harassed the Country under the command of Gunderic their King. In his absence neither Honorius nor Stilicon had taken any care to satisfy Alaric; insomuch that he provoked by such unjust delays, with an Army far more powerful than that which the Emperour's Favourite had encountred, march'd directly toward Italy through Pannonia and Ilyria. Our advance soon terrified Rome, while Stilicon, to buoy up the courage of the Emperour and the people, with what Forces he could raise of a sudden, put himself into Ravenna, which we intended to besiege, being advanced to a place not far off, which is called Candian. And while the Army of the Romans lay on the other side of Ravenna, ordered his own to march toward Palleno a small Town in the sight of the Enemy, where the Goths had no sooner retresh'd themselves, but their valiant Leader offered Battel to Honorius's Lieutenant: Stilicon durst not run a hazard of so much importance, but fearing that just before the Gates of Rome the loss of his Army might be the loss of the Empire, he lay under the Walls of Ravenna, and like another Fabius was resolv'd to attend the destruction of an Army which could not long subsist in an Enemy's Country, surrounded with Enemies. Alaric on the other side, like another Hannibal, several times made several attempts upon Stilicon; but not being able to force him out of his Trenches, nor draw him to a Battel, he was constrained to quit the Field at the beginning of Winter, and retire into Winter Quarters in such places where he was not like to find any great resistance.

During the winter season, the former propositions for peace were renewed; and after several conferences wherein each party scann'd the difficulties that could oppose their pretensions, they agreed that Stilicon should persuade the Emperour to surrender to the Goths those Lands which Theodosius had promised to give them in Gallia: and that Alaric should send Embassadors of the most considerable quality to Rome, to treat themselves with the Emperour. Autalpb and my Master were entrusted with this Commission, and were received by the Emperour with all the honour that two such Princes could pretend to, who were the nearest Relations of so formidable an Enemy. They appeared in the Court of Honorius after a different manner; for the Prince of the Goths was very magnificent in his expences, yet in the sumptuousness of his Equipage the Romans observed something that still appeared to be Gothic; for in every thing that belonged to him there appeared the symptoms of a haughty vain glory. On the other side, they acknowledged that Wallia's Magnificence was better understood, and that there was a gain of politeness in all his Equipage that did not so much as border upon any thing of pretended Barbarism, for which our Nation is condemn'd. Their affections also were differently engaged; for Autalpb no sooner beheld the Princess Placidia but he fell in love with her; but my Master minded nothing more than to strengthen that noble and generous friendship with Constance, who was now return'd, which they had already contracted, notwithstanding the enmity of their party. Some seven or eight days after we had been at Rome, there was a rumour spread, that the Princess of the Huns was coming to that City, Heracian was sent to the other side of the Alpes to receive her in the Emperour's name, and when she approached the famous Metropolis, Constance by Honorius's order went to meet her about twenty miles off, attended by all the Court most magnificently habited; for they had newly left off their Mourning for the Empress Termantia that was Stilicon's Daughter. That Favourite was not then with his Master, being unwilling to part from the Army till the truce were concluded and signed. But they that appeared most gallant at that Courtly Ceremony were Artabure, Mescezel, Maximus, Castinus, Aurelian, Anaxilla and Ariobinda. On the other side, Placidia was no less earnest than the Emperour her Brother to pay those honours which were due to Theodolinda, being accompanied by Cleomira, the Princess of the Tongres, the Sister of Taxander, Virginia, Camilla, Hersilia, Hyppolita, Flaminia and several other beautiful Ladies of the greatest quality at Court: Autalpb, Wallia, Taxander, Eucherus Stilicon's Son, the young Atius and the famous Claudian would needs be of the number: and I remember that I was not so much surpris'd at the remarkable discourse which I heard, as I was at the Magnificence of that stately Train that attended the Sister of Honorius: not but that the jealousy which Autalpb and Euchere had of each other, sometimes spoiled their discourse, and made it incline to a little too much seriousness, but Claudian being seconded by Hersilia, Camilla, Wallia and Taxander, was so careful to intermix his own jollities, that it soon continued its former Gayety. True it is, that being devoted to Stilicon's interest, he often spoke in the behalf of Euchere, but it was with so much ingenuity, that it was no difficult thing to discover the subtilty of his wit.

Claudian had fixed his eyes upon those beautiful Ladies that were next Placidia; and Wallia who took great delight to hear him talk, Were you not, said he, taken up with the consideration of so many wonders, I should be surpris'd at your silence which robs us of a thousand pleasant conceits with which your fancy abounds. You would wonder more, smartly answered he, to flatter Stilicon's Son, if I should tell you that it is the wisdom of Prince Wallia that I admire above all those lovely countenances that you see me behold. In short, Sir, I am of opinion that you have not withstood so many charms, but only because you would not engage your self in the service of those Ladies from whom you are so suddenly to depart. Eucherus presently apprehended the true meaning of that discourse, and addressing himself to Claudian, Do you not also believe, said he, casting his eyes upon Placidia, that our Ladies are obliged to act more warily than Prince Wallia, and to defend themselves against the Strangers; whose friendship they no sooner shall have gained, but they must lose them perhaps for ever, according to all probability? Those Strangers, replied Autalpb very briskly, pray not only con- time inseparable from those fair Ladies, but they are of that quality that they can confederate themselves with whole Nations, and restore peace to a good part of the world.

Those words pronounced with a slow utterance, touched the enamour'd Euchere to the quick, and in regard he was supported by Stilicon's power, he was about to have made a reply to the Prince of the Visigoths, when we perceived a far off that the Emperour had made a stop with his magnificent Train, and Placidia judging that he had met Theodolinda, order'd us to make more hast, and to interrupt a discourse the consequences whereof might have proved dangerous, she took upon her to describe the fair Princess that was so near at hand, My Master listned to the Sister of Honorius with an exceeding attention, which Virginia taking notice of, made him a most obliging challenge, wherein the Prince of the Goths defended himself like a compleat Courtier. But that jollity and the lively air of his countenance soon vanished, when we were come to the place of enterview between Honorius and Theodolinda.

The Emperour being arrived at such a distance, that he might be easily observed by the Princess of the Huns, presently alighted, and the charming Theodolinda having done the same, these two illustrious persons, of the highest rank of any persons in the world, advanced toward each other, with that Majesty as testified more evidently than the magnificence of their Train, the grandeur of their birth and the loftiness of their dignity. The noble presence of Honorius was set out with a magnificent Helmet, staded with a most stately Plume of Feathers, and a rich Coat of Arms altogether as sumptuous. On the other side, the Jewels that glitter'd upon Theodolinda's head and her other habiliments, seem'd to borrow from that Princess the lustre, which they were wont to lend to beauties less surprising. All the Court of Rome stood in admiration at the sight of her, while the Princess alighting from her Chariot, seem'd to be some Goddess descended from heaven to honour the Earth, and to favour the vows of mortals that ador'd her. For being tall, straight and rarely proportion'd, having a complexion altogether dazzling by virtue of its whiteness, and her eyes black, fair and full of fire, she immediately darted a pleasing trouble into the Soul of every one that cast their eyes upon so accomplished a Princess.

As for my Master, he was surpris'd with an admiration of which I thought him so little capable, that I soon foresaw what would be the effect of that first motion, which made me narrowly observe his looks, and every particular action at that time. I perceived that the Prince took delight to receive into his heart the glances of those fair eyes which he admir'd, I took notice that he was so mov'd at the sight of that wonderful Princess, that he minded nothing but her, listned to nothing but what she said, and that he seem'd to have accompanied Placidia, only to offer to Theodolinda a liberty, which till that fatal day he had preserv'd entire. He was ignorant a good while of the loss which he sustain'd, but as we were upon our return to Rome, it was no difficult thing for him to perceive, that he was passionately in love with the Princess of the Huns. He never took his leave of her without being troubled, he never came into her presence but overjoyed, and he began to take more pleasure than ever he had done before, in Balls, Turnaments, and such like magnificent pastimes. At first these marks of his growing passion, made him suspect a good part of the truth, but a few days after a violent jealousy seizing his heart, absolutely convinced him.

He was the first that took notice that the Emperour was not so respectful to Theodolinda, out of that civility which was due to the daughter of a great King, as out of a certain inclination, which he seem'd to have toward so lovely a Princess: And upon a rumour that was spread abroad, that there was to be an alliance between the Romans and the Huns, for the strengthening whereof, the charming Theodolinda was to be match'd to the Emperour Honorius, he became so insupportably melancholy, that he fell into a fit of sickness. Now in regard that he was generally beloved, all the Court took notice of the change of his humour: But Placidia and Constance who had a particular kindness for him, were more highly concern'd. Nay Theodolinda her self, who began to have as great a kindness for him as the Sister of Honorius, often desired to know the cause of his distemper: But the pensive Walia told her enough without speaking, while he looked upon her sighing, and then looked down upon the ground, not daring to return an answer. True it is that Theodolinda could not understand that manner of his expressing himself, for the being a haughty Princess that slighted the very offic of Honorius himself, would not believe that a Prince who was not heir to a Crown, and indeed in no probability of ever attaining one, could be so bold as to think so presumptuous a thought. My Master on the other side, who had nothing but what was great and lofty in his Soul, resolv'd more than once to let her understand, how he dyed for love of her, but a profound respect always stopp'd the impetuosity of his passion.

At that time Stilicon's Son prepared a magnificent Turnament in honour of Placidia, there Wallia resolv'd to fight for the honour of Theodolinda, but he ran without declaring his intention or making himself known, so much he feared lest his presumption should displease the Princess whom he adored. At the end of those famous courses wherein he honourably signaliz'd himself, the enamour'd Prince retired to his Chamber, wholly taken up with the bright idea of Theodolinda's beauty, and the magnificence of the Court of Rome. Then reflecting upon his having engaged himself, where he could not hope for any favourable success; Unfortunate Prince, cryed he sighing, wilt thou always love Theodolinda, or to say better, wilt thou always love without hope, not daring to make known thy love? What fruit canst thou expect from that rash passion that reigns in thy heart? Knowest thou not that Theodolinda is the daughter of a potent monarch, and is not an Emperour thy Rival? What hopest thou for unhappy man, wouldst that Theodolinda should renounce one of the chiefest Thrones in the earth, to espouse Wallia and become the Subject of Alaric?

These thoughts so cruelly tormented him, that he refused to see any person all that evening, and he took a hundred several resolutions, without determining any thing. He would be gone in all haste from Rome sometimes, sometimes he would love no longer, but Theodolinda's beauty more prevalent than his reason, detained him in the Court of Honorius, more strongly riveted his chains, and increased the violence of his passion in that manner, that he found he could not chuse but love her as long as he lived, and that he could not live unless he made known his passion to her. Nevertheless though he were as bold as any person living, though Theodolinda had a very fair esteem and a great kindness for him, he durst not presume to complain of his sufferings before her, had not the fair Princess herself given him a very favourable opportunity. One day finding her alone without any other company than one of her Maids of honour, she intimated to him that she had something to say to him in private, and thereupon taking him aside, and beholding him in a most obliging manner, Generous Wallia, said she, the Princess Placidia reposes such a confidence in your virtue, that she requested me to declare to you her real thoughts, with an absolute freedom of speech: It seems she has apprehended for some days since, that Auralph has a more particular kindness for her, and therefore she not being in a condition, to receive those Testimonies which he gives her, with that acknowledgment which he may pretend to, she hopes you will divert the Prince from pursuing his design.

The fair Princess of the Huns had no sooner concluded those words, but Wallia beholding her in a most passionate manner; Alas Madam, said he, how difficult a thing it is for a man to stifle in his breast the marks of a violent inclination, and how unhappy are they that suffer, when it is not lawful for them so much as to complain. While he spake in that manner, he sigh'd, and cast his eyes downward, so that Theodolinda beginning to apprehend some suspicion of the truth; blushed out of modesty, and went about by degrees to alter the subject of the discourse. I am apt to believe, replied she, that you never speak but of business with Prince Auralph, and therefore since without doubt you intend to be gone so soon as your business is dispatched, the Princess would do her self more right to persuade the Emperour, to determine your affairs with all speed, rather than trouble you with a commission, which you may not think so proper to discharge.

The enamour'd Wallia was more afflicted at these words than before, finding his jealousy thereby awaked, inso-much that lifting up his eyes to the fair Countenance which she adored; I am persuaded Madam, replied he, that Placidia's mediation would very much forward our affairs, but it is not from her alone that we might hope for kindnesses of the highest nature, had we a desire to return to our Camp. I know no person, replied she, whose reputation is so great with the Emperour as hers. How Madam, replied he interrupting her, can you be ignorant of what all the world already knows, and of what you have reason to know better than all the world? Ab no no, Madam, it is not possible that you should be ignorant of the power which your charms have obtained over the Emperour, and I make no question but the Emperour has already told you several times over, what an unfortunate Prince, that has no Crown to offer you; dares not presume to declare.

At those words the Princess blushed, not only out of modesty, for there was something of honour that had a share in the change, which appeared in her fair countenance, which made her desirous to let Wallia understand, after what manner Honorius had behaved himself toward her, and to shew that the dignity of that Prince had not made her so hardy as my Master imagin'd. I must acknowledge, answered she, that the Emperour has given me to understand, that he had some kindness for me: But I am also obliged to tell you, that he did not let me know so much, but with all that respect, that I could not have expected more from a Prince far beneath him that sits upon the chief Throne of the world.

But, Wallia, pursued she, to hinder him from taking any hold of her discourse, I will go a little farther, for seeing that Placidia and I look upon you as a discreet and virtuous Friend, I make no scruple to tell you the real thoughts of my mind: for as I neither receiv'd the offer of Honorius with incivility, so perhaps I neither considered them to be of such an obliging value; since methought it was not for the Princess of the Huns to be transported with those honours that had been so easily bestowed upon Stilicon's Daughter before. I confess that Honorius is a good man, and full of integrity, but I cannot tell whether those two qualities are sufficient in a Prince that I would accept for a Husband, and whether I should not desire some other person more worthy my esteem. In short, whether this humour proceed from my Country, or from my Birth, methinks I cannot but scorn, that the Successor of the Cæsars, that the Son of the great Theodosius should so degrade himself to seek for an Empress in the Family of his Favourite. Yet such matches many times happen, replied Wallia, for love seems to take pleasure sometimes to unite persons unequal in degree, the better to display the effects of his power. Thus we see presumptuous hearts that sometimes dare aspire to the Thrones of their Sovereigns, while on the other side there are Kings that let their sights fall upon Beauties which they chuse among their Subjects. 'Tis necessary then, replied Theodolinda, that such Princes should be as great in the endowments of their minds and persons as in the extent of their Dominions. They ought to be the delight and honour of their people, the terrour and admiration of their Neighbours; and being such, I give them leave to love where they please, since 'tis their fate that they can no where love above themselves; and for that reason they cannot be accus'd of doing any thing beneath themselves. I will go a little farther, Madam, replied Wallia, since it is my opinion that generally all great Princes are obliged to love. For in short are they always oblig'd, though they could do it, to put on the severity of command, to keep their State, or observe the exact rules of wisdom? Rather is it not better for them to descend a little? And which way can they better shew their courtesie and humanity, than by appearing sensible of that noble passion which I defend?

While he spake in that manner, he so amorously beheld Theodolinda, that the prudent Princess took upon her to speak, that she might hinder my Matter from proceeding in a discourse, the consequences whereof she began to suspect: But, Prince, said she, do you not believe but that a King who has not those endowments which I spake of, would render himself contemptible by such a match as you mean? And will you not acknowledge, that of the two, it is more noble to offend out of pride, than of—— I not only acknowledge it, said he most passionately, interrupting her, but, divine Princess, added he sighing, and with a guilty utterance, I must confess moreover that the charms for which you are so ador'd, contrain me to put it in practice: yes, yes, great Princess, the presumptuous Wallia—— Ah, Prince, said she, I beseech you practise it no more, nor oblige me to change the manner of my behaviour toward you. How! Princess, too severe, cryed he, would you not so much as understand that I adore you? Alas, if it be so, I am far more miserable than I thought my self; for if you take the testimony of the most respectful passion that ever was for an offence, I must then prepare my self to die, since it is impossible for me to live without doing you that injury every moment.

At those words his grief oppress'd him in so violent a manner, that he could say no more; but his sighs having as it were opened a passage for his speech, and Theodolinda's irresolution giving him time to resume his lamentation: Ha, Madam, I beseech you, said he, leave those niceties: you know that my Birth is sufficiently illustrious to hinder me from blushing, when you shall vouchsafe so far to humble your eyes, as to count me among the number of your slaves. Though on the other side I know this Birth of mine ought to be supported by those Crowns which fortune has denied me, and which it ought to be in my power to offer you, if I would pretend to a felicity so infinitely above my hopes. But, Madam, I do not aspire to that honourable felicity, nor do I beg any other advantage, than only to serve the fair Princess of the Huns with her permission.

While he spake in this manner Theodolinda felt a kind combat of her heart between that esteem which she had for my Matter, and the resentment which persons of her humour and quality might have upon such an occasion: so that the enamour'd Wallia seeing her hesitate in that manner, What, Madam, answered he with many signs of discomposure as well in his looks as in his behaviour, have you any reason to study so much as one moment what to answer, after so many real protestations which I have made you? Have I conceived the least rash hope whereat you can be in reason offended, and though perhaps I have declared my self with more freedom than I ought, has it not been accompanied with all the veneration that could be offered to a Deity? By that time the Princess having absolutely determin'd, with a serious aspect, Prince, replied she, I see too well that those testimonies of esteem which I have given you upon several occasions, have drawn upon me the effects of a boldness which offends me: but absolutely truly know this, that either you must forbear to see me any more, or else never let me hear a word more of your affection, which infalibly will produce those consequences, which will never please your humour. Must I forbear to see you more, replied he in a most pensive manner, Ah! too inhumane Princess, exact from me other proofs of my obedience. Require of me that which it is possible for me to grant. No Madam, I will see you as long as I can see day, for I feel that I cannot———You shall speak no more to me, replied she with a more resolute utterance, of a thing which I require you to banish from all your discourse.

She pronounced these words with such symptoms of her anger, in so much that Wallia being touched to the quick, and beholding her with a grief intermix'd with submission; Well Madam, replied he sighing, I will endeavour to the utmost of my power to hold my tongue, I will say no more if it be possible, but that you are the most charming Princess in the world, provided you will reward so painful a silence, and that at the same time when only my eyes, my diligence and my services shall speak for me, you will suffer your self to be convinced that I adore you, and that I am willing to wear to my Tomb those chains which you have put on. He would have spoken more without doubt, but Placidia entering at the same time, brake off the discourse.

My Master afterwards conversed with Theodolinda, after such a manner that she could not disapprove. The air of his countenance, his languishment, his diligence, his entire submission to her commands, and that blind obedience which he punctually observed, were testimonies of his love sufficiently visible. But these marks of his passion were accompanied with such a reservedness, that the most rigorous severity could not in reason condemn him: On the other side, being supported by a great merit and a noble reputation, I am persuaded that Theodolinda as she was, did not always with displeasure behold the Empire, which her beauty had obtained over the heart of a Prince, young, handsome and famous for so many renowned deeds. But before she would dispose her self to permit this illustrious Lover to presume to complain of her cruelty, Honorius upon Placidia's solicitation had sign'd the Treaty, for the compleating whereof they resided at Rome: So that they left behind them that which they held most dear in the world.

Whatever passion they deserve that are forced to absent themselves from what they love, certainly none did ever deserve more than Wallia merited upon that lamentable separation. For he not only left his Princess, almost without any hopes of ever seeing her again; but also left her with a Rival who had great probability of success, a Rival who was Emperour of the Romans, young, courtly, and very amorous. Besides that it was not permitted him to discover his torments, so that his grief and his affection only appeared in his eyes.

But instead of relating all the circumstances of this departure, I will only tell you that Wallia was so afflicted, that all the Court of Honorius seemed to grieve for his sake. Placidia and Constance openly testified the high esteem and friendship which they had for that Prince, and Theodolinda her self bid him farewell, with an aspect neither so haughty nor so cheerful as she was wont to carry: And though the Emperour had given those two Princes an absolute satisfaction, yet they found so little in absenting themselves from Placidia and Theodolinda, that they made but easy journeys toward the Army, and that with no small affliction to their minds. At their arrival they perceived that the Visigoths were already advanced toward Gallia, to take possession of Aquitain which the Emperour had granted them. But Sir, you know the revolution which overturning all the good intentions of Honorius, caused Alaric to change a resolution. For at that time a certain Jew named Saulus, a hardy Soldier, and wholly devoted to the favourite of Honorius, commanded several Provinces through which we were to march. To him had Stilicon sent a private order to set upon our Troops, and not to question the success, provided he began the war. Saulus obeyed his commands with all exactness, so that we were no sooner upon the Frontiers of the Province of Narbonne, but he fell upon us unawares and cut our Vanguard in pieces. The surprize and fear thereof was so great among the Visigoths, that they had been absolutely defeated before they could have made any defence, had not my Master rallied them and led them on well encouraged to the Battel. He thunder'd in upon the Enemy with such an impetuosity, that he bore to the ground the stoutest resistance, while death and terror were his attendants wherever he appeared. He sought out Saulus, met him, fought him, kill'd him, and saved the life of the King of the Goths, and changing the fortune of the two Armies, constrained victory to declare her self in our behalf. The generous Alaric had no sooner acknowledged, how much he was bound to him for so prosperous and so unlooked for an event, but he storm'd against the prodigious perfidy of the Romans, and vowed before the principal Officers of his Army, to take a revenge worthy the justice of his provocation.

tion. Presently he consulted which way to execute what he had resolv'd upon, and believing he could not undertake a nobler design than the famous City of Rome, he made it his whole business to prepare all things fit for an enterprize conformable to the grandeur of his thoughts.

The Goths overjoyed at their King's design, desired nothing more than to march back into Italy, and encouraged with the hopes of the plunder of that rich City, fill'd with the spoils of the whole earth, they promised themselves the ransacking of that populous place, though it had been defended by those very Citizens that had formerly made her Mistresses of all the world. Nor was there one in all that numerous Army that shewed any sadness in the midst of the general rejoycing of the Soldiers, unless it were Wallia himself. He could not hear of marching as an enemy against a people by whom he was so well beloved, and he made use of all the power he had with the King, to divert the storm which threatened a Country that he could not think upon but with affection. And still his discontent encreas'd, to see that all his entreaties nothing prevailed, and that he could not handsomely continue in the Army, when Alaric's Honour, and the reputation of the Gothish Arms lay at stake. But his grief encreas'd beyond measure, when we understood that Placidia, Theodolinda and Cleomira were unanimously resolv'd to endure all the hardships of a Siege, on purpose to encourage the people to defend themselves, while the fainthearted Honorius fight'd at Ravenna in love with a Stranger that was called Bellamira. A consolation which did not a little please him to see himself delivered from the corrivalship of an Emperour, and made him think himself not altogether the most unfortunate Lover in the world: Ab, Hilderic, said he to me several times in our march to Italy, to what an extremity am I reduc'd, and what resolution ought I to take? Must I forsake my Sovereign's interest, or else bring Fire and Sword where the divine Theodolinda remains shut up: Ab, how shall I be every moment surrounded with deadly fears, for the life of that celestial Princess! I fancy already some barbarous Visigoth may sheath his Sacrilegious Sword in her bosom; methinks I already see her lovely Body buried in the ruins of that magnificent Palace where I have seen her shine so bright with all her charms. Then transported with his despair, May we all perish and be ruined, rather than a destiny so lamentable should put an end to her days. But fainthearted Wallia, added he again, determine with thy self: dost thou stand considering, poor spirited Lover, when thou art to serve Theodolinda? Get into Rome, offer thy life to her whom thou lovest, and take a generous Princess's part against an ambitious King to whom thou art so scrupulously loyal.

These thoughts so violently and so long afflicted him, that by that time we came into Italy he was neither in a condition to fight for Alaric, nor to offer himself to Theodolinda; he fell into a lingering Fever that presently weakened him, and cast him afterwards into a languishing condition, which so disheartened the Goths, that they were not so hot upon their enterprize, whatever confidence they had in Alaric's valour. The nobler sort went to visit him every day, while the disconsolate Prince raising out of every thing new matter to feed his grief, all the time they were present with him was forc'd to put a constraint upon himself, which augmented his torments: sometimes he struggled with himself to give them some testimonies of his acknowledgment; but then looking upon them as Theodolinda's Enemies, he could not behold them but with a kind of horreur which encreas'd his displeasure against them. He remain'd in this condition till we were just ready to sit down before that famous City; at what time the King having given him some more particular marks of his esteem and affection, insus'd those appeals into his head that serv'd to allay the better part of his trouble: for because his distemper arose from the cruel irresolution wherewith his mind was tormented, he had nothing to do but to determine with himself to dispel the violence of his malady, which he did by considering that he was not to be unfaithful to his Prince to satisfy his passion, and that by taking the right tide he not only fought for his Country, and the honour of his Nation, but thereby he put himself into a capacity to be considerably serviceable to Theodolinda herself. Rome by the death of Stillicon, the absence of Honorius, and by reason that Constance lay sick at a great distance, remained forsaken and abandoned to the Arms of the valiant Ardaric, for which reason my Master thought it to be in part for his own interest to second the designs of a grateful Prince, to the end he might pretend to a kind of right to demand any kindness in favour of the Princess. He found so much justice in his purpose, and so much probability in his pretences, that his restless desire, to render himself considerable to Alaric, and profitable to Theodolinda, soon brought back into his countenance that warlike heat which was wont to enliven it. Nevertheless, he perswaded the King to send to the Princesses to offer them liberty, to come forth out of the City, and to retire to Ravenna. But those brave Heroick Ladies return'd answer, that they would rather chuse to be buried in the Ruines of Rome, if heaven should surrender it up to destruction, than to preserve their lives by abandoning an unfortunate City in its misery.

After the Romans had made a stout resistance, and endured unsufferable hardships, their City was taken by assault, by a Nation whom they called Barbarians, and in regard that Wallia glowing with impatience to see the Princesses and to serve them, had fought with a double reinforcement and valour, he was the first that entred that deplorable City, whatever Autalpb could do to dispute that honour with him. He ran to the Palace through horror and desolation, and opening his way with his victorious sword; he cryed out at the same time that they should take care of the Princesses, promising great rewards withal to let him pass. Those words having enfeebled a resistance, which his valour could not have so soon surmounted, he presently got to Placidia's Apartment, and no sooner did he cast his eyes upon the illustrious Daughter of the great Theodosius, but he looked upon her without being able to utter so much as one syllable, so violent a sorrow seiz'd him all of an instant. Ab Wallia, said the Princess, are you come hither as an Enemy?

Then it was that my Matters courage forsook him, and though so valiant and so laden with new honour as he was, he could not refrain from letting fall a shower of tears, to behold Placidia's affliction. The Sister of Honorius was mov'd, to behold those signs of affection in the Gothick Prince, who then breaking silence; I am come Madam, answered he, to repair some part of the crime which I have been constrained to commit, and to pay you such services as you might expect from the most faithful among the Romans.

Those words pronounced with a pensive and respectful aspect, gave some consolation to Placidia, but at the same time Autalpb coming in, broke of any farther compliments; a little while after came Alaric himself attended by Sigeric and Attalus. Then the enamour'd Wallia looked about for the charming Theodolinda, and no sooner had he spied her at a distance, but he advanced toward her with a profound submission, and falling upon his knee and taking her by one of her fair hands; You know Madam, said he, that my birth and honour obliged me to fight for the King of the Goths, however I make you this protestation, that I had never born Arms against a City, which your divine person had rend'ed sacred, had not the hope of being serviceable to you at such a dismal time as this, more powerfully engaged me, than my duty to Alaric, or Wallia's own reputations. Not Madam, that the services I have done or may perform, are of that importance but that you might have received them, from the first Officer that had any sence of honour. But Madam, I have some credit with Alaric himself and some power among the Goths, and I will lose both the one and the other, but I will obtain the liberty of a fair and noble Princess, which we have only found by an accident shut up among our Enemies. Generous Wallia, replied she with an air as obliging at it was possible for her to shew, during the trouble that still discomposed her, we were not deceived, neither the fair Princesses nor my self, when we had some hopes that you would succour us in these dreadful calamities, enough to daunt the stoutest courages in the world. We also find that your respect has far surpassed, what we expected from you, and if the temper of the King of the Goths be answerable to his fair reputation, and if his blood that sprung from the same veins with yours, have infused into him inclinations like your own, we shall have some reason to comfort our selves in his misfortunes. But whatever fall out, we have so great a confidence in your virtue, that we shall commit our selves wholly to your protection.

Wallia sensibly obliged to his Princess, return'd her thanks with all the submission that he could have done, had he received the same kindnesses which he offered: And as soon as he had order'd some Companies to guard and attend the Princesses in the absence of Alaric, who was gone to look after his wounds, he went to visit the King where he found Autalpb, Sigeric, and Attalus. The King of the Goths very joyfully received him, and beholding him with an obliging countenance, Come hither Cousin, said he, come and receive the first testimonies of my acknowledgment, till we can reward those actions that have so great a share in the honour of our success. Your valour by the taking of Rome, affords me a most remarkable advantage to acquit my self, toward those persons to whom I am most deeply obliged: And I shall dye a very ingrateful person, if I should not find something worthy your acceptance, in a City whose magnificence all the world admires. With the government of this famous City, accept also the choice of all the Spoils, and therefore seek out for what is most precious among all the treasure, or most considerable among all the Prisoners. Wallia return'd no answer at first but only by his submission, but taking notice that Alaric's words did authorize the intention which he had, to demand the liberty of the Princesses, he resolv'd to explain himself to a Prince so generous and grateful. The King of the Goths taking notice thereof, and being willing to encourage him; What Cousin, said he, shall Wallia's generosity continually contend with Alaric's

acknowledgment, and will you never permit me that boldness which so successfully accompanies you in fight, to follow you after the victory when we desire that you should reap the reward of your virtue? Sir, then answered my Master, I cannot tell whether your Majesty may not be surpris'd to see me make use of that freedom which you give me, and whether I may not be accused for obeying too exactly your commands that make me so bold, when I shall presume to beg the liberty of three fair Princesses, who are more worthy to fetter others, than to wear Chains themselves.

Autalph, Sigeric, and Attalus, appeared somewhat dissatisfied at Wallia's words, and the former who could not restrain from looking upon him with a kind of envy, addressing himself to his Brother; Sir, said he, I am of opinion that no person can desire you to let go the Princess Placidia, but such as would at the same time deprive you of several other great advantages: For in short, whether you think fitting to continue the war or to make peace, what may not you demand and stand upon, when you have at your disposal all that Honorius has most dear in the world, and the most considerable person in the Empire. Besides if your Majesty think it more convenient to enter into an Alliance, Placidia may be a means to unite your house to the family of the great Theodosius, and to make Autalph the most happy Prince in the world. As he concluded these last words he blushed, and turning toward my Master with the same commotion, "You are not ignorant, said he, what thoughts I have for the Sister of Honorius, you know that I adore her, Yes, you know it, and yet you would deprive me of the company of so fair a Princess." "Twas because I knew that, replied Wallia slightly enough, that I thought that you would either make the same request that I did, or at least that you would second me if I made it my self." "It appears, said Autalph, that you never laid to heart the sorrows that I may suffer, upon the absence of the only person whom I love: For certainly you would be of another mind, if you understood what it is to love so well as I. I agree with you, replied Wallia, that the knowledge which I have thereof is far different from that to which you pretend, seeing that I could never understand how any Lover, could be pleased to see his Mistress a slave, who should rather chuse to take off her Fetters and wear them himself." "Cousin, said the King interrupting him, fearing lest the consequences of the discourse, might at length exasperate the two Princes, It would be an act of generosity to send away the Princess Placidia, but there is more security in detaining her. She is Sister to the most potent of my enemies, and I may thereby expect great advantages in treating with Honorius. As for the Princess Theodolinda, added he beholding him very steadfastly, I give you full power to dispose of her as you please and at your pleasure, to keep her in the Camp or to send her back to her father.

Presently Wallia was overjoyed at those words, in regard he had obtained what he most ardently desired: However he perceived a while after that he wanted something to complete his joy, whether that he thought he had not sufficiently acknowledged the King's kindness, or whether he thought that Theodolinda, whose generous humour he knew would never consent, to leave her two Royal companions among the Goths, having always desired to share in their dangers and afflictions: And therefore renewing his address as well to testify his acknowledgment, as to speak a little farther in the behalf of Placidia and Cleomira, "You may well believe, said he, that I shall not take upon me to give the Princess of the Huns her liberty, in any other than my Sovereigns name, nor upon any other score to tell her that the may return for Dacia. But Sir, what will not Renown report in honour of your Majesty, if you extend your favour and clemency yet a little farther to the two Princesses, who are neither guilty nor fit to endure servitude. What advantage can you expect from the exchange of two prisoners, which you are not always in a condition to obtain by the force of your Arms, which is a way far more becoming the grandeur of your courage?" "It may well befit Prince Wallia to speak in this manner, replied Alaric, and I should be of the same opinion and act accordingly, were I to answer for none but my self. But Cousin, a King without committing apparent faults, cannot be too wary in managing the affections of his Soldiers, and he must follow the advice of his head, not his heart, when he is to act either as a Father of his people, or as a Captain of an Army.

Whatever reasons the King made use of, it was not easie for him to satisfy Wallia, for that generous Prince, so far from submitting, that he could not forbear to intreat on for Placidia and Cleomira, pressed Alaric still with all the vehemency, that his respect to his Sovereign would permit. But finding that he employed his time in vain in the behalf of his two Princesses, he went to the Princess of the Huns, who observing him to look somewhat discontented, most sweetly addressing her speech to him; How Prince, said she, is it possible that Wallia should appear sad before us, after so much honour and success. He has cause to be so,

Madam, answered he, apprehending that you will be in the same condition to leave Placidia and Cleomira among us, but on the contrary, nothing sad when you bid farewell to— At those words, instead of making an end he held his peace; then casting a look full of love and languishment, upon the eyes of the Princess; You see, Madam, said he, that I dare not absolutely presume to explain my meaning; and though the testimonies of my grief ought not to be compris'd in the rigorous command which you have laid upon me, yet I dare not take the boldness, while I bring you the tidings of your liberty, to tell you what effect the freedom which you have to leave us, has produc'd in my heart.

How great soever the Prince's passion were, he shew'd no more particular sign of his love, but contented himself with giving an account to his Princess of the dispute which he had with Alaric. He carried himself also with more reservedness toward her, than he would have done in the Court of the King of the Huns, that he might not seem to take advantage of Theodolinda's misfortune, and the kindnesses which he had done her, to disobey the commands which she had laid upon him. No sooner had he told her all those circumstances which he thought himself oblig'd to let her know, but Placidia and Cleomira came into the Princess's Chamber, who no sooner understood what the Prince of the Goths had done, but they testified to Theodolinda how much they rejoyced in her happiness, yet that fair Princess appeared more melancholy than cheerful: and indeed there was neither of those illustrious persons but shew'd an unwonted kind of Generosity. The incomparable Sister of Honorius, and the amiable Princess of the Tongres seem'd to be rid of their chains, seeing Theodolinda's taken on: on the other side, the Princess of the Huns only endured the captivity of her Friends. But then the two Princesses considering Wallia's good intentions beyond the success of his mediation, gave him all the marks of acknowledgment which he could possibly expect, had he obtain'd in their behalf as much as Alaric had granted Theodolinda, and they treated him with far more apparent demonstrations of friendship than the Princess of the Huns had done, who thought her self obliged to carry her self more reservedly toward my Master. Wallia for his part receiv'd the marks of such inestimable kindnesses more abashed, than had he been himself obliged to the Princesses as much as they thought themselves engaged to him, and addressing himself to Placidia, Alas, Madam, said he, sighing, how unhappy am I, that it is not in my power to redeem you out of the hands of Autalph? What may not the unfortunate Constance say of Wallia's proceedings? But what can the unserviceable Wallia do in opposition to his Sovereign's Brother, to serve the incomparable Placidia, if persecuted by him?

Much after this manner ended their discourse, after which my Master went to give orders to prepare a most stately equipage for Theodolinda. However, in regard it was not an ealie thing to employ many workmen, but that it must be taken notice of, the Princess of the Huns was soon advertised thereof, who instead of giving Wallia thanks, very much blam'd him, which manifest'd the generosity of her Soul far beyond all the testimonies of acknowledgment which she could have given: Prince, said she so soon as he came to see her, is it after this manner that you treat the best of your Friends? Would you have me believe that you esteem Theodolinda, after the publick proofs that you have given to the contrary? Who, I, Madam, cryed he surpris'd, have I committed any such offence? No, no, Madam, believe no such thing, for you will have little reason to accuse me ere long: Would to God, said he, beholding Theodolinda's fair eyes with less astonishment than love, would to God, that in obeying you with all the exactness imaginable, I were as little capable of letting you understand that I am—— But alas, presently added he sighing, whither will your reproaches carry me?

Concluding those word, he held his peace, and the fair Princess mov'd without doubt with so respectful a passion, had suffered her self to discover some part of the kindness which she already had for my Master, if her Soul out of the severity of her wisdom that guarded it against the tenderness of her heart, had not hindered her by causing her to continue her discourse in the same manner as she had begun it, Prince, said she, in taking so much care of my Equipage, you have a strange opinion of my friendship; for in short, you believe that your labour will not be fruitless, thinking that I am resolv'd to depart. It is so natural, replied my Master, to have no dependance upon others, and to love liberty, that in truth, Madam, I thought that you would not be very much troubled to accept of that favour which I obtained of the King of the Goths. I do not deny, replied she, but that liberty is very sweet, and that we are born with the very seeds of antipathy against all things that put a constraint upon our wills. But, Prince, you know, that it is not always requisite to follow the motions of natural desire, seeing that oftentimes a noble Soul is obliged to make use of Maximes far different: you are not ignorant of the love which I bear to Placidia and Cleomira, and can you then believe that I can be ever able to abandon them in chains, to return into my own Country? Your behaviour obliging in appearance manifests as much outwardly, but secretly upbraids me, yet which of my actions has overpersuaded you? How did you know that I was unwilling to suffer a servitude, which your continual kindnesses render so easily supportable, and indeed what likelihood is there that I should leave my companions, having had the honour to partake with them in the misfortunes of a besieged City.

While the incomparable Theodolinda, strengthened Wallia's passion with the fair proof of her generosity, Placidia, Cleomira and Autalpb entred the Chamber, and interrupted their converse for some time, but my Matter soon renewed it by letting them understand, after what manner the Princess had refused the liberty, which the King of the Goths had given her. Placidia and Cleomira testified to their illustrious friend, how much they were bound to her with all the Caresses that a real affection could inspire, and indeed the charming Sister of Honorius, conjur'd her most earnestly to forsake unfortunate Italy. But when she saw that her entreaties nothing avail'd, she blam'd her with an extraordinary tenderness, and endeavoured to vanquish a resolution, which she however found her self more willing to follow than condemn. The two Princes on the contrary, gave Theodolinda all the commendations that she deserved, and took their leaves of her so charm'd with the beauties of her Soul, insomuch that Autalpb talk'd of nothing else to the King his Brother, but of the rare qualities of that Princess.

Wallia was at first overjoyed to hear a discourse, so much to the praise of her whom he loved, but soon after his joy became secretly disturb'd, for though the honour of Theodolinda was infinitely dear to him, the report thereof that then began to spread, caused him to sigh though he could not by any means conjecture the cause. Alaric who had not only all the accomplishments of a great King, but the conditions also of a just and honest man, was extremely taken with an action so worthy his esteem, which made him so eager to give a visit to the Princesses, that he resolv'd no longer to defer it. The next morning he sent the Captain of his Guards to those illustrious prisoners, to know whether they would be pleas'd, to permit him the honour of attending upon them, who being very just and not able to blame Alaric for any thing but his valour and his success, they admitted the officer that came from him very civilly, returning for answer that it was not for the vanquished to prescribe him laws.

The King of the Goths no sooner heard their answer, but he would needs go to their Apartments, notwithstanding the trouble of his wounds. This earnestness of his was no small, but secret disturbance to Wallia, though in all outward probability he ought to have been well pleas'd, as well in reference to Alaric's honour, as in relation to the advantages which the Princesses might gain by his visits. But examining a certain kind of envy so little conformable to his usual humour, and not able to understand the nature of that inward morion that caused it, he took it for an ill omen of that misfortune that threaten'd his passion.

In the mean time Alaric went to visit the Princesses, affecting at that time to appear more magnificent than he was wont: He was most splendidly habited, while Autalpb, Sigeric, and Wallia went before shining in Coats of Armour, that glittered all over with precious stones, and followed by five or six of the most considerable Officers in the Army. He was no sooner entred the Chamber resting his hand upon Attalus's Arm, but his eyes were dazzled at the lustre of so many persons as came forward to receive him: Nor did the charming Princesses appear less surpris'd at the noble presence of the famous Alaric, and he upon the sight of Theodolinda, felt a kind of pleasing disturbance in his heart, to which he had never been accusom'd before, but whether it were that he were desirous to recompense himself, or that he thought he was oblig'd to address himself in the first place to Placidia, to whom the success of his Arms had been most fatal, to her it was that with a Majesty mingled with submission, he thus began. Great Princess, said he, Alaric had appeared before you with less terror, and Rome had still enjoyed her native freedom, had Honorius observed those agreements to which he had so solemnly sworn. But since he would bring a war into the very bowels of his Empire, I have been constrained to assail a City, which you so powerfully defended against me. However Madam, we shall always make a difference between what you have aïed against us, and the rest injuries that we have received from our Enemies, and we shall look with more admiration upon the honour which we have obtained by your means, than with resentment upon the losses which you have caus'd us to sustain.

Sir, answered she, tis not for Placidia to examine the proceedings of Honorius, especially in affairs of important weight which are now maturely deliberated upon: So that if he were deceiv'd in his counsel, or otherwise thought he had reason to act as he did, I only followed the dictates of my own duty, and labouring to do that for my Relations, for my Country, and for a miserable people, which it became the Daughter of the great Theodosius to act against the enemies of his Successors. But after all that, it behoves me now to make a more exact distinction, and as before I put up my vows and prayers to Heaven for the ruine of a potent Adversary, whom I beheld arm'd to the destruction of my Country; yet to the King of the Goths I must confess my self oblig'd to render all the acknowledg'ment due to a generous Conquerour, whose chains are so light and easie.

Alaric believing that he had discharged the full of his Duty to Placidia, made no other answer than with a respectful bow; and therefore knowing as well the passion which Antalpb had for her, as out of his desire to discourse Theodolinda, he left the Prince of the Goths with the Sister of Honorius, while he address'd himself to the Princess of the Huns: to whom with a courtly air, and a countenance which he had rendered more serene, through the strength of his imagination, Madam, said he. I must confess that you are a good friend to the Romans even to the end: for in short, not to say any thing of what you have done for them by shutting up your self in their City, during the inconveniences of a long Siege: I very well see that you only stay in Italy to cause some revolution worthy of your charms, while you compel the Conquerours of a Nation so by you belov'd to wear your fetters.

My Master, who listened with an extraordinary attention, hearing those last words, seem'd to be very much disturbed, insomuch that he could not forbear from coming to the King of the Goths. Thereupon Theodolinda, who already had a kindness for him, sometimes would cast her eyes upon his countenance, and perceiving the trouble that was easie to be observ'd therein, she was sensible thereof, and taking care to revive the heart of her illustrious Lover, to whom she thought her self oblig'd for so many real kindnesses: Sir, answered she very obligingly to the King of the Goths, were I so formidable as to cause the revolution which you speak of: however, you would be very secure for all me; for besides that, my humour does not lead me to make such eminent disturbances, I would not give Wallia, to whom I am so infinitely oblig'd, any just reason to accuse me for obtaining victories which I ought not to do, since perhaps he may be somewhat concern'd at the conquest.

My Master had been overjoyed at the answer, could he have apprehended all the fence: but he was so little inclinable to put favourable interpretations upon what concern'd his affection, that he was but in part satisfied. On the other side, Alaric presently understood the force of the words: both in regard that Antalpb had already given him an inkling of Wallia's passion, as also for that he perceiv'd him so much concern'd for Theodolinda's affairs. So that all of a sudden, perceiving an inward disturbance which was not usual, he resolv'd to withdraw himself out of an entertainment that began to be little to the purpose, but very perplexing; away therefore went he, and taking Wallia along with him; and no sooner was he return'd to his Quarters, but he call'd my Master into his Closet: at first he beheld him very earnestly, and changing colour, but then with an aspect that betrayed the disquiet of his mind, Prince, said he, you never told me that Theodolinda was the fairest person in the world. Those words very much troubled my Master, but recovering himself, Sir, said he, if I found not the Princess of the Huns so charming as she seem'd to be to you, it was not for me to speak contrary to my thoughts: but if she were as fair as your Majesty affirms, I did not think it convenient to make such a report, which might involve you in a dangerous piece of curiosity. "Either I am very much deceiv'd, replied Alaric, or you have had some experience of the jeopardy; but that which is dangerous for Wallia, is not so for Alaric: for you know that I may have reason to hope, where you cannot think your wishes should be entertained. The Prince of the Huns does not so disdain an alliance with me, to refuse me the enjoyment of Theodolinda, if I desire it: for if the Conquerour of Rome send him Embassadors upon so acceptable a proposition, the fair Princess will not put me to the expence of many sighs, to court her to be Queen of the Goths. "She deserves to be Queen of all the world, sadly replied Wallia: but, Sir, would you be beholding to an Embassy only for Theodolinda? Think you a Princess so charming as she deserves no more pains, whose heart is not to surrender to reasons of State, but to the constancy of her Lovers services? "She is more than worthy, replied the King, and therefore instead of acting upon this occasion like persons of my Rank, I declare to you, that I am resolv'd to apply my self wholly to the service of Theodolinda. Thus I thought good out of the friendship which I still preserve for you, to speak to you in this manner on purpose to divert you from pursuing any design opposite to my intentions. In short, I would have you know that I shall find all the likelyhoods and assistances imaginable to my pretences, where Wallia will meet with nothing but obstacles, and that therefore it will be a vanity for him to continue obstinately the Rival of Alaric; but that rather he should endeavour “deavour to overcome a passion the happy success whercof is so improbable. While he spake in that manner, he generously embrac'd my Master, and pursuing his discourse in a most obliging manner, “Cousin, said he, 'tis only in favour of a Prince that loves you, that you are desired to put these constraints upon your self which Alaric demands, and that if you win the victory which I expect from the greatness of your courage, I shall be more engaged to you for that, than for all those others for which I am so much obliged to your valour. In all Battels and Sieges you have fought for Wallia as well as for Alaric: you have won honour by these actions that have been advantageous to me, and then your enemies were neither persons by you belov'd, nor formidable: but now you must quarrel with Wallia himself, you must carry the war into his heart, you must drive out thence what you take the greatest pleasure to harbour there; and your Generosity acting only within your self, and without any noise or affectation of fame, instead of those exclamations which you would have heard from Nations and Armies you will receive for the noblest of all your actions, only the reward of a secret satisfaction for having been able to perform it.

While he spake in this manner, he took notice that Wallia appeared very exceedingly troubled, and scarce in a condition to return him an answer, so that to master altogether a heart which he saw began to waver, he pursued his argument; “Besides the satisfaction, said he, that you will have in your self, what may you not expect from a Prince that never was ingratul, and how can you better free your self from the strangest disturbance that ever was: For to tell you plainly, I love Theodolinda. “Ah, Sir, replied Wallia with a pensive aspect, I know it too well for my repose: and I see too apparently that I am the most unfortunate of men. Alas, pursued he sighing, was it not enough that I was born to love the Daughter of a great King, without being born to reign, but must I be immediately crossed by the Competitorship of an Emperour, and meet a Rival in the person of my King? But what King, modestly replied Alaric, he is not such an one as your affection would make him appear to be: for, Prince, I can assure you that for your sake he has contended with the passion which he feels for the Princess of the Huns, and that he is resolv'd still to withstand it, though with little hope of victory, so that though you are not in a condition to supply a place which he would freely surrender into your possession: strive you on your part, added he, and we will shortly give you an account of the progress we our selves have made in so just an enterprise.

Concluding these words, he went forth, and my Master remained so exceedingly perplexed, that he knew not whether it were best to follow Alaric, whether he were best to return him thanks, or whether he ought to complain of a procedure which he found so obliging, at a time when he perceiv'd that he could not have that acknowledgment which it behoved him to shew. However, he went to his Apartment to argue with himself whether it were possible to be complacent to Alaric's persuasions. But after many various reflections, after many unprofitable sighs, and extraordinary disturbances, Theodolinda was still Mistress of his heart, and he was so far from being willing to break those chains with which that charming Princess had fettered him, that he only found that he had not so much as the power to think of any such thing: neither could he forbear to visit that incomparable person; so that Alaric coming in a little while after, blush'd so soon as he perceiv'd Wallia, and Wallia for his part turn'd away his eyes, and cast them upon Theodolinda's face, as it were to shew the King a fair excuse for those faults which he was constrained to commit. They both presently saw that they should be a mutual hinderance to each other, in their intentions to entertain Theodolinda alone: and therefore Alaric instead of standing upon his Dignity, considering that Wallia's engagement was before his, and that a Prince whom he infinitely esteem'd, had reason to bewail the small hopes of success in his affection, departed first out of the Room, and by that obliging act as it were violently pulled away the enamour'd Wallia from out of the charming Princess's presence. However, Autalpb staid with Placidia, Sigeric applyed himself to the Princess of the Huns; and Attalus, as diligent as he was to keep near the person of the King, now staid with Cleomira.

The King of the Goths was no sooner return'd to his Palace, but taking my Master aside, and stedfastly beholding him; Prince, said he, have you followed my advice to good purpose? Have you yet forgotten Theodolinda? In short, what can you tell me in reference to those things which so much concern us? That the great Alaric, answered my Master, is the most generous that ever was; and that Wallia is the most in love of any person in the world; for having done what I can, I am obliged after all, Sir, added he, sighing, to confess to your Majesty that I am so far from being able to vanquish my passion, that I was never able to contend with it in the least. “But, Prince, replied Alaric, what hopes have you? How will you order “your affairs in such a nice occurrence as this, or how will you divide Wallia between Theodolinda and Alaric? The King of the Goths, replied my Master, shall have my Arm wholly devoted to his service, and the Princess of the Huns shall enjoy my heart, where she shall be adored to the last gasp of my breath.

Upon these words the King seemed to be prepossessed with a thought that wholly took up his mind, so that after he had studied a while; “Well then Prince, added he of a sudden, let us even take our chances, let us both love Theodolinda since heaven has so resolved it, I will neither put a constraint either upon your intentions or my own: and I promise you withal not to make use of any advantage, which I may expect from my Royal dignity. I do not find my self altogether destitute of endowments, fit to purchase an illustrious heart, and I question not to be able to assail Theodolinda, notwithstanding the corivalship of a young Prince, though of so fair a reputation and so great a merit. He had no sooner concluded these words, but he turn’d toward a company of Courtiers, who were retir’d out of respect, and Wallia instead of making any answer, sigh’d to see himself overcome by generosity, having no other comfort but the pleasure of knowing that his love was greater than his Rivals, and that he had given visible testimonies thereof.

At the same time that those two renowned lovers prepared to contend for the enjoyment of Theodolinda, yet without any injury one to another we departed from Rome, whereof Attalus as it is well known was made Governour: For how noble soever the employment were, the generous Alaric durst not bestow it upon Wallia, to whom he had already offer’d it, that he might not seem to offer but an envenomed potion, while he separated him from Theodolinda. As for Autalpb, he rather chose to follow the Sister of Honorius whom we carried along with us, than to command in Italy. And Sigeric also, though no person could ever tell the reason, refused that honour which he had well deserved by his famous exploit, and which would not have been bestowed upon him, but in regard of his birth. While those things were a doing, the Goths who were in pay earnestly sought the protection of the Princess of the Royal Family, to the end that by their favour they might obtain the employments to which they aspired. To that purpose they would not lose so fair an opportunity to fix themselves, minding nothing else but to get rewards and recompences, before they left a Country where it was not difficult to find satisfaction. The Army was march’d toward Calabria, the government whereof was given to me at Wallia’s request, and that of Capua was in a manner promised to a Soldier of fortune, who was named Autharic, whose interests Prince Sigeric most ardently supported. He had also several private conferences with him, the meaning whereof we could not presently discover, though we were no sooner arrived at Constance, but there happened strange Revolutions as you shall understand.

Hilderic had proceeded thus far in the history of Wallia’s life, when the King of the Tongres came to consult with Balamir, what he had to do as well in the Camp of the Cimbrians before he departed thence, as also in the Army of the Franks when he came thither. They presently agreed that Taxander should visit those two Princes, whose interest had been most prevalent with Rosamond, to gain that leave which he had obtained: And Balamir not only thought it convenient, to let him have a convoy proportionable to his dignity, but also to send Telanor after him, to carry along with him the Cimbrian prisoner, which Pharamond had demanded from the King of the Basternes. For that reason he called his faithful Squire so soon as Taxander was gone, and as he was about to instruct him what he should say from him to the King of the Franks, he observed an extraordinary melancholy in his eyes, whatever the other could do to conceal it. Balamir who had an extraordinary kindness for him, seeing him surpris’d and compassionately sad, desired to know the cause thereof: When Telanor sighing, Ab Sir, said he, would to heaven I were not obliged to satisfy your curiosity in that particular, and that the news which I expect, may not prove answerable to the news which I have received. Now Sir, I beseech you ask me no farther, to clear a thing which I know no more of my self, and for your own quiet sake, never meet a misfortune which it may be will never happen.

Though those words had in some measure moderated Balamir’s desire of a more exact information, yet could they not have hindred him from being eager, to know at least what Telanor already understood, had he not observed in his countenance an unwillingness to explain himself, which was the reason that he only spoke to him about such affairs, as he had to do in the Camp of the Franks: and presently sent him away perceiving Ambiomer coming into the Chamber. It was a particular design that led him thither that morning, beside the pleasure which that famous Gaul took in the company of a person whose virtue he so highly revered: For, said he to Balamir, You know Sir, that the fairest lips in the world have commanded you to visit that learned Greek, that came yesterday to the Camp together with Martian. And the uncertainty of my own birth having bred in me a curiosity so great, that I should not have a greater, but only to know the story of your noble adventures, obliges me to visit Theon as well as the illustrious Balamir. Nor shall I have any reason to complain of the command I have received: For if in the visit we shall make both together, I bear my own life threatened with accidents that I have reason to be afraid of; this will be my comfort when Balamir shall be promis'd all the happiness that his merit can be recompens'd withal: "Alas to this hour, replied the Prince, I never saw that I had the least ground to expect a fortunate destiny, for excepting "only some few actions, the success whereof has not been altogether contrary to my hopes, "You know how I have in other things been persecuted all along by fortune: So that I have "as little reason to hope well as the valiant Ambiomer, and were I not assur'd but that I am "Son to the King of the Huns, I know no cause that I have to visit Theon with more confidence, than you may have in his predictions.

They went forth continuing all the way this discourse, and calling upon Martian whose virtue was at that time no less famous in the Cimbrian Camp; than in the Court of Theodosius, they went into the Chamber of that renowned lover of Pulcheria, where they heard of the advance of the Emperours forces toward Cologne. Balamir then told him, in few words, that to satisfy the curiosity of the Princesses, he had a design together with Ambiomer to visit the learned Theon without making himself known, to the end he might hear what that great person could say, after he had punctually observed the Lineaments of their faces.

Martian believing that desire of theirs not to be ill grounded, carried those two famous Soldiers to Theon's Apartment, concluding that Ambiomer should lead the way, to the end the old man might be the more easily deceived, when he gave his judgment upon their natiivities. Most learned Theon, (said he presenting to him Ambiomer and Balamir) your reputation has brought hither two noble Knights, who being every moment to encounter great dangers, and to travel in the chase of honour, fain would understand what they have to fear or hope.

Theon had no sooner cast his eyes upon Ambiomer, but he seem'd to be surpris'd at the noble haughtiness of the Gaul, and the Grandeur of that air that appear'd in his behaviour, and the whole composure of his countenance. But no sooner had he turn'd his looks upon illustrious Balamir, when an astonishment more than ordinary seiz'd him. He fix'd his eyes with delight, to consider the sweet Majesty and brisk vivacity, that spread it self over the whole person of that young Prince, and having attentively observ'd the lineaments of his face, and as earnestly beheld Ambiomer's; Either all the rules of my art are false, cryed he strangely moved and addressing his speech to Martian, or those two great Princes whom you call Knights, are worthy the Crowns which they are one day to wear. Balamir listned to his words with astonishment, and Ambiomer who found them conformable to the generousness of his thoughts and inclinations, could not withstand a secret motion of hope, that leap'd in his heart, ere his prudence could suppress it.

On the other side, the learned Greek found himself insensibly engaged, to behold the two young Soldiers more exactly, which he did while Martian went to speak to Varanez, concerning some affairs in reference to the Army. After he had examin'd all the lineaments that serv'd to fortifie his knowledge; I do not believe, said he, that there are any two persons under heaven, between whom there is that agreement in their fortunes: For in short not to tell you, that you are the most valiant among the most valiant persons in the world, and that you are passionately in love, I dare assure you that notwithstanding your potent Rivals, that the one will not be less happy than the other in reference to your Amours, than you have both been hitherto prosperous in the pursuit of honour.

At those words Balamir and Ambiomer both sigh'd, and Theon believing that they gave little credit to his words; I fear, pursued he, that you take my prediction for one of those general conjectures, that may be made upon your age and your noble affects: But if I tell you what has already happened of most importance, you will then believe it may be, that the secret of future events is not altogether clos'd from me, since with less trouble I sometimes discover to the knowledge of men, the most hidden of their past adventures. And in short to begin with the first accidents of your lives, I must tell you that your births have been both a long time concealed. "I must confess, replied the Prince pointing to Ambiomer, that this noble Knight is not well satisfied "of his own to this day. But learned Theon, that very particular which you would have "me apply to my self, confirms me in my former opinion, that it is not for the unfortunate Balamir to flatter himself, with those hopes which you would persuade him to conceive.

At the name of Balamir whom a thousand victories had rendred famous through all the World, the old man appeared of a sudden surpris'd, and full of contemplation: But at length with all the respect imaginably due to the Prince, Sir, answered he, if it be true that you are Balamir, then must Theon renounce his heart as a vain amusement and a meer cheat: seeing that setting aside that remarkable valour, all those other things that I find in your face, appear to me quite contrary to what I have heard of the great Balamir: That Prince was not born till after Mundific; and according to the best of my skill you can have no brother: besides it is reported, that Balamir has lost the most incomparable Princess of the Goths, and I am strongly persuaded, that no accident nor no power in the world can deprive you of that which once you loved. And after all Sir, I do not find that nature has given you a heart capable of inconstancy. Yet I know that Balamir is reckon'd in the number of these illustrious slaves, that wear the chains of Rosamond with so much honour.

Though the Prince of the Huns did not perceive his curiosity fully satisfied with the old mans words, yet he forbore not to return a most obliging answer: I wish it had pleased heaven, said he, that Mundific and death had not so surely ravish'd from me the fair and unfortunate Hunnimonda, as it is certain that I am Balamir, and that I have an affection for the Queen of the Cimbrians, which I shall preserve to the end of my life. I cannot tell, replied the learned Stranger, whether you do not talk in this manner to puzzle me, but if what you say be true, then I must agree that all the knowledge which my Art affords me is very uncertain, and that I should not dare to tell your friend that he was born a Prince, though I see marks thereof that pass infallible among those of my profession.

Ambiomer had reason to be well satisfied with those last words, yet out of the effect of his moderation, he was so far from continuing a discourse so pleasing to his fancy, that he himself altered the subject thereof, and insensibly oblig'd Theon to talk of the principal Courts which he had seen, since his departure from Alexandria. The Greek acquitted himself like an experienced person, and having judiciously displayed the several interests of those persons which he had known, Balamir and Ambiomer took their leaves of him, with a greater esteem for his worth, than inclination to believe what he had related, concerning the condition of their fortune.

The generous Prince being gone, it was easie for him to conceive an advantageous opinion of Ambiomer's birth, nor did he fail to repeat all that Theon had said in favour of that noble Knight. The report thereof was presently spread abroad, and it caused no small joy in an Army where Ambiomer had given so many proofs of his valour. The famous unknown person for his part, neither contributed to the confirmation or denial of the report, but keeping himself within the true bounds of moderation, he was contented only to shew himself obliging to those persons, who earnestly wished that Ambiorix were come to establish Theon's opinion. In the mean time it being late enough in the morning, to go to the Castle and visit the Princesses, Balamir, Varanez, and Martian went to Rosamond's Apartment, and Ambiomer to the Queen of the Turingiens. Amalazontha who already knew what had been made publick to his honour, believ'd him to be put up with Theon's words, and that he was come only to entertain her with the discourse of a passion the testimonies whereof she could not endure to hear, so strangely was the prepossessed with a respect for the King of the Franks: And therefore she seem'd to be troubled, and beginning a discourse according to her own design, she spake very little of Theon, and that very slightly. Whereupon though the dispute of that learned man, had made no impression in the mind of Ambiomer, yet the fiery Gaul was not a little displeas'd at Amalazontha's behaviour. He immediately summon'd into his memory all the causes of complaint that he could think upon, and being dispos'd to shake off the severe yolk of a disobliging Princess, whom he had but too religiously ador'd, He went to find out the Sister of Agelmond, there to meet with that sweetness, which he observ'd no longer in the Turingien Queen.

He was no sooner entred into Agione's Chamber, but the amiable Prince's presently rising up, "Generous Ambiomer, said she, how overjoyed was I to understand, that the skill "of a great personage not accus'd to be deceived, proves so conformable to your actions, "and the universal belief of the Camp. For my part I am very easily perswaded, that "your birth is such as it is reported to be: And though I were not prepossessed with Theon's "Art, yet should I be always so much in favour of Ambiomer's merit, as never to believe "otherwise, than that so famous a Soldier could never be born, but of an illustrious extraction.

Those words entirely subdued Ambiomer's liberty, for the enamour'd Knight charm'd and embolden'd to see himself so obligingly us'd by a young Princess, whose heart he knew was not yet engag'd, of a sudden followed the incitements of his own exalted Soul, that could inspire nothing but what was great upon what occasion soever. Then he beheld

Agione with a passionate aspect, and notwithstanding the fierceness of his courage, looking down upon the ground out of respect; Would to God Madam, cryed he, that one day I might wear the Crown that Heaven makes me hope for: But divine Princess, added he immediately with a sigh, I should wish also that you would not be offended, if I put my Scepter at the same time into your hands, and that I could presume also to demand in exchange those Fetters, which I should be contented to wear as long as I live.

He had no sooner concluded these words, but the amiable Sister of Agelmond seemed to be surpris'd and blush'd, and making a reflection upon a discourse which she had drawn upon her self; "Ah Ambiomer, replied she with a disdain which the enamour'd Knight observed, "it did not become you to abuse Agione's ingenuity, nor ought those thoughts of esteem which I had for you, give you the encouragement to offend me.

These words pass'd between them when the King of the Lombards entred into the Chamber, and notwithstanding the melancholy of his heart, taking notice of the discomposure in Agione's countenance, and Ambiomer's looks, "Sister, said he, I do not think I am deceiv'd, when I believe that this illustrious Knight, has the same thoughts of kindness which before he had for Amalazontha, to the great advantage of the Turingiens. You know that his passion was approv'd by an understanding and grateful Prince, and I hope instead of following Amalazontha's example, that you love the Lombards too well, to refuse them a King which I would chuse for them, since I shall never be in a condition my self either to rule my people, or command my Armies. There is a necessity for a famous Soldier to govern a warlike Nation, and those disorders which you saw the desire of Rule excited, when I was at Tamyraque, teach me that the fierceness of the Lombards, will never submit to a person that does not appear among them, with some extraordinary mark of superiority. 'Tis also better for them to let them have a Stranger for their Sovereign, to stifle that emulation the consequences whereof may prove dangerous, by dividing those families that may pretend to the Supreme power. Ah Sir what is it you say, (replied the amiable Princess, letting fall certain tears from her fair eyes?) That which I have resolv'd upon, replied Agelmond, and what you shall see me put in execution in a few days. I beseech you answered she, change a thought that bodes to me nothing but what is fatal, and if I must purchase you the friendship of Ambiomer, if he will be contented only with Agione's affection, I will freely give him my hand since you command it. But after all that, I would rather chuse a private wedlock than to be a Queen, if I can obtain that dignity by no other means, than by the resignation of a brother whom I love beyond my life. How Sir, pursued Ambiomer with an utterance, that testified both his wonder and acknowledgment, could you abandon a Nation that submits to your laws with so much obedience? No no, Sir, you ought not to deprive them of a King, than whom there is no Prince more worthy to supply that potent Throne. Surely if Fate would afford me the opportunities to be your Comforter, while you remain oppress'd with those sorrows that have seiz'd your heart, I should never be so happy as in serving a great King, and in adoring a great Princess whom it is infinitely above my hopes ever to enjoy.

This noble and generous dispute had not ended so, had not the Princess of the Lombards been sent for by Rosamond and Albisinda, to the Queen of the Turingiens Apartment, where all the Princesses dined that day.

The End of the Third Book of the Tenth Part:

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

THe King of the Lombards had conceived an esteem so extraordinary for Ambiorer, that detaining him in the Princesses Chamber, he discovered to him his whole mind, and obstinately resolv'd to render him happy, notwithstanding the modest excuses which the generous Knight made. On the other side, Balamir, Varanez, and Martian, descended from the Castle and they were no sooner come into the Borough but Balamir retired to his quarters, believing that by that time Taxander would have visited the King of Suevia, and those other persons of quality of whom he had design'd to take his leave, before he departed from the Cimbrian Camp.

There he found that by Telamir's care, Giler, the King of the Basternes prisoner was already dispatched away, and that there was a Convoy ready, who only expected orders to attend the King of the Tongres, who was no sooner return'd to the Prince of the Huns, but he presently prepared to be gone: when Balamir observing the gayety of his countenance; How fortunate is your lot, said he sighing, you love a fair Princess and you are going to see her: You love her and you are going to be received by her, with all the marks of a tender affection, which you can possibly expect from a person that you hope to enjoy. Alas how different is the unfortunate Balamir's destiny, from that of the King of the Tongres! I never loved Hunnimonda as it fell out, but to see her ravished from me by a Brother, by a marriage and by death: and if I wear the Queen of the Cimbrians chains, I do not find in my heart that I was ever born for that divine Princess, but she has also told me with her own lips, that she can never agree to grant me that precious reward, that has been promised to so many Kings that fight for the prize: So that if I were a Rival formidable to Pharamond, I would willingly out of a sence of acknowledgment, that he should understand all the particulars which I have told you. I shall only speak of them to himself, reply'd Taxander, and I am very confident he will more joyfully receive the news hereof, than of the total defeat of his Enemies. "I will go a little farther, reply'd the Prince of the "Huns, for I must confess I should be glad to see the famous King of the Franks, if many "weighty considerations, did not hinder me from going to his Camp. "Let me alone to "procure the interview, pursued Taxander, and I'll promise you to return to morrow "merely upon that occasion, whatever kindness I have for my lovely Adelziada, nay though "the return of Godegesile to this place, should disengage me of the promise I have made. The two Princes then embracing with all the marks of esteem and real affection, Taxander departed from Balamir, to return whither his love called him.

Not long after, an ancient grave person of a comly presence came to the Prince of the Huns, and making himself known to be Ambiorix, he was receiv'd by the Prince with all the testimonies of sincerity with which Balamir was wont to gain hearts: Sir, said he, in regard I could not see Ambiorer, who, as they told me, was gone to walk upon the Banks of the Rhine with the King of the Lombards upon a very serious conference. I thought fit to address my self to the famous General of the Cimbrians, to put into his hands that which may be of advantage for the knowledge of a Soldier whom I bred up; to be afterwards presented to Rosamond, to whom I am come to discover a secret worthy of some consideration. What, said the Prince of the Huns, interrupting him, was the valiant Ambiorer born in Bohemia? He was born there. or I am deceiv'd, replied the old man. If that be true, said Balamir, interrupting him again, let us not delay to give the Queen that satisfaction, which she will most certainly receive upon such acceptable tydings. "She shall know the whole truth, replied Ambiorix, when you think it convenient for us to go up to the Castle, where I am told she is lodged. "Rather, answered the Prince, so soon as you have well rested your self after your journey. I travelled such short journeys, replied the Gaul, that I have no need of repose.

Concluding those words, he called one of his Attendants to him, and took a little Cabinet out of his hands, which he presented to Balamir. The Prince having ordered it to be carefully looked to, he went with Ambiorix to the Queen of the Bohemians Apartment, who no sooner understood the cause of their coming, but she was extremely joyed, and most civilly welcomed the Stranger. She testified a world of impatience to be satisfied in an Adventure, the truth whereof she had so long desired to understand, to which purpose she carried Ambiorix into her Closet; where the Gaul having recovered himself out of that surprize which the surpassing Beauty of Rosamond usually produc'd, began his short Relation, addressing himself as follows to the Queen.

The History of Ambiorix.

MADAM, I shall be very careful to cut off from my discourse all particulars which are not absolutely necessary for the information which you desire. For in short, Madam, I know that we are not to abuse the precious leisure of persons of your Quality. Therefore, Madam, to speak to your Majesty as succinctly as may be, give me leave to tell you, that I am a Gaul born in Belgia, of a Family sufficiently noble, and that the first time I bore Arms was at the famous Battel which the great Theodosius gained against Eugenius and Arbogastus. After the defeat of those two men, the Gauls enjoyed a most pleasing tranquillity, so that I being neither of an age or humour to live at peace in my own Country, went to seek employment in the Wars as far as Pannonia, where the Huns every day enlarged those Conquests which have rendered them so formidable to the best part of Europe. To that purpose I marched toward the Rhine, whither I came in few days, stopping no where but in such Towns where there was something remarkable to be seen. Passing the River I entred Germany, I saw the Country of the Marcomans, and crossing the Hermanns I came into Bohemia, where I understood the little Prince Theobald was newly born, and that there were magnificent preparations in hand to solemnize his Birth. Three days after the Solemnities began, I parted from Marobudus, and passed the great Mountains with which your Majesty's Dominions are environed, and descended directly into Celemanzia. No sooner was I come there, but that I understood that the King of the Huns was making great preparations to invade the higher Mætia, at the head of four and twenty thousand men, and that the Queen his Consort should suddenly follow him, though she had been but a little before delivered of Balamir, and found some inconvenience in it. Presently I advanced toward the Danow, and having crossed it at the City of Comagenes, I listed my self among the Troops that were raising in Pannonia, which were ordered to the Frontiers of Dacia, near the great Meurse where the King had commanded the Rendezvous to be, and to take a general view of the Army. As for my own part, in regard I had been a Soldier already, and that my Equipage was remarkable, I was soon taken notice of, and presented to the King in a great plain where we encamped, between Sirminum and the two Meurses.

But in the interim there came news from Pannonia that overthrew all the King's designs and compelled him to return in haste to the succour of three or four Countries which Fire and Sword had already laid waste in several parts. For forty thousand Histrians having passed the Julian Alpes, and being joyned with thirty thousand Japodes, had ravaged all that part of the Country which extends it self from their Territories to the Dravus. That invasion struck such a terrour into all Pannonia, that those persons to whom the education of the Princes Mundisic and Balamir was omitted, minded nothing else but to flee for refuge into Climates far remote from the seat of the war, and thought it also convenient to separate themselves for fear some one single accident might overturn the double hopes both of the people and the Royal Family. So that they carried them both at a great distance beyond the Danow; and as they chose for Mundisic the Capital City of the Terracians, they secured the young Balamir in the City of Singone in the Territories of the Quadians. In the mean time the King of the Huns, to the end he might not utterly give over his Conquests in Mæsia, left some part of his Army in Garrisons in such places as he had taken; and marched for Pannonia with the rest of his Forces, hoping to reinforce them in his march, as also that the King your Father would send him other assistance. But he was hardly arrived among the Cibaliens, when he understood that all Bohemia was up in Arms, and that the Narissquians having passed the Hercinian Mountains, were got into the great Province of the Turiocherians, and had cut in pieces thirty thousand Cimbrians who oppos'd their march. The report ran also that the Bohemians had taken the same care for the preservation of young Theobald, as the Huns had done to preserve Mundisic and Balamir; and that the King your Father had sent the Infant Prince into the Country of the Quadians under the tuition of a person in whom he had an entire confidence. We understood this last particular by reason that Theobald's Governour went to live at Rbobodun, a City not far distant from Singone, where, as I have already told you, Balamir was secured: and from whence you may well conjecture that we often received news of our Army. The King of the Huns was not a little discontented to see himself disappointed of the Succours which he expected; yet was so far from discovering to his Army any sign of his trouble, that he marched furiously toward his Enemies, and set upon them in their Trenches before Rogonda, which they had vigorously besieged for above a month before. The Huns however, maugre the stout resistance of the Enemy, encouraged by the presence of their King, entered their Trenches, and raising the Siege with great loss to the Histrians, who thereupon finding themselves separated from their own Country by the Alpes, sent to make some propositions of peace, and obliged the Japodes to enter into a Treaty for a general accommodation. While the Commissioners treated upon this important affair, it was agreed that the two Enemies should remove at a distance the one from the other, and that the Huns should march toward the Danow, while the Histrians and Japodes retreated toward the Mountain Ocra. The King of the Huns also for the more commodious subsistence of his Army, thought fit to divide it, and to send one part beyond the River into the Province of the Quadians. I was in that Body that marched out of Pannonia, and we had not remained long in our Quarters, when the news came that the Belgians and Menapians were at war with the Morins and the Tongres upon certain claims which they laid to some part of each other's Territories. That news being confirm'd in a few days, I resolv'd to quit the Strangers who were making peace, and to hasten to the relief of my own Country, which Marsiliandus Father of Taxander now King of the Tongrians threaten'd to invade. I march'd with all speed, glad in my mind, that I was returning into my native soil, when crossing a wood I saw there the fresh marks of a Combat which had been lately fought: for besides the blood wherewith the Grass had been stained in several places, I saw five or six Horsemen that lay stretched upon the ground dangerously wounded: one of them was dead, the rest gasping for life, and not one of them that could inform me what I question'd to know. Thereupon I looked about every where to try what discovery I could make; and taking notice of an Osier that grew some two paces from the high way, I observ'd that it shook, though there were no wind stirring, which made me earnestly desire what the meaning thereof should be: thereupon having removed with my Lance those Boughs that hindered my sight, I perceived a lovely infant, who no sooner beheld the glittering of the end of the weapon which I held forth, but he began to play with it with his little hands, and smiled in my face: I was charm'd both with the behaviour and countenance of the child, and for fear he should hurt himself, I presently sent one of my Attendants to take care of him: being alighted, I ran to the lovely innocent, I took him in my Arms, and kissed him. He was pleas'd with my Careffes, which without doubt I had longer continued, but that at the same time one of my men shew'd me a Knight, who being less wounded than the rest, gave me some hopes of better information. I went to that unknown person, and I had no sooner enquired his Country and whose the child was, but instead of returning an answer, he made me a sign to take up a little Cabinet that lay close by him, signifying to me that I should there find the full discovery of all that I looked for. But, added I, to whom must I restore what I have here by providence, found in a Country where I know no person living. To Briomer, said he in short, But, said I presently perceiving his strength begin to fail him, can you not tell me who that Briomer is, or where I may meet with him? He strove to have returned me an answer, but being stifled with his blood he dyed, not being able to speak a word more.

The fair Queen seem'd surpris'd at that part of the old mans relation, and as little satisfied in reference to Ambiomer, however not willing to interrupt him, she suffer'd him to proceed.

I made

I made no question, pursued Ambiorix, but that Briomer, whose name they had told me, had been the Father to whom I was to make an acceptable restitution, So that being desirous to restore him a Son, the loss of whom I could not but think was a great grief to him, I enquired after him in several places round about, and went to several Neighbouring Cities to hear news of him: but all my care was fruitless, no person could tell who that Briomer was; nor did I see any thing in the Cabinet that could give me any light. True it was, that by the Riches and Magnificence which I found there, I readily conjectured that the wealth of the person whom I sought was vast, but he I was perplexed to consider that an infant was deprived of it all by such an effect of his evil fortune. I was mov'd by that reflection which I made upon his misfortune; and in regard the affection which I had for him every day increased, as also for that I never had any inclination to marry, I resolv'd to adopt that Son which Heaven had as it were given me for a present, and to apply my self to give him an education so noble, that he might not look upon me hereafter as the author of a second misfortune. Thereupon I gave him the name of Ambiomer, compos'd of my own and his supposed real Father's name; I sent for women also to take care of him, and travelled easily; for fear of injuring his health. As soon as I came into Gallia, I sent the little Ambiomer, to the City of the Parisians to be educated there, and I went my self to the Army where I was not a little respected. At that time the war of Hungary began to be so famous over all Europe, that the Belgians were of opinion that I must have learn'd an art which I had practis'd in those Armies so famous for their victories, insomuch that they made new Levies, of which they gave me the command, where I laboured by my actions to uphold the repute which they conceived of my abilities. We fought a long time with various success, and that equality of force and fortune made us so obstinate, that it was impossible for our Neighbours to compose our differences, though they often offered us their mediation. Then it was that the young Ambiomer, in whom I had observed several good omens of his valour, having but just accomplished the exercises of his youth, conjured me by several Letters to send for him, and to permit him to expose for my sake a life the preservation whereof he owed to me: I could not refuse his generous suit, I sent for Ambiomer, and I found his proportion so rare, his aspect so noble, that his goodly presence confirm'd me more in the true opinion which I had before of his extraction, than all his swathing Cloaths of Cloth of Gold which I preserv'd; or the little Box enriched with large Diamonds which I found in the Cabinet that I have mentioned. But, Madam, how did my esteem and affection encrease, when he was permitted to seek out opportunities to signalize that great courage wherewith nature had endowed him. He would be in all parties; they never went far enough to answer his courage; and though by reason of his years he had at first no command, yet he would still act as chief in all Encounters where disorder hindered the Soldiers from obeying their Leaders. In short, he rallyed, sustain'd, encouraged, led back to the charge, and what was more wonderful he never return'd but Victor, and never without giving all the honour to his Commander. Such a generous carriage joyned to his extraordinary valour, so charm'd the Belgians, that they looked upon Ambiomer as a person sent from Heaven, and that general affection grounded upon his great merit, soon rais'd that famous Soldier to the supreme command. Then being able to put in practice his military virtue with greater splendour, he always design'd enterprizes conformable to his new Dignity; and having carried the terrour of our Arms beyond the Rhine, he compelled our enemies to beg for peace upon terms very disadvantageous to themselves. I recalled him then, that he might taste the fruits of so much labour; and at his return the Sovereign Magistrate of Cesorumage, who was the chiefest in quality among the Belgians, decreed him high honours, and assign'd him large pensions in those Territories where he presided. Ambiomer failed not to go see him, and to testify his acknowledgment, and was receiv'd by him with an aspect and behaviour more obliging than all the kindneses which he had receiv'd at his hands. At that time Codrusus, for so was the Belgian called, was at a pleasant House which he had built in the Country of the Ambianians, together with his Family, there he entertained Ambiomer with all the demonstrations of friendship, and all the Divertisements which a lovely Country that was environed with three or four fair Cities could afford. In several marches also which he made, he engaged several Knights of the most considerable Quality in the Country; and on the other side his wife drew together all the handsome Ladies that liv'd in those parts. But how courtly soever that assembly was, Codrusus had the principal ornament in his own House, for the amiable Virione his only Daughter surpassed all the rest; none of the other Belgian Ladies presuming to contest with her for precedency of Beauty. The charming Virgin was about sixteen years of age, her proportion was tall, and free, her hair of a dark white, her eyes blew, and equally dis-stanc'd, and in her complection was to be seen that lively freshness, that usually accompanies youth. Virione, such as I have described her in few words, had already caused as many persons to sigh for her, as there were lovers fit for her in our Country: And I may safely say that the bounds of our Gallia, did not limit the bounds of her charms. She had extend'd her conquests beyond the Rhine, for the young Vindoristus King of the Bructeres almost dyed for love of her near the River Amisia: while she remained insensible of a passion that procured pity from the most severe and cruel. But if the Chains which a person of his quality wore in Germany were so apparent, how were Belgians that wore theirs undiscovered, and Virione who perceived them not, remain'd expos'd to their contrivances. One of these secret lovers named Terambaud, came with several Others of his friends to Codrufus's house, while Ambiomer stay'd there, and while the Magistrates friends thought upon nothing else, but how to invent new diversifements every day, Terambaud only watch'd an opportunity to execute a design which he had laid a long time before.

A hunting match furnish'd him with as fair an advantage as he could desire, for with the boldest of his company keeping close with Virione, he had carried away that lovely person with little resistance, she being at a great distance in a wood, with only two of her Fathers men near her, who as it was thought had betray'd her into that remote part, and secur'd her in the place which he had chosen for his retreat, had not Ambiomer hearing her loud shrieks hasten'd to her relief. He presently flew upon the Ravishers with a most furious impetuosity, and being intermix'd among them with amazing blows, he opened a passage to Virione, who was struggling to get out of Terambaud's hands.

The Belgian no sooner perceiv'd Ambiomer coming to snatch his lovely prey from him, but transport'd with rage and seeing his party much stronger than Virione's, that came but thinly in to her assistance, he resolv'd to dispatch the most valiant of his enemies, that he might be at liberty to flee: So that he gave Virione in charge to his Esquire, and with two of his companions presenting himself before Ambiomer, Rash Stranger, cryed he, oppose not the happiness of this Country, nor cross those intentions that only serve to unite two of the most potent families in these Territories. Is it by violence, disdainfully reply'd Ambiomer, that thou thinkest to carry her away, whom it became thee to win with the utmost of thy respect and services? Instead of saying more, he was about to have flown upon Terambaud, but meeting a Knight that stood in his way, he gave him so rude a brush that he tumbled him horse and man to the ground: at which time Terambaud taking his time, with the point of his Sword drew blood of Ambiomer, when the haughty Soldier more enraged at the foul play offer'd him, than at the wound he had received; Traitor, cryed he, thinkest thou by treachery to keep what thou hast cowardly got into thy possession?

Concluding those words he flew upon Terambaud, and while he wav'd his glittering Sword before the visier of his Helmet, he strook such a fear into the Traitors heart, that Terambaud fled and forsook Virione. The lovely Maid no sooner saw her self deliver'd, but she mov'd toward her preserver in a most obliging manner, and beholding him with a pretty blush which Ambiomer attributed to her modesty, she testified her gratitude in words which she thought most proper to express her acknowledg'ment, yet such as express'd far less than her eyes. In the interim Codrufus and his wife attended by a noble and numerous Train, came to the place, and after they had given Ambiomer all the praises which were due to him, they return'd home talking all the way of an adventure, which was sufficiently surprizing to afford ample matter of discourse.

But all the company were very sorrowful when they observ'd some drops of blood upon Ambiomer's vestments, which made them oblige the young Soldier to betake himself to his bed, how unwilling soever he seem'd to be, to mind a repose which he believ'd no way necessary. The Magistrate immediately went to visit him, and after he had commended his valour, with all the expressions of an extraordinary esteem, "Generous Ambiomer, said "be, had not the command of our forces been decreed to you for the number of your conquests and victories, this last of your actions had been sufficient, to have made you worthy the supreme government of our people. I will resign for your sake, and I will cause my own choice to be approv'd so soon as you shall think it convenient, provided you are willing to take upon you, that which I would never have yielded, either to Terambaud or any other Knight in all our Provinces. For in short to tell you my thoughts, I had design'd Virione either for the Prince of the Bructeres or to our valiant General: But being very contentedly satisfied, that she is less taken with the quality of Vindoristus, than the virtue of Ambiomer, I am overjoyed that it lies in my power to unite in your person the full Authority over the Belgians, and to give my Daughter for a Wife to a person, that seems to me the most nobly endowed of all that ever I saw in my life.

Ambiomer

Ambiomer surpris'd at a discourse which he never dream'd of, made no answer at present, though the offer of a beautiful and young Virgin with a considerable sovereignty, did not a little please him: But soon after considering that he had no inclination to love, he was unwilling to abuse the generosity of Codrusus, or to pretend to the enjoyment of a charming Lady, whom he saw so worthy to receive his heart, while she surrendred her own. Besides that he had a reluctancy to ruine the pretensions of a Suitor who was already acknowledged, nor did he think that he could obstruct the good fortune of Vindoristus, without opposing Virione's happiness. And therefore that he might not injure the Prince of the Bructeres, nor shew himself ingratul to a Family, whose kindness he had so much reason to extol, Sir, said he to the Magistrate of Cesaromagum, when I relieved a lovely Virgin which the hand of violence would have ravished from you, I did you no other service than what you might have expected from the first person that found her in that distress: And therefore you had better reserve rich offers for a person already considerable in Territories, than for a Soldier of fortune like Ambiomer. I beseech you Sir, approve your self a juster Father, and instead of reducing your self to the necessity of having no other posterity, but such a one whose original is unknown, suffer the incomparable Virione to be in a condition, to bring you Princes for your Grandchildren. Codrusus charm'd with an answer so modest and generous, We know, replied he, that your extraction is very noble, and though Ambiorix had not given us sufficient Testimonies thereof, yet our thoughts and actions are such infallible proofs, that we could never have question'd it.

This discourse had doubtless longer held, but that the Magistrate was advertis'd that his friends were ready to depart, for they found it inconvenient to trouble him, when they saw him obliged to wait upon an illustrious Soldier, that was wounded only in his quarrel. Codrusus therefore beholding Ambiomer, We shall better understand one another, said he, for I apprehend that I shall be suddenly able to attend you altogether. Then shall I have nothing to do but wholly to employ my cares, in the cure of my Daughters deliverer, and we shall have time also to examine what to determine upon, in that weighty concern which I have already mention'd. In the mean time seeing that Virione's complements are needless at the departure of our friends, or rather since it is more necessary that you should be better acquainted, she has the liberty to stay with you, while her Mother and I take leave of the company.

Concluding these words he went forth, leaving Virione without any other than two of her attendants who kept themselves at a distance out of respect. Ambiomer no sooner cast his eyes upon the countenance of that lovely Maid, but he beheld it covered with a rosiè tincture wherewith modesty had overspread it, when with a respectful utterance, Madam, said he, I find that Codrusus is too favourable to Ambiomer, and that he ought to take more care how he profusely wasts his benefits upon an unknown person. For Madam, I beseech you not to believe that his good intentions have so far puff'd me up, as to make me cover an honour so far above my hopes. No no Madam, I will never abuse the kindness of Codrusus, yet all my life I shall have that reverence for Virione, as ever to submit to her will. Mine, answered she with a modest shamefastness, is absolutely conformable to my Fathers, to whom I owe an entire obedience: For as I am perswaded that he will never command me any thing, till he has consulted the affection he has for me, it will be no hard thing for me to frame my humour to my duty, and to follow the commands of Codrusus to the full satisfaction, that he can expect from a grateful daughter. But Madam, replied he, if you will be prepossessed to my disadvantage, must the charming Virione be obliged to renounce that liberty, which is allowed to all persons that are to engage themselves during the whole term of their lives? It may be I should not renounce my liberty neither, replied she, biding her fair cheeks with the veil which she held in her hand, for I do not apprehend that I ought to have that reluctance, to give the consent which is expected from me. And indeed since there was never any person that complained of Codrusus, in the exercise of the Supreme Authority; there is little probability that being so just in the publick affairs of our Nation, he would prove unjust in those things, which concerns the private interest of his Family.

How modest soever Ambiomer were in his thoughts, he could not but perceive that Virione both by her eyes and by her language, was not ill inclined to admit him for her husband. Thereupon at first he seem'd willing to accept of that beautiful Virgin, he considered her charms and was well satisfied in them, he considered the advantages which an alliance with Codrusus might afford him, and found them considerable: Nevertheless when he began to ruminate upon the effect which those reflections had produced, he found that he had a heart sufficiently grateful, but that people are not always in love that are desired to be so. In the mean time Virione gave him as many innocent marks of her affection, as prudence and modestly would permit her. And on the other side Ambiomer stirr'd up his heart, to that affection which he thought he owed her: but his endeavours were in vain, for a natural haughtiness still oppos'd and imperiously perswaded him, that the enjoyment of Virione could never satiate the full ambition of his Soul.

At length he understood that he had no passion but only for honour, and knowing that the profession of Arms wherein he had been so successful, was the only way to obtain fame, he turn'd all his thoughts upon war, imagining that after he had contented that eager desire, yet more and more to signalize himself in feats of Arms, he might perhaps be in a better condition to steepe his inclinations to love. At that time the Batavians having taken several prizes from the Belgians, gave him an opportunity to employ his Valour in a new sort of combat: So that it was resolv'd in the chief council of the Belgians, that he should hasten to the Ports of Gessoraque and Bononia, to get our Naval forces together, and that in the mean time he should take order for the giving out commissions, raising of Seamen, and providing Ammunition.

But then the lovely Virione lost some part of her gayety, when she saw that Ambiomer was ready to leave her, and her bright eyes though somewhat fearful, told her these things which her fair lips durst not presume to express. As for Ambiomer in regard he could not speak against his real thoughts, he only continued the testimonies of his acknowledgment to the charming Virgin, and beholding her with looks full of respect; I hope Madam, said he, that when I return, it will be lawful for me absolutely to utter my mind, and that I may do it then with more assurance than now, that Ambiomer wants something to merit the incomparable Virione. Thus he avoid'd that passion which he thought he owed to a person so amiable, and the daughter of Codrufus who was not ignorant of Ambiomer's modesty, imagin'd that he was only willing to repair the uncertainty of his Birth, by an augmentation of his fame and wealth.

Your Majesty no doubt has heard how victory accompanied our noble General no less by Sea, than she had followed him in his battels by land, and that after the peace which was made between the Belgians and Batavians, he sail'd away to the mouth of the Elbe, to settle the tottering Throne of the King of Turingia. You also know Madam, that the pride of that haughty Knight was humbled in that Country, where the angry heavens punished him to revenge Virione, subjecting that proud heart which she could not subdue to the charms of a Princess, who was no more destined to establish the felicity of Ambiomer, than Ambiomer was dispos'd to yield to Virione. In short Madam, Amalazontha captivated the haughty liberty, which Ambiomer had but too warily preserved, and we knew her in Gallia, when the news was brought of the great advantages he had gain'd over the enemies of the Turingians, and of the famous encounters between him and the Prince of the Saxons, and the Prince of Freizland, who as you well know were both passionately in love with the fair Princess, whose charms the conquering Ambiomer could not resist. The Belgians joyfully heard what renown published in honour of their famous General, and if they saw him in corivalship with the presumptive heirs of two potent Kings, they were still satisfied to hear that Amalazontha's father preferred him before two Rivals, so much above him in dignity: Codrufus easily perceiv'd that the choice which he had made, was authoriz'd by the King of Turingia, and because he had a real kindness for Ambiomer, he earnestly wish'd that the enjoyment of Amalazontha, might be granted him as the guerdon of his noble exploits, and thereupon turn'd all his thoughts upon the Prince of the Eruliers, for the advancement of his daughter. However you are not ignorant Madam, that Amalaric Prince of Turingia, utterly oppos'd the good fortune of our passionate Knight, and having shut his eyes against the lustre of his famous deeds, he perswaded the Princess his Sister never to accept a Soldier of fortune, whose extraction was obscure, for a husband: So that the disconsolate Ambiomer return'd to Cesaromagum, not so well satisfied in his victories, as he was afflicted at Amalaric's carriage, and the ingratitude of the Princess whom he adored. The Belgians received him with all the acclamations, wherewith they were wont to accompany their Triumphs, but he was not sensible of the honour which they did him, and we perceiv'd sadness in his countenance, at the very time when he caus'd a universal joy among us. He appear'd in Codrufus's company somewhat ashamed of himself, though he had learned by experience that a man is not always the Master of his heart, at all times that he has a mind to dispose of it.

True it is that the generous Magistrate soon recover'd him out of that bashfulness, receiving him with an aspect full of sincerity and gladness: He talk'd to him only of those noble actions which he had performed in Batavia and against the Saxons, and if he intermix'd in his discourse, any thing of the affection which that valiant Knight had for Amalazontha, Amalazontha, he only commended it as a passion worthy the grandeur of his courage, and approv'd by the King of Turingia.

But Ambiomer was in a greater labyrinth when he came to Virione's Apartment, and cast his eyes upon a Beauty that would have surrendred to his desires, had his destiny but permitted him to have had an affection for her. At first he sigh'd, and secretly upbraided himself, then with an utterance that betrayed his guilt, I make no question, Madam, said he, but that you have heard of all that befel me in Turingia, and that you already know that Ambiomer has been rash and unfortunate. After those few words, he cast his eyes downward, and instead of saying any thing more, he expected Virione's answer, who had not the power to speak: for indeed there appeared a discomposure in her lovely cheeks so soon as she perceived Ambiomer, whether it arose from the presence of a Knight whom she no way hated, or from a jealousy mixed with a kind of surprize, which is usual at such meetings. Ambiomer perceiving her at such a plunge, Madam, said he, speak your real thoughts; for it is not from the charming Virione that I am to expect compassion for my misfortune, or any excuse for my boldness. You may be deceived however, answered she very seriously, for as I never heard that an aspiring boldness was ever any crime in a young Soldier, I do not believe that loftiness is to be condemn'd which encouraged you to court the Queen of the Turingiens; nor that it is a thing unusual for a person accustomed to vanquish to promise himself prosperity in all his undertakings.

That was the moderate answer which she gave him out of a sense of honour, being compelled to smother those marks of displeasure that lay concealed in her heart. How, Madam, replied Ambiomer, do you not altogether blame me for that haughtiness that made my hopes aspire to the Daughter of a King, and can you so much slight me as to refuse to tell me your thoughts of that which most concerns me? Ah, Ambiomer, answered she, casting down her eyes, and fetching a short sigh, you know that I expressed my self but too freely before your departure from Cesaromagum; and I must seriously protest, that had not the intentions of Codrusus in some measure authorized that liberty which I thought I might lawfully take, I would never pardon my self for having said that to you which I ought to have expected from your self.

Thus they concluded their first converse, afterward they visited one another more frequently, and with more familiarity. For as Ambiomer found sufficient consolation in the company of a lovely Virgin that no way hated him, to dispel the melancholy which he brought from Turingia; so Virione could not chuse but joyfully entertain the testimonies of love and respect from the most noble Knight that ever she knew: not but that she had her hours of disconsolation, when she called to mind that Amalazontha had deprived her of a heart which was in a manner due to her. But when she considered again how little likelihood there was that Ambiomer could espouse that Princess, she despaired not but that one day her innocent affection might be regarded. In this very interim Codrusus fell sick and died: and it being then discovered that his liberal hospitality, and his honesty had left him poorer than he needed to have been, many of Virione's Suitors grew cold, not beholding so many dazzling charms in the fair eyes of a Lady from whose Family they could not expect that wealth and support which they hoped for. The generous Virione took not so much as any notice of those changes; but Ambiomer, who observed them, look'd with contempt upon those mean Souls that only worshipped fortune. From thence forward therefore he not only stood up mainly for the interests of Virione upon all occasions; but to extend his Gratitude as far as it would go, he made use of all his credit, which was not inconsiderable among the Belgians, to make the Daughter of Codrusus the most considerable person in all our Provinces. To that end, how powerful soever her party were, he resolv'd to strengthen it, and gave it out underhand, that he would put the supreme power into her hands, and render his own command of General of our Armies to the person that had the honour to marry Virione. There was no question but he would have accomplished what he undertook: but before the Estates were assembled for the election of a chief Governour, there came a Courier from Vindoristus, who brought news that the Prince was coming with a most magnificent Train to conjure her at length not to despise the principalities of the Brueteres. Virione seem'd very well satisfied with Vindoristus; and Ambiomer being really sensible of his affection, spake in the Prince's behalf, and endeavoured to persuade Virione to accept those obliging offers which he made her. Virione was vexed at first to hear Ambiomer speak in the behalf of another, whose Rival she so willingly desired him to be. But our generous Soldier giving her to understand with equal frankness and sorrow how unable he was to break those chains wherewith he was laden, so well laid before her her ingratitude to Vindoristus, if she should refuse him for a Husband, that he began at length to shake a heart sensible of acknowledgment. In the interim, Terambaud, whose faction was not despicable, spread abroad reports proper to the design which he had to oppose the pretensions of a German Prince, giving it out that Ambiomer was going about to deprive the Belgians of their liberty: that Vindoristus came only to possess himself of the supreme authority, together with Codrusus his Daughter; and that the stranger so potent and sovereign would not fail to make that command hereditary, which was wont to honour and enrich so many Families in Belgia. Thus the people, prepossess'd with an opinion founded upon great probabilities, was soon wrought upon to take Arms to break off the marriage between Vindoristus and Virione.

But Terambaud fearing that Ambiomer would be too hard for him in open fight, instead of making a publick insurrection, he only mustered up his people in private, with an intention to set upon Vindoristus unawares as he travelled upon the Road: But in regard the Prince of the Bructeres had a Train so numerous, that it was not an easie thing for his Rival to conceal a party as would be strong enough to assail him, Ambiomer being advertis'd thereof, presently took Horse with such as were ready to follow him, and hastened to the relief of Vindoristus with all the vigour that Virione's interests could inspire into him, and the natural antipathy which he had against all bad actions. Had he not been so diligent, his endeavours had been to no purpose, for he found that Vindoristus and Terambaud were already engaged, and that Vindoristus, though far more valiant than his Enemy, was very near being oppress'd by the multitude of his Enemies: not but that he still defended his life with an extraordinary vigour, that he had not wounded his Rival, and was fighting at the same time as it were environed with a Breast-work of dead men, which his own terrible weapon had raised: but he had very few of his men left; for to make more haste to the amiable Virione, he had outrid the Body of his Train, and was assaulted by a far greater number of his Adversaries far more numerous than his own Convoy. Thus Ambiomer came just in the nick of time to his rescue, and finding an object whereon to exercise his excellent valour that had rendered him so renowned: he flew upon Terambaud's party with a most impetuous violence. The Belgian no sooner perceived him, but he was more transported with rage, then struck with fear, and whatever experience he had that his strength was not equal to Ambiomer's, yet out of the fresh malice which he had against a person that seem'd destin'd to cross his most important desires, he stoutly bore the shock of so terrible an Assailant. But notwithstanding all his resolution, he made no long resistance, for the fierce Ambiomer, who had immediately singled him out, and charged him, redoubled his blows with that agility and violence, that the unworthy Lover of Virione fell down dead at his Horses feet: Vindoristus, who had opened a passage with his Sword to fight by his valiant Defender, no sooner saw Terambaud beaten down to the ground, and his party put to flight, but he lift up the Viser of his Helmet, and turning toward Ambiomer in a very obliging manner, Invincible Champion, said he, whether you have fought in my defence, or only to satisfy your own Generosity, yet I must acknowledge my self indebted to you for a life which I offer to your service, and which you shall command me always to expose for the preservation of yours upon all occasions where I may have the honour to be present.

He uttered those words with an excellent grace, when the Conquerour of Terambaud being uncovered, Sir, answered he, when you shall understand that my name is Ambiomer, you will then perhaps find that you were not so much engaged to me for your defence, as I was bound to it my self. 'Twas not for me without being an accomplice with your Murderers, to stand still while a great number of Cowards and Traytors distressed an illustrious Stranger in a Country where I have some command. And though I had never known any thing of Terambaud, yet my Gratitude would not have permitted me to consider a moment what I had to do, when I was to fight in the defence of a Prince who was only assailed because he came to wed the Daughter of my Benefactor.

After these Complements they alighted, reciprocally admired each others goodly presence, embraced with all the demonstrations of Friendship, and having given convenient orders in reference to the lame and wounded, they took Horse and continued their journey with all the haste that Vindoristus's wounds would permit. They were no sooner come into Cesaromagum, but the enamoured Prince was earnestly desirous to visit the charming Virione, notwithstanding the Chirurgeon's admonitions, who ordered him to keep his Bed, so that Ambiomer, sensible of his noble passion, presented him to the Daughter of Codrusus. But in regard that Ambiomer had several advantages over Vindoristus, both in respect of the Majesty of his presence, the fame of his reputation, and Virione's affection, the passionate Vindoristus found himself not so happy at the first meeting, nor at some others that followed, when he consulted his fortune in her fair eyes. Thereupon his sorrow was so great, that he began to grow careless of his cure, insomuch that that languishment where-

into he fell all of a sudden moved all persons that knew the real cause, to pity him. Virione her self also seem'd to be sensible thereof: but being not yet sufficiently Mistress of her heart, as Gratitude oblig'd her, she still delayed to declare her self, being neither able to speak against her own thoughts, nor being willing to disoblige a Prince whom she tenderly loved. But in short, at the same time Vindoristus is ready to die for her, she observ'd that Ambiomer's thoughts were more than ever fix'd upon Amalazomba. He received news from Turingia, where he kept a strict correspondence, that Amalaric who reigned for some time in that Country was slain by the King of the Franks: so that seeing himself deliver'd from a Prince that had always thwarted his pretensions, he resolv'd to leave us, that he might be near the Queen whom he adored. For that reason the just Virione opened her eyes, moderating that inclination ere it grew too potent, which she had for a person whose heart was not at his own disposal: so that out of a generous resolution she determin'd of a sudden to make the passionate Vindoristus happy. Ambiomer was infinitely satisfied, and our people, who were by this wholly disabus'd, generally rejoiced: and the Prince of the Brüderes was so transported, that he could not return Virione thanks, but with a pleasing kind of bashfulness which arises from the excess of joy. The Festivals lasted several days in Cesaromagus, though the delights and pastimes wherewith the Belgians graced the Solemnities were no sooner at an end, but they were as sorry for Ambiomer's departure, who was resolv'd to be gone whither his passion call'd him. The two Lovers made him a thousand sincere professions of their friendship: and the Knight, being satisfied that he had so honourably match'd so fair a person whom he could not wed himself, sorrowfully departed from us, taking his march toward the Rhine. Several of the most considerable of our Officers would have attended him, but in regard he knew not how Amalazomba would entertain him, he only took along with him two or three of his Domestick Servants, that he might come privately to the place where he intended to reside. And in short, he never shew'd himself to the Princess, till he had fought Prince Sumnon, who would have stopp'd her Army from returning into Turingia. In the mean time, the affection of a Father, which I had for so famous a Soldier whom I had bred from his infancy, made me take a particular care to know what happened in this Camp; and thereby I soon heard of Briomer, and that next the Princes who are engag'd in your Majesty's quarrel, he held one of the greatest Commands in this powerful association, which was the reason I never scrupled to make a just restitution; and instead of writing to Briomer and his illustrious Son, to give them the means to acknowledge one another, I rather chose to come my self to share in the satisfaction of being the cause of such a strange good fortune. But, Madam, the satisfaction which I hop'd for, is not so great as I expected, for I was extremely perplexed when I understood the ill disposition of the Father of my Ambiomer. However, I am not the less oblig'd to restore him what I believe belongs to him, to the end, the fairest Queen in the world may regain a valiant Subject whose noble exploits, already perform'd, make a fair promise of others, which may prove of no less advantage to your Majesty, and the honour of his Country.

Thus the Gaul concluded, when the charming Rosamond having pondered a while upon what she had heard, I am glad, answer'd she, that the good education for which Ambiomer is beholding to you, added to the excellency of his natural parts, hath qualified him in another manner than could have been expected from the breeding of the Cimbrian whom you assign him for his Father. In the mean while I would not have you make any farther discovery of his Birth; for besides, that he is generally belov'd in an Army where his Father is hated for his barbarous carriage, I know that there are nobler advantages design'd him, than he can possibly expect from the Lieutenant General of my Army.

Thereupon she told him what were the intentions of the King of the Lombards in favour of Ambiomer; and the Prince of the Huns being admitted into the Closet, declared that they were not so slightly to pass sentence upon the fortune of so great a personage, but carefully to examine what Ambiorix had preserv'd for better and clearer evidence of the truth; so it was resolv'd that the next morning the Cabinet which Balamir had in his custody should be brought to Rosamond's Apartment. As for Ambiorix, he retired to Ambiomer's Quarters, whither that famous Warriour came so soon as he understood of the arrival of the Gaul whom he had so long expected. They tenderly embraced each other at first, but the General of the Belgians no sooner understood the probability of his being Briomer's Son, but he chang'd colour, causing the Gaul to repeat the circumstances upon which such an unwelcome opinion was ground'd. Is it possible, cry'd he, that I am descended from a parentage so much abominated, and that fortune should seem to desire a reconciliation with me, by making such advantageous proffers as she has done, only to precipitate me from the happy condition

dition where to I was advanced, into an abyss of melancholy and discontent? I know, answered Ambiorix, for the Queen of the Cimbrians has told me, that your hopes are very great: but, Ambiorix, why should you lose them? Is there any necessity for you to reveal a secret, the knowledge whereof might be destructive to your expectations? Ah, Sir, replied he, how little should I have deserved your care, were it possible for me to dissemble upon such an occasion? No, no, Sir, Ambiorix will never enjoy the felicity which has been promised him, if he must purchase it by ways unworthy the grandeur of his Soul, and he would rather chuse absolutely to renounce them, than dishonourably gain their enjoyment by keeping an ignominious silence that would upbraid me all my life time. However, I do not find, replied Ambiorix, any reason that should move you to publish your first Adventures. I do not say, answered he, that I will make them publick; on the contrary, I believe it would be imprudence in me to do it: but I am persuaded at the same time, that I neither can, nor ought to conceal it from those persons that have a particular interest to know it: so that I will go to Briomer as soon as I am confirm'd in the opinion which you have infus'd into me, and offer him that blood which I had from him. In those combusions also which he shall make, I shall either take his part, or if justice forbids me, I shall labour to moderate the violence of a humour of which so many complain, and of which I my self have seen the fierce effects as well toward the Queen of the Turingicns, as in his behaviour to Prince Balamir. I am contented, replied the old man, that we both together do visit Briouer, provided that it be without any noise, and that beforehand we may consult Rosamond and Balamir, who with an extraordinary affection take upon them to concern themselves in all things that may be for your advantage. I will not only follow their advice and yours, replied Ambiorix, since I know you will never urge me to be ingrateful to him that gave me my Birth, but you shall also see me very diligent in the search of all things that may make me question the belief of what you have related to me in reference to my extraction. In brief, Sir, I shall not omit to call to mind all the circumstances which may confute the opinion which you have fixed in my Breast; for I declare to you, that if I could recover my former ignorance without any injury to the laws of nature, I would heartily prefer it before the cruel information which I have received.

Thus they entertained one another in discourse till the Evening, at what time they were to visit Balamir, to whom Telator soon after returning, they enquired of him what news in the Camp of the Franks, and what persons of eminent quality were arrived there, drawn thither either by the reputation of Pharamond, or the charms of his incomparable Sister. But Balamir's Esquire who was not well contented in his mind, was glad that he had an opportunity, instead of answering, to present an Officer belonging to Theodolinda, who could better satisfy their curiosity. In short, that Officer had no sooner acquitted himself of those Complements which he had to make the Prince of the Huns, but he gave them the Relation which they expected in graceful language, and made them a description in few words of a Magnificent and warlike Court: Besides a very great number of Princes, added he, that are continually about Pharamond, and who seem to borrow their lustre from that great King, I this day saw in his Army the great Constance, the noble Viridomar, the Kings of the Britains and Tongres, the famous Wallia, the valiant Artabure, nor is this all, for the report goes, that the Emperour Honorius himself will be there, which they who know his love to Bellamira make no question of, seeing that that charming Stranger is also come to the Camp together with the Princess of the Franks. But, said Balamir interrupting him, is it possible that the unknown Bellamira should be so surpassingly fair as fame speaks her to be? 'Tis most certain, replied he, that she exceeds whatever is fair in the world, excepting Rosamond and Polixena, and that she may also contend for the first rank of Beauty with those two wonderful Princesses without any disadvantage to her self. However, all those perfections which are admired in her person, neither can infuse any pride into her, nor dissipate that sadness which the misfortunes of her life have fixed in her heart, and depainted in her countenance. But, Sir, I should perhaps tell you too much, should I undertake to give you a particular account of all her virtues, only this you must further understand that yesterday arrived in the Camp the Queen of the Goths the widow of Autalph, together with Octavia Queen of great Britain, who being better informed as to the pretended infidelity of Constantine, has now consented to make that Royal Suitor happy. Thus Placidia, Polixena, the Queen of the Britains; the Princesses of the Huns and Nemetians, Cleomira and Elelinda intermix their lustre and brightness with the noble reputation which so many valiant personages seem'd to have spread through the whole Camp; and their fair eyes in some measure sweeten the terrible sight of warlike preparations, while they make living in an Army to be a kind of comfortable delight. Yesterday I saw a great part of those fair and great Princesses at the sage Melusina's Apartment. But Bellamira was not there, either because, she does not mind curiosity, or else because she no where finds so much delight delight as in Theodolinda's company with whom she has contracted a strict and sincere friendship.

He was interrupted by a great noise of the trampling of Horses, and by the coming of the King of the Tongres, who presently entered Balamir's Chamber, and after the usual Compliments, he spoke to the Prince in Pharamond's name, in the most obliging expressions that obligation and gratitude could inspire into him: Balamir having testified the effects which the Generosity of his magnanimous Rival produc'd, failed not to enquire of Taxander for his charming Adelaiada, to oblige him by speaking of her: I wish to Heaven, answered he, that all those great personages that sigh for love upon the Banks of the Rhine, had but the same good fortune as I. I cannot see, sadly replied Balamir, that what you wish can ever come to pass, seeing so many Lovers bend their desires toward one and the same object, so that it is not possible for any one of them to arrive at the happiness to which he aspires, but that all the rest must be inevitably miserable. But, Sir, can a happy Lover absent himself so quickly from the person whom he loves, as I find you have done? You understand, replied Taxander, the cause that brings me back; for although the return of the King of the Herules sets me absolutely at liberty, I am willing to discharge my promise, and procure an interview of the greatest personages in both Armies. "Either I am deceived, replied Ambiomer, or you will be very much perplexed to manage so many different spirits; for if the fiery disposition of men be not easily pliable at such meetings, the reservedness of the women affords no less trouble. "I am not ignorant, replied the King of the Tongres, but that it would be very difficult for me to compass my design, had I grounded it upon any important affair, where every one should make particular delays according to their particular interests: and therefore I have steered a different course, where there are no advantages to be taken, or preliminaries to be examined; but on the contrary, where a single curiosity shall draw all those persons, which I intend, to the designed Interview. In a word, Theon and Melafina shall meet in a convenient place which I have chosen, to confer upon the most important secrets of their Art, whither the greatest part of the Princes and Princesses will be glad to come at my invitation, to see and hear the conferences of two such famous persons. But because I did not think it lay in my power to persuade the Queen of the Cimbrians, I thought fit to procure the assistance of the Princess Albisinda, to whom I am to deliver a Letter which Prince Viridomar has written to further my intentions. Concluding those words, he produced a Letter which he shewed to Balamir, in these words.

Prince Viridomar to the Princess Albisinda.

I Make no question but that you have a desire to see the famous Melufina; and though you should not be guilty of so much curiosity your self, yet you may engage the Queen of the Cimbrians, since I conjure you so to do, upon a design which the King of the Tongres will tell you. 'Tis only for Pharamond's sake that I make you this request: and if you shut your eyes against the merit of so great a Prince, yet remember at least that he is Marcomire's Brother, by whose only means I can hope to enjoy the fair Princess whom I adore.

"Since it behoves the fair Albisinda and you to act by consent, said Balamir, you cannot chuse but succeed in your undertaking. . And I know also, that should the Queen of the Cimbrians be unwilling, that Viridomar's Sister will put some innocent deceit or other upon her, to bring that to pass which without doubt will not displease her in the end. For in short, Sir, I am of opinion, that if Theobald's death had not been an invincible obstacle to the pretensions of the King of the Franks, Rosimond had never scrupled to render him happy, nor to have given him that precedency which the crowd of his virtues so loudly demanded. "Few people however, replied Ambiomer, agree, that Pharamond would have supplanted the Rival that so generously praises him; and Rosimond's proceedings are so far from being answerable to your opinion, that they sufficiently demonstrate what her affection is for a great Prince, who better than any other in the world is able to dispute all sorts of Conquests with the King of the Franks. Though such obligations as those are: beyond my desert, modestly replied Balamir, nevertheless I will tell you, that the Queen of the Cimbrians does not afford me those publick testimonies of her good will, for any other reason but because she is convinced that she shall never be inclin'd to allow me any further favours. But Sir, replied Taxander, will it not behove her to declare her self more fully to the King your Fathers Ambassador, and can you think that she will declare against you: You Sir that ave received from that Princess, so many Testimonies of her confidence and esteem? I do sincerely protest, replied Balamir, I am ignorant what that great negotiation means, but whatever design the King of the Huns may have, I am not inclinable to conceive those hopes, wherewith others believe I have reason to flatter my self. On the contrary, I have in my heart those checks of melancholy, which the best part of the world may well take for a bad Omen.

After this Balamir and the King of the Tongres went up to the Castle to the Queen of the Taringiens, where most of the Royal Associates were that evening. As for Ambiomere he went along with Ambiorix, and while he was considering what was most severe in the relation of his extraction, and that the Gaul was endeavouring to cheer him up, Agelmond wondring he had not seen him, sent impatiently to know the cause, as also to enquire after the Gaul who had taken care of his education. That Prince whom Gilismene's death had mortally afflicted, desired nothing more than speedily to provide a match for the Princess his Sister, and a King to reign over the Lombards, that he might the more willingly put an end to a life which he led in sorrow. He had declared his mind to Ambiomere, and in regard he resolv'd to resign his Kingdom, and the possession of his Sister to that renowned Soldier, he could not apprehend what obstacle could keep him from a place, whither two such potent motives allured him.

Viginizus who came to him from the King his Master, had no sooner delivered his errand, but the sad Ambiomere sigh'd, so that it might easily be observed after what an odd kind of manner his mind was tormented, by the strange whimsies of fortune, that at the same time gave him a prospect of so much good and bad luck together. However, believing himself obliged to wait upon Agelmond, he went together with Viginizus and Ambiorix, asswaging by his presence the discontents of a Prince, that shewed himself highly interest'd in all his concerns. He was most civilly received by the King of the Lombards, and a while after the Princess Agione entering the Chamber, apparently demonstrated by the cheerfulness of her looks, that the company of Agelmond and Ambiorix, were more pleasing to her than all the Noble Society, which she had left at the Queen of the Taringiens Apartment.

Immediately the King her Brother addressing himself to the learned Gaul Ambiorix, Sir, said he, I am very glad that you are come into this Camp, not that I have any desire to be better inform'd of the extraction of a Knight, whose merit is sufficient for me, but that you may see Ambiomere in that splendid condition, of which he has rendred himself so worthy by his renowned deeds. At those words the Gaul was as much overjoyed, as if he had been a real Father: when Agelmond continuing his discourse; It is not just however, said he, that I should shew so much of indifferency at such a time as this, as not to desire with the rest of the world, what so eminently concerns so great a person, whom I look upon as my Ally. Be pleas'd therefore to tell me of what family you believe him to be descended, and you will do me the greater kindness in regard I expect nothing, but what will be for his advantage, not only in respect of the noble endowments of Ambiomere, but also for the prediction of the learned Greek, who seldom is wont to be deceived.

These words caus'd the Knight to sigh, which the amiable Princess of the Lombards observing blush'd, while Ambiorix less satisfied than before, only said in few words that his extraction was noble. Agelmond observing that coldness, had some suspicion of Ambiomere, and therefore instead of requiring any other more particular circumstances, 'Tis enough, generously replied he, for since I only look upon Ambiomere's virtue, I will go on in my resolution, which the Princess questionless will not oppose. You know Sir, answered she with an extraordinary sweetness, that it is my duty only to obey. Ah Madam, said Ambiomere interrupting her and fetching a sigh, that you should so little know me. If your extraction, answered Agelmond observing his countenance, be not so illustrious as ours might require, you will the better like our manner of proceeding, and I am apt to think that you will live the better with a Princess, that shall never scruple to take you for a husband. Ah Sir, answered Ambiomere, 'tis not lawful for me to pretend to such an honour, for if I am the Son of Briomer as probabilities may persuade me, I must rather dye than——— Ah Ambiomere, said the old man interrupting him, why do you discover when there is no necessity, what you see no person obliges you to confess? How, replied he, shall I pretend to a silence full of dissimulation and perfidionsness, and by a tacit consent shall I abuse a heavenly Princess, that deserves the adoration of all the world, and betray a generous King to whom I am so infinitely oblig'd? No no, Ambiomere will never aspire to a happiness with which he might flatter his hopes, by ways not conformable to his inclinations: and if he be dazzled with the glistering fortune which it foretold him; he ought not to be so blind to gain it by a treacherous treacherous surprize, suffering the blood of Briomer to be united to the blood of an illustrious Race, which he has so much cause to reverence.

This magnanimity of Ambiomer strook the King of the Lombards into an admiration; Agione seem'd to be astonish'd and less chearful, while the enamour'd Knight cast his pensive looks upon the amiable Princess and sigh'd. As for Ambiorix he felt his heart pierc'd with such a lively sorrow, that he was forced to leave the Room, and Ambiomer who would not forsake him, left a redoubled esteem in Agelmond's breast, yet with some kind of irresolution, what course to take in an Affair of so much consequence and nicety.

On the other side, when it was dark and that the Princes were going home through the Burrough to their quarters, Balamir was surpris'd after a strange manner. Coming to his Apartment, he found all the Officers of his household extraordinarily sad, and that a general disconsolation reigned in all their faces. He stop'd the first he met, he demanded the cause of their affliction, but not meeting with any that could give him a punctual answer, he called for others by whom he was no better satisfied. Then commanding his Squire to be called, one of the most considerable of his Attendants answer'd him with a low voice; That it was Telanor's discontent that caus'd their grief, though doubtless neither would have wrought so powerfully in our minds, but that several conjectures perswade us, that you your self, Sir, have no small share in the news that causes our discontent, for Telanor transported with that that despair that turmoyls him, has told us confusedly such things as confirm'd our belief.

At those words Balamir not so much concern'd for himself, was really griev'd for the sadness of his Esquire, and in regard he had an extraordinary esteem and love for him from his infancy, he went forward to his Chamber with that eagerness, as easily demonstrat'd how much he was concern'd for him. Nor was this carriage of his to be admir'd at, for Telanor was the Son of Valamber, whom the King of the Huns had entrusted with the education of Balamir, so that he had been always bred up with the Prince, and was so entirely fix'd to his service that no revolution could separate them. When his Master came to him he was sitting near a Table, leaning his head upon one hand, and holding a Letter in the other which carelessly hung down. At first he knew not Balamir, his thoughts were so deeply retir'd into his breast: but the presence of the Prince having awaken'd his imagination, which was wholly taken up with his Masters resemblance, excited whatever was most active in the profound melancholy of an afflicted Knight. Valamber, cry'd he, is a prisoner, but Valamber is innocent: Yet 'tis not his misfortune that pierces me so much, as the terrible blow that I fear will follow it. Alas poor Prince, continued he sighing, hast thou appear'd in so many places as the greatest and most vertuous among men, to tumble on a sudden into this misfortune?

Upon those words Balamir labour'd to comfort him, Telanor be of good comfort, said he, perhaps I am not yet so low in credit but that I may do Valamber a kindness, and for those misfortunes that threaten my life, I only desire thee to have so much constancy to behold them, as I shall have to undergo them. The faithful Squire upon the sound of a voice that was so dear to him, being so far come to himself as to be able to return an answer, Ab Sir, said he, 'tis your self that is concern'd chiefly in the news which has been more terrible to me than death: But Sir, I beseech you excuse me from making so cruel a relation, and be contented to receive that satisfaction which will be too heavy a task for me to give you, only from a Letter of Valambers and the person that he has sent. Concluding these words he presented him the Letter which he held in his hand, which the Prince had no sooner open'd, but he was surpris'd at the following words.

I Write to you from the great Tower in Alba Julia, where I remain in a most terrible perplexity, my Sovereign requires at my hands a Son which he committed to my care: But it is impossible for me to restore the same wherewith he entrusted me. Your illustrious Master with all his merit cannot repair the losses which has befallen us, 'tis the true Balamir that he commands me to find out, and whatever esteem he may have for that famous Warriour that has so honourably born his Name, a Stranger will not satisfy a Father who demands his own flesh and blood. I would tell you more had I strength and convenience, but Narva who is faithful to me and well instructed, will give you a full account of all things.

How courageous soever the Prince of the Huns had at other times appeared, he could not but look upon that Letter with astonishment. He read it over and over again, to see if he were not mistaken in the sense, then reflecting upon so strange an accident, What, said he to himself, must I now all of a sudden question my parentage without apparent ground, after Twenty Years peaceable possession: If the King of the Huns be not my Father, to what Prince can I be beholdling for my being, seeing there is not any Prince in the world that bewails the loss of a Son? On the contrary if my extraction be mean, how came I to have those high thoughts that never were below the Royal Title which has been hitherto attributed to me. At the conclusion of those meditations which he kept private to himself, he turned toward Telanor and talked to him a good while, on purpose that he might mitigate his discontent, and that with such a tranquillity of mind, that the greatest person that ever was in the world, could have shewn upon such an occasion.

Having in some measure in that manner asswaged the anguish of his mind, he committed the care of his most faithful Squire to the most dutiful of all his Attendants, and retiring to his Chamber commanded Narva to be sent for, by whom he hoped to be better satisfied than by Valamber's Letter. The Hun was no sooner come into his presence, but he appeared very sad, and not daring to look up in the Prince's face, he seemed by his Behaviour to let him understand, that his news would not be very pleasing. The undaunted Balamir, who was always ready to encounter the most troublesome events, with a constancy becoming his noble reputation, having observed those timorous looks that already boded his misfortune, to confirm the drooping spirit of Narva, What fearest thou, said he, if thou knowest Balamir speak, speak boldly and be confident, that if there be in the world those strange and hidden circumstances, that can take from me the birth and Title of a Prince, yet there will remain that riches in my Soul that fortune cannot deprive me of: Nay I shall have a Sword left too, of which I may still make use with success. O heavens, cried out Valamber's messenger, can you suffer so great a personage to be thrown from that degree, wherein you had so justly placed him: And must Narva be obliged to let him undertake his fall? After those words he paused a while, and then addressing himself to Balamir; I find Sir, said he, that there is a necessity for me to repeat to your self what I have already related to Telanor, not only because it is my duty to obey, but that you may also proceed with that caution which you shall think convenient, according to the information you shall receive of what concerns you. He had no sooner concluded those words, but he made a second stop. But after a long silence,

Sir, said he, I make no question but you will be extremely surpris'd, when I shall tell you that the young Balamir Son of the King of the Huns, was brought up in the Province of the Quadrians where Valamber had secured him, when the Histrians and Japodians made that famous irruption into Pannonia. Then it was that they who took away Balamir, put you in his Room, while my Master was but gone to give a visit to Briomer, who as you may have heard remain'd with young Theobald at Rhabodunnm, another City of the Quadrians not far from Singone where we were not to be comforted, neither by the beauties that appeared in your face, nor the riches of your cloaths, which however gave him to understand that your birth was not mean. Nevertheless well considering that it was not a time to make vain complaints, or to display his grief to the world, which would but discover a loss which it concern'd him rather to conceal, he took horse with all the Soldiers under his command, and dividing them into several Troops he sent them several ways, under the charge of such Officers as he most relyed upon. I was one of the first whom he entrusted, and indeed I was the only Officer that took the Road which we should all have taken. For in short, being entred into a Wood not far from Celemuntia, I discovered certain horsemen, who by the disguises that they wore upon their Arms and habits, I shrewdly suspected. I soon overtook them and finding I was not deceived, I charged them notwithstanding the inequality of their number. Immediately they divided, and while one party stayed to put a stop to us: the other rode on mending their paces, to the end we might be out of hopes of ever recovering our young Prince. For my part I never stood to consider, but flew after the division that carried Balamir away, but being constrained to leave the best part of my men to hold the other party in play, I fought but with an unprofitable zeal, though the Huns highly signaliz'd themselves at that time. For in short, their vigour and their courage only served to destroy our Enemies, not leaving us in a condition to make any advantage of their defeat: For indeed so bloody and so rude was the encounter, that we fell altogether dead or mortally wounded, and the little Infant as I thought, lay exposed to the mercy of the wild Beasts, among a heap of men slain outright or else expiring. And most infallibly had I perished among the rest, had not heaven guided to that part of the Wood,

some charitable Hunters who gave me all the relief that I could expect; for though they found me in a most desperate condition, yet perceiving some hopes as long as I was warm, they carried me to a Village not far from the place, and omitted nothing of care and skill which either Singone, or the nearest of my Relations could have afforded me.

In the mean time there was no more hopes of recovering Balamir, and therefore it concern'd Telamor's Father to dissemble his grief, and to keep secret a loss that was irreparable. True it is, that it was no difficult thing to conceal it, as well in regard there was no little difference between yours and the Prince's age, as also for that the lineaments of infancy never perfectly shap'd, nor easie to be distinguished, rendered the success infallible. To this also the distance of the Court mainly contributed; for though he had made such a strict pursuit, I was the only of Velamber's Officers to whom he had discovered the true ground of his affliction. For he had perswaded the rest that it was a Nephew of his which was taken away from Singone; and though they had known the contrary by recovering Balamir, Velamber's prudent management of things could not all have surpris'd them afterward. Besides that, Telamor's Father had no great reason to care what they could say against him, provided the little Prince that was committed to his care, had been found again. But when he perceived that all his pains and inquisition proved fruitless, then he bestow'd all his care upon you; but when he began to observe in your countenance the good omens of those extraordinary endowments which we afterwards admired, he grew perfectly satisfied, and bequeath'd all his affection and tenderness to you; not but that some remains of sorrow still perplexed his mind, when he called to memory the change that had befallen the fortune of his Sovereign's off-spring; no less fearing also lest the Ravishers themselves might one day discover what they had done. Indeed there was little probability that they had committed so great a crime to no purpose, but rather that they had made themselves Masters of Balamir's life and fortune, to draw some considerable advantage to themselves, by making his quality known. Nevertheless, 'tis not above twenty years ago, yet nothing has been heard of that Prince. During which time you have made his name famous by a thousand glorious actions: you have fill'd the world full of your renown, and you have more than that, given such proofs of your Virtue as far surpass the fame of your Victories and Conquests.

When that alliance was made which still continues between the Romans and the Huns, and that the Princess Theodolinda resided in the Court of Honorius, Keza was sent privately to the Emperour, to treat of certain particular interests in reference to the two Royal Families, and the Confederates of both Nations. While these things were a doing, the King of the Huns having found certain expedients more proper to put a more speedy end to that weighty Negotiation, thought fit to give more ample instructions to his Embassadour: and having pitched upon me for the person to carry them, I departed with all speed from Alba Julia to Ravenna, where Honorius then kept his Court. Keza and Aurelian conferred daily together, but I could not stay to see the success of their Conferences; for a little while after our Ambassadours thought fit to send me back into Dacia. He also oblig'd me to take Gallia in my way, and to visit the King of the Tongres, to whom he order'd me to make certain propositions that concern'd our alliance with the Romans; but that journey prov'd very unsuccessful; for besides that I was set upon and wounded passing through a Forest upon the top of the Alpes, I was also constrain'd to encounter a Lombard in Belgia, against whom I was not able to make any great resistance, in regard I had not fully recover'd my former health: so that at the end of the Fight, not having strength enough to continue my journey, I was forc'd to entrust my own Enemy with a Letter which I had from Keza to deliver to the King of the Huns, and remov'd my self to Cesaromagum, a place where in all likelihood I might soonest find a cure for my wounds. That very day that I came thither, a person considerable among the Gauls somewhat stricken in years came to visit me, understanding that I was a Hun: he took great delight to hear me talk of my own Country, where he had formerly been himself; and by reason that he had had a command in our Army, he related to me many particulars of the Messian and Histrion War, which was the reason that the young Balamir was carried to the City Singone in the Province of the Quadrant. That was not all, Sir, but Ambiorix, for that was the Belgian's name, would needs entertain me in his own House, where he not only had me carefully looked to, but he trust'd me all with a horse which he never had declar'd to any person, believing perhaps that I could get him some other way in a business that was an absolute mystery to him.

Here Narbor came to the great Prince, and heard him all the story of Ambiorix's childhood, and then he went with him, and he had seen those things that would easily evidence the truth concerning this renowned Soldier, he pursued his Rchearfal as follows.

Be you the judge now, Sir, said he, whether I had reason to be surpris'd at so unexpected an accident? Assuredly 'tis not easie for me to exprets my Ambition, in so much that I had like to have imparted a secret to Ambiomer, which I well knew I ought not to do without consulting Velamber first. Thereupon I only promised the Count to find him speedily such news as should give him better satisfaction. In short, upon my return to Alba Julia, so soon as I had given Telanor's Father an account of what I had heard, I asked him whether it were not convenient to let the old Belgion know what had befallen us at Singone, during the war between the Huns and the Hibernians: It will be the better way, answered he, so soon as his surpris'e would permit him, to confer with Briomer, that I may understand what that great person was that I bred up under the name of Balamir. For in short, if I must be the occasion of so great a fall to that great Hero, to restore the Son of my Sovereign, I would not be so exactly just, to lose my own labours for the sake of an unknown person. Besides that the alteration may be prejudicial to the King and Kingdom, seeing that it is impossible that any Prince in the world, unless the King of the Franks, can so worthily supply the room of the illustrious Balamir.

To that purpose some few days after Velamber sent me with a bare Letter of credence to Briomer, entrusting me to declare that by word of mouth which it was not fitting to commit to writing. In short, the Cimbrian appeared so strangely surpris'd, and his colour changed so often, so soon as he understood the cause of my coming, that I was confirm'd in the belief which I had already. However, he presently recollected himself, and then with a stern aspect, and a resolute utterance: If your Master's conjectures, said he, be not grounded upon a good foundation, it matters not whether I give you, or cause you to wait for an answer to your demands. But if there be any shadow of truth in what you have said, I am not bound to satisfy you presently, or at any other time.

After those few words, I was forc'd to depart from the Cimbrian, who obstinately refus'd to see me any more, only he gave me to understand that I might return into Dacia, and that he would suddenly send to Velamber himself. But, good Gods! how well did the Errand become the person that sent it: for not long after, as Telanor's Father was riding to a House of his own, some twelve miles from Alba Julia, he was set upon and wounded, and had certainly perished, had he not been relieved by certain persons that lay hid in a thick Thicket of Trees. It was the valiant Keza, who attended by three or four Horsemen, no sooner observed the Encounter, but he fell in violently upon the Murderers of Velamber, and after a stout resistance, he slew some part, while the rest fled away to save themselves. After that in regard it was of great importance to know the Abettor, and the reason of such a crime, he fought among the dead to see if he could find any thing to give him information. Among the rest he found one Cimbrian, who, though dangerously wounded, was in a condition to speak, Him they caus'd to be rais'd up, and upon a strict examination.

“Being now at the point of death, said he, and having nothing to hope or fear, I will discover the naked truth, happy if my sincerity may repair some part of my crimes. I was born in Bohemia, and it was Briomer that sent me hither, together with my Accomplices, to kill a certain Knight who is called Velamber: I cannot tell the cause that urged him to this mischievous design, but this is that which I understand by conjecture: For it is most certain, that Briomer formerly took away young Balamir by force, while he was a mere infant, to put his own Son in place of the Prince: Velamber lately discovered that this exchange was made at Singone; and therefore Briomer, who never scruples any mischief to serve his own turn, thought fit to secure himself by destroying the person that might be able to destroy him. The Captain of our Company, who is his most faithful creature, can tell you all these things more positively than myself: for it was only upon certain words that Briomer spoke to him when we parted from Marobuda, that I grounded this conjecture of mine: Go, said he, embracing him, go, my dear Menebalde, expect the highest reward from Briomer's Gratitude, and pardon a Father whose indulgence thought he might dare any thing to advance a Son to that degree where you——” Instead of saying more, he sigh'd, for what reason I know not; and presently took Horse to follow Menebalde.

“The Cimbrian had no more to say; whereupon Keza, that attentively listened to him, went and gave a perfect account of what had fallen out to the King; who having an extraordinary affection for your self, was so astonish'd at the Relation, as if he had been thunder struck: immediately out of respect to you; he commanded them to keep the news private. But out of his natural affection he resolv'd to have his Son relieved him, and left nothing omitted to reobtain him at a time so favourable to his design: he spared not

“not Telanor's Father, and caus'd him to be arrested; and he sent so many Horsemen after “Menobaldus, that the Cimbrian not being able to flee by reason of his wounds, was taken “before he could pass the Danow; and I believe he is at this time at Alba Julia, or at least “they were bringing him thither when I set forth toward this Camp.

“This, Sir, added Narva, finishing his short Relation, is the reason of my journey: and “indeed Velamber thought it convenient that I should discover to you what I have already “declared, believing that in the midst of your discontentments you might make a good use of “his information.

Narva having spoken those words, the Prince paus'd a while upon what he had heard; but immediately after, I should be really griev'd, said he to Narva, should this disgrace that threatens me, deprive me of the power of doing good to those persons that have devoted themselves to my service: otherwise I am little concern'd, that I will endeavour my self all that lies in me, to find out a Son for the King in my own room, since obligation and justice command me, and perhaps the pains which I shall take to that purpose may not be altogether fruitless. Having so said, he sent for the little Cabinet that was left in his hands, and opening it, he shew'd Narva all that Ambiorix had there preserved. Ah, Sir, replied Velamber's Agent, do I not see Balamir's swathing cloaths which I saw at Cesaremagum? There is no longer any question to be made, replied he of a sudden, having cast his eyes upon a little piece of Gold-smith's work, enriched with remarkable Diamonds, and Heaven has so ordain'd it as to put into your hands the only token in the world to discover the Prince whose name you bear, and you will easily agree with me, when I have shew'd you what I did not think fit to shew the Gaul Ambi- orix when I was in Belgia.

When he had so said, he took a little glistening Box, and opening it, he readily pick'd out from among the rest of the Jewels a certain gold plate, whereon was enanelled the pourtraiture of the chief Idol that the Huns worshipp'd at that time, and over which these words were written in the characters of that Nation.

To young Balamir's Tutelar Deity.

Thus you see, Narva, said the Prince, that I have not made any advantage of a thing committed to my trust: for if you do not believe my disposition to be changed with my fortune, you may affirm that I would rather do a good action, though it made me miserable, than by an unjust deed acquire all the Crowns in the world.

That extraordinary personage said no more, but retired, and went to Bed with the same countenance as he was wont to do. However, though he were generous, he was not insensible, so that instead of taking any rest, he only made his reflections upon an accident so severe and strange: “Was it not enough, said he, to tell me that I was not the Son of a “great King, as all the world has made me believe, but at the same time it must appear that “Briomer is my Father? For in short, there is no doubt to be made but that I was born in “Bohemia; the affections which the Cimbrians have for me, and the very thoughts of my “heart that always told me there was no enjoyment of Rosamond for me, are intallible “proofs thereof. “Not but that, added he, after he had paused a while, Briomer's designs
 “to have killed me seems to destroy that faith which faith would fix it self in my mind.
 “But why should I question but that a person of his humour might have a design as well “to murder me as Velamber for his own security; for what affection could he have pre“serv'd for me, if he look'd upon me no longer as his Son, after so many years?

He pass'd the night in these disturbances; and the next morning without staying for Ambiorix to go along as they had agreed, he went very early into Ambiorix's Quarters, taking Velamber's Messenger with him. Ambiorix and Narva no sooner had taken acquaintance one of another, but they manifest'd all the signs of joy for their happy meeting, that the occasion which afflicted both, and that reservedness of behaviour which it became them to observe in Balamir's presence would permit: and that they might discourse the more freely, they retir'd both to the window, when Ambiorix addressing himself to the Prince of the Huns, “Sir, said he, since it was agreed between us that we should both go toge“ther to the Queen of the Cimbrians's Apartment, you need not believe that I would “have waited upon you; and therefore wonder not: what surpris'd to see the great “Balamir in my Chamber at such an early hour, when I could not expect the honour which “I receive. Sir, answered the Prince, when you were inform'd that I am able without Rosamond's assistance to give you all that light and satisfaction which you can require, and all likewise to your own advantage, I make no question but that you will no longer wonder that I should be so hasty to give you a visit sooner than you expected.

After that he called Ambiorix, and repeated every particular as Narva had inform'd him : he shewed the Box open, which the Belgian did not believe could have been opened, and very diligently and clearly demonstrated that Ambiomer was the real Balamir, that the renowned Warriour stood like a Statue, not so much out of the excess of his joy, as through a well grounded astonishment : I see, Sir, said he at length, that there is some probability that I am the Son of the King of the Huns ; but there is so little likelyhood that you are Briomer's Son, that all the proofs which you have given me less prevail upon my belief, than Balamir's virtues so long since imprinted in my mind. Yours, replied the Prince, perswaded all the earth that the valiant Ambiomer could not but spring from a Royal Extrac^on : and the words of a person whom death hindered from farther explaining himself are not so slightly to be considered. I confess, Sir, replied he, that my disposition is not conformable to Briomer's ; but how unlike is yours to his ! And how improbable is it that you should be the Son of that Cimbrian ? He is the best able to satisfy us himself, replied Balamir, and therefore since a bare curiosity carried us to visit Theon together, an interest of greater concern may well persuade us to see Briomer.

Having thus concluded their generous dispute, they immediately went to the implacable Enemy of Pharamond ; and the savage Cimbrian no sooner saw them, but his colour changed, and he appeared very much dismayed : Be of good cheer, said Balamir immediately, no design of harm brings us hither : on the contrary we have brought you a Son, whom perhaps you thought you had lost a good while ago. At those words Briomer sigh'd, notwithstanding his natural fierceness, and how important soever the news which they brought him ought to have been to him, he was so far from giving them any attention, that he seem'd to be altogether taken up with other more troublesome. But no sooner was the Officer, to whose custody Rosamond had committed him, retired, out of the respect which he had for Balamir, but the Prince beginning the Relation which he had to make, took notice that the Cimbrian grew pale when he heard the very first circumstances. 'Tis true that he recovered himself so soon as he understood that Balamir and Ambiomer were both at an uncertainty, so that when they press'd him to declare himself, Well then, answered he at length, more boldly than he ought to have done, since you desire to be better satisfied which of you two is my Son, examine with your selves the greatest antipathy against the King of the Franks. If to be your Son it be necessary to hate Pharamond, replied the Prince, I dare affirm that you never begat me. And I wish to Heaven that it were impossible to be of your kindred, unless he had those unjust thoughts which I am sure I shall never be guilty of. You believe perhaps both of you, replied Briomer, resuming his wonted fierceness, that you should make a low exchange, if from the degree of a Prince, to which I confess you have reason to aspire, you should fall into such a Family as mine, but to redeem you out of that error, and to let you understand my power, I engage either to lose my life, or to make you two of the greatest Potentates in Europe, will ye but own those inseparable Titles of Briomer's Son, and Pharamond's Enemy. " Rather we altogether renounce so honourable a fortune, coldly replied Balamir, if there be no other way " to obtain it, but upon those conditions which you impose. But instead of putting any " farther constraint upon you, since I know not yet what to trust to, I am willing to preserve " an esteem for you, and without giving you any farther trouble, to stay till I can hear from " Menebaldus's own mouth, what I could willingly have learn'd from yours.

At the name of Menebaldus the wild Briomer changed colour, and stood dismayed : How, Sir, cryed he, is it possible that you should know the Cimbrian which you have nam'd ; or that you should have heard any news of him ? I have received most certain news of him, replied Balamir ; for this very Hun from whom I had the relation which I have repeated to you, assures me that Menebaldus is taken by the King, whose Son you caused to be carried away from Singone. Those words were so piercing to Briomer, that he felt a most furious augmentation of his trouble, and not being able to endure a discourse that lay so severe upon him, he fell into a deep meditation of the terrible events which he apprehended, and fix'd his eyes upon the ground in a frantick kind of posture.

As for Balamir and Ambiomer, they had no sooner taken their leaves one of another, but the Prince of the Huns went up to the Castle to visit the Cimbrian Queen, to whom he intended to give a full account of all things. For besides that he knew the admirable prudence of that Princess, he thought himself obliged to that respect, imagining also out of a natural instinct, that it would be a great ease to his sufferings, if Rosamond should appear to be mov'd at his misfortunes. She was without doubt more troubled than he expected, for her celestial eyes ; so worthy the wonderful effects which they every day produced, vitibly manifested manifested that her heart was more pensive than Balamir's, upon the strange accidents that he had related to her: But at length opening her fair lips, No no generous Prince, answered she, 'tis impossible that you should be descended from the blood of Brioner, all the world will agree with me, and I find my very thoughts incens'd against that belief, which you with so much earnestness embrace. You see however Madam, that my opinion is but too well grounded, and that if I were not the Son of Brioner, he would never have removed Balamir out of the way to put me in his place. Besides, from whence should proceed that reluctancy of yours to listen to my suit, had not the Gods to whom you are so dear, inspired you for fear one of your subjects should advance himself to the Throne? Whence proceed those thoughts in me, so opposite to all those pretensions which I might as lawfully have had, as so many Princes that preserve their own, with as little reason as I had to hope for success. 'Tis too true Madam that I am unfortunate, nevertheless, added he with an air that had something else more than ordinary Majesty in it, I am so far from fainting under my burthen, that it may be I may have courage enough to behold it, and it may be I may undergo it with that patience, that may not be unworthy those renowned marks of kindness, wherewith you have honoured me.

While these two illustrious persons thus entertained each other, the Princess of Suevia and the King of the Tongres who knew not the subject of their discourse, came into the Room as jolly and pleasant as might be, and told the fair Queen that it was high time to take the Air without the Camp, as they had made an agreement for that morning. "You know, dear Sister, pursued Albifinda, that in some measure it is lawful for me to press you, since it behoves me to see Viridomar, and that Marcomire and Gondemar cannot stir abroad by reason of their wounds: I could willingly comply with your desires at another time; but I have no great fancy at present, besides I am perswaded that we shall meet with more company than you are aware of. "Though your Majesty should meet with more than you expected, they cannot admire at your curiosity to see the famous Melufina, since the other party are as eager to see the learned Theon.

Albifinda and Balamir also joyning others of their own to the King of the Tongres reasons, they absolutely won Rosamond's good will, and perswaded her to go along with them, the freshness of the Air and the splendour of the day, giving then such a pleasing invitation to divertize themselves that morning,

Thus without any magnificence either in apparel or attire, a most beautiful company fit to be admired by all the world, rode forth of the Cimbrian Camp. The Queens of Bohemia and Turingia, the Princesses Albifinda and Agione, shone like the Lustre of the Sun when he breaks through the tender Clouds, environed with extraordinary personages, among whom were to be seen the great Balamir, the haughty Varanez, the renowned lover of Puleberia, the melancholy Agelmond, the valiant Ambiomer, the King of the Tongres, and the learned Theon. All these illustrious personages, entertained one another according to their several interests, the Princes of the Huns and the Persians never left Rosamond, Albifinda and Taxander whose minds were free and unengaged were very pleasant together: On the contrary Amalazomba and Agelmond were deep in contemplation, but said little. As for Ambiomer, he pleased himself with the sweet affableness of the Princess of the Lombards, and Martian who was a great distance from what he loved, took delight to hear Theon discourse in his own Art, that he had rendred so famous over all the East.

But now it was time for Theon to advance forward, seeing a great body of horsemen and Chariots that came from the other Camp: But before they drew so near as to know each other they alight, and Theon and Melufina moved on the one toward the other, encompassed about with several Officers, that served to hide their persons from being too much expos'd to publick view. Though Altoruna were already far stricken in years, yet she went very upright, her countenance was Majestick, her complexion brown, her face Oval, her eyes black, her looks stedfast and piercing: But neither she nor the learned Greek gave one another those tedious commendations, with which most people are wont to tire their expressions, yet they seemed to be so satisfied, that though they spoke without any strain'd language, it was after a manner altogether as obliging, as their admiration each of other was reciprocal. I make no question, pursued Theon, but that you are of the same opinion with me, that e're long we shall see the foundations of great Monarchies new laid. We may affirm it before all the world, replied Melufina, nor is it very difficult to see the presages thereof, in the effeminacy of the successors of the great Theodosius, and the valour of these fierce Nations, that wage war against the two Empires. But learned Theon, both you and I may look for other causes of these revolutions, and find them as certain though somewhat more remote, in those great luminaries that roll over our heads. "I have already consulted them, replied he, and if I am not "deceived, those sublime Planets, whose conjunctions govern the most memorable events

“in this low world, declare to us the wonderful revolutions that must happen over all the world. Those that fell out after Hannibal was chosen General of his own Country-men, were of less consequence, though at the same time the young Philip ascended the Macedonian Throne: Achæus usurped Asia, Licurgus subdued the Lacedæmonians, Ptolomy Philopater seiz'd upon Egypt, and Antiochus fixed himself in Syria. I am of your opinion, though it be not so universally received, replied Altorana, and to make it more clear I need go no farther, than to shew you some observations which I have made, upon what success, the Stars do promise to the glorious Monarchy of the Franks.

While they were thus discoursing, the Princes and Princesses of both parts advanced forward by degrees, and immediately next to Meluzina might be seen the charming Sister of Pharamond, the incomparable Placidia, the fair Queen of Albion, the lovely Adelaiada, the Princesses Cleomira and Blesinda. Among the Princes that compos'd that Court of renowned personages, was the great King of the Franks, who was yet more remarkable for his haughty and warlike presence, and the splendor of his Arm glittering with jewels in every part. The lover of Polixena the illustrious Viridomar, did not meanly contribute to the glory of that meeting, the famous Constance appeared laden with honour, and the King of the Britains with the valiant Artabure, discovered themselves there with a presence conformable to the high reputation which they had won.

The first of these great personages on both sides, that separated from his company was the Prince Balamir, for besides that he had a desire to see the fair Theodolinda, and all probabilities perswaded him, that she might be with the Queen of the Goths and the Princess of the Tongres: However she did not meet him at present, for the King of the Franks being advanced toward his generous Rival, accosted him so far unlike an Enemy, that his aspect manifested nothing but esteem and acknowledgment. Will it never be possible Sir, said he, for Pharamond to see himself free, from the competitorship of the renowned Balamir? Neither Balamir, answered the Prince of the Huns, or any other King in the world, must contend with Pharamond for a heart which he has so well deserved, and whereof he still made himself more worthy, by that fatal exploit which overthrew all his hopes in the death of Theobald. But Sir, added he with a more serious utterance, seeing Viridomar approach, 'Tis not for you to spend so much time in a converse, which you may better elsewhere employ. For I am much deceived, if the Prince of Suevia who as I know too well has taken your side, be not coming to do you some good office.

Viridomar hearing these last words, answered with an aspect full of acknowledgment, so that those three renowned and valiant Princes, who at another time would have been overjoyed to have held on their discourse, broke off immediately to go where their differing intentions guided them: But Viridomar still addressing himself to the Prince of the Huns; I am, said he, so many ways obliged to the King of the Franks, that I am desirous with your permission, that he may receive some part of acknowledgment from my Sister, and that I may attend him to her, notwithstanding we run the hazard of meeting her with the Queen of the Cimbrians, Should that misfortune befall you, replied Balamir with the same aspect, 'Tis very likely that you will find some expedient to comfort your selves in the midst of your pain. He said no more that he might not any longer retard the two Princes, but Pharamond would not leave him till he had brought him to Constance, to whose care he committed him that he might present him to the Queens and Princesses.

The famous lover of Placidia admirably discharged his trust, and Balamir as much accustomed as he was to see Rosamond, could not chuse but be surpris'd at the sight of so many Beauties, which he beheld all at one time. Some marks of which astonishment he gave in his discourse to the Sister of Honorius, to whom Polixena and the other Princesses gave the chief place of honour, which the Queen of the Goths observing; Sir, said she, I must confess that the whole world has not a place unless it be this where now we are, that affords you the sight of so many wonders at once, and yet the person whom you look for is not here, for the Princess Theodolinda would not come along with us.

While Placidia spake in that manner, the other Princesses earnestly beheld Balamir, in whose person they found nothing but what was Majestick, nothing but what was conformable to his noble Reputation. But when he had paid them all the respects which he could imagine due to them, and that they had returned him all the testimonies of their esteem, which he could expect. It is not just, replied Autalph's Widow, for us to detain you any longer, the Princess Theodolinda also would take it ill as well as you, if we should one moment retard your meeting after so long an absence. I believe however, replied the Queen of Albion, that Prince Balamir will not be a little troubled, where to find the Princess his Sister, for I was told that she was gone to take a walk with the fair and melancholy Bellamira. At these words the Sister of Honorius seem'd to be somewhat surpriz'd and ponder'd, whereupon Polyxena made made answer to Olivia, that she would send some of her Attendants along with the Prince of the Huns, to shew him the place where Bellamira and Theodolinda, were wont to seek retirement.

In short she turned about, and sending for five or six very comely Franck Knights, she gave them order to attend Balamir. They conducted him through many turnings of the Wood, into a remote and wild place where they were forced to alight. Afterwards they divided taking several paths that led several ways, that they might the sooner meet such persons as went to hide themselves, having their Guards at the avenues of the little deserts. As for Balamir he kept the same path as the King of Sueden had done, when he threw himself into the fetters of his Enemy's Sister, and no sooner had he walked along the side of a Rivulet, to the fountain which had been so fatal to the Father of Viridomar, but he saw two Ladies negligently habited, sitting at the head of a great Tree. The one leaned upon the other in a muling posture, yet might her incomparable presence be observed. The Prince had no sooner cast his eyes upon as much of her face as he could discover, but his heart was moved as it were at the apparition of some Deity, and thereupon having stepped a little nearer, and more earnestly considered what he believed he had not well discerned before, he made a loud exclamation to Heaven, pronouncing the name of Hunnimonda. But then the two Ladies immediately rose up, and she that had caused Balamir's wonder, beheld him with indignation, and with all the speed she could, endeavoured nothing more than to avoid him.

The Eleventh Part.

BOOK I.

Are you the Ghost of my Princess, cryed the astonished Balamir, are you the divine Hunnimonda? Has Heaven sent you to comfort a miserable person, so cruelly ravished from me? Rather, added he, fetching a deep sigh, having better observ'd the countenance of that incens'd Lady, are you not come to overwhelm me with more misfortunes than I am already plunged into. He was about to have continued, transported with several passions, when he took notice that his words had rather irritated than mollified the haughty Lady to whom he made his addresse; so that he held his peace, and having viewed her more circumspectly than before; Or I am deceived, cryed he like one dismayed, or you are that divine Princess which an inhumane Brother ravished from my glorious hopes. Yes, ingrateful Prince, answered she, I am Hunnimonda; but Hunnimonda rather dead to thy remembrance, than in the opinion of the rest of the world.

After she had in that bitter manner reviled him, she turn'd swiftly about to go toward a Tuft of Trees where she had left Theodolinda, when the passionate Balamir catching hold of her Garment, Ah, Madam, cryed he, for Heaven's sake tarry; and if the Gods have preserved you in this world, or if else they have raised you from the dead by some omnipotent miracle; hear for the sake of those Gods what a Prince that adores you can say in his own justification No, no, perfidious man, said she, I will hear nothing; get thee to thy Rosamond, court a Princess that can bestow a Crown upon thee, and never more look after an unfortunate person that has nothing left her to move thy ambition. Ah, Madam, replied he, sighing, that you should know Balamir no better! After which words, while he strove to hinder Hunnimonda from running away, the incensed Lady beheld him with eyes, which notwithstanding the fury that enflamed them, yet darted forth most inexpressible charms, and with a loud voice, and a redoublement of indignation, Unhand me, faithless man, cryed she, I know thee too well. She would have said more no doubt, considering the fury she was in, had not Theodolinda, hearing her voice, hastened to her with all speed; Dear Brother, cryed she, I beseech you force not the will of the Princess; 'tis enough that you have wronged her, and still continue injurious to her, without persecuting her in these solitary retirements, where she seeks that repose which you disturb. Alas, pursued she, beholding the Prince with eyes full of tenderness and grief, who would once have thought that Hunnimonda would have ever fled from Balamir? Or that Balamir would have worn any other Fetters than Hunnimonda's? But since you have been the cause of that injustice from whence the change proceeds, let us talk no more of a change that extremely afflicts me, and not cross those joys which we ought to have upon the sight of each other.

While

While she was thus talking, her beautiful friend ran in all haste into the Wood, and getting into her Chariot, she fled from her inconstant lover whom she could not hate however. Then Balamir beholding Theodolinda with all the symptoms of a new disturbance, How Sister, said he, must I always receive the most sensible unkindnesses from my nearest Relations? Was it not enough for Mundisic to ravish from me the Celestial Hunnimonda, but must it be Theodolinda's care also, to deprive me of the sight of the only person whom I love which the propitious heavens have restored me again? “Dare you say, said she disdainfully entertaining him, that you love Hunnimonda, or do you believe that fair Princess can be ignorant of your passion for the Queen of the Cimbrians? No Brother never flatter your self, all the world knows that you are the most dreaded Rival that Pharamond has. “Cruel Sister, replied he, why speak you so positively to augment my grief: I say no more than what all the world reports as well as I. “Well then Brother, pursued she all of a sudden, will you promise me to submit again to Hunnimonda's Commands. I not only promise it, replied he with a certain liveliness in his eyes, but I also vow dear Sister to dye her captive. Then you are no longer in love with Rosamond, said Theodolinda, and taking notice that Balamir answered not a word, “Speak, said she very earnestly, are you in love with the Queen of the Cimbrians or no? “I cannot betray my thoughts, replied he at length, and therefore I must confess, that notwithstanding the violent passion which I have for the Princess of the Goths, I feel a kind of tenderness toward Rosamond at the bottom of my heart, which I shall have to my dying day. “By what I find, coldly replied she, you have not lost all your infidelity, but what has this Rosamond done for you, that you are only constant to her, and what has not my generous friend done for Balamir, from the very time that he ingratfully forgot her? “I beseech you, said he interrupting her, tell me what these last obligations are which she has laid upon me. They are so great that I am ashamed to relate them, for fear of making you ashamed, of the indifferency of your behaviour. Balamir then beholding Theodolinda in a supplicating posture; “Dear Sister, said he, will you not tell me whether the report that ran of Hunnimonda's marriage with Mundisic, be as false as the news of her being dead, and will you not also tell me by what miracle, that heavenly Princess saved her self from the hands of her Ravisher. “Tis not material, answered she very slightly, for a lover of Rosamond to understand the concerns of the Queen of the Goths, “Ah cruel woman, said Balamir interrupting her with a deep sigh, how well do you confirm me in the suspicion of my meaner birth? For were you my Sister, you would not so cruelly refuse the satisfaction on which I desire. Were I your Sister, answered she with some surprize, what have you as clean forgot Theodolinda as Hunnimonda? Or is it because I have lived so long in Honorius's Court, that you remember not that I am the daughter of the King of the Huns? I know it very well, replied he, but Madam I know not whether I owe my life to the same person that gave you yours: For I can tell you of an adventure that will perhaps, very much stagger your belief, in reference to my Parents. I cannot apprehend, replied the Princess, upon what ground you build this uncertainty, but I confess withal that were I positively convinced of the untruth of a thing that I have believed from my infancy, yet I could not chuse but have a greater affection for Balamir's virtue, than for Mundisic himself. And upon that assurance I hope you will not be unwilling to discover to me the reasons of your suspicion, at the first convenient opportunity.

Balamir more transported with his love than with any other consideration, offered immediately to satisfy the Princess of the Huns request, imagining that thereby he might insensibly engage her, to tell him what concern'd the fair Hunnimonda. But how great a comfort soever it were for Theodolinda, to see a Prince whom she so entirely loved, and whatever interest she had in the adventures of his life, she yielded rather to good manners, than to her own satisfaction at this first interview, and referred it to Balamir's next visit. But as she was about to take her leave of the Prince, he looked with so much affliction in his Countenance, finding himself constrained to return without re beholding his Princess, that Theodolinda touched with compassion, and being willing to give him some consolation, I protest Brother, said she, I would willingly by a full relation of her Story, let you understand the whole heart of the incomparable Hunnimonda, could I do it without asking her permission, perhaps she will not absolutely deny me. But will she not wilfully refuse my company, cryed he interrupting her. I dare not undertake, replied Theodolinda, that I can bring her into your company by her own consent, for she is no unsettled person in her resolutions: But, Prince, add but you as a Lover of Hunnimonda, and I will shew myself to be Balamir's Sister. This is all I can say at present, and the reason I beseech you ask no more, but give me leave to follow that fair Princess from whom I cannot long be absent.

She had no sooner said these words but she took her leave of Balamir, and though the Prince fain would have stay'd her longer, she absolutely resolv'd to return to Hunnimonda, and defer the rest of the discourse till a longer time. Thereupon the Prince beholding Theodolinda with all the symptoms of sadness in his face; "Well then, said he, I must part from my Princess and from you, not being able to obtain so much compassion from a Sister, as to hear my justification to the person whom I adore. But it may be you will be both more just the next time I see you, for in regard I cannot tax my self with the guilt of any crime, I despair not utterly, but that I may one day move the incens'd Hunnimonda's heart.

In this manner Balamir took his leave of Theodolinda, and the Prince of the Huns return'd to the noblest interview that ever was in the world, whither he was no sooner come among those renowned persons, that environ'd Theon and Melusina, but he returned thanks to the Princess Polyxena. After that he accosted the renowned Constance, who was discoursing the incomparable Sister of Honorius: who had no sooner cast her eyes upon his face, but she observed the extraordinary disturbance that appeared in his countenance, but in regard she knew the reason; "I am deceived, said she, or you have found more than you sought for, and that instead of one you saw a couple for whom you had no indifferent esteem. "Ah Madam, replied he, in regard you are not ignorant that Hunnimonda lives, I have only your protection to beg, against a Princess that has caus'd you with the most important secret of your life. "Should I take Balamir's part, replied the Queen of the Goths, perhaps it may not be the first time that I have openly declared in his behalf: But the change of your affection has made such a noise, and so enrag'd the fair Princess, that Theodolinda and Placidia have been little hearkned to, when they undertook as several times they have done, to speak in your justification.

Constance from whom they kept nothing secret, was overjoyed to hear that the charming Bellamira prov'd to be Hunnimonda, and addressing himself to the Prince of the Huns, By what I find, said he, there may be a reconciliation at length between two potent persons that infinitely esteem each other, for that jealousy that arn'd them one against another, and made them seek each other with so much animosity in fight will now be laid aside, seeing that if I be not deceived, you are no longer the King of France's Rival. I confess, replied Balamir, that I must return to my former capacity, but on the other side generous Constance, the difference is great between us two in the recovery of our Mistresses: For you appear before the incomparable Placidia, with all the confidence that can proceed from the innocency of a faithful heart. But the unfortunate Balamir is looked upon to be guilty by the severe Hunnimonda, who flies him and beholds him with detestation. After he had spoken these words, he took notice that the King of the Franks, was discoursing with the Queen of the Cimbrians and the Princess of Suevia, and it was the first time that he beheld the King of France's happiness, more pleas'd than disturb'd at it.

The enamour'd Viridomar had done that kindness for Polyxena's brother, for he guessing that Pharamond would not presume too boldly to approach Rosamond, and that Rosamond would not endure a long familiarity with Pharamond before so much company, presented the King of France to the Princess Albisinda, who was always inseparable from the Queen of the Bohemians. Thus having shew'd himself the contriver of that interview, 'twas his own fault if the more scrupulous sort reflect'd a little too severely upon him. He had also gone somewhat farther, for knowing that Varanex might disturb their communication, he had drawn him aside by degrees, under pretence of acknowledging the kindness which she had shewn him, after the conflict which he had had with Balamir.

Ambiomer and Agione were very busily unfolding their thoughts one to another, and the Queen of Turingia, who would fain have been where the King of the Franks was, durst not stir from that part of the wood where Agelmond remained with her, staying with that Prince not only in point of decency, but out of a virtuous resolution wherewith she oppos'd that violent inclination, of which she was not always the Mistress: So that Balamir found Pharamond and Rosamond without any other company but Albisinda's, and accosting those three illustrious persons, he cunningly fell into discourse with the Princess of Suevia, on purpose to give the King of France (towards whom he had nothing but a perfect esteem and affection) the more liberty to speak his full mind to the Queen of the Bohemians. But that fair Princess as also the generous Pharamond, no sooner cast their eyes upon him, but they press'd him very earnestly to know the cause of his discontent, when Balamir returning for answer that he had been to see Hunnimonda, put them into an extraordinary Amaze.

Immediately they thought that either they had not rightly understood him, or that Balamir had made some mistake: So that he was forc'd to tell them in few words, that Bella- mirz was Hunnimonda. With that the King of the Franks addressing himself to the Queen of the Cimbrians, "I make no question Madam, sudbe, but that heaven it self has been sensible, of what Balamir would have done for Pharamond's sake, and has restor'd Linn Hunnimonda as the recompence of so just an action. But Madam I am past all hopes, that ever the Gods should do a second miracle in my favour, nor am I so well beloved of fate, as to change the destiny of Theobald. I would joyfully sacrifice his murderer to your revenge, if the life of that inhumane assassinate, might prove an offering pure and precious enough, to restore a Prince to your wishes, that so well merited your affection.

Concluding those words he fetch'd a deep sigh, and cast a look so full of love and grief, upon the countenance of the fair Queen, that Rosamond could not but behold him again with such an Air, as display'd her natural haughtiness tempered with an obliging languishment. "You know Sir, answered she, that it was only report that published the death of the Princess Hunnimonda, but in regard I was an eye-witness myself of the Prince of the Cimbrians death, the loss which I have sustained is as unquestionable as the Prince Balamir's misfortune was uncertain, so that you are not to preserve these thoughts of kindness for me, that would meet with those acknowledgments in the breast of any other Princess but Rosamond, which it is not lawful for me to testify: Nor can I tell how to pardon my Sister and myself, for having entred into a communication so familiar, after I had taken a resolution never to have more to do with Pharamond. For my part Sister, very complaisantly replied the Saxian Princess, I was bound to pay my thanks to the French King in Viridomar's behalf, and when I saw the Prince of the Franks in your company, the antipathy which I have against war, made me look upon the interview of both the Generals as a good omen. You are so imprudent to day, replied the Queen yet not so seriously as she was wont to do, that I am perswaded I should be angry, did I not consider that the sight of a famous and beloved Brother, does in some measure authorize a gaiety not usual with your mirth.

While she spake in this manner, the impatient Varanez bristles up in great haste to her, and observing more of sweetness than disdain in her fair eyes, he was mad at the heart and soon would have discovered his fury, had not the presence of the charming Queen humbled his haughty humour. Fearing however lest Pharamond's virtues, might take too deep a root in Rosamond's heart, he could not but look upon his Rival with a mortal hatred, imagining that one day he might be happy. Nor could all those rare qualities which he formerly admired in the person of the King of the Franks, defend his heart against the assaults of a jealousy which his temper rendred so violent. In the mean time Pharamond had an opinion far different of the condition of his fortune, for though the Queen appeared less incens'd than formerly, the last words that she had spoken convinc'd him plainly, that the obstacles of his pretensions were as invincible, as Rosamond's loss which he had occasion'd was inseparable.

Upon the neck of this fell another vexation, for it being now time for both parties to retire, the Queen began to walk toward the Chariots that waited for her. The enamour'd Pharamond could not then take leave of the Queen, without apparent testimony of his grief, nevertheless that he might not fail in the punctilio's of good manners, as also in obedience to those tender whispers of affection which he had for his brothers, he gave the lovely Sister of Viridomar to understand, what extremities of sorrow Marcomire sustained, by reason that his cruel wounds kept him from appearing at this interview. Afterwards accosting the fair and penive Amalazontha, he let her know that the passionate Sunnon was departed from the French Camp to assist the Turingians, And you may well think, added he, that I shall always most willingly pardon him, when he leaves me to serve so incomparable a Princess, and so worthy the veneration which he has for her. I am so accustomed, answered Amalazontha, to receive kindnesses Sir, both from your self and Prince Sunnon, that I am nothing surpris'd to hear that you have laid new obligations upon me. I am more oblig'd myself, replied he, to your favour, nor can I remember but with an infinite return of acknowledgment, that you should send away your Troops to weaken my Enemies Army, especially when my own Arms have done you so much injury. The effectual services which you have done me, replied she, have made a deeper impression in my soul, than the resentment of offences unwillingly committed: But willingly, added she, my acknowledgments are little to be regarded, for all persons that have suffered far more than I under your victorious achievements, yet give you more respect and a higher esteem. I agree Madam with you, replied he, that no person in the world has ever looked upon my actions with so much indulgence as you have done. But in regard the Queen of the Turingians has done me an honour which she was no way oblig'd to do, I have no reason to complain if others refuse it me, and judge not so favourably of the misfortune that has drawn upon me their aversion. A for aversion, replied she, 'tis a hard thing to conceive such a sin against the King of the Franks: but I cannot tell, Sir, whether it be justice to all the part of an enemy against a Prince that offers to lay down his Arms, and submits to orders tending to his own ruine.

She would have said more perhaps, if Agelmond's presence had not put her to silence, who at the same time undertook to excuse himself to Pharamond for being obliged to take the Cimbrians part. Ambiorix justified himself much after the same manner, at what time the Princes of the Lombards came toward the King of the Franks, who, as soon as he had payed the lovely Sister of Agelmond all the respect and honour due to a person of her Quality and Sex, was just about to return to his own party, when he was met by the furious Varanez, who had all along very narrowly observed his steps: I am of opinion, said the lofty Persian, that you return with more satisfaction from Rosamond than ever you expected, and that that Princess is not deeply incens'd against a King who slew her Brother before her own eyes. It may be you and I may differ in our thoughts in reference to the Queen, slightly replied Pharamond, but if I must be of your opinion to disturb my Rivals, I will tell you, that the Princess was so just as to consider my intention, when I had the misfortune to displease her. Among those Rivals whom you so little esteem, answered Varanez, I know that some are sufficiently able to impeach your enterprises, and to dispute with you the possession of Rosamond, even to the last drop of their blood. Though you should mean Prince Varanez himself, impatiently replied the King of the Franks, I should never believe it to be the greatest of my misfortunes to undertake the combat with him.

Upon those words, the haughty Son of Isdigestes redoubled the measure of his fury, and had certainly hastened to the decision of his quarrel, if notwithstanding the heat of his boiling rage, he had not considered those illustrious personages that were in presence, as so many obstacles that would oppose him in the execution of his wrath. He judged it also better to stay till the Queen had made choice of a Husband, that he might afterwards assault the Lover whom she intended to render happy; fearing also lest before that decision his other Rivals might draw any advantage from his quarrel with Pharamond: and therefore addressing himself to the King of the Franks, Remember, said he with a lofty utterance, the resolution we have both taken, and know that there must be no Quarter between Pharamond and Varanez, if Rosamond her self declares either for the one or the other. Pharamond will never beg it, replied he, and you may do as you please, if you gain the victory, of which you are no way assured.

The King of the Franks and the Prince of Persia were upon these terms when Viridomar, Contance, Martian and Taxander came in, and altered the scene of the discourse. However, these great personages did not converse long together; for the Troops being obliged to march, they were presently constrain'd to take their leaves, and return to the fair Princesses whom they had accompanied all the day. Never did two contrary parties receive greater satisfaction the one from the other: never was seen more occasion to breed emulation, nor hearts more capable to harbour it. Rosamond, Amalazontha, Albisinda and Agione did nothing but extol the Princess of the Franks, the Queens of the Goths, and Britains, and their fair and illustrious companions: and on the other side, Polyxena, Placidia, Odivia, Adelaiada, Cleomira and Blesinda were in a manner charm'd with the bright and surpassing Majesty of the Bohemian Queen. They also acknowledged that lovely languishment in the Queen of Turingia's Beauty, which no heart could withstand, that the sweetness and mildness of the Suevian Princess infinitely pleased them; and that there were few persons more amiable than the Sister of the Lombard King. Thus did those two renowned and Royal Assemblies entertain each other; and when they that followed the charming Rosamond were come into the Camp, the spirit of joy spread it self through all that vast Army, and every one press'd to repeat the circumstances of an interview so worthy of admiration.

In the mean time Briomer waiting with a strange impatience to be resolv'd about the detention of Menebaldus, understood that they brought along with them that great accomplice of his, that they intended to have him examined before the Queen. The hair-brained Cimbrian hearing such dreadful news, seem'd to be in a manner quite dismayed; but his natural boldness, that rendered him capable of undertaking any abominable enterprise, soon dissipated the greatest part of his fear: nay, his pernicious audacity went farther; for Briomer finding himself warrant'd in his thoughts by the implacable hatred which he bore to Pharamond, and sustained by the support which he expected from the King of Suevia, took such resolutions as he thought most proper to preserve him from the danger that threatened him. Immediately he went to Albisinda's Father, the most zealous of all his protectors, and desires to speak with him in private, which request he obtained: he spoke long, and spoke spoke vehemently, so that he put the King of Suevia into an extraordinary surprize. The King beheld him very earnestly, but said very little: afterwards having given him something which the Cimbrian very carefully concealed, Go on, said he, taking him fast by the hand, I will never forsake thee; only return as soon as may be, that we may not lose the least moment in the execution of our designs,

Briomer being reassured by those words, was no sooner in his own Quarters, but seeing 'twas night he sent the people that were in his Chamber upon several Errands. Afterwards advancing toward the Cimbrian, who had order to observe him, he comes up close to him, feigning as if he had some earnest request to make him: and when he perceiving him busily minding to hear what he would say, he lifted up his hand, and stuck his dagger full in his bosom, and so quickly redoubled his blow, that before he could cry out, or defend himself, the Cimbrian fell dead at the feet of his wild Assassinate. The famous Villain was no sooner at liberty, but he fled to the King of Suevia's Quarters; and being introduced into his Closet, there he found the King impatiently expecting him, to whom he thus address'd himself, I cannot think, Sir, you will be surpris'd at what I have done, since you know that I have formerly executed all that ambition could infuse into a Father for the advancement of his Son to the supreme Dignity. Afterwards he conferred very succinctly with Albisinda's Father, being desirous to get out of the Camp before his last crime came to be known: In short, Sir, added he, all that I can do is to put my self into Cologne, and if you do but act as we have resolv'd, we shall not only hinder our common enemy from triumphing in the possession of Rosamond, but you may also be Master of that Princess's life and fortune, and reduce the Franks under your power. He said no more, but disguising himself with all expedition, he followed certain Suevian Officers, who had orders to assist him in his escape.

While he was upon his journey, led by some evil Angel fatal to many illustrious personages, the last of his cruelty became publick through the whole Camp, and they sought to punish the Offender, whose future violences they had so much reason to fear. At first it was believ'd that such a person as Briomer would not lightly forsake his commands, that he had some more than ordinary reason to do what he had done; and that he must be upheld by some Sovereign Authority. All persons suspected that the King of Suevia was his protector. Rosamond only, Albisinda and Balamir, who had heard Menebaldus's confession, conjectured that the imprisonment of Briomer's accomplice had mov'd the Cimbrian to that strange resolution which he had taken, for fear he should be left to the severity of the Law. The fair Queen was very glad to find her self rid of a subject whose humour was so dangerous; and in regard she could not imagine so wicked a person should be the Father of Balamir, besides that he had conspired his death, she took upon her to mitigate the discontents of that Prince: to which intent she fell into a discourse with him concerning the Princess of the Goths, that admirable Princess that had rendered the names of Hunnimonda and Bellamira so famous over all Europe. This she did after so generous a manner, and so far from all sort of jealousy, that Balamir not being able to master the sudden motions of his Soul, Would to God, cryed he, fetching a deep sigh, that the incens'd Bellamira and the incredulous Theodolinda were well acquainted with that affection that permits the Cimbrian Queen to commend the Princess of the Goths; and hinders not Balamir from speaking in favour of the King of the Franks.

That very transportation of mind convinced the fair Queen how kindly Balamir thought of Hunnimonda; and therefore as she was very much interest'd in all her concerns, she let him know how glad she should be to understand what had befallen him in the visit which he gave to Theodolinda. Balamir feeling I cannot tell what kind of sweetness in trusting Rosamond with the most important of his concerns, and the most secret of his thoughts, gave her an exact account of all that had happened in the Forest, where by accident he met with the Princess of the Goths: and then continuing his discourse with many marks of grief in his face, Madam, said he, do you not plainly see the malignity of my Stars, and how that fortune could be never more ingenious to persecute a miserable man? I confess she has advanced me to some reputation among men, but that was only a poisoned present; for it was that very fame that dissipated the melancholy that reigned in my Soul, by a strong desire of Glory which it possessed me with in lieu of the other: and by that means I was hindered from searching among my sorrows for the end of my unfortunate days, or indeed of a life that I find I must lead like a person forsaken of all the world. For after all, Madam, I fear that in a short time I shall lose the dignity of my Birth, which hitherto has been accounted great; and perhaps I may appear to be the Son of that person whose violences and enormities you are so well acquainted with, for the Son of an inhumane Father, who would sacrifice me to his own safety: on the other side, I find that my affection for your Majesty will remain for ever in my heart; and that this so just affection will constrain me to be hated by Hunnimonda, and if my duty oblige me to head the Cimbrians, 'tis only to fight against a Generous Prince to whom I am beholdng for my life, to fight against an Army that secures me a Sister and a Mistress.

The penfive Balamir could not conclude these words without a sigh, so that the charming Queen sensibly moved at his affliction, instead of returning an answer seem'd rather in a study, what means to find out to assuage the grief of a person so renowned, and yet so unfortunate. But the Princess of Svevia drawing near on purpose to break off such a melancholy discourse, "What Sister, what Prince, pleasantly said she to both, think you to find "a way to comfort one another without consulting Albisinda, or that there needs no more "than a moment of time, to find out remedies for such extraordinary evils? No no, we "must have more than one consultation in this case, and therefore since it is time for us to "return to our company, let us take a little time to arm Balamir with necessary cautions "against the accidents threatned him as well by fortune, as the renewed love of Hunni- " monda.

Concluding these words she went forward, together with the Cimbrian Queen toward Amalazontha's Apartment, where there was a most noble meeting of great personages. But the enamoured Balamir instead of making any stop there, departed presently to try whether he could get a sight of the fair Princess, that reigned in his heart more imperiously than ever. To that purpose he went in all haste toward the Camp of the Franks, and though he had a great desire to see Pharamond, to whom the concerns of Hunnimonda were no mysteries, yet he went directly to the place where Theodolinda was lodged. But he was strangely surpris'd to find Polixena, the Queen of Albion, and Adelziada in Theodolinda's Chamber, and to hear that Pharamond and Placidia were with Hunnimonda, using their endeavours to mollifie and appease the incens'd and hardned heart of that fair Princess. Balamir was received by all those charming Princesses, with all the marks of esteem that a person of his high renown, and to whom Alexander, Constance, and Pharamond himself had been beholdng, could possibly expect. However Odivia, the Princess of the Franks, and the Princess of the Nemetians, believing that Balamir and Theodolinda might have some private business together, were not long ere they took their leaves, and left them their full liberty of discourse.

The enamoured Balamir, who had nothing in his mind but the image of that incomparable Lady, who had made two Names so famous over all the world, the first thing he did, he enquired whether Hunnimonda continued inexorable, and understanding to his grief, that her anger was not yet appeas'd, in regard he could not see her then, he resolv'd to justify all the actions which he had done, since an inhumane Brother had ravish'd from him, all his happiness and all his hopes.

He related to her the despair of his heart, when he was constrained to abandon all that was dear to him, he repeated all the circumstances of his travels, while he rather wandred at the mercy of his grief, than out of any curiosity. Then he told her how strangely he was dismay'd at Hunnimonda's marriage, how disconsolate he grew upon the news of her death. After that coming to what concern'd the Cimbrian Queen, I vow dear Sister, said he, that it would be happy for me that the too severe Princess whom I adore, could but discover in the bottom of my heart, the nature of my affection to the fair Rosamond. I am perswaded she would rather approve than hate me for it, for there being no question to be made of her justice, I cannot conceive she should take it ill, that I should be grateful to a Princess, that has not only given me the greatest command she could bestow upon me, but reposes also a greater trust in Balamir, than in all those potent Princes that take her part. But brother, reply'd Theodolinda, Rosamond is fair, so fair that you might rather give your gratitude some other name, for I cannot tell whether in having been so zealous to serve her, it may not amount to an affection for a Beauty, that inspires nothing but violent passion. How Sister, reply'd he sighing, will you always interpret my words so contrary to my intentions, and will you not believe me when I shall protest to you, that my love to the Queen of the Cimbrians is not greater, than that which I bear to the Princess of the Huns, and that Rosamond's affection for me is no other, than what you your self have always testified for me. "Were Rosamond the King of the Huns daughter, reply'd Theodolinda, or were Balamir the Son of Rosamond's father you might overperswade us, but " ———— But, said he impatiently interrupting her, 'tis most certain that I have sigh'd " and mourn'd for Hunnimonda, that I thought her dead at that very time, when I had so " much reason to acknowledge the Queen of the Cimbrians kindnesses. "Had you done " more for the Princess of the Gaths, reply'd she, all your performances would not have out- " vyed the fame of her actions. "I beseech you, said he in a supplicating posture, let me but " know what they are and do not, I conjure you, so obstinately refuse me a favour which "you

“ you should be glad to grant me: For in so doing you have an opportunity to speak in praise
 “ of the incomparable Hunnimonda, and to extol a Princess whose part you take so zealously “ against a brother that loves you, and who without doubt is more unhappy and less guilty “ than you imagine. I have not only permission, replied Theodolinda, to satisfy your desire, but also for a reason that you shall know at the end of my Relation, to discover to you the most secret of her thoughts. Upon these words the enamoured Balamir impatiently listned, and the lovely Princess thus proceeded,

The History of Hunnimonda:

I Do not believe there is a greater proof to be found, of our uncertain knowledge of humane affairs, than by reflecting upon Balamir's actions or Hunnimonda's government of her self: For in short, Brother, who would have thought that a Prince of an undaunted courage, could have been subject to inconstancy, and that a Lady without any support in foreign and remote Countries, should contemn death with such a heroick resolution. That this Princess despoiled of her fathers fortune, should despise Empires, to preserve her heart for an ungrateful man, whom she beholds unfaithful in the sight of all Europe.
 Yes Prince, you have been both ungrateful and unfaithful, but I shall be so far from upbraiding you with a crime which has made so much noise, that I will only tell you the story of a virtue unknown, which you will consider with admiration, when you understand the particular circumstances of my relation.

Know then that your departure out of Sarmatia, soon appeas'd the tempest in Mundisic's breast, so that as violent as he was in all his passions, he appeared very moderate for some days, through the satisfaction which he received from your absence. He visited Hunni- monda, he spake to her with all respect, he offer'd to remove her from the Castle of Paziris, either to Olbia or to any other City which she would make choice of, among all these under his jurisdiction. But the afflicted Princess gave so little ear to him, and gave him such cold and slight answers, that the impatient Mundisic slung from her in a rage, resolving not to endure such kind of usage, so disrespectful to a Prince of his birth. The next day understanding that Hunnimonda's sadness increased, and that she did nothing but spend all her time at her devotions, or in reflecting upon your sorrows, he grew mad at the advantage which his distant and inferiour Rival had over him. Insomuch that being come to the Princess's Apartment, I shall not know Madam, said he fiercely, whether or no you will ever open your eyes to my pretensions, or whether the lustre of those Crowns I offer, will not overcome at length your antipathy against me. 'Tis time Madam, 'tis time to have your reason about you, and to yield to a Prince that can advance you to one of the most potent Thrones in the world, rather than to preserve your heart for a Lover that cannot espouse you, but he must make you my subject. Sir, answered the generous Hunnimonda, besides that I prefer the virtues of that Prince you men- tion before all the Empires in the world, it may be his conquering Sword may one day gain as many Scepters, as you will lose by your injustice. I find then that I am no otherwise unjust but because I am in love, because I would remove a Rival from you, by whom your heart is prepossessed, and because that notwithstanding the blindness of your passion, I strive to advance you to a glorious fortune. The pretended fortune which you boast of, replied the Princess, is but a torment to me, when I consider how disagreeable our humours are, and the happiness I shall meet with in the possession of a noble heart.

Upon these words the furious Prince beheld the magnanimous Hunnimonda, with eyes enflamed with anger, but believing that time and Balamir's absence might work a change, that neither rudeness nor threatening language would ever prevail, he rather chose to depart than provoke a fair Princess whom he really loved. However some few days after finding that nothing would weaken that tender affection which she had preserved with such an immovable constancy, he alter'd his course of proceeding, and shut the generous Hunnimonda up in a very close confinement, allowing her but two Virgins to attend her in her captivity.
 While that unfortunate Princess led her life in so languishing and deplorable a manner, Mun- disic came to visit her with a more serene countenance than formerly, and bluntly addressing himself to her at length, Madam, said he, heaven favours my designs, and taking Bala- mir out of the world has at last removed the obstacle, that oppos'd my pretensions and your happiness.

At these words the Princess grew pale and turn'd away her eyes, unwilling to behold the odious person that spake them; but afterwards hearing him confirm the dreadful news by several probable circumstances which he had framed out of his own head, she felt her strength begin to fail her, and that Balamir's untimely fate had shaken that courage of hers, which her own misfortunes could not move. But how charming soever the Princess appeared in her sorrows, Mundisic could not behold her without a certain madness which he found he could not master, so that he left her for fear of discovering the marks of his rage, and that he might not leave her in that dangerous extremity into which he had thrown her, he sent others to her by the way to contradict the news, and to tell her the improbabilities of your death. But this faithful Princess, who without doubt had never survived so great a loss, by reason of your absence only, lived in that languishing condition that would have moved a very Monster of cruelty to compassion; and seeing that time did nothing avail to mitigate her sorrows, the impatient Mundisic published abroad, that he was resolv'd to marry her in three days. He no sooner told her of it himself, but with her wonted Generosity, Sir, said she, methinks you should not thus deceive your self, nor seek to enter into a heart which none but Balamir shall ever enjoy. Yes, Sir, that heart which I never set open to any but that Prince, I will keep close shut against all other men: nor do you take the way to move it, by seeking to rend it from your own Brother, to whom you ought to acknowledge your self obliged for so many famous Victories. "He has won one, spitefully replied he, that defaces in "my mind the remembrance of all the rest: and if he be yet alive, I will surrender into "his hands all the Provinces which he has added to the Dominion of the Huns, provided he "will but let me reign in one place, whereof he shall never have the possession. "That "place, resolutely answered she, is able to hold out not only against Mundisic, but against all "the world; so that all your assaults be but in vain: and therefore instead of being so "obstinate in your Siege, consider how unjustly you assail an innocent affection, which "Prince Balamir gained by many signal services, and which your Father's consent and Hunnimonda's own inclinations have authoris'd. "'Tis a most ingenuous confession, Madam, "replied he very smartly, but to shew that I have as much privilege as you, I must tell you "that in three days I intend to marry you, and so long time I give you to prepare your "self, and to consider of it: and if then you shall refuse me that satisfaction which you "ought not to have denyed me the very moment that I demanded it, I shall take that course "which a passionate man that has all things at command can prompt his rage to make use of. "I know, replied she, that you can kill me, but your power as absolute as it is cannot reach "the liberty of my Soul: and for that reason I do loudly declare, that I will never be "Mundisic's Wife, but if you constrain me to an act which the weakness of my Sex cannot resist; I shall publickly protest against the giving my consent, that your violence will but "draw upon you the anger of Heaven, and the aversion of your people. "The Heavens, "said he, not at all disturbed, and our people will but blame your own blindness, and "when my perseverance has opened your eyes, you will thank my constancy that procured "you that good fortune which you so obstinately refus'd; and therefore I leave you to "consider of it, and not to flatter you, I give you this farther advertisement, that a Prince "of my humour would never use the utmost extremities, if he did not intend to reap those "advantages which he expects from thence.

He flung out of the Room after he had spoken those words, and not only continu'd firm in the resolution that he had taken, but also resolv'd to celebrate the day of his marriage with such an extraordinary solemnity, that the report thereof should come to his Rival's ears. To that purpose he sent Bela, one of his most trusty confidants, to the City of Olbia, with orders to spread the news, and to provide all things proportionable to the pomp that was intended. In the mean while, the fair and mournful Princess had no other consolation but in her devotion, and in conversing with her faithful Zenelia: Alas, said she, fetching a deep sigh, *what will become of Balamir, who is only miserable for the affection which he bears to an unfortunate Virgin! And what will become of the unfortunate Maid her self, if she remains under the power of a cruel tyrant, whose heart nothing can move, so far distant from an illustrious Prince that so well deserves her love and respect? Then letting fall certain tears from her fair eyes: Ah, Balamir, pursued he, that thou shouldst not be able to see what passes in the heart of thy beloved Hunnimonda! There thou wouldst find such thoughts as would not be perhaps unworthy of thine: there thou wouldst see thy virtues triumph over all the proffers of Mundisic: there thou wouldst lastly observe a constancy, that I am apt to think, is able to resist all the persecutions that threaten me. But now, Generous Prince, 'tis better I should suffer, without desiring that thou shouldst understand what I endure for thy sake; the comfort thou wouldst receive thereby, would but produce doleful effects, and the more doleful thy Hunnimonda appeared, the more sensible thou would be of thy affliction. However, Madam,* replied Lyriana, (one of those Virgins whom Mundisic had put to wait upon her, being the Daughter of Cephaloneze) you may be happy, and yet not render Balamir unfortunate: for if his love be real, can he be displeas'd to see you one day sitting upon the Throne of your Ancestors? And will he not prefer your advancement before his own particular satisfaction? But if he loves himself better than he loves Hunnimonda, may you not lawfully dispense with your esteem for him, that would persuade you to flight a Crown? "That thou shouldst so little understand me! replied she, to think that I am one who regulates the motions of my heart; otherwise than according to that real love and acknowledgment which is shewn me!" For my part, added the faithful Zenelia, addressing her self to Lyriana with a kind of disdain, I cannot think it to be the part of a generous Soul to change upon any consideration of pomp or advancement; and I am strongly perswaded that our Prince will never forget that kindness which she has for the illustrious Balamir, though the Prince himself out of an inconstancy, of which I cannot think him capable, should neglect her precious affection. Lyriana durst not reply for fear of being suspected, nevertheless it was soon discovered, that she acted only for Mundisic's interest.

The fair and afflicted Hunnimonda had spent in prayers and tears all the time which the Prince had allotted her: when upon the morning of the third day they brought her most magnificent Habits, and at the foot of the Castle they beheld the numerous Convoy that was to attend her to Olbia. Then Lyriana began to commend Mundisic's Magnificence; but the prudent Princess, instead of breaking out into vehement language, gave her not a word of answer, only she made it appear, that 'twas not outward pomp, or appearance of submission that could move her heart. In the mean time, Mundisic, attended by Bela, and glittering all over with Jewels and precious Stones, entred the Chamber, and notwithstanding his natural fierceness, having saluted the Princess with a very great deal of respect, Madam, said he, will you not surcease at length to oppose our common felicity? Will you not surcease at length, that we may be both as happy as our wishes can make us? Our dispositions are so different, answered she, that I cannot see that your satisfaction can ever prove the content of my mind. Methinks however, replied Mundisic, that if the enjoyment of Hunnimonda could tend to my felicity, that fair Princess should be willing to see her self established in the Throne of her Ancestors, and to be the Queen of a flourishing Nation. I willingly renounce all those glorious claims, replied the generous Princess, and provided you will but allow me that liberty which I was born to, I freely give you leave to bestow those Crowns which you offer me upon some person more ambitious. How, Madam, said he smartly interrupting her, are you still so obstinate in your denials? Will you never leave troubling the repose of a Prince that adores you? But, Sir, will you your self, answered she, never leave persecuting a Prince so worthy of your esteem, will you eternally seek to rob him of what he eternally loves? And will you never be perswaded that Hunnimonda would refuse the fairest Empire in the world to follow the fortune of an illustrious Prince, whose interests ought to be so dear to your self? I can never look upon that happy Rival, fiercely answered he, but as the most irreconcilable of all my Enemies: the more you love him, the more I shall hate; and I will seek him over all the world, to tear out that heart which you so unjustly prefer before Mundisic's: but before I leave you, I will make sure of you, and advance you to that degree you can never expect from Balamir. Sir, replied Hunnimonda with a charming languishment, I believe assuredly that you will never open my eyes to consider the advantages of such a change; and therefore if my Sex and Birth cannot prevail with your passion to be civil to the King of the Goths's Daughter, yet you cannot but remember, that Hunnimonda's consent is necessary for the execution of your design. I am not ignorant, replied he, of the usual formalities: but, Madam, your vanity and my quality dispense with those things at this time. In short, that we may not lose time, taking her briskly by the hand, know that I am in love, that I have all the power in my own hands, and that you must go along with me to Olbia, there to be married in the sight of the immortal Gods, and a multitude of people that will be there assembled at so solemn a Festival. But, Sir, said she, fear you not those immortal Gods that you are about to make witnesses of your violence?

Upon these words she not only beheld Mundisic with a look that would have forced pity, but also let fall some tears from those eyes whose Heavenly power you are so well acquainted withal. Those precious drops distilling from two fountains of fire that had enflamed so many noble hearts, more vehemently scorched the Breast of Mundisic; so that how imperious soever he was wont to be in his passions, he beheld the the charming Princess for some few moments in such a manner, as if there had been some hopes of being mollified: at what time the perfidious Bela addressing his speech to him, "What, Sir, said he, can such a Prince as Mundisic labour under such an injurious irresolution, or can you be insensible of the scandals which it will bring among your people upon your high dignity, and the "noble reputation you have won? Loose no more time Sir, lay aside superfluous words, for when we act for advantage the violence of a provoked passion is to be pardoned, and when you are married you will be soon beloved.

The Princess looked with scorn upon so dangerous a Counsellor, disdainful to return a word of answer, and Mundisc who never much considered what he did, being emboldened by Bela's words, prepared to pull her out of the Room. But the prudent Princess no sooner saw his intention, but she went of her self to avoid uncivil usage. When she came to the Gate of the Castle, she went into the Chariot of her own accord, and suffered her self to be carried to Olbia, without testifying the least reluctance to follow her persecutor. True it is that there was such a mournful sadness appeared in her countenance, that neither the convoy nor the people that met her, had any power to congratulate her with their shouts of acclamation, but were so concerned to see the Princess so melancholy, that there was never less joy seen in the midst of so much magnificence. Hunnimonda was not contented to publish to the world the occasion of her discontents, but being entred into the Palace that was prepared for her she took Mundisc aside, and with a majesty that would have humbled pride it self, Prince of the Huns, said she, *I should not fear the power thou hast over me, did the religion of my Country allow me to put an end to my misfortunes by a voluntary death. But know withal, that though I must submit my life to the disposal of Providence, yet heaven permits me to be absolute Mistress of my liberty: And therefore never expect that I should submit to a yoke, whose weight you have made me feel so heavy before you could impose it. And therefore carry me as often as you please, to the Temple where we are expected, I will declare before your Gods and your people, that I no way give my consent, nay I will speak it so loud and with such a resolution, that I shall have the consolation to see the whole crowd look upon you with horror, when they shall behold me with that compassion, which any heart but Mundisc's would afford me.*

At this very passage Balamir sigh'd, he felt his eyes moist, and he had certainly interrupted Theodolinda, had not his admiration of Hunnimonda's resolution kept him silent, while Theodolinda pursued her story.

The Princess said she, had no sooner spoken these words, but the Prince of the Huns's courage was somewhat shaken notwithstanding his natural savageness; but a few minutes after the heat of his passion, the violence of his humour, Bela's advice and his resentment of a denial, transported him beyond all the respect which ought to have proceeded from his love, and now the Princess must be led to the Temple as a victim to the slaughter. She was no sooner come thither, but Bela who knew her constancy to be immovable, put her into a place encompassed with great Balisters, together with Mundisc and some faithful Officers. As for his part he sat a horseback at the head of a great number of the Guards, to keep off the people, while the Priest who was at the Prince of the Huns devotion, was ready to begin the ceremony. But he no sooner advanced toward Hunnimonda, when she undertaking to speak, with such a presence as would have inspired respect into the most barbarous breast, You are now to make it appear before all the world, said she, *whether you must respect the sacred commands of the Gods, or your own terrestrial interest: The Gods whom you serve forbid you to put any force upon my will, Mundisc commands you to do an act of violence, are you now to consider what course to take, or dare you prefer the injustice of a Tyrant whom you ought to abhor, before those laws which require your adoration?*

Those words pronounced with a Majesty so formidable, begat astonishment in all that stood by, so that they stood with their eyes fixed upon the ground, when the impatient Mundisc offended at their behaviour and silence, threaten'd the Priest with a menacing look, and turned toward Hunnimonda to have upbraided her in her misery: but his fury was disarm'd when he beheld her fair face, that was the innocent cause of his rage. He observed how the lovely Carnation that enlivened her cheeks, gave way to the paleness that came in place, and there was also a languishment in Hunnimonda's eyes, that convinced him of her indisposition. In short the Princess swooned away, not being able to endure your absence nor the indignities of Mundisc: The Prince who really loved her, fearing she might dye should he finish the ceremony, instead of venturing any farther caused her to be carried back to the Palace, and to take all the care imaginable to restore her to her health. In the mean time Bela to blind the people, told them that the Marriage was done, but that the reason why there were no acclamations nor no shouting, was because the Princess was sick with her journey.

This, Brother, was the ground of the report of Mundisc's being married to Hunnimonda, though that fair Princess has always continued faithful to you, so that Mundisc having try'd all ways which he thought proper to gain her affection in vain, abandon'd himself to whatever despair could inspire into a Lover of so violent a humour, that saw himself despised.

I know he had often an intention to have sheathed his sacrilegious Dagger in her bosom, nor did any thing divert him from that barbarous design, but that he would not put an end to the sufferings of a person that was the cause of his. But in short he return'd to Pasris, carrying Hunnimonda along with him although at that time very ill, and after he had warned her with all the reproaches and threatnings which his fury could devise, he departed from thence in a proud disdain, and thinking to use the Princess yet more unmercifully, he left the surly Bela to command the Castle and obey his orders. After he was gone, his creature did but too exactly obey a Prince, from whom he expected all his advancement, and having shut up Hunnimonda in a very close imprisonment, some few days after he came to see her, with this insolent language in his mouth. Troth Madam, said he, I cannot but admire your conduct, and rejoyce to see you in that condition which you have so earnestly sought after. I confess you have marvellously prospered in your designs, for being resolved to contemn grandeur and despise a Prince that proffers you so many diadems, you could not have advanced your self with more honour.

Upon these words the generous Princess losing some part of her moderation, Insolent fellow, disdainfully answered she, Is this the respect which thou shewest to my birth, and to that which fortune cannot take from me? Open thy eyes and behold the Daughter of the King of the Goths, whom thou unjustly detainest a Prisoner by the command of a Tyrant, and if thou hast a mind to proceed to extremity with Hunnimonda, pierce, pierce this heart which I have denied to thy Master, and I will rather pardon thee that murder than thy want of respect.

She pronounced these words with so much Majesty and such a lofty Air, that Bela as audacious as he was was forced to look down, so true it is that Royal Personages bear that character about them, which awes the rest of the world with Fear and Submission. Thus Mundisc's Agent retired notwithstanding the violence of his humour, but he was no sooner out of the Chamber, but having lost that veneration which Hunnimonda's presence inspired in to him, he felt himself transported with rage, and more transported than before to second the intentions of a despairing Lover. Thereupon he began to put a thousand indignities upon that fair and great Princess, he allowed her but two Chambers and a Closet, he fixed grates to the windows so strong and close, that it was impossible for the unfortunate Hunnimonda to see or be seen. He kept a constant Guard at the door night and day, and for fear the Princess might corrupt any of his Soldiers, he took from her all her money and her jewels, all her books wherewith she was wont to divertise her mind, and the use of pen and paper. Yet could not that Barbarian hinder her, but that sometimes she felt some certain motions of joy, when she called to mind that she suffered all this for your sake. Balamir was all her consolation, the name of Balamir was always in her mouth, and the only belief that Balamir was faithful to her, stirred up in her heart those motions of tenderness, that turned her sorrows into real pleasures. Nevertheless a life so deplorable could not have long endured, had not her heart sustained her body, and Zenelia had sunk under the burthen of fatal a melancholy, had not her affection for her illustrious Mistress, produced the same effect in her soul, as that constant courage which was so admired in Hunnimonda. Yet then did that Princess appear no less charming than ever, and there was something of tranquillity still in her countenance, only your absence troubled her repose, that was more harsh to her than her confinement. And those pains which she thought you suffered, more sensibly afflicted her than all her own sufferings.

As for Lyriana who was only shut up with Hunnimonda to serve Mundisc, upon hopes of some great preferment, she soon grew weary of such a melancholy life, seeing how much in vain she laboured for the Prince, from whom she expected her reward: Inasmuch that she desired leave to return to Cephaloneze, but Mundisc unwilling to leave any stone unturn'd, obstinately refused her. Thereupon out of meer madness and for the inconveniences that she suffered every day, she fell into a disease which proved mortal. But though Hunnimonda and Zenelia had then more liberty to talk of you, than before a person that they knew to be treacherous, yet the generous Princess could not forbear to pity Lyriana, though she were a confidant of Mundisc's.

In the mean while there was a hot Alarm in that part of Sarmatia, for the report ran that Agathysus was return'd into his Father's Kingdom, and that he was marching with a formidable Army to regain those places, which the Huns had taken during his abode in Asia. Mundisc who was really a person of a very lofty courage, was fully resolv'd to defend his conquests that had cost so much blood. But he was strangely hamper'd when he found himself oblig'd to send to Court for orders: For in regard he was not much in the King's favour, that he had but few friends, and that the greatest part of the Huns were devoted to your service, he was afraid lest you should be sent for to command the Army to his prejudice, nor could he tell who to pick out to send to Alba Julia: some were more capable, others more zealous. At first he cast his eyes upon Keza, whose merit and valour you know. But besides that, he did not like the honesty of that good man, he was afraid to call him from his command at such a time. On the other side, believing himself to be hated by all the Huns, he was unwilling to trust any one of that Nation, and therefore pitched upon Saturninus a Roman. That Stranger was a person of wit and courage, and which rendered him the more acceptable, he had only served under himself, and had never known you. However, the Prince changed his mind, when he considered that Saturninus had little or no acquaintance at Alba Julia: so that at length no person pleased him like Bela; and yet his unwillingness to take him from Paziris, kept him in a cruel suspense; but still there was a necessity of powerful recruits to defend a Country that was to be so vigorously attacked. In the mean while, the fair Princess and her faithful Zenelia spent their time usually in talking of you and your condition; when on a sudden they heard the Trumpets sound, and the noise of several great Bodies of Horse upon the march, Zenelia was very glad, imagining that no change could happen so bad, that it was not to be wished for: Pray God, said she to Hunnimonda more than usually merry, it be not Prince Balamir come to set us at liberty! Ab, Zenelia, answered the Princess, canst thou flatter thy self with a hope so far distant from probability. 'Tis but too true I fear me, that Balamir is dead, or at least not in those Countries that have been so fatal to him: I knew his heart, I knew his affection; and I make no question but he believes that Mundisic has married Hunnimonda, and has thereupon renounced all the interests in the world.

I had renounced them indeed, cryed the enamoured Balamir: but alas, some secret fatality has inspired into me a tenderness for the Queen of the Cimbrians, notwithstanding the passion which I have always preserv'd for my divine Hunnimonda.

The Princess of the Goths had no sooner made some such kind of reflection, pursued Theodolinda, but she fell into a deep meditation upon what she had to say, so that Zenelia being desirous to abate some part of her melancholy, Madam, said she, what can fall out, from whence we may not hope for some ease of those miseries which cannot be multiplied. If the King of the Huns recover the Country which is at Mundisic's devotion, will not your fortune then change with all the advantage you can wish for. On the other side, if the Prince of the Sarmatians regain the same Country which the Huns possess in his Territories, will it not be to your satisfaction to leave the tyranny of Mundisic for the protection of Agathyrus? But, Zenelia, replied she, fetching a deep sigh, should I recover my liberty, should they set me upon the Throne of my Ancestors, what good would all those felicities do me without Balamir? For if that Prince be dead, what is there more for me to wish? For my part, replied Zenelia, I cannot imagine that Balamir would make away with himself, how great soever his torments were, so long as yours lasted. But dost thou believe, replied the Princess, that there is any way to make publick Hunnimonda's destiny? I will make it known my self, replied Zenelia with a confident utterance, for the march of so many Troops cannot be disadvantageous to my Princess.

Having so said, she sought always to bring about her purpose; but not being able to find any, by reason that she could neither call, nor be seen out at a window, she cut of a picce of Sheet-Lead that lined some part of the Room, and with her Bodkin, instead of a Graver, she wrote those words,

WHo ever you are that pass by these Walls a foot, know that Heaven has not brought you this way, but only that you may have the Honour to free the fair, but unfortunate Hunnimonda. She has been several Months confined in this Castle, and the unjust Mundisic, the Ravisher that tyrannizes over her, dayly puts innumerable Indignities upon her. That's enough for you to understand, if you are but sufficiently generous to attempt her deliverance.

When she had written those words, she threw the piece of Lead out at Window, with such a force, that the ditch not being very broad, the Lead fell into the great high way, where the Troops were to march. It happened also by good luck, that Saturninus, whom I have mentioned already, was then near the place, and saw the Lead fall; who thereupon taking it presently up, read what Zenelia had written, and immediately resolved to serve a Princess so unworthy to suffer what she endured. But knowing himself not in a condition to set her free without assistance, and being acquainted with Keza's Generosity, who rode over to that famous Hun, who lay quartered at this side Paziris, and shewed him what he had found, as a motive to take Hummimonda's part: Keza, who from his heart detested the violences of Mundisc, who was overjoyed at such an opportunity to serve the Princess, and Saturninus having promised to second his diligence, they consulted together what course to take to bring their design to perfection. Saturninus went back to his Squadron, and coming with all speed to Olbia, whither Mundisc was arrived some days before, he went and paid his respects to that Prince whose esteem he had already gain'd. On the other side, Keza went to the Castle of Paziris to visit Bela, and was by him received with all the honour and all the demonstrations of joy that could be shewn to a Knight of his Quality and Reputation. Now in regard it was very proper to talk of the great preparations against the next Spring, it was not long ere the two Huns fell to discourse upon that subject, and Keza beginning according to his design: I believe, Sir, said he, that being in so great favour with the Prince of the Huns as you are, you will hardly leave this Castle to take a Command in the Army, otherwise the war which is generally the spring of honour and reward, would become prejudicial to you on which side soever the victory falls; for if Agathyrus be Victor, then you will lose your command; if Mundisc conquer Agathyrus, he will be sure pursue his victory, and so Paziris will be inconsiderable, ceasing to be a Frontier Town. Bela listened very attentively, and Keza finding him begin to waver, continued his speech to this effect, Do you not think, said he, that all commands that are near the person of the Prince are not to be preferred before those that are at a great distance, how important soever their services may have been? For my part, I am of opinion, that no great Officer can be in any security that follows not the Court; for they are subject every moment to be destroyed by a word or two spoken to their prejudice. I agree to what you say, answered Bela, and therefore it is not without reason that I am troubled to see my self shut up in this Fort, when every body else is in the Field. But, Sir, I hope you will not refuse me your assistance, having given me your advice, rather that you will stand my Friend to obtain that leave which I shall entreat you to beg of your Prince in my behalf. It will be no difficult thing for you to obtain your wishes; nor will it be a hard matter in such a numerous Army to find out employments more proper for you, nor difficult for him to find out persons more fitting for this courage. It may be, answered Bela, it will not be so easy as you think for, to find out a person fitting to be entrusted with this Castle, and you will confess as much when you shall understand that the Fort is not so considerable as what I keep therein by Mundisc's command.

Having so said, he looked upon Keza more earnestly than before, and being well acquainted with his sincerity, he made no scruple to declare to him all the concerns of his fair prisoner the Princess. Upon those words, the General of the Huns dissembled the surprize which it was convenient for him to shew in his face; and then resuming his discourse with more earnestness than before: "Having told me what you have done, said he, there is no dallying any longer in the case; for besides that in the Army you will serve your Master with more honour, than in spending your time with his unjust passions: most certainly while you persecute Hummimonda, you will but draw upon your self the King's displeasure, Balamir's anger, and Mundisc's contempt, when better thoughts have opened his eyes; it may be all Generosity is not quite extinguished in his Soul; and though the Prince should be so unhappy as not to be capable of so fair a virtue, are you therefore to renounce it your self? Would it not better become you to appear with your Sword in your hand in a Battel fighting for the honour of our Nation, than to be doing poor offices which nobody dares mention; So far will you be from receiving those applauses which are due to noble actions?"

Instead of saying any more, taking notice that Bela was sufficiently convinced, he only then discoursed him after what manner he should steer his course in so ticklish a conjuncture, and having consulted with him how to carry on his own design, he left Paziris without so much as asking to see Hummimonda, guelling that such a visit might create a suspicion, should it be known that he had made it, whereas he might be otherwise more serviceable to the Princess.

After this, Keza attended very diligently upon Mundisc, and he had not been with him

above three days before he received a Letter from Bela, as they had agreed at Paziris, conjuring him to second the petition which he had sent to Mundisic for an employment. The Prince seem'd very much perplexed what answer to make to a person who was first to be prepared before he could speak. But having a great esteem for Keva, in regard the noble Knight spake to him in the behalf of the Governour of Paziris, he made no scruple to trust him with his secret, to the end he might more justly consult him in an affair of so much importance: For my part, Sir, said the General of the Huns, I should never stand to remove a person from a charge of which he professes himself weary; nor would I stay till his fidelity were corrupted by his stomaching a denial. But, Keva, replyed the Prince somewhat disturbed, who is there among all the Huns whom I can entrust to secure the Queen of the Goths? There Keva paused a while, but afterwards the better to carry on his design, 'Tis very true, Sir, replyed he, there are very few in our Nation that may not be tempted to restore the Princess to her Father, in hopes of a reward which Prince Balamir may be forward enough to promise: but, Sir, cannot you think of an honest Officer that has no relation to our Court. I know one, replyed the Prince, that I think very fit to succeed Bela: but in regard he is a Stranger, and has no tie in our Country, you cannot believe it safe to commit the fortune of the Princess I adore to such an one. It may be said as well, Sir, replyed the Knight, that the quality of a Stranger can give no suspicion in this case. For in short, the Princess of the Goths is not in a condition to gain an Officer by presents: nor is it probable she can ever persuade him, by letting her go to renounce the recompense which he may be may expect from your liberality. Mundisic made some kind of reflection upon that discourse, and retorting afterwards all of a sudden: You speak reason, said he to the General of the Huns, and I think Saturninus to be a very fit person to be entrusted with a charge as precious to me as my life. I confess, said Keva, that Saturninus really deserves to be chosen out for such an employment, and there is no question but he will very faithfully acquit himself.

He had no sooner spoken those words, but the Italian entred into Mundisic's Chamber, who having determined to bestow the Government of Paziris upon him, received him after a most obliging manner. He declared his intentions to him, he instructed him in all things that he could possibly think or imagine to tell him; and in a few days he dispatched him away to supply Bela's place, whom he sent for into the Army. Saturninus had no sooner taken possession of the Castle where Hunnimonda was imprisoned, but he behaved himself as respectfully toward the Princess, as Bela had carried himself rudely; and coming often to comfort her, he found something that was very amiable in Zenelia's face. He was also taken with that fidelity which the Generous Virgin shewed to her Mistress; and he had discovered his thoughts to her, but that considering the place he held, and the condition to which Zenelia was reduced, the more power he had to speak, the more it became him to be respectful and wary. However, his eyes, his complaisance, his passionate diligence, which could not be the effects of an indifferent love, gave her to understand that her charms had subdued Saturninus's liberty: nor was the lovely Maid, as modest as she was, troubled at all to perceive the effects of her Beauty, not only for that Saturninus was both virtuous and deserving, but above all that she might thereby be serviceable to the unfortunate Princess.

One day that this same Knight met with a favourable opportunity to entertain the person whom he loved: "How much to be dreaded are you, said he, most charming Zenelia, you reign where you are not at liberty your self, and Saturninus wears your Fetters in a place where all the world acknowledges his authority." "You will not easily persuade me to such a belief, replyed she, for as long as I am in Mundisic's prison, I shall never believe that any person wears my Fetters that has power to break my chains." "I could resolve to break them, replyed Saturninus, but after all, how unjust soever Mundisic be, ought I not to remember that he has entrusted me with all that is dear to him in this world? And is it not lawful for me to wish that you might recover your liberty without any blemish to my honour? You are too prudent for a person that professes so great a passion, slightly replyed she, but since you take part with tyranny, and that the interests of our persecutors are so dear to you, never come—" "Ah, too severe Princess, answered he, impatiently interrupting her, why interpret you my words with so much cruelty? And why do you so bloodily reproach me, when out of a thought that you cannot but approve, I only fear to lose your esteem by proffering a kindness? To cure you of that scruple, replyed Zenelia, consider that Mundisic is no Prince of yours, that you give weapons to a mad man, by obeying him so exactly; and that if you are engaged to preserve Paziris for him, all the Laws dispense with your being an instrument of his inhumanity." "In a word, I beg at your hands the Princess's liberty, tell me whether I may expect it. or “if——” Yes yes, you shall have it, cryed he interrupting her in a very passionate manner, “for there is nothing that Saturninus can refuse the amiable Zenelia, but I beseech you Madam, let us be careful how we undertake an enterprize of this nature. Mundisic is in love, it may be he has spies upon me, and I am certain that the Garison is not all so much under my command, as publickly to give you your liberty. However deny me not your advice, and let the noble flame which you have kindled in my heart, enlighten my invention and shew me the way which I am to take, at such a ticklish conjuncture as this. Zenelia glad to see her Lover so well enclined, Generous Saturninus, said she, I was not at all deceiv'd in my hopes when I observed your civil behaviour, I believed, I told the Princess, that heaven was at length moved with our misfortunes, since it had put into your hands the government of the place of our captivity. 'Tis your part to make good my belief, and mine to seek after all means that may bring our designs to a good issue. Do you your duty, and be assured that Zenelia's heart shall never fail of acknowledgment.

'Twas about this time that they feared Lyriana would dye, so that her indisposition increasing they wrote to Mundisic, that the health of the Princess was in some danger. The Prince was really afflicted at it, and in regard his passions did partake of the impetuosity of his temper, he would have quitted all things to have returned to Hunnimonda; had not Keza who corresponded with Zenelia and Saturninus, taken great care to divert him. He represented to the Prince that the very sight of him, might cause new troubles in the Princess, and that his presence would prove as hurtful at Paziris, as it was necessary at Olbia, where was the general Rendezvous of all the Army. Besides the Sarmatians making inroads upon all that side of the Country, he laid before him that there could be no safety for him, unless he took along with him the greatest part of his forces, but that at that time it would be of dangerous consequence to divide the Army. At length he persuaded the Prince who was pretty well satisfied, that his going to Paziris would signify little. But some few days after Keza was harder put to it, to manage his impatience, as you shall hear.

Lyriana's sickness encreasing, that poor Victim to Mundisic's passion dyed, notwithstanding all the remedies that were used for her recovery: The Princess and Zenelia who were truly generous, were sorry for her death; but when Saturninus and his Lieutenant came in haste to see her before she expired, Zenelia was nothing sorry that he beheld more sorrow in her face, than she might probably be sensible of. She met them and beginning her speech after an ingenious manner, in language which Hunnimonda might as well have uttered as Lyriana, she still spoke nothing contrary to truth. You see Sirs, said she, that only death can put a period to our miseries, and hereby you may judge what we are to expect from Mundisic, when a person that was so dear to him or else ought to have been so, could not break those chains, which that unjust Prince had put upon her Arms, but by breaking the bonds of life. But for your parts I cannot think you so hard-hearted, as to suffer the unhappy Captives that survive, so miserably to perish, and I hope that when you give Mundisic an account of what has happened, you will both put in a good word for two persons, whose acknowledgment may not be contemptible.

After she had so said she pulled her veil over her eyes, and retiring to the farther end of the Chamber, she gave the Officer that was with Saturninus, liberty to confirm himself in the opinion which he had already conceived, that the Princess was dead. Herderic, for so was he called, was one of those Soldiers of fortune, who knew nothing but what concerns their trade, insomuch that never having had any inclination to visit Ladies, he never had seen those at Paziris, nor knew so much as their faces. Saturninus who was well assured thereof, failed not to second Zenelia's intentions, and so walking with Herderic toward the fair Maid, Madam, said he, *I know you can procure us friends at the Court of Alba Julia, and that Prince Balamit will never let those kind offices which we have done for you go unrewarded, But though we should not interest our selves in your concerns at this time upon those considerations, yet humanity it self which as not altogether left us in the Army, persuades us to take your part, and to assist you in the change of your fortune, and without doubt it must of necessity change: For besides that 'tis very improbable that the Prince should trouble himself in vain, to give me any order to the contrary, I believe he will be too sadly afflicted, when he shall upbraid himself to have been the cause of the Princesses death, to have any thoughts of persecuting those Virgins that served her: so that you may be absolutely assured, Madam, that I shall leave nothing undone to procure your liberty, from this captivity which you have so long suffered. Herderic who pities the desolation that we behold is going for Olbia, he will see the Prince, and after he has made a faithful relation of what has happened, he will not fail to add a few prayers, to the petition I shall make in your behalf.* After this communication Saturninus and Herderic departed: And the Roman Knight wrote both to the Prince and Keua, the Letter to the Prince being to this effect.

Saturninus to the Prince of the Huns.

SIR, the news that you will receive will be so lamentable and so doleful, that I have not the heart to mention it, and I had rather you should understand it from Herderic's mouth, than be the publisher my self. He will let you understand the loss that you have sustained notwithstanding all your care, and therefore seeing that this change will cause you to alter your resolutions, I expect your commands which I shall obey with more zeal, than I had an inclination to afflict you

This Letter and the Relation that followed were so terrible to Mundisc, and excited such a redoublement of love in his heart, that the Prince suffering himself to be guided by the impetuosity of his temperament, was about to have left all things at six and sevens, to post to the place where he thought he might still view the body of Hunnimonda. Keua laboured very hard to divert him from a design so much to be feared, but seeing all his entreaties and all his arguments nothing availed, he resolved to oppose a violent passion with a smart resentment. "Sir, said he, I beseech you consider and do not leave the Army, do not run to Paziris only to see a dead Corpse, which can be nothing but a spectacle of horror: But this is not all Sir, will you go weep over a Victim wholly devoted to your Rival? Can you testify your self so highly afflicted for a person, that chose rather to dye miserable for Balamir, than to live sitting upon your Throne? Ah no no, Keua, replied he transported with jealousy, no longer will I bewail that ingrateful person, that has preferred Balamir before me with so much obstinacy and boldness.

Having so said he held his peace, but a few moments after love and grief inspiring him, "Why, pursued he staring with his eyes, why should I not bewail the death of a fair Princess, that I my self have brought to her grave. "Yes, added he sighing, 'twas I that was the cause of her death, 'twas my inhumanity that held a dagger to her breast, so far from admiring her constancy, that I used all the tyranny I could to shake it. After all this who can condemn my affliction for having been so barbarous, for having been the murderer of Hunnimonda?

He spoke with so much vehemency, that at length his grief, the agitation of his mind, and the heat of his temper excited such troubles in his heart, that they almost disturbed his reason: Inasmuch that instead of thinking any more upon going to Paziris, he fell into a rambling discourse, wherein he often confusedly mentioned the names of Hunnimonda, Balamir and Keua. Sometimes he asked pardon of you as well as the Princess, for the misfortunes he had occasioned to both. These transportations of mind endured for three or four days, and had weakned him in such a manner, that he was not only not in a condition to take a journey at that time, but his impetuosity waxing less violent, he began to give ear to Keua and to follow his advice: So soon therefore as the generous Knight took notice of the Calm, which the abatement of heat and want of strength had produced in the breast of Mundisc, he drew near the Prince and in mournful language, "Sir, said he, 'tis not my business now to oppose your desire to see Hunnimonda. By this time you cannot but think, that her Corps can be no other than a ghastly spectacle, and therefore instead of taking a journey to no purpose, were it not better to send order for the funeral of that Princess, whose death you so lament? Is not your resentment dead with her, or can it hinder you from paying to the deceased Hunnimonda, the last tribute due to mortality? "No Keua, no, answered the Prince, for I will erect a magnificent Monument in memory of that admirable Princess, and engrave upon her Tomb all the marks of my love and grief. This is all I can do, and this is all that remains for me to do for the fair and unfortunate Hunnimonda. Yes, replied Keua, you may do her one kind office more, and that is by giving the two Virgins that served her their liberty. However Sir, added he very politickly, 'tis for your interest to send out of our Territories such persons, as I believe have no kindness at all for you, who in bewailing their Mistress will talk of your rigor after such a manner, as will make but bad impressions in the hearts of all that hear them: And in my opinion 'tis no way convenient, that a people who are one day to live under your laws, should have their ears filled with complaints, which they may take for acts of your injustice. You “ speak reason, replied Mundisc, I think it absolutely necessary that Zenelia be sent out “ of the dominions of the Huns, but I think there is no such necessity but Lyriana may stay.

“speak

 “ Oh Sir, you cannot imagine, said he, that Lyriana will ever applaud the ill usage she re“ ceived at your hands during her confinement, (so she termed her abode at Paziris) for you “ know that although she took your part all the while she lay sick, you would not give her “ leave to return to Cephaloneze for the recovery of her health: And in regard she never fa“ voured the Princess, her complaints will be less suspected and more dangerous than “ Zenelia's.

Mundisc having made a short reflection upon Keza's words, “ I will follow your advice;
 “ said he, so that we are now only to consider whom to trust, for the conveying those two “ Virgins away. That's a thing very easie to determine, replied Keza, for I conceive that “ Saturninus being a person so conceited of his own Country that he despises all others, will “ not think much to return into Italy, and to carry along with him such persons, as they
 “ that shall oblige him by the effects of your liberality.

Mundisc pleased with what the General of the Huns had said, sent very considerable presents to Saturninus, made him larger promises, and charged him to convey away quite out of our dominions, both Zenelia and Lyriana. The Roman Knight full of love and generosity, was overjoyed to receive those orders which he so ardently waited for, and then which the Princess desired nothing more but that they should be quickly executed, for she had no mind to stay in those Provinces, where she might fall again under the power of Mundisc.
 Besides she had a great desire to see me, believing she might live with her dear Theodolinda, with more comfort and with more reputation, than with any other person in the world.
 But before her departure she was willing that Saturninus should receive his reward, for besides that the fortune of the Roman who was of a noble extraction, would thereby be well fixed in the world, she wisely thought it inconvenient to undertake so long a journey with him, till Zenelia and he were mutually affianc'd together.

After that she deemed it necessary to change her name, in regard her own was so well known over all Europe, but here, Brother, we may admire the quick invention which her tender affection toward you inspired into her: She never studied for the choice of a name but presently called her self Balamira, pleased that she should always hear your name repeated, while she was called by her own. True it is that when she came into Saturninus's Country, the Italians more polite than our Nations, accustomed themselves to call her Bellamira, as being more soft in pronunciation. And thus brother, by that only name you may understand already, the greatest part of those Adventures, which yet remain for me to relate.

How Sister, said Balamir interrupting her, is it possible that the divine Hunnimonda should call her self Bellamira, through an effect only of that kindness wherewith she honoured Balamir?
 'Twas only by a motive of that very affection, Brother, that she chose that name which has been so famous in the world, and only under that name has she done so many great and obliging actions, for your sake. I know confusedly, replied he, that Honorius saw Bellamira in Trajan's garden, that he became desperately in love with her, and that his favourite Heraclian was enamour-ed of that incomparable Princess, with the same violence of passion. I have also heard of the famous revolt of that Roman, and of his carrying Hunnimonda away by force: I have also been convinced that if the divine Hunnimonda's Soul, were too large for the Empires that were offered her, her courage appeared yet more heroick, when that generous Lady alone unarm'd in an enemies Country slew her Ravisher, to defend her honour which she infinitely priz'd beyond her life. Well then, replied Theodolinda, I shall but lightly touch upon those particulars, which fame has already brought to your knowledge, and dilate only upon those which I am sure you never heard of.

So soon as the incomparable Hunnimonda, (whom I shall call hence forward by the name of Bellamira) had passed the Alpes, I was advertised thereof by her own order, and she was no sooner arrived at a house, which Saturninus's Father had built near Trajan's garden, but I made hast thither with that impatience and joy which I cannot express. Immediately we ran to each other, we threw our Arms about each others necks, and thus we stood for a good while mutually embraced, not having the power to speak, while the tears which affection and the remembrance of our past misfortunes drew from our fair eyes, trickled down our checks. Dear Sister, cryed I at length, am I certain that I see you again, and that you are that incomparable Hunnimonda, who has been dead in the opinion of all the world? So she be not dead in Theodolinda's breast, answered she, nor in Balamir's heart, she troubles not her self with the rest of all the world.

Pronouncing those words she embraced me with all her strength, and beheld me with charming eyes that have enthralled so many illustrious Hero's. Afterwards there pass'd some complements which are usual upon the first interview, but ere we came to a conclusion you were all the subject of our discourse. Balamir only was the subject of our communication and our disquiet, we enquired of each other what news concerning him, as fearful as earnest to know what was become of him, and not being able either of us to resolve the question, we both of us sigh'd at the same time, though both for different reasons. In short, I must confess that the sadness which appeared in my face, was far less obliging than the passionate languishment that I saw in her fair eyes, and I farther observed that she must be a good Sister indeed, that was so deeply sensible of the loss of a brother, as she was of the loss of a Lover. Yet was Bellamira so far from being happy, that on the contrary she had no other content, but what she received from my company, which it was impossible for me to afford her so often as I intended. And therefore when I could not dispense from being at Court or with the Princess Placidia, the Queen of the Goths spent her time in Trajan's Garden, either meditating upon the banks of Tyber, or else retired within some solitary grove adjoining: One day that I went to Saturninus's house later than I was wont, she not expecting me, was gone to walk where her melancholy for your absence led her.

Honorius who at that time had some thoughts upon me, came to look for me at Saturninus's house, but seeing Hunnimonda as you have heard already, he fell so deeply in love with her, that the violence of his passion seem'd to exceed the ordinary humour of that Prince, whose temper you know has a softness too mean for the offspring of Theodosus. This passion whatsoever it were at the beginning, encreas'd to such a degree in a few days, that Honorius fondly offer'd her his Empire, before he knew so much as her extraction. But the magnanimous Princess was so far from accepting such a splendid present, that it was the only satisfaction which she then enjoyed, that she had refus'd one of the most glorious Thrones in the world for the love of Balamir.

True it is, that though she had never told me what she had refus'd, to the great astonishment of all the Court, yet was I not ignorant of any circumstance of that noble denial, so that I went to Hunnimonda, and as soon as I saw her, I ran to her and embraced her with a redoubled affection. Dear Sister, said I to her in a kind of extasie that I could not moderate, By what means can the fortunate Balamir ever requite what you have done for his sake? Ah Sister, answer'd she, you are too good natur'd, Alas what have I done to merit that acknowledgment which you speak of, and the inestimable caresses of your favour? I confess, reply'd I after an ironical manner, 'tis no great wonder for a person of our Sex to crave death, and for a Princess despoil'd of the fortune of her Ancestors, to refuse the Empire of the greatest part of the world. But after all, added I seriously, though you have forgot that Bellamira did all this, you must not think to hinder all the world, and future Ages from preserving it in memory. Though it were true, reply'd she, that I had shew'd some constancy of courage, how do you know Sister whether Prince Balamir would be more oblig'd to me, than I should be beholding to him? For in short, said she with a pleasing smile accompanied with a modest blush, I should never believe Balamir to be fix'd in my heart as he is, were there any thoughts there that could displease him, or be unworthy of his esteem.

Thus the affectionate and generous Bellamira, made her self a debtor to you for the kindness which she continually shew'd you, and not only refus'd the first degree of honour in the world with an admirable constancy, but what was more extraordinary in a heart like hers, she resist'd the very tears of Honorius. That Son of the great Theodosus wept a hundred times in vain at her feet, and without moving in the least that strong affection which she preserv'd for a Prince, of whom she could not so much as hear any tidings. Nevertheless this behaviour of Hunnimonda that in a manner surpris'd all Italy, wrought no change at all in the heart of Honorius, for the fair Princess still command'd with Sovereign power over the Emperours heart, as the happy Balamir still reign'd in hers. But at length that generous Lady mov'd with pity toward a Prince that so highly oblig'd her, strove to remove the cause of a passion so improbable to be happy in the event, and declar'd to me the resolution that she had taken, in such language as manifest'd her affection both for you and me. Dear Sister, said she embracing me, there is an absolute necessity for us to part: The malignant Star that has persecuted me from my infancy, envying those pleasures which I tast in your company, hales me from your Arms, and to separate me from Theodolinda, convinces me that Balamir's interest commands my quick departure. " Ah Sister, cry'd I, forbear to proceed in a design, that already so much afflicts me: For in short, though you are not able to hearken to Honorius in prejudice of my Brother, what need you take any course so grievous to your friends? " What, said she interrupting me with surpris'e, would you have me endure that “any other than Balamir should give me proofs of his affection every moment; or that being obliged to Honorius, my presence should inspire such thoughts into his heart as cannot but trouble his repose? No, my Princess, cried I, I desire nothing that may give you any offence. But I must confess, added I, embracing her in my Arms, I desire your company, and there is nothing which I would not do to enjoy so great a happiness. Nevertheless, replied Bellamira, I do not see how it is possible for us to enjoy that satisfaction; for indeed there is an absolute necessity for me to avoid Honorius, seeing that though Balamir should never know that Bellamira is Hunnimonda, or that she had despised for his sake the chiefest Throne in the world, Hunnimonda must not for all that forbear to do those things which her own virtue claims from her self, with as much right as Balamir has reason to expect them from the most exact and scrupulous constancy.

In short, Brother, Bellamira was resolved to be gone; and all that I could do by my often repeated prayers and entreaties, was, to prevail that she would not depart out of Italy, to the end we might write one to another, and have the happiness to travel together to Alba Julia, when my Father should call me home. I need not tell you that the fair Princess fled to Ravenna, which is no more than you know, as also in a short time the Emperour followed her thither, that he might abide inseparable from her charms; whereby abandoned Rome became a prey to the terrible Alaric. But this you must know that the Emperour of the Romans and the Queen of the Goths lived in that manner together till the revolt of Herzelian. You have heard how that Favourite rebelled in Africa where he was governour, that he came to Ravenna, that he took away Bellamira by force, and that at length he was killed by the courageous Hunnimonda, at a time when he was about to have done her an injury less supportable than death it self. You may well guess then, Brother, what was Theodolinda's grief when she understood that Bellamira was carried away to Carthage, and her self separated by the Sea from a person so dear to her? I protest that all the afflictions of a Siege without any hopes of being relieved, less disturbed my mind, during Rome's misfortunes, than the force put upon Bellamira. But at length the fair Princess wrote to me, and I understood by her Letter that she was gone to Hyppone, there to find some consolation in the company of a renowned personage, who was called S. Austin, a man of great virtue and sublime wit. It was to the counsel of this prudent African that we owe the return of Hunnimonda, for she believing you were dead, would have led a languishing life in some religious retirement, never dreaming to have return'd into Germany, had not the holy Austin perswaded her to the contrary, by an inspiration that seem'd to promise more prosperity than yet we had experienced. In short, Bellamira and I being mutually advertis'd of the time of our departure for Alba Julia, and being desirous to travel together some part of the way, we appointed to meet in these Countries: Hunnimonda not daring to pass through Italy, or Gallia, for fear of falling again under the power of Honorius. But no sooner had the fair Princess, whom Zenelia never forsook, and whom Saturninus attended in Africa, set foot upon the European Shoar, but together with the news of the irreconcilable war between the Cimbrians and Franks, she also heard the fatal tydings of Balamir's infidelity. At first she would not believe it, but when it was confirm'd to her with all the circumstances by several persons of great reputation, nay, by the report of whole Nations, she had not power to withstand this last stroke of misfortune; even that constancy of courage, which had rendred her so famous, quite forsook her in that terrible conjuncture. That undaunted Princess that had brav'd death and fortune, could not support her self against your inconstancy: that sprightly air that enlivened her fair countenance gave place to pallid languishment; and those eyes, those lovely eyes that were wont to dart forth flames and terror, lay drown'd in tears, while she complain'd of your injustice. She usually address'd her lamentations to the generous wife of Saturninus; and Zenelia found so much reason, and felt such charms in her grief, that she could not chuse but have the same resentments of her injuries: Alas, said the disconsolate Bellamira, fetching a deep sigh, what crime have I committed? By which of my actions have I drawn upon my head such a crowd of dismal misfortunes? Was it not enough for me to see my Father's Throne quite overturned, but that I must be torn from the Arms of her that brought me forth? Was it not enough to be under the tyranny and imprisonment of Mundilic, to see his Sword bent against my Breast to sacrifice me to his rage, but the malignity of my fate must separate me from what I loved? Not the loss of Kingdoms, not all the force that has been put upon me, not all my being threatened with death, not all the attempts of my Ravishers ever came so near my heart as this last injury which I have received. Then addressing her self to you, as if you had been there, Well, ingrateful Prince, added she, I look upon thy infidelity more inhumane than all the violences of Mundilic or Heraclian. They never were beloved by Hunnimonda, but thou hast received the most obliging testimonies of her affection.

on. Ab, Balamir, is it possible thou should court Rosamond for the sake of a Crown, when I for the love of thee fled from Honorius, who offered me the most splendid Throne in the world? Then turning toward the companion of her misfortunes and her sorrows, Ab, Zenelia, said she, what have I done that can justify Balamir's inconstancy? Nothing but was great, answered she with tears in her eyes, nothing but was heroic, nothing but what might deserve the heart of the most renowned person in the world. Wherefore then, replied she, has Balamir prov'd inconstant? Because, said she, you are out of sight, Rosamond still in his eyes, and because he is only a man.

These were Hunnimonda's and Zenelia's lamentations, after they understood the news of your change. But when Theodolinda and she met together, Ab, cried I, fair Princess, how charitable you are still to preserve a kindness for Balamir's Sister? but while you are sincere it behoves not me to prove unjust: I take your part against the most ingrateful of men, and wholly devote my self to your interest. You are too generous a Friend, answered the afflicted Hunnimonda; but I fear you will not be thought a charitable Sister in condemning Balamir's proceedings. I confess my self, the Queen of the Cimbrians is more beautiful, and her fortune more splendid; and that the inconstancy of the Prince your Brother may pass rather for an effect of his judgment, than a mark of lightness.

Such as this was generally our discourse, and though we usually sought out the most retired and solitary places, yet we still met upon the Road either the Princes, or the attendants of those Princes that served in Pharamond's Army. Bellamira, who avoided all society, was troubled at it, yet this was her comfort, that she met with no person that knew her: only the other day she was somewhat surpris'd to see Artabure in a Country from whence she thought him far enough off. That famous Roman no sooner perceived the Princess whom he also loved, but in a most respectful manner falling upon one knee, Divine Bellamira, said he, you need not fear the approach of a person that dares not draw so near with any other thoughts than those of veneration Your beauty and your virtue have wrought quite contrary effects in mine, to what they produced in the heart of Heraclion: I seek after you only for my Matter's sake, to establish your felicity: for I have order from the Emperour, to assure you that he has not yet changed his mind. I offer you more earnestly, and with more submission than before, the Crown of the great Theodolius, and with that Diadem a heart whose affection and fidelity are to be preferred before all the Thrones in the world.

Those words made Hunnimonda sigh; she could not chuse, when she heard them, but accuse her self of injustice to Honorius, and be ashamed of her self, that she could not hate a person that had forgot her upon the first sight of another Beauty. Nevertheless, not all the obliging protestations which he made her on the Emperour's behalf, nor the crime of an inconstant Lover could move her heart. Still you remained there with absolute Dominion, notwithstanding your egregious levity: and Hunnimonda return'd for answer only certain complements of her acknowledgment both to Honorius, and to Artabure. No, no, my Princess, replied Bellamira, these are no examples for me to imitate; if Balamir be guilty, his crime cannot justify a fault in me. But would it not be great satisfaction, replied I, to behold from the Throne of the Cæsars, your Rival moving with Balamir in a lower orb?

At those words Bellamira blushed and sigh'd; but then with a languishing and dying tone, Ab, my dear Sister, pursued she, that you should be so little acquainted with Hunnimonda's heart, and Balamir's merit! Can you believe that I should be less troubled to see Rosamond Balamir's Wife, than she would be to see me Empress of the Romans? Alas, how different are these two sorts of jealousy! Jealousie of greatness is not half so powerful in a heart like mine, which obeys no law but that of my affection. But most heroic Princess, cried I, transported in mind, what is it that you intend to do? Die for grief, replied she, fetching a deep sigh, for I can no longer live, since the ingrateful Balamir lives no longer mine. After those sad words, she let fall some tears from those divine eyes that formerly you would have so religiously adored. Then turning them toward me, as she wept in a languishing posture that would soon have made you shake off your last chains: Fair Princess, continued she, I have but one thing more to beg of that generous friendship of yours, of which you have given me so many proofs: Tell the inconstant Balamir that his infidelity cost me my life, that he sheathed a more fatal weapon in my Breast than the Sword of Mundisic: and relate to him the manner of my death with all the circumstances that may produce a repentance in him for the crime that caused it. But, alas, replied she, redoubling her sighs, with what vain hopes do I flatter my misfortune? No, no, my Princess, there's no talking to that fickle Lover, of Bellamira's deplorable fate; for he pursues his Courtship to Rosamond, and never mentions to her the Princess of the Goths, which as a Victim he has prepared to sacrifice to her charms. But after all, replied I impatiently, if Balamir be really perswaded that Hunnimonda is lost to him, either by death or marriage with Mundilic, does he not prove thereby the less guilty, and may he not at length dry up his tears upon the sight of the Queen of the Bohemians. No, said she, he could not without injustice, his heart was mine, he should have preserved it for me to the last gasp: there I ought still to have lived, notwithstanding the pretended death that separated us. Alas! who would have said that Hunnimonda, should have set Balamir an example of constancy, and that Balamir would not follow it? Ah Balamir ingrateful Balamir, how cruel art thou to the constant and disconsolate Hunnimonda, who was always thine. Ah Queen of the Cimbrians too fortunate Princess, if the ornaments of thy Soul are correspondent to the beauties of thy face, why art thou more rigorous than fortune, why hast thou deprived me of the only felicity that she left me, to comfort me for the loss of all the rest? Hast thou not renowned Captives enough to wear thy chains, but thou must covet Balamir from me? But wherefore do I always flatter myself, added she redoubling her sighs, ought I not to consider that the malignant Star that governs my unfortunate days, preserves me alive only to persecute me without ceasing? But alas my miseries are not yet compleat, inhumanity still pursues me, and that fatal constellation hurries me into a crowd of misfortunes, and provoked at the constancy which I shewed in those assaults whence it delivered me, it assails my heart upon the score of affection, to sink it into utter ruine. That fate which could not move me with the splendid proffers of Crowns and Scepters, that could not scare me with the threats of fire and sword, at length to overturn my constancy must render Balamir unfaithful, and that ungrateful person whom I cannot hate, must cease to love me.

Pronouncing those doleful syllables she turned her self toward me, in such a dying posture as would have drawn compassion from a Barbarian, and beholding me with eyes drowned in Tears, Generous Princess, pursued she, you will in a short time be freed from all these my troublesome complaints. You have not long to hear the repetition of the disconsolate Bellamira's moans, you will in a few days behold the end of her life, which she leads after a manner so deplorable.

At that part of Theodolinda's Relation Balamir let fall certain tears, which he had till then retained, and though he knew that Placidia and Pharamond were both in the Room with Hunnimonda, he rose hastily from his Seat and ran into the Princess's Chamber. True it is he was not ignorant, that the King of the Franks and the Queen of the Goths took his part, and that they were pleading for him at that very time: So that without any scruple by reason of their presence, he threw himself at Hunnimonda's feet ere she were well aware of him, and embracing her knees which he watered with his tears, Behold that ungrateful, cried he, behold that faithless person, who is now come either to expire at your feet by the force of his repentance, or merit a heart which you have so generously preserved for him.

At the same time the violence of many other passions stopp'd the course of his words, but Pharamond and Placidia leaving the Room, that the two illustrious Lovers might enjoy the more freedom, the enamoured Prince resuming his lamentation, Most divine Princess, said he, behold your Balamir, 'tis you that are to dispose of his destiny, must he dye for the expiation of his crime, or may he resume those splendid hopes which he once conceived by your allowance? Hunnimonda who could not hate the faithless Balamir, redoubled her affection for him now so passionate and repenting, and as soon as her surprise would permit her to speak, But are you then returned Balamir, cried she. I am not only returned, cried he very earnestly interrupting her, but most dear Princess, there is nothing how potent or powerful soever in the world, that shall ever separate me more from Bellamira. Will you never see Rosamond again then? replied she. Then Balamir finding something of injustice in her words, notwithstanding the violence of his love; But my dear Princess, answered he, suffer———How ingrateful, cried she smartly interrupting him, does the only name of Rosamond startle thy resolution, nay can it cause Theodolinda also to favour thy perfidiousness?

Having uttered these few words she threw her self into a little Closet; and clap'd the door after with that violence and hast, that neither the astonished Balamir nor the Princess of the Huns with all her speed could prevent it. Theodolinda observing the surprise that spread it self, all over the countenance of the enamoured Prince, What brother, said she somewhat discomposed, have you given the incomparable Hunnimonda any new cause of complaint? Or will you not tell me the reason of your trouble? Alas, replied he tetching a deep sigh, it proceeds from a misfortune that always attends me, and which doubtless will never forsake me as long as I live.

The unfortunate lover then gave an account to Theodolinda of what had befallen him, who being very much concerned for him, How am I vexed, said she, at the interruption you gave me, and that your impatience has thus incensed Bellamira, considering the course which I had taken to oppose her anger. Alas, abruptly answered he, I could no longer defer the joy which I expected, expected, from the sight of my fair Princess, for certainly you would not have had me as unfortunate in this house as I was in the Forest, when my Astonishment, Hunnimonda's flight and your severity, stop'd me from the pursuit of what I adored. But Brother, replied Theodolinda, If you have those thoughts which you pretend for the Princess of the Goths, whence is it that you avoid not all occasions of displeasing her? "The Gods are my witnesses, replied he, that I had rather suffer the most cruel death in the world, than fail in the least tittle of my duty and submission: But Dear Sister (if it be lawful for me to call you so) use your endavours I beseech you to assuage the rigour of Hunnimonda's severity. She would not have me see the Queen of the Cimbrians any more, but you know how deeply I am engaged to that Princess, you know the nature of that kindness which I have for you: And therefore will you not take my part, will you not speak to Bellamira for a Prince, that would not be ungrateful to Rosamond? "Had you had but patience to the end of my Relation, said she, we had acted by consent and perhaps prosperously enough. Dear Sister, then said Balamir, for heavens sake finish your Relation, that we may try in the conclusion whether there be any remedy for this mischief that befalls me, only because I am too desperately in love.

Constance then said she, and Artabure have seen her several times, though not knowing her to be any other than the charming Bellamira, for whom Honorius had so great a passion, but whatever they could say in behalf of that Prince, they could never draw any thing from the constant Hunnimonda, but complements of acknowledgment: So that the Queen of the Goths and my self to whom the heart of that Princess was open, thought there was no better way to assuage her discontents, but by taking part with the person whom she lov'd: To which purpose Placidia seconding my intentions, I make no question, said she, but that Balamir will see his error so soon as he understands Bellamira to be Hunnimonda. But fair Princess if that fugitive Slave shakes off his criminal Chains, and resumes those Fetters which he ought to wear, shall not his repentance blot out the memory of his crime, and will not you receive a Lover justified by that very last act of his. "I must acknowledge, answered the afflicted Bellamira, that I should be very well pleased to see him change a second time, and that after he had forgot me for Rosamond's sake, he should forsake that fair Princess, and return again to an unfortunate Lady that cannot hate him. But after all, though he should highly prefer me before a Rivaless whom all the world admires, though he should return and weep at my feet for the expiation of his crime, can he persuade me that he has not been faithless, or can my love find any security in the affection of a Lover, who as all Europe knows has sigh'd for another besides Hunnimonda.

We were at this dispute, when we were told of the interview of Theon and Melusina, but Bellamira who avoided all company not being willing to be there, rather sought for privacy and solitude, among those wild and obscure parts of the Forest where you found us. At first I was as zealously incens'd against you as the Princess more justly provoked, but when I observed you so passionate for her, and so full of repentance for your fault, I took your part with so much eagerness and spoke so powerfully, that at length Hunnimonda prest by a friend that was dear to her, and for a Lover that was so lovely, declared her resolution and final determination in these words. "I find, said she, that you will never let me be at quiet, I am contented then that you shall discover to Balamir the most secret of my thoughts, that if he should forsake Rosamond and cleave entirely to me, I should hardly have the heart to send him back to the Cimbrian Camp, or to remember his inconstancy: But if he waver and has nothing but a share of his affection to offer me, all the earth shall not hinder me from retiring to a religious life and renouncing the world, where Balamir has taught me that there is nothing of solid certainty. In regard I knew the constancy of her mind, those expressions somewhat frighted me, out of an apprehension that such an incomparable Lady should embrace such an austere life.

Thereupon I used the utmost of my endeavours to divert her from a design, the consequences whereof might prove to fatal to us, but to speak ingeniously all my entreaties nothing prevailed, for the constant Hunnimonda was as immoveable then as upon all those other occasions, that signaliz'd the greatness of her courage. At length all that I could obtain from her was, that in regard you were General of the Cimbrians, and that it would seem to be too apparent a piece of levity, over-hastily to quit your command, you have eight days to manage a change that will make so loud a noise, to the best advantage of discretion and civility. But, brother, you must not expect any longer time, and if you do not return within the time prefixed, resolve never to see that fair and generous Princess again.

Theodolinda had no sooner made an end of speaking, but in casting her eyes upon Balamir's

mir's countenance, she observed that the Prince seem'd to be prepossessed with some certain thought that held him in a deep suspence: What, Brother, said she with some surprize, can you not yet determine with your self, after all that I have said concerning the Princess of the Goths? Not so, Sister, replied he, fetching a sigh, but because I make no question but I shall render my self unworthy of her esteem, when I shall become ingrateful toward Rosamond, I find that in resuming her splendid chains, I shall die both for love and grief at the feet of that too severe Princess. Can you call that person too severe, cryed Theodolinda, impatiently interrupting him, who having preserv'd all her affection entire for you, will not accept of a piece of a heart at your hands? But, Sister, replied he, if her friendship for the Princess of the Huns be not incompatible with her tenderness toward Balamir, wherefore may not I be permitted to accompany my acknowledgment of the Cimbrian Queen's favours with some thoughts of affection; especially if that affection acknowledges the Empire of an over ruling passion? Do you not know, or at least have I not told you, that Rosamond's Beauty would always render that good will suspected? And after that, can you be still irresolute? And shall I not at length return your positive answer, which the charming Hunnimonda expects in an agony that your irresolution is too unworthy of. Speak then, Brother, explain your meaning, tell me what I shall say to the Princess? That I will adore her to the last gasp of my Breath, replied he: And as to what concerns the Queen of the Cimbrians, pursued Theodolinda? That I do not feel my self Master, replied Balamir, sighing, of those motions of affection which I have for her. Upon these words Theodolinda blushed for very madness, and Balamir changing colour, when he considered what he had said. "Alas, added he with a scornful countenance, "to what purpose is this contest between us, now that I am threatened with such a terrible "overthrow, which would make you blush as well as Bellamira, if you have still the same "kindness for me that formerly you had.

Theodolinda then interrupting Balamir, desired him to recite the circumstances that made him question his Birth, who having given her an account accordingly of all that he had understood from Narvis and Telanor's mouths, thus pursued his discourse: When I was at Alba Julia it grieved me to be the Son of a Prince who had despoiled Hunnimonda's Father of her Dominions; and I wished that the King of the Huns had not been my Parent. But as the case now stands, I am constrained to look upon that which I took to my greatest unhappiness, as the only means to procure my good fortune: for after all, Madam, I am but too well assured of my ill fate, that strange love which the Cimbrians bear me, convinces me that I was born among them, and the affection which I have for their Queen, not being able to change my thoughts, tells me by a kind of natural instinct, that certainly I was born in Bohemia. But, alas, is it not enough that my fall must be so great, and that I must now no longer be the Son of one of the greatest Kings in Europe, but that it must appear at the same time that I was begot by one of the most wicked men living.

The Princess finding too much probability in all that Balamir had recounted, was sensibly touched at the discontents of a young and renowned Warriour which she had always taken to have been her Brother. However, to put him by an opinion that could not but be grievous to him, she told him that notwithstanding some probabilities that seem'd not to favour his pretences, there were others that strongly convinced her, that a person of so much virtue could never be descended from one that was abominated by all good men.

She had proceeded farther, would Balamir have permitted her, but the enamoured Prince causing all his disturbances, not produced by his passion, to give place, to that incomparable Hunnimonda's repose: For Heaven's sake, Madam, replied he, let me but behold my divine Princess but for a moment. Were it in my power to grant your request, answered Theodolinda with some certain symptoms of anger in her face, I believe I should refuse it, since you have done me so great an injury: you have given me a Title offensive to the affection I have for you; but know, Brother, that though the misfortune which you fear should happen, Hunnimonda and Theodolinda would value that in you, which all the power of fortune cannot take from you: for in the loss of your quality, you will no less preserve their esteem than your own virtue.

But what comfort soever Balamir received by this obliging discourse, the Prince was still restless, and press'd Theodolinda to procure him the happiness which he so earnestly desired: but she protested to him that he could not hope to see the Princess of the Goths till he had renounced Rosamond. Balamir, who could not possibly withstand that torments which he had for the Cimbrian Queen, was mortally afflicted at her last words; but notwithstanding all his entreaties, notwithstanding all his grief, he could obtain nothing; for the Princess of the Huns was immovable in the punctual observation of her vow. Thus Balamir was forced to take his leave of Theodolinda; for besides that company began to come in, time called him away to his Army: but though his employment and some motives of affection called him to be near Rosamond, yet he made no great haste to her, departing from the Princess of the Goths but very slowly, and very sorrowfully. Guided by his unquiet thoughts, he took through the Forest, imagining that among so many great Trees, he should not fail to find some one of those places of solitude, where the miserable seek to unlade the burthen of their sorrows. At length having spied an obscurity proper for his melancholy purpose, he alighted, and parting from his attendants, buried himself in the thickest part of the Wood with some kind of consolation. Presently all his misfortunes crowded into his fancy, so that his great courage that served him with so much renown at other times, now forsook him; nor could he forbear to abandon himself to his troubles, and to make all the complaints that his grief could inspire into his thoughts: By which of all my actions, cryed he, or rather by which of all my thoughts have I drawn upon my head these terrible misfortunes that overwhelm me altogether? Can I not recover Hunnimonda without losing that quality which authorises my pretences to her? And can I not lose the honour of an illustrious Birth, but I must find my extraction by the crimes of Eriomer? Then he paused upon what he had said, he sighed, and resuming his lamentation: Ye just Gods that I have always adored, pursued he, is there any reason for you to be always so incens'd against me, that I must be reduced to a necessity of doing so terrible a piece of injustice? You know the obligations that Rosamond has heaped upon me, what an opinion that generous Princess has of the unfortunate Balamir, and yet you constrain me to forsake her party at a time when she shews me most affection, and honours me with her most secret trusts: what will she say of my proceedings? What will all the Cimbrians say, that so well love me? What will all the world say, that have hitherto applauded the reputation of my Actions? For I find that I shall never stand to prefer the chains of my divine Bellamira before all that is great and precious in the world: but I would willingly return to her with all that acknowledgment which is due to her, without shewing an ingratitude to the Queen of the Bohemians, which I can never pardon my self.

Thus he lamented a long time, and his sorrows so turmoiled his thoughts, surpris'd by night and weariness, that he fell into a slumber which he thought impossible to have seized upon his eyes. No sooner was he fallen asleep, but he dreamed that he saw the two Princesses that continually haunted his imagination, but so fair withal, that nothing was ever comparable to those charming shadows. They did not seem to behold each other like two Rivals, but on the contrary, having saluted one another, they seem'd to testify in most obliging language both their surprize and satisfaction. Balamir observing them very diligently, seem'd to take notice, that at the end of their discourse, Rosamond took from her own head the Crown which she wore, and presented it to Hunnimonda, who received it more joyfully, than she had disdainfully refused the Diadems of Honorius. With that the enamoured Prince was so satisfied, that he awaked in an extasie of joy, and his fancy being yet wrapped up in the pleasures of his Vision, he stretched forth his hands toward the place where he thought he had seen the two Princesses stand. But afterwards it was an imaginary comfort of real miseries: I see, cryed he, fetching a deep sigh, I see that the miserable must not flatter themselves, and that Balamir wrongs himself to draw favourable conjectures from a repose that he so seldom enjoys." Afterwards reflecting upon what he had seen in his dream, Is it not a very hard thing, continued he, to guess the meaning of Rosamond's respect to Bellamira? Does it not signify that the Cimbrian Queen having a bare respect for me, yields the Empire of my heart to a Princess that has preserved the most tender and obliging thoughts in the world for Balamir. But, alas, very pensively added he, what will such an inestimable tenderness avail me, if the misfortune that threatens me, render me unworthy all those testimonies and proofs of her affection?

PHARAMOND.

BOOK II.

THe afflicted Balamir concluded his complaints but only that he might the more seriously ponder upon the various assaults of his evil fortune. He walked cross the Wood, not minding that the obscurity of the shade might lead him out of his way: so that in less than an hour he came by chance to a certain place where he heard the tongues of some that were discoursing together. At first he thought they might have been his own Attendants; but hearing immediately a voice that he knew not, he made a stop, and listened with that attention, that one would have thought he had not then been capable of. Presently some person or other thus pursued his discourse: "Sir, said he, 'tis most certain that the Princess of the Goths is in the Camp of the Franks: they that told me of it know her, and cannot be mistaken. From them also I understood the news that is reported among the chief Officers of Pharamond's Army, that Balamir had renounced his pretensions to the Queen of the Cimbrians, that he had seen Hunnimonda, and that he loves her more passionately than ever. "I make no question of it, answered the other to whom the discourse was address'd, but that you might have been betrayed, and that this Beilamira so famous over all the world may be that very Princess whom you thought to have been so long dead. I can tell, and it may be by experience, after what a manner a Lover may be abused upon such an occasion: and I observe also that the friendship which is between us, not only rose at first from the correspondence between our dispositions, but also from the conformity of our fortunes. You shall be convinced when I tell you some circumstances that make me speak in this manner: for I must confess, that I come as well as you to seek out a Rival that is in the Camp of the Cimbrians. Yes, Sir, I come to seek out Agelmond, and to be the death of him; for my antipathy against him is no less, nor no less lawful than your hatred against the Prince that stole from you the affections of Hunnimonda.

Balamir not questioning but that the first that spoke was Mundisic, felt an inclination to combat his detested Rival, that had caused all the misfortunes of his life. Nevertheless, the generous Prince kept himself within bounds, out of a sense of that respect which he preserv'd as yet for an Enemy which he had always acknowledged for his elder Brother, and farther out of a firm belief that his Adversary would never be entertained by the Princess of the Goths. On the other side, scorning to slip an opportunity that invited him to take Agelmond's part, he thus address'd himself to the person that pretended himself to be that Prince's Adversary: "Whoever thou art, cry'd he with a surly utterance, that seekest the King of the Lombards's life, so soon as day appears thou mayst attacke him in the person of one of his Friends, and according to thy success against me thou mayst proceed in thy design. For that very reason, answered the other, shalt thou see my strength; and though thy Birth should not be answerable to thy pride, 'tis enough that thou takest the part of a person whom I hate, for me to desire to fight thee. In satisfying that desire, perhaps thou mayst win some honour by the Combat, if fortune favour thee.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but Mundisic, for it was he himself, returned this answer, Were it likely, said he, that Balamir could be out of the Cimbrian Camp at this time of the night, I should sorely suspect thee by thy speech: But in regard his employment will not permit him that liberty, and that thou takest the part of a person whom Balamir himself hardly knows, I am apt to think I have made a right conjecture. While he spake in that manner, some body was heard to come along toward the place where the dispute began, however, Mundisic continuing his speech, If thou servest in the Cimbrian Army, added he, let Balamir know the hatred which I bear him, and tell him moreover that I am resolved to have his life.

Upon those words Balamir could not hold, when a certain person comes up of a sudden, and interrupting Mundisic, "You may chance to miss of your design, said he in a surly tone, and it may be a valour inferiour to Balamir's, may teach you another Lesson and school you for your rashness. "The rashness of your Language is more to be wondred at, replied the enraged Mundisic, and were it not for the darkness of the Night, we should quickly try whether the gallantry of your Actions could so well maintain his quarrel, that you have so audaciously undertaken. You shall hear of me and my Friend in Pharamond's Army, at the Tent where the King of the Herules lodged, and because I care not to conceal my name if thou enquirest for Mundisic, thou shalt meet with a Prince that will make thee repent thy boldness. And having spoken these words, he thrust himself into a Thicket of Trees, together with the King of the Lombards Adversary.

Balamir was surpris'd at the strangeness of the accident, but instead of examining any farther into it at that time, he rather chose to testify his acknowledgment to the person that had taken his part. To which intent advancing toward him, "You have so obligingly embraced Balamir's quarrel, said he, that I my self being very much his friend, would gladly know whose generosity it is that has so much obliged him. "If you rightly knew me, answered the other, you would be soon of another mind, and never believe that a person so unhappy as I, did any thing extraordinary for the great Balamir, in venturing a life only which I lead in so much sorrow.

The language and the voice made the Prince of the Huns suspect the truth, so that after he had paused a while upon the words, Either I am deceived, said he, or it is the valiant King of the Lombards, whom Balamir must acknowledge for his Champion. The very same unfortunate person, replied he fetching a sigh, the miserable Agelmond, who at a time and place that he had chosen to bewail his misfortunes, never dream'd of such a lucky opportunity, to serve a person whose virtue he reverences. The famous Agelmond's virtue, replied the Prince of the Huns, with more justice deserves the veneration of all the world, and Balamir who cannot conceal himself from so generous a friend, shall ever have———How Sir, replied the King of the Lombards interrupting him in a surpris, Is it possible that a Prince so great and happy as you, should be met with in a place only proper for the moans of the miserable. Alas, replied Balamir, it appears that you never heard of the malignity of my Stars: But Sir for your better understanding, you need no more than remember the words of the Prince of the Huns, for you know I have a Rival that has ruin'd all my happiness, you know how obstinately he seeks after my life, not contented to have made it so miserable. Yet notwithstanding all this a strange whimsy of fortune, that hinders me from being at peace with my self disarms my revenge, for while she shows me the most implacable of my Enemies, she shows me the person of a Prince, whom I have always acknowledged for my elder Brother, she shows him wounded and in a condition rather to move my compassion than provoke my anger. And therefore I beg your excuse for speaking in his behalf, presuming that the greatness of your daring courage, will scorn to handle a weapon against an adversary, whose overbrow will yield you no honour, nor seek the death of a Prince who has been sufficiently punished for his violences, by the contempt and hatred of those Princesses, that he has still taken away by Force.

Thus the magnanimous Balamir took care of the safety of an ingrateful man, who sought to take away his life, but notwithstanding all the power which he had over the King of the Lombards, Agelmond being naturally proud and having received so terrible an injury could not speak of Agione's being carried away from him by force, without thinking upon his revenge likewise. "I know Sir, said Balamir, that I must never expect to see unpunished those crimes which have been committed against the King of the Lombards, yet I dare assure you upon very good grounds, that before Mundisic be in a condition to fight, you will find such an Accident happen that your resolution will be alter'd.

Balamir would have said more, and without doubt have better satisfied the King of the Lombards, when he heard several persons coming behind him, and therefore thought fit to change the subject of the discourse, without examining whether they were of Agelmond's or his own retinue. As for Agelmond whose victories had rendred him so famous, he let Balamir understand at length, that he would defer his quarrel with Mundisic, and falling by degrees degrees into a discourse that was always in his mind, he began to bewail his loss and spoke with so much grief concerning Gilismene, that you might easily see that the death of that Princess was the chief trouble of his thoughts. Yet the afflicted Lover had this consolation to make his moans till day appeared, to a Prince that shared in his sorrows. But daylight no sooner shewed it self but a French Officer came to Balamir, accompanied with seven or eight others. "Sir, said he, I knew by the Lyons in your Arms that we did not follow you in vain, for I perceive we have now found, what we have sought after with so much pains. "I cannot apprehend, replied Balamir, why you should put your selves to so much trouble, but believing you had some reason for it, I suppose you will not be unwilling to reveal it. "I will tell you then Sir, replied the other, that the King my Master having intelligence that you left the Camp in a discontent, sent several parties after you with orders to tell you, that he longs for a meeting between himself and you, with an intent to try whether he caused the difference which you have with Prince Balamir. "I do not wonder, answered he, to see my self so far engaged to the King of the Franks, having received so many testimonies of his generosity upon several other occasions, and if the Prince for whom you have taken me be of the same mind, the Royal house of the Huns will not be divided. "Is it possible, replied the Frank, that so many probabilities should deceive me, and that you should not be Mundisc? 'Tis very probable, replied Balamir, that you might be deceived by the likeness of our Arms, but we are so unlike in Face, that no man would take us to be brothers. The difference between your dispositions, replied Agelmound, is as remarkable, and excepting that you are both in love with the Princess of the Goths, there is no conformity in the world between your inclinations.

Those words caused Balamir to sigh, putting him in mind of his misfortunes, and while the Frank was pondering what to believe, he saw the Prince of the Huns retinue come up, among whom he knew Telanor. On the other side Balamir casting his eyes upon the Troop, took notice that Theodolinda had reinforced his Convoy, having sent several Horsemen under the command of Hilderic, a Visigoth very considerable in his Country, as well by his own merit as being in Walia's service: So that Balamir having testified to Pharamond's Officer, his acknowledgment to the King his Master, return'd together with Agelmound with a greater Train than was wont to attend him.

He was no sooner come to the Cimbrian Camp, but he made it his business to take upon him the King of the Lombards quarrel, and in regard that Telanor was in the Franks Army, and might be seen by Mundisc, he rather chose to employ Walia's Squire, and having fully instructed him he sent him to make enquiry after that unknown person with whom he was to fight, and then abandoned himself to his prevailing passion.

At first he found himself strangely unresolv'd, for he thought it might be some ease to his mind, to give Rosamond an account of his restless disturbances, and presently after he chid himself for having such a thought, as being a new crime against the Princess of the Goths. For that reason he determin'd of a sudden, not to go so presently to visit the Cimbrian Queen, that he might by degrees wean himself from her company, being obedient to the commands of the inexorable Bellamira. 'Tis very true that he saw himself forced to go to the Castle, not only because his employment and civility obliged him, but also because Rosamond her self had sent for him, impatiently desiring to know the success of his visit. Balamir therefore believed that he might listen to the motives of good will, yet never wound the duty of his love. However he was at a great loss, when he began to think it necessary for the Queen of the Bohemians to understand, what Bellamira had impos'd upon him. Nevertheless he delayed it as long as he could, but Rosamond taking notice of the trouble that appeared in his face, Prince, (said she with an Air that testified how much she shared in his affliction) I beseech you never stand to consider, but since you cannot live without your Princess, go to Pharamond's Camp, and let me not look upon my self as the cause of your sorrows. Ah, Madam, cryed he, that you should be so generous and Balamir so unfortunate: For 'tis impossible for me to fight against the Queen of the Cimbrians interest, or to be an Enemy to the Princess of the Goths. To shew you, replied she, that your being in that Army will not trouble me, and to cure you of the scruple of conscience that detains you here, know that the satisfaction which you will receive in Hunnimonda's enjoyment, will make me amends for what I shall suffer for your absence. But if I must tell you all, added she with a blush, I must acknowledge that I more fear the reinforcement of your valour given to Pharamond, than all the succours which he expects from Theodolinda. I find Madam, replied he, that you are just to the King of the Franks, and I would to God that the severe Hunnimonda, would be but as just to the unfortunate Balamir, to permit him to preserve an affection for you, though not comparable to that passion which I have for her, so I believe we might one day be all satisfied———But with what kind of felicity, replied plied she interrupting him, would you flatter Rosamond? I would fain, answered Balamir, see you Queen of the Franks, and in regard that Pharamond is not guilty but only in the false accusations of his enemies, methinks there is nothing binders why he may not aspire to the honour which I intend him. Ah, no, no, Prince, replied she with a resolute utterance, Rosamond will never do that injury to a Brother slain before her eyes, and how sensible soever she may be of Pharamond's merit, she will rather perish in the Ruines of the last City that holds out against him, rather than yield to what you advise me. For in short my heart would upbraid me, though my reputation were safe in such a necessity, that I must either perish or espouse Pharamond. Think therefore no farther of it, but since I am the cause of your afflictions, observe how I will restore you to your full content,

You shall know then all that lyes concealed in my heart, for Rosamond will discover to you all her thoughts, that she never fully revealed, not to the Princess of Suevia her self. Upon these words a slight blush spread it self in the cheeks of the lovely Queen, and after she had a while cast down those Angelical eyes, that ruled the destinies of so many great potentates; she turned them in a languishing posture upon Balamir, and thus continued her discourse: I know as well as you and a little more, too much indeed for the repose and quiet of my life, what those noble qualities are which are so much to be admired in Pharamond. The extraordinary merit of that Prince which has gained your esteem, has had a more absolute dominion in my heart, than ever my resentment, though left me as a legacy by my deceased Father, and as it were implored at my hands by the Tears of a Brother slain before my eyes. In a word I cannot hate the King of the Franks, and notwithstanding all my endeavours to have an aversion toward him, when I was oblig'd to look upon him as my irreconcilable enemy, I found my intentions always ill seconded by the motions of my heart, and that heaven had not created that Prince such as we behold him, to render him odious to Rosamond. "Hitherto, Madam, replied Balamir, you have said nothing that surpriseth me, and I less wonder to hear you so just with Pharamond's vertue, than if you had been unjust toward a Prince so potent and so lovely." "Would to God," replied the fair Queen, fetching a deep sigh, that I had continued in this moderation, but, alas, I know too well how far my affection extends, the more I find my self constrained to smother my love, the more it encreases and strives to break forth, being accompanied with certain troubles that make me ashamed. Yes Balamir, I am sometimes ashamed of my weakness, and when to flatter my pride I begin to commend my courage, I chide my self for those fears which I cannot but pity, I fear lest Pharamond should in the end grow weary, lest he should shake off his chains which it will never be lawful for me to ease him of, and sometimes I am thinking that Amalazomba's Glances and her carriage toward him, will one day rob me of his affections." "Ah, Madam, cried Balamir, interrupting her, can you so injuriously suspect the King of the Franks? No, no, Madam, Pharamond will never change, but to the last gasp of his breath he will adore that Angelical Queen, to whom he is always ready to sacrifice his life and Kingdoms." "Should what you say be true," replied Rosamond, as sometimes I make my self believe for my own repose, I should not be altogether unhappy, for being free from any other Prince in the world, this would be my satisfaction that no other Princess in the earth, could deprive me of Pharamond's heart. This consolation will be supported also by my joy, to see you restor'd to Hunnimonda's affections: For in short, Prince, I will make your peace with that Princess, and when I have told you which way, you shall confess it to be infallible." "Can you be so rigorous," replied Balamir, beholding her very stedfastly, to propose that to me which Belanira has offered. Ah, if it be so, I had rather dye for grief at the feet of that severe Princess, than submit to so unmerciful a command." "When you tell me what that command is, answered the Queen of the Cimbrians, you shall soon know whether my intentions are conformable to the Princess's." "Well then, Madam, replied he, she commands me to renounce for ever the sight and company of the most incomparable Rosamond. Now, Madam, is there any other way but death, to get clear of such a Rock as this. I am so deeply engaged to the testimonies of your affection, that I never can so ingratfully forsake your service, as never to see you more: And on the other side it is impossible for me to live, hated by the Princess whom I adore." "I confess, replied Rosamond smen hat disturbed, I should be loth to be for ever deprived of your company, and not be suffer'd to see the only person to whom I can speak the secrets of my heart with confidence and consolation. But, Prince, assure your self, the way that I shall take is not altogether so severe, and I make no question to accomplish your hapipness, yet never break that secret Link of friendship that tyes us together, proceeding from a secret sympathy, of which I have often examin'd, but never yet could find the cause.

I have already told you, that since it is not in my power to make choice of Pharamond for a Husband, Husband, I am resolv'd never to marry any Prince in the world. And therefore in regard I owe the Cimbrians a King, and for that how pleasing soever my Government may be, they will never be satisfied, unless they find some likelihood of a Successor, I have cast my eyes, Prince, upon you, to settle you upon the Throne of my Ancestors. You shall reign over a Nation already accustomed to obey your commands; besides, my people will have a Sovereign whom they entirely reverence, and may promise to themselves from Balamir and Hunnimonda a race of Heroes worthy to command all the earth.

The Prince charm'd with such obliging expressions, threw himself at the Queen's feet, and in an extasie of acknowledgment and affection, Rather, cryed he, rather let Balamir perish, than owe his happiness to a Generosity so prejudicial to your person. No, no, Madam, I shall never accept those offers that cannot enrich me but with your spoils. And if nothing but a Crown will carry Bellamira, I will seek to gain it rather by my Sword, than by the liberality of a Princess to whom I am so excessively obliged. Then making a second reflection upon Rosamond's kindness: Ah, Madam, cryed he, fetching a deep sigh, how unhappy am I, that my destiny should draw from your Magnanimity an effect contrary to your intentions? Alas, Madam, the means wherewith your kindnesses have inspired you to render me happy, rather sends me to my Tomb, than advances me to that honour which you allow me to claim from your affection. The more generous you are toward Balamir, the more you confirm him in his resolution never to forsake you; and therefore since I cannot see you without provoking Hunnimonda, and that I cannot provoke Hunnimonda but I must die for grief, there nothing more remains than for me to end my life.

He concluded those words with an aspect so pensive, that Rosamond, who took upon her to feel a great share of his afflictions, was most sensibly moved therewith, but as she was about to have given him some testimonies of that reality, word was brought her, that Amalazontis and the Princesses of Suevia and Lombardy were come to kiss her hands, together with Varanez, Agelmond and Ambiomere. The Prince of the Huns perceiving that he was not able to moderate his sorrows before those illustrious personages, rather chose to depart, than to appear sad and pensive in such company, thereupon he retired to his Quarters, and while he expected Hilderic's return, he pondered with astonishment upon the condition of his fortune. At first he thought that mark of Generosity which he had received from Rosamond, to be the interpretation of his dream: but then reflecting upon Bellamira's humour, he was soon perswaded that Princess would never consent that Rosamond should resign her Crown.

In the mean time, the King of Suevia having received intelligence that the King of the Huns Ambassadors were near at hand, that they were in the Country of the Sicambers, and that in crossing the Territories of the King of the Franks, they had given out, that the War should suddenly be ended by the strangest, yet most welcome accident in the world, was afraid lest Briomer's villany should come to light; and therefore to shelter him from the storm, he tryed all ways that he could imagine or think of. At first he thought to way-lay the Hunnish Commissioners, and to have them murdered; but understanding that the prudent Keuz was one of the chief Deputies, and that he had either a Train or a Convoy of two thousand Horse, he foresaw some difficulty in that design. But being of that disposition he was of, he never would have scrupled laying violent hands upon the Ambassadors whatever had come of it, had he not foreseen that it would have been to no purpose, in regard the King of the Huns himself was able to declare at any time the contents of their Embassy.

For that reason he turn'd all the violence of his malice upon Balamir, not being ignorant how much he should suffer by that renowned Soldier's Birth, and sought his absolute destruction, imagining there would be no stirring for a dead man's sake, in order to any change of affairs, which was a thing dreaded by so many great personages. At first he thought to have acquainted Varanez, Gondioch, Ardaric and Godegesilus with his design: but in conclusion he discourf'd his mind only to the King of the Herules; whether it were that their humours sympathized better, or whether he thought that Pharamond's other Rivals would not second him in his enterprize: for in regard there was a necessity to make use of many hands in the murder of Balamir, he was afraid that the jealousy of the Persian Prince, or King of the Burgundians had not quite extinguish'd their Generosity, which would make them abhor to seal a piece of treachery. As for Godegesilus, he not only approv'd the King's contrivance, but being fix'd to his interest, he spurred him on, and exhorted him to lose no time, before the Huns Ambassadors arriv'd at the Camp. They wanted neither means nor opportunity, those two Kings having still at their command a stock of Villains ready upon all occasions, and besides, they knew that Balamir went every day to the Camp

Camp of the Franks with a very small Train. Thus they gave order for the murder of a person whom they ought to have reverenc'd rather, while Balamir seem'd to contribute to his own ruine, out of his extraordinary impatience to be gone. But being oblig'd to expect the Visigoth Knight, to the end he might know where to meet with Agelmond's Enemy, he was forc'd to spend the rest of the day in the Camp of the Cimbrians, where he met with new vexations by the King of Suevia's devices, for that Prince having laid his plot with Briomer, sent to the Cimbrian Queen, requesting her to come to his Quarters, and in the presence of Varanez and Martian, spoke to her to this effect, Madam, said he, you know that the Vanguard of the Grecian Army are within some few hours march of the Camp, and therefore would your Majesty be pleas'd to meet them, and to see them drawn up, it would be a pleasant recreation, from whence you may expect other advantages. It would oblige the Emperour Theodosius, and give new courage to the Soldiers.

Rosalmond, who was constrain'd to take worse advice from him than that, readily consented. Thereupon, notwithstanding her unwillingness to animate an Army against a person too dear to her for her repose, she gave orders accordingly, and the three Princeesses went along with her, attended by the Prince of Persia, Martian and Ambiomer. Nor did the King of Suevia make any scruple to open his very heart to Varanez, declaring to him the reason why he had made this match, and the advantages which Pharamond's Rivals would reap thereby, As for Balamir, he saw the departure of the Queen, but could not follow her; for besides that his honour detain'd him in the Cimbrian Camp in expectation of Wallia's Squire, his love also called him to the Camp of the Franks; so that they took their leaves each of other, as if they had not been to meet again in a long time: but at length, inwardly checking their own weakness, they parted with more courage to outward appearance, than really they had in their hearts.

In the mean time, Hilderic being returned, gave an account to the Prince of the Huns, that it was the Prince of the Venedians with whom he was to fight, that Agelmond's Enemy would meet him in that part of the Wood where Theon and Melusina had their interview appointed, and that he seem'd to be much troubled that they had not an opportunity to decide the quarrel yesterday: 'Tis very certain, said the Visigoth in pursuit of his message, Harmaxas has us'd all his endeavours to persuade him from taking Mundific's part: but he being enraged against you, is resolv'd not to leave him, already suspecting that it was you that were the King of the Lombards's Friend.

Thereupon, confirm'd as he was in his resolution, Balamir sent for the principal Officers of the Cimbrian Army, who were no sooner met in his Chamber, but he thought good to exhort them to continue in their loyalty, not only because the Queen was absent, and because he was going to the Camp of the Franks: but out of a prophetick foresight, the reason whereof he did not understand, which made him the more zealously renew the marks of his affection, and those exhortations which he gave them to continue faithful to their fair Queen. To all which, the Commanders that reverenc'd his personage, return'd their acknowledgment, and such protestations of their fidelity, that he could desire no more. Balamir was not a little satisfied therewith; nor did he dismiss the Cimbrian Officers without a considerable present, and such Carestes as were of more value than his gifts. After that, he gave order to Telanor to provide all things necessary for his departure the next morning by break of day: and finding it not to be very late, in regard that Hilderic was to stay all night, he request'd the Squire to relate the remaining part of his Master's Adventures; for though his troubles were at that time incompatible with his curiosity, yet had he a great desire to hear the Story, not only because he had a very great esteem for Wallia, and was deeply concern'd for Theodolinda's good fortune, but also because he hoped to find an opportunity to serve a Princess so highly respected by Hunnimonda. Thereupon the Gothish Knight glad that he could please a Prince to whom he was altogether devoted, thus address'd himself to that renowned Warriour.

The Continuation of the History of Wallia.

I Think, Sir, I was interrupted in my Story by the coming in of Taxander, when I was speaking of our departure from Rome; at what time I told you that Alaric having left Attalus to command, took his march toward Consensum, attended by Autalph, Sigeric and Wallia. Those Princes courted their fair Ladies all the way; for, Sir, we carried along with us the incomparable Sister of Honorius, the charming Theodolinda, and the lovely Princess of the Tongres: and besides these persons so highly eminent, there were several others of a lower degree, who were however no small grace to the company. For on the one side, Placidia and her two companions were attended by several Ladies of Quality, and our Princes generally surrounded by the chiefest Officers of the Army. Alaric sigh'd for Theodolinda; and though his Royal Dignity, which he maintain'd with so much splendour, might easily have made her his own, yet his Generosity forbid him to have recourse to ways that could not make him happy, unless it were in consideration of his Dignity. Thereupon he resolv'd, as I have told you already, to gain her affections by his services, laying aside Maxims of State, and unwilling to owe so fair a conquest to the Negotiation of an Embassadour. On the other side, he could not absolutely resolve to supplant his Rival by the advantages of his greatness; for his Rival was so dear to him, and had been so prodigal of his blood at all times for the encrease of his honour, that the graceful Alaric was very unwilling to raise himself upon his ruins. While he was considering how much he owed to that valiant Prince, and while opposite thoughts divided his heart and mind to his extraordinary trouble, Wallia had more reason to complain on the other side: for besides that he was deeply sensible of Alaric's behaviour, certain it was that he was more in love, though with less hope. And as for the Princess Theodolinda, she had so high an esteem for the King of the Goths, and such a kindness for Wallia, that she was in as troublesome a perplexity as either of her Lovers.

This, Sir, was the condition of those three principal persons of whom I am to discourse; for as for Autalph and Placidia, it will suffice to tell you in a few words, that Alaric's Brother was most passionately in love without being beloved; and that Placidia, importun'd by the protestations of his love, never minded any thing but the misfortunes of Rome, the weakness of Honorius, and the absence of her dear Constance. As for Sigeric that now reigns over the Visigoths, he is a Prince naturally proud, impatient and furious. At that time he mightily affected Theodolinda's company, but the Princess always avoided it as much as civility would permit. However, one day that Alaric and Wallia were taken up with some great affairs, she was persecuted by this new Lover, after a most cruel manner: for he not only beheld her with a boldness that displeas'd her; but when she turn'd away her face, Well, Madam, said he, according to his wonted pride, I see you scorn my heart, that will not so much as vouchsafe me one look toward the conquest of it. I beseech you, Sir, said Theodolinda, talk not of hearts, nor conquests, nor looks, they are words that no way please me, and — They do not always dislike you, said he, interrupting her, for when they come out of Alaric's or Wallia's mouth, then no question but they are very mellow and well accepted. Alaric and Wallia demean themselves in so different a manner from you, replied Theodolinda, that I should be unjust to complain of their behaviour. You would say, answered he, that they are more happy than I, but I cannot tell whether their passion be stronger than mine, or so well worthy to succeed: for theirs is too moderate and wise; but a vigorous love proportionable to your charms, can only impose Fetters upon Sigeric. Perhaps he would not find them very light, replied the Princess, but 'tis well for him that I am neither in a condition nor humour to impose any shackles at all upon him.

This dispute began too smartly to have ended so soon, had not Alaric at the same time stepped into Theodolinda's Chamber, and by his presence altered the subject of the discourse. Immediately he was not a little troubled to observe a disturbance in Sigeric's face, and a discomposure in the fair eyes of Theodolinda: but being enamour'd; and understanding the cause, Is it possible, Madam, softly said he to Theodolinda, that none but my Brother escapes your charms? And that your Beauty, fatal to all the rest of my Family should raise Sigeric up to be my Rival? I cannot tell, answered she, in the heat of passion that Sigeric had put her into, what that Prince's real thoughts are; but I guess that he has forgot me to be the Daughter of the King of the Huns, and takes me only for a Captive to the King of the Goths.

At those words, Alaric turning toward the haughty Prince, I wonder not (said he with a severe and surly utterance) to see you charm'd by a Lady that all the earth adores, but that you may hence forward know how to carry your self, know that your King has a divine veneration for the divine Theodolinda, and would willingly make her your Queen, could I but win her consent. As far as I can see, Sir, replied he, with a despite that he could not dissemble, the Princess of the Huns is so accustomed to hear of the effects of her Beauty, that she takes a bare complement of Sigeric for a serious protestation of love: but since the smoothest of my expressions will not please, I will even hold my tongue, though at the very same time that I must not dare to speak, Wallia shall be permitted to hold the Princess Theodolinda in a discourse of his love, and to profess himself unpunished to be the King's Rival.

Alaric, provoked with his words, and yet not willing to flie out in the presence of a Princess that he adored, gave Sigeric only such a look that his pride was soon quelled; and away he went out of the Chamber, for fear of incensing the King any farther; and now the King being alone with the Princess of the Huns, with a melancholy deeper than he was wont to shew, You see, Madam, said he, what a conspiracy there is against me: for not only Wallia's merit is a potent obstacle to my claims, but Sigeric's violent humour also threatens me with strange crosses. How, Sir, answered she in a kind of surprize, is it possible you should fear Sigeric for a Competitor? I do not fear, replied he, that he will ever win your heart: but something has strangely discomposed my mind ever since Sigeric has been under your Laws. Were you acquainted with my Laws, replied Theodolinda, you would quickly see that Sigeric is not a man to be feared; so that you are safe enough as to him. But am I as safe as Wallia? replied the King, fetching a deep sigh. I confess, said she with a slight blush in her cheeks, the virtue of that Prince has equalled the kindnesses that he has done me, and made far different impressions from those which Sigeric has imprinted in my heart. So then, Madam, answered the King, you prefer the happy Wallia before all those other Princes that adore you? There is a great distance, replied she, between your thoughts and mine: for I believe there may be justice done to Wallia, without any necessity of determining so hastily upon the choice of him in that manner that you intend. But is there no hope, answered Alaric, for the King of the Goths? As I am not the Mistress of my own will, replied she, 'tis a needless thing for me to break the Laws of civility by a positive answer. But, Sir, you have dealt so generously by me, that I dare frankly make you this protestation, that the kindness which I have for Wallia shall never lessen that esteem and acknowledgment which I owe to the King of the Goths.

While they were upon this dispute, the illustrious Prince of whom they were discoursing entred, so that his presence did not a little trouble Alaric: and Wallia himself was not a little disquicred to behold the discomposure of mind that appeared in both their faces. Immediately he began to examine the nature of their discontent, and casting his eyes upon the Princess, he seemed to conjure her by that very action to lay aside those fears that vexed her soul. Theodolinda understanding that secret request, answered him with a look that might have confirmed Wallia, had not the presence of such a Rival as Alaric weakened the effect of that innocent favour, insomuch that those three illustrious persons so worthy to have been all happy, and yet so unlikely to be so, observed one another a good while with a mutual silence; and when they did speak, their discourse hung but ill together, shewing only the esteem which they reciprocally had for one another: but when they were parted, they went severally to bewail the misfortune of their virtue; and while their Generosity bounded their desires, Sigeric gave all the twinge to his that his rage cou'd demand. He had shut himself up with one Autharic a Soldier of fortune, upon whom for his valour the Government of Capua was bestowed at the same time that I obtained the command of Calabria by Wallia's means: so that he being beholding to Sigeric for his advancement, that Prince determined without any more to do, to discover his whole mind to him. To which purpose, beholding him as attentively as his troubled thoughts would permit him, Autharic, said he, you know I have so well carried on your interests upon all occasions, and by the proofs that you have received of my good will, you may easily conjecture what you have still to hope. Sir, answered he, not giving him time to say more, all the marks of your goodness are so deeply engraved in my memory, that you need but tell me your business to be assured of my zeal to serve you.

Sigeric was very well satisfied with this answer, but though he questioned not in the least the fidelity of the Gothish Officer, he could not fully resolve what to do. His passions increasing his natural boldness, he found there was a necessity of declaring himself; but the greatness of the enterprise, the difficulty of the execution, and the uncertainty of the success, so violently turmoiled his mind, that 'twas impossible for him that day to explain his thoughts: and therefore addressing his speech to Autharic, Wonder not, said he, that I seem seem more cautious than I was wont to be, of discovering to you the secrets of my breast: They are of that consequence, that it is best for you to examine the thoughts of my heart, and to consult that fidelity which you have promised me, before I entrust you with so great a secret. The Goth would have made him vows and protestations, but the Prince interrupting him, No, no, 'tis not time for me to speak yet, go and ponder upon what I have said already, and come again to morrow if you find your self undaunted enough, to satisfy your Ambition by signaling your Arm.

Autharic, after he had sworn a hundred Oaths, that no danger how terrible soever should make him change his resolution, went out of Sigeric's Chamber, while the Prince abandoned himself to all those violent thoughts, that jealousie and desire of Reign could insufe into him. He looked upon Alaric as a Tyrant, Theodolinda's Majesty seemed to be an unmannerly rudeness, and he looked upon Wallia's noble pride as an insupportable presumption. What, said he, wouldst thou that the Daughter of a great King, that a Princess who has scorn'd the offer of Kingdoms should take notice of this passion? Wouldst thou that she should prefer thee before thy Master, and when she may be a Queen and spouse the vanquisher of Rome it self, stoop to be a subject and marry Sigeric? For what reason should she make such an idle choice, is it in regard of thy dignity which is inferior to Alaric's, is it for the renown of thy actions so far outdone by Wallia. Remember thy self unjust Prince, and since thou canst not merit Theodolinda's affections, render thy self at least worthy to obtain the pardon of thy disobliging behaviour.

These reasonable thoughts which only the Image of the fair Princess had inspired, were such Strangers in Sigeric's heart, or rather were so little conformable to his ordinary humour, that in a short time they gave way to thoughts far different. In short, the Prince suffered himself to be carried away, by the violence of his natural inclinations, and the heat of his temper overpowering his reason, he minded nothing but pernicious contrivances, blinded by those malignant vapours that his passions raised. At the same time Autharic coming to him, made him such solemn protestations to shut his eyes against all considerations that might oppose the services which he vowed him, that the Prince discovered to the Visigoths all the plots that lay concealed in his breast, and in a long and private conference, resolved upon those desperate Villanies, that caused those great revolutions which ensued.

No sooner were we come to Consensum, but the King thought it convenient to make some stay there, as well to visit the Princesses as to enjoy the pastime of such sports and recreations, as the politest of the Goths and Romans in Placidia's Train could invent or set forth. But instead of that gayety that usually appears at Balls and Turnaments, there was only to be seen a dull magnificence, accompanied with I know not what to call it of languishment and negligence. I need not tell you the cause of that melancholy, in regard you know that our Princes and Princesses, had reason little enough to be merry. Theodolinda, Alaric, and Wallia, though their interests were different, yet they looked upon one another with that real esteem which their virtues merited, nevertheless they still beheld one another fighting, and their misfortune was so strange, that because they would not injure one another, they rather chose to continue unhappy, than to wish for any change in the condition of their loves.

Sigeric on the other side never any farther troubled, mix'd the importunate proofs of his passion with theirs, and being very indifferent whether he ever saw Theodolinda or no, the whole Court was perswaded to believe, that he had banished from his heart the true cause of the Kings displeasure against him. The generous Alaric believing the concealed Lover had done great things merely to debar himself from being the Kings Rival, in recompence of the Act granted all the favours which his private enemy besought him, whose only business it was to make and oblige his creatures. Thus the cunning Sigeric had raised a potent faction, against a King whose benefits afforded him the means to seek his ruine: So that when he saw both his practices and his love were quite out of all suspicion, he resolved to execute a design, which promised him the satisfaction of all his hopes. He gave order to Autharic to make all the preparations imaginable, for a most magnificent and Royal Feast, and when he was advertised that all things were ready, he went to the Princess Placidia and told her that it was chiefly for her sake, that Capua the delicious had so displayed all her dainties and charming Varieties. You know Madam, continued he, what advantages Rome has found by the pleasures of that lovely City, when they melted and disarm'd the Soldier like fury of Hannibal, the most famous Enemy of your Country: And I believe you will be glad to see the place which scattered that terrible Cloud, that had like to have poured such a Tempest over your Capitol. I confess, replied she, I could have been very well contented, that the King of the Goths notwithstanding standing his generosity, had made such another journey before he came to Rome, and that he had met the same disaster in Capua which befel the Carthaginian. Though this City, answered he, have not put a stop to Alaric's conquests, as she put a period to Hannibal's victories, yet she can promise you the overthrow of certain friends, whom you fear more than the Visigoths. For in short Madam, I am deceived if you return with those vexations, which you carried with you from Constantinople. You must give me leave however not much to credit what you say, since my misfortunes are of another nature, than to be remedied by any thing that you can make me hope.

As they were thus arguing Alaric comes into Placidia's Chamber, and presently after Theodolinda and Cleomira led by Autalpb and Wallia, after the usual complements were over, the Princess of the Huns, the King of the Goths and my Master, fell into a particular discourse by themselves. As for Alaric, he being somewhat sadder than ordinary that day, was willing to let Theodolinda know the last of his mind, which he did in the presence of Wallia to this effect. 'Tis high time Madam, said he, for you now to put a period to Alaric's fortune, and to declare your thoughts before two Princes that adore your Beauties: But Madam, speak more boldly I beseech you, and redeem us from that cruel uncertainty, which hinders us from resolving what we have to do. If that small renown which I have won among men, together with that extraordinary adoration which I yield to the divine Theodolinda, can render your inclinations conformable to the will of the King your Father, then should Alaric be suddenly one of the happiest Princes in the world. But on the contrary if Wallia's merit bear a greater sway in your heart, and that it be closed against the King of the Goths, I renounce my dignity, I renounce my Conquests and all the honour I might probably win, to seek the end of a life altogether lamentable. Before the Lady, replied my Master, pronounces the final determination of our destinies, be pleased only to let me speak my mind first, and then to depart the Chamber, that I may not hear the sentence which your virtue makes me dread. It is not just for you, Divine Princess, said he turning toward Theodolinda, to prefer a Prince that has no Crowns to lay at your feet, before the great King of the Goths: But in regard my passion for you is the most violent that ever was, suffer me to love you without hope, and because it is impossible for me to behold you in the possession of another, 'tis the miserable Wallia that must seek for death, to deliver his King and his Princess, out of the Labyrinth of their own generosity.

He had no sooner concluded these words, but he beheld the fair Theodolinda's eyes, fetching a deep sigh, and never staying for an answer he departed in such a posture, that constrained pity even from the Prince that disputed with him for the affections of the Princess: In so much that Alaric, as passionate as he was, could not but in justice repent that he had gone so far, and blamed himself that he had strove no more than he did, for the sake of a renowned Soldier that had so faithfully served him. 'Tis very true, that having cast his eyes afterwards upon a Princess altogether charming, he felt in himself a gentle inclination to excuse him, from the impossibility there was of losing that love which he had inspired, and not losing his reason withal. And therefore resuming his first question, Well Madam, pursued he, are you yet ready to pronounce the sentence of our destinies, and will you be but so kind as to tell me your real thoughts, that I may govern my self according to the sincerity of your answer. Sir, answered she, I will either not speak my mind at all, or if I do, it shall be with all the freedom you can expect from me; for I always thought dissimulation to be much below my birth. And therefore since you deem it so necessary for us to know how far our thoughts of kindness may extend each to other, I am contented to discover mine more precisely than ever I did. I will tell you then, Sir, that before I saw the King of the Goths, I observed something so noble and lofty in the person and courage of Wallia, that was sufficiently effectual to gain my esteem: And I must presume to say, added she blushing, that it was enough to move my affection. And now Sir, since I have told you that which I never spoke to Wallia himself, be pleased to let me have the liberty not to declare to any one but Wallia; how far my kindness extends to Alaric. "But Madam, impatiently replied he, should your Father command you to marry me, what resolution would you take. To obey his commands, answered Theodolinda: And yet to tell you the truth, I should be very unwilling to be constrained to deprive Wallia of an innocent affection, which is the reward of his love. Suppose then the King of the Huns, said Alaric, should favour the fortunate Wallia———That can never be; said she interrupting him and fetching a sigh, for I know my Father too well, that he will never yield me a Husband so unlikely to wear a Crown: And therefore Sir I am prepared never to be happy, and were I not acquainted with your generosity, I should have too much ground to fear for my repose. In short, I am not ignorant that so great a Conquerour as the famous Alaric, has many ways to supplant Wallia and to obtain Theodolinda: But Sir, I should prove unjust to your virtue, durst I apprehend that any violence could proceed from thence. 'Tis most certain Madam, very pensively replied he, that I should rather dye for grief of loving without hope, than to thwart your inclinations. However divine Princess, added he, beholding her in a most passionate manner, will you not at least reserve some acknowledgment for a miserable person, that resigns so submissively to your will, though to his own ruine?

He had no sooner expressed himself in that manner, but Theodolinda out of a pure respect toward him, "Sir, answered she, your carriage has been so obliging, that it can never be any stain to my modesty to tell you, how sensible I am of your obligations. "However, replied he, you would not stick to espouse my Rival before my face, had you but the consent of the King your Father. "Were it the King of the Huns will, replied Theodolinda: that I should marry Wallia, most willingly would I consent: But Sir, I declare withal, that never of my own head, would I prefer that Prince before the King of the Goths, since I find you take the true way, to make your self Master of my Destiny.

Alaric satisfied with what she had said, departed from her less melancholy than he was before, and Wallia who saw him not long after, observing a kind of tranquillity in his eyes, apprehended a thousand strange fancies in his mind, not without being mortally grieved at it. For which reason instead of taking order for his departure from Capua, he sent for me to bear a share in his affliction. So taking me into his Closet, he beheld me with an extraordinary trouble in his countenance: "Ah Hilderic, cryed he fetching a deep sigh, I am lost: for the ambitious Theodolinda without doubt prefers Alaric's Diadems, before the most tender affection that ever was. "But Sir, said I interrupting him, who inform'd you that the Princess of the Huns has taken up such a hasty resolution, wherein she has hitherto appeared so wary. "The King by his eyes assured me of it, and Lovers are seldom deceived by those conjectures. Yes Hilderic, it must of necessity be, that either Theodolinda has been very kind to Alaric, or very unkind to Wallia: But 'tis no strange thing that the daughter of a great King, should forget a Prince that has nothing but his Sword and his Love, or that she should favourably accept the vows of an illustrious Victor, that has filled the greatest part of the world with the Renown of his conquests. "Ah Wallia, added he, flatter thy self no longer, but if through thy injustice thou wouldst not render thy self worthy of this misfortune, approve those reasonable and lawful thoughts, and shew thy zeal and thy respect, as well for thy King as for thy Mistress.

He held his peace after he had taken this resolution, but then having considered a while, whether he were able to keep it or no; "I know right well, answered he to himself, that I can never cease to love Theodolinda, I know she will Reign with absolute Sovereignty in my heart, till the last gasp of my breath. But after all, does it behove me to be contented only with being more in love than the King of the Goths, without attempting to carry my generosity, as far as I have seen the extent of his. He has contended with his passion for my sake, though he knows himself in a condition to gratifie it, and shall Wallia who loves without hope, endeavour nothing for the King's sake? Shall he give no proof of his acknowledgment to a magnanimous Prince, to whom he is so much beholding? No, no, I will never tax my self of so much ingratitude, rather he shall find that I am not altogether without that virtue, which makes us thankful for such benefits as we receive. I am resolved not to go along with the Court, but here in this City will I shut up all my sorrows, and never go to Capua there to intermix them with those delights, that Alaric and Theodolinda will enjoy after those obliging protestations, which in all likelihood they mutually made to each other. But immediately repenting, "Wherefore, said he, shall I let my Rival peaceably enjoy the company of the person whom I adore? and not go if it be but to interrupt his discourse, disturb his joy and be always in his sight? But alas, added he fetching a sigh, so far shall I be from disturbing Alaric's satisfaction, that I shall but go to be a witness of his success, I shall but go to behold my misfortune in his Countenance and in Theodolinda's eyes.

Thus he demurred a while upon that resolution of going to Capua, but his love afterwards enticing him to visit Theodolinda, he went to see her, and with a redoublement of grief, heard from her own lips, all that she had promised to Alaric. How generous soever my Master were, he could not endure patiently to hear the praises of so formidable a Rival, but interrupting Theodolinda with an air not usual, "Well Madam, answered he, with a resentment which he could not moderate, submit to the fate of a Prince on whom victory always attends, but never expect that Wallia should live to honour his Triumph. No, no, Madam, you shall never see me tyed to his Chariot, for your cruelty that would deserve me to that punishment, shall free me from it by that death which it forces me to seek.

Concluding

Concluding those words, he went his ways, absolutely determining to abide at Consensum, to the end he might be at his full liberty to abandon himself to his troubles, while all the rest of the Court went to divertise themselves in the pleasantest City of all Italy. Therefore it was that he sent me to those persons whom he most respected, to make his excuse. But after I had discharged my Commission, I was very much surpris'd to take notice that Sigeric was more discontented at it than any of the rest, and us'd all arguments imaginable to make him alter his resolution: but all his persuasions nothing prevail'd; for the pensive Wallia not only staid at home, but fell also into such a distemper of body, that had he been willing to have gone he could not. Well, Sir, to be short, there was a most magnificent Ball, Horse-Races and running of Chariots, and a small Sea-Fight upon the Lake Vulturinum, but the Magnificence of the Festival, as to the abundance, delicacy and rarity, was most admired by all the Court, though indeed they had not time to see all the variety which was intended: for the King found himself ill upon a sudden, and being less patient than he was wont to be, he resolv'd to leave Capua, and not stay to see the end of that pompous Feast: Sigeric endeavour'd all he could to have perswaded him to tarry, but Alaric, instead of returning an answer, retired into his Bed-Chamber. Immediately he sent for his most trusty Physicians, who had no sooner looked upon him, but they beheld him with astonishment without speaking a word. Their countenances and the quality of the Medicaments soon confirm'd the King in his suspicions, so that as soon as he had received some ease by vertue of those Antidotes which he had received, he would not stay a minute, but leaving a City where his secret enemy was in a condition to attempt any thing, he return'd to Consensum with as much speed as if he had been in perfect health.

In the mean time, Wallia, whose love, grief and distemper had increased altogether through Theodolinda's absence, no sooner understood that the fair Princess was return'd, but not being Master of his passions, he rose, notwithstanding his weakness, and ran where his heart was drawn by those potent spells, whose power it acknowledged. He found the Princess alone, and beholding her with eyes full of tenderness and languishment: Will you not tell me yet, Madam, whether you are in the same resolution, to comply with the King of the Goths in the point of marriage? Not, added he with a deep sigh, that I pretend to that choice: but, Madam, there is something in it that so torments my mind to think that you should consult my Rival in such a doubt as this; that from hence forward, lest I should be expos'd to so terrible a misfortune, I absolutely renounce both your company and my life.

He utter'd those words after so sad a manner, that Theodolinda was really moved, yet believing it became her to have that respect for the King of the Goths which she had promised him, Prince, said he, *I know the King my Father earnestly desires an alliance with Alaric, and that he will never encline to prefer you before those Kings that seek to be in amity with him: so that you see it only lies in Alaric's power, whether he will have Theodolinda or no: and therefore since he has promised not to force my will, and that it is impossible for me to be yours, wherefore should not I have a kindness for the King of the Goths, which being far from being prejudicial to you, may keep him constant to those thoughts which may always prove for our good? Must that Prince then, Madam, replied he, dispose of your affections? Would you have me provoke him, answered she interrupting him, or that I should incense him to prove my Master, instead of my Husband? I know not what I would have, replied he sighing, but it may be, I should think my self less unfortunate in dying suddenly, than to see you Queen of the Goths, and linger out a long and languishing life. Then 'tis with your consent, replied Theodolinda with a kind of disdain, that I should marry Alaric? I have told you already, answered Wallia, that I neither know what I would have, nor what it becomes me to desire: for you know, Madam, that having so much love, and so little hope, 'tis a very hard thing for me to preserve my reason entire.*

He concluded those words when the Sister of Honorius entred the Chamber, and no sooner had she cast her eyes upon my Master's countenance, but that taking compassion upon a Prince for whom she had so great a kindness and esteem, she spake to Theodolinda in his behalf; nor was it without good success, for the Princess of the Huns not daring to promise Wallia, and not caring at all to promise Alaric, thought it enough to shew, that her affections inclin'd toward my Master, not repenting however of those testimonies of her acknowledgment, which she had given the King of the Goths. Placidia would not give her off so; but as she was about to have put a smooth interpretation in Wallia's behalf, upon what Theodolinda had spoken in behalf of Alaric, one of the King's Attendants came in, and with a strange alteration in his countenance brought word, that the King's distemper increased to that height, that they began to be afraid of his life: that Autalpb and Cleomira were in the Chamber, and that the sick Prince only desired for his consolation to see those two Princesses, together with Wallia. Thereupon they all three went to the Royal Apartment with all the speed they could make.

Alaric would have risen up to have saluted them, but his Physicians not thinking it convenient, “ Friends, said he to them, you have nothing more to do for me; for since I cannot end my life with honour at the head of my Army, as I had resolv’d to do, you shall not constrain the King of a warlike Nation to die in his Bed, like one that had neither the Dignity nor resolutions of Alaric. Thus Autalpb, Cleomira, and afterwards Placidia, Theodolinda and Wallia found him sitting in an Elbow Chair, and as they were about to have expressed their sorrows, Sigeric desired admission, complaining that there had been no regard had to his Rank and Quality; he sent in word, that he had not only never been inform’d of the King’s indisposition, but that he could not be permitted to come to pay those devours which so great a King had reason to expect from persons so near him in blood. Alaric, as feeble as he was, yet his blood rose at the very sound of Sigeric’s name, but in regard he had nothing but bare suspicions against that Prince, he only return’d him this answer: “ Let Sigeric, said he, have but a little more patience, for if he can but wait a short while longer, he will see me with much more joy than now.

Having by those few words given him to understand that it was he whom he suspected, he turn’d toward Prince Autalpb, and majestically addressing his speech to them, “ Brother, said he, my death will suddenly put you into the possession of my Throne: but remember your self I conjure you, and let not the greatness of your power range according to the dictates of your unbridled passions, but let your virtue give it those bounds which your people cannot prescribe. It may be you think it a fine thing to see the destinies of three fair Princesses at your disposal; but have a care that you forget not what you owe to persons of their Rank and Sex. Above all remember that the illustrious Placidia is the Daughter of the great Theodosius, and if she refuses you to be Queen of the Goths, instead of putting a force upon her inclinations, consider that she may look upon us as the destroyers of her Country, and Princes more than barbarous. As for the two Princesses of the Huns and Tongres I recommend them to you with more hopes to obtain the effect of my prayer: for since you can have no prejudice against them, I cannot imagine you will ever give them any cause to think themselves your prisoners. But, Brother, what am I not to say in the behalf of Prince Wallia? his Arm, his Prudence and his Generosity will support your Reign with Honour. You have nothing to do but to give him an Army to keep your People in awe, and your Neighbours in fear. There is nothing can shake your Throne if he uphold it; and if the Visigoths will give that honour to so valiant and generous a Prince which is due to his virtue, I make no question but you will quickly lay the foundation of a lasting Monarchy. Besides this National advantage, I desire one kindness in particular: for I must acknowledge, that having a very great affection for the Princess Theodolinda, I cannot die in peace unless I leave Wallia in a condition to protect her against Sigeric: and therefore once more, Brother, added he with all the vehemence he could, I recommend to your care these four illustrious persons.

At those words he fetched a deep sigh, his spirits being wasted. Afterwards having kissed Placidia’s and Cleomira’s hands, and given his own to Autalpb, but still holding fast Wallia’s and Theodolinda’s: at first he beheld them without speaking a word, but soon after his love, and the strength of his courage exciting him to do his utmost, he pronounced these words, which he accompanied with some tears “ Prince, said he to my Master, I leave my Scepter to Autalpb, and Theodolinda to Wallia: but how advantageous soever you may think this share, I cannot be absolutely satisfied without giving you some power to preserve her to your self. You know full well, that he that aims at the Princes of the Huns must be a King, and that you cannot with justice think to reign in Barcelona, since both Autalpb and Sigeric are your elders. But without entrenching upon their Privileges and Rights, without doubt you may easily obtain the Kingdom of Aquitain, which has been hitherto denied us, but that which Honorius will never refuse to Wallia’s merit, by the mediation of Placidia and Constance. Yes, Prince, by taking part with the Romans, you may obtain all that Country of Gallie, and the possession of the most charming Princess that ever was. But when you are arriv’d at so great a happiness, will you not forget the unfortunate Alaric, will you ever mention more his unhappy name to the divine Theodolinda? Oh, Sir, cryed Wallia, throwing himself at the feet of his King, and transported with acknowledgment and grief, wherefore is it not possible for me with the loss of all these glorious hopes, and the overthrow of my life it self, wherefore is it not possible for me to divert this fatal blow that threatens us?

Alaric mov’d with his Generosity, embraccd my Master. and then turning toward Theodolinda, dolinda, and beholding her for some time with tears and love in his eyes, Divine Princess, said he fetching a profound sigh, I could no longer live without a crime, for crossing the affection of two such illustrious persons, so well deserving each the other: And therefore now I dye willingly, though I die wearing those precious Chains wherewith you fetter'd me, and which I now resign to my Rival. Yes Madam, I resign them to Wallia as to the Prince, who of all the Princes in the world best deserves to enjoy your virtues. But Princess, will you absolutely forget Alaric? Will you not sometimes pity his end so much to be deplored? But then Theodolinda and Wallia feeling the sinews of their constancy and courage fail, lost the use of speech, and to such obliging questions only return'd him the doleful answers of their Tears; while the King of the Goths casting his farewell look upon the Princess of the Huns, took her by the hand and kissed it, tasting so much sweetness thereby as seemed to make his departure ealie, which some few minutes after ensuing, left us all unspeakably disconsolate.

The Visigoths had no sooner lost their renowned Prince, but their sorrows were attended with many troubles: For in short, Sir, when our Princes and the most considerable Officers of our Army, were assembled to acknowledge the new King, Sigeric put in his claim to be chosen Lieutenant General of the Crown, pretending that Autalpb having no nearer Kinsman, they could not in justice refuse him what was his due by birth. No sooner had he made his harangue, but there ran a murmuring noise among all the Goths that were of his party, and among those to whom his humour, and the circumstances of Alaric's death were too well known, to permit them to approve his pretensions. Wallia for his part being an utter enemy to all acts of violence, and having besides particular reason to oppose Sigeric's advancement, made answer that all the great employments and Commands, lay absolutely in Autalpb's disposal. And if it were the will of heaven, added he, to afflict us with a second loss, we may believe the Goths would be so just as to obey any Prince, who had right by birth to rule over them, provided he were not unworthy the command.

Sigeric was about to have interrupted my Master, and to have lanced out into a fury, when the King commanded him to be silent. But notwithstanding the Antipathy which he had against him, he only told him then very moderately, That he was not yet of years to undergo so great a charge: That before he demanded such an employment, it behoved him to learn more experience in affairs, and to get more repute in the Army.

Sigeric nipped with so severe a reproof, blushed, held his tongue and gave Wallia's a sour look: And dissembling his revenge during the ceremony, he was no sooner got out, but having got together the Heads of his faction, he protested against all that had been done during Autalpb's Coronation. Afterwards while the King was consulting privately with my Master, to settle the present confusion of things, Sigeric who had already laid his plot, not only carried away Theodolinda by force, but also met Autbaric upon the way, who came to receive her with a party out of his Garison: Insomuch that Theodolinda was upon the rode to Capua, before he could be in any condition to pursue. True it is that the enamoured Prince, having with an inconceivable diligence, drawn out a considerable strength to follow him, flew out of Consensum with a party of a Thousand horse, after the Ravishers of Theodolinda. Nor had he marched with that fury long before he overtook Sigeric, who had time to prepare himself with a party of three thousand horse: And being a Prince of courage he brought up the Rear, in case of any opposition that might come from Consensum, And being advertis'd of his coming, he sent away Autbaric before with five hundred Horse, to guard the Princess to the Castle of Capua, while he made a halt at the head of his own Brigade.

Wallia, notwithstanding the inequality of number, considering it was for the recovery of Theodolinda, never stood to consider what he had to do, but having exhorted and ranged his men, he thundered upon his enemies in a most terrible manner, however his virtue would not permit him to fall directly foul, upon a Prince that might happen one day to be his King: So that perceiving Sigeric at the head of a Squadron, he turned his fury upon another which was led by a Kinsman of Autbaric, but understanding that his Rival, that the Ravisher of Theodolinda challenged him, and was coming directly toward him, he looked upon his former scruple as very unnecessary at such a time: So that there began a most terrible fight between Wallia, who was one of the most valiant men in the world, and Sigeric whose courage was supported by Love and Antipathy. Their Lances being shattered in a thousand pieces, gave way to weapons more conformable to my Masters impatience, and the two fierce Rivals met with loud cries, and laid at each other so furiously, that the very fire sparkled out of their armour.

Wallia incensed with so much resistance, and reproaching himself with it as a new injury done to Theodolinda, discharged so furious a reverie blow upon the head of his Adversary, as made him reel again: For the ponderous blade lighting upon that part where the Helmet joyns to the Cuirafs, hewed out a considerable Gap into his shoulder. My Master was about to have redoubled his blow and compleated his victory, when of a sudden he was parted by two great bodies, that came to charge each other in that place: So that he was constrained to turn the stream of his valour another way. In the mean time our party encouraged by the Achievements of their Chieftain, and the justice of their cause had got an entire victory had not Night come on. We lost about two hundred, they above a thousand; so that Sigeric was almost at his wits end, and his fury not being to be moderated by his disgrace, he wreck'd his malice upon his own people, he taxed them of cowardise, and rallied them again in expectation of a new charge, notwithstanding his loss of blood and men, True it is that the principal Officers of the faction, knowing that by his fall they should be all ruined past redemption, represented to him, that if he made a halt he would but give Wallia leisure to recruit, so that it were better for him to retire to Capua, where he might get advantageous Articles for himself, and also obtain the possession of Theodolinda.

Sigeric moved by these reasons, and at length perswaded by his love, was now altogether for seeing the fair prey, which he had got into his clutches, however that he might not seem to make more hast than good speed to her by a shameful flight, he made a kind of a retreating fight, to the end he might give some satisfaction to his courage. But alas, his resistance was very feeble, for besides that Wallia charged him with an irresistible vigour, Autalpb sent us a fresh recruit not only to reduce a Rebel, that aspir'd to be his associate in the Sovereign Authority, but also to please Placidia who tenderly loved Theodolinda, and had a particular esteem for my Master.

Thus we drove them before us to the very Gates of their Sanctuary, and when we came before Capua, we were above four thousand men. Immediately Wallia sent summons to the Town in the name of the King of the Goths, and to incense the Inhabitants against the Garrison, he posted himself so as to cut off all provisions, that came from the Lake Vulturnum. In the mean time the body of the Army came up, with the battering Rams to force the Walls if the Town refused to yield, while Sigeric on the other side shewed himself publicly to the inhabitants of Capua, he thought it convenient to do some signal piece of service for a City, where it was of so much necessity to him to maintain his Authority. To this purpose having given Aubaric orders to keep my Master in play with a thousand horse, while he himself charged those that lay upon the Vulturnum, who resisted stoutly for some time, but Sigeric breaking in among them at length forced ours to give ground, and beat them as far as a fort that we had raised to make our selves Masters of the Lake. Strangely was he puffed up, when Wallia returning from pursuing Aubaric to the very drawbridge of Capua, renewed the fight, and making his way to the Ravisher of Theodolinda, he flew upon him covered with blood and dust as he was with that impetuous violence, that all the witnesses of his fury that were his enemies trembled, fearing the ruine of themselves by the loss of their Captain. Nevertheless Sigeric stood his ground, and put himself into a posture to receive his enemy, like a person whom no sight of danger could scare; when his Commanders drew him by force to his place of retreat, where he might be able to hold out a good while, and make advantageous Articles for himself and them. And indeed Capua was at that time one of the greatest Cities of Italy next to Rome, and besides the strength of the place, the Rebels had a considerable party in our Army. My Master therefore understanding the divisions that were among us, and fearing that the inconveniences of a long siege, might cause the Goths to mutiny and thereby strengthen the faction of Sigeric, he resolved to carry the Town by storm, how rash soever the attempt seemed to be. To that purpose he order'd me to advance toward the Citadel, and to make as if I intended to assault it, in the mean time he marched toward that part of the City, which was farthest off from the Castle.

When the night was a little advanced, I gave a most terrible Alarm to the besieged, at which very time my Master with a thousand Visigoths, carrying each a Ladder in his hand and a faggot at his back filled up a good part of the Ditch, and setting their Ladders to the wall, which was continually pelted by his own Slingers, which he had planted at a convenient distance for that purpose, and magnanimously mounting, and having slain two or three of those that opposed his laying hold on one of the Battlements, he so scared the rest that he presently got upon the wall, and being bravely seconded by those that followed him in this amazement of the besieged, he leaped down into the City, and opening the Gates to the rest of his Troops, got possession of all the advantages which he desired for the reducing the Castle: So that Sigeric now in extremity, was forced to come to a Capitulation and to surrender Theodolinda. Wallia no sooner understood where the Princess of the Goths was but thither he ran with all speed, and casting himself at her feet, You are at liberty, Madam, he cryed, transported with love and joy, you are at liberty, and by the consent of the King of the Goths, Wallia will be your convoy where-ever you command him. If Placidia be still at Consensum, answered she, and raising him up again, I am contented, generous Wallia, to stay with her till I find an opportunity to return into Dacia.

Her last words caus'd the enamoured Prince to sigh, Oh, Madam, said he, will you be so cruel to part from us, to leave the Sister of Honorius alone, and to go into a Country where perhaps I may never see you again. You are too just, replied Theodolinda, to think that I have not staid long enough here, and that I have been a very sufficient time absent from the King my Father. Not that I would forsake Placidia, could my feeble conversation stand her in any solid stead: but, alas, Wallia, what can be hope for from Theodolinda's friendship? Rather, cryed Wallia, interrupting her, what may she not promise to her self from your affection? I would be glad, replied she, that the Princess of the Romans might be happy in the return of Constance, and though you are a Visigoth, and that I am so highly obliged to your Generosity upon many accounts, yet I must confess, I would leave you for Placidia's sake restore Rome again into the possession of Honorius. But since it is not in my power to do such kindnesses as these, 'twill be enough for me to go and share the sorrows of my Friend, if Autalph renew his persecutions upon the death of a Prince whose virtue was an Asylum against all violence. And if the King of the Goths, replied my Master, treats not the Princess of the Romans with that respect which is due to her, will you then presently be gone to Alba Julia? Is there a necessity, if Autalph prove unjust, and Placidia unfortunate, that Wallia must prepare himself to suffer the torments of Theodolinda's absence?

Those mournful words so pensively he uttered, that the Princess, touched with compassion, beheld him with a most obliging air: but in regard she made no answer, and for that there appeared something of fear in her eyes, the enamoured Prince urged her so seriously, that at length, What would you have me say? cryed she. Alas, replied my Master, you will not yet tell me what I would fain understand from your lips: for I would fain know what thoughts you treasure in your Breast in favour of me? A Boon you may the more freely grant me, now Alaric is gone. Speak then, dear Princess, most passionately added he, speak I conjure you, and tell me for what destiny the divine Princess whom I adore has reserved me? Then Theodolinda blushed, and casting a glance of tenderness from her fair eyes, Ah, Wallia, answered she at length, I have a Father, and you are not a King. Having pronounced those few words with an utterance that testified her affection for my Master, she looked upon the ground like one ashamed, willing to conclude a communication wherein the thought her self too far engaged before she was aware. Nevertheless, the passionate Wallia having considered the sense of her words in that pleasing perplexity which had puzzled the Princess: Provided, cryed he, the divine Theodolinda's heart be not unkind to mine, Fortune and my Sword may prove favourable to me, and by their assistance I may acquire sufficient to make good those glorious hopes which you allow me.

Thus those two illustrious personages concluded that discourse, though they had several others upon the Road to Consensum. And all the way did Wallia taste those sweets which he had not been acquainted with before, being permitted to discover his passion in all those expressions that were capable to set forth the violence of his love. And Theodolinda for her part manifested to the enamoured Prince a tenderness so obliging, which quite transported him with joy and acknowledgment. But no sooner were they come to the King of the Goths's Court, but their satisfaction gave way to several new occasions of sorrow. They observed much confusion there, they descryed many marks of discontent in Placidia's face, and took notice, that they who took her part, were very often forced to excuse the rudeness of King Autalph. For he no sooner saw himself absolute, but he began to shew the power of his Sovereignty. You know without doubt how he used the Sister of Honorius, and how that incomparable Lady, after all the resistance she could make, was constrain'd at length to marry Autalph, while her Religion would not permit her to avoid the match by a voluntary death. You have also heard how that Attalus, taking advantage of our divisions, usurped the name of Emperour; how he kept the Princess of the Tongres a long time shut up in a Tower, after he had stollen her away from us; and how that Rebel was afterwards beaten, taken, and sent prisoner to the Prince whose Majesty he had usurped. As for Autalph, he being charmed with the Beauties of his Queen, left Rome and Italy entire to the possession of her native Sovereign: only before he marched from Barcinona the Capital City of his Dominions, he sent Theodolinda back to the Court of Honorius, being thereto requested by Placidia for several reasons. For indeed the Rape of Cleomira and Sigeric's humour humour made her the more careful of the Princess of the Huns. On the other side, she thought that such an incomparable Princess as she, while she staid for an opportunity to return into Dacia, might work her Brother to do an act of Generosity for a Princess's sake, who had had so great a respect for his Sister. To which purpose she thus reasoned with Theodolinda before their departure: Fair Princess, quoth she, in the presence of Wallia, with tears in her eyes, I am now by the will of Heaven Autalph's Wife, and my Fortune is so linked to his, that I am no longer permitted to think of him whom once I loved so innocently. I dare not pray for my Relations, nor for my ruined Country, if the Prince, whose interests must govern mine, should resolve either to march against Rome or Honorius himself, I must go farther, dear Princess, seeing I find my self obliged to shun your company; for you are so likely to take away from me some part of that affection which is due from me to the King of the Goths, that your company otherwise so charming and alluring, seems now as dangerous as it was really charming before. Ah, my fair Queen, cryed Theodolinda, your conscience is too nice; so that instead of parting from you, I must blame your virtue so severe to my prejudice. However, replied she, now that I am the King my Husband's, and must be his alone, 'twill be a difficult thing for me to refuse you a share of my heart—— How! said the Princess of the Huns, impatiently interrupting her, will you then no longer love me? Not so, dear Princess, replied Placidia, but to tell you truth, I would not that your presence should augment my affection for you; for I fear 'twill weaken my affection to the King of the Goths. And you, Prince, said she, addressing her self to my Master, do you not take my part, or do you slight the joyful honour of conducting the charming Theodolinda to the Court of Honorius? I have perswaded Autalph to make an alliance with the Romans by your mediation: and in regard Honorius has that esteem for you which he has not for any of the Goths, I make no question but he will easily grant Prince Wallia those Provinces which the great Theodosius promised your Countrymen. The care which Alaric took of your fortune, puts us in remembrance to labour in your advancement, as well as to humble the pride of Sigeric: so that the intentions of so great a King being conformable to Autalph's inclinations, you may be sure that nothing shall be omitted to render the journey which I propose successful. Autalph shall not limit your Commission; and I my self will write in your behalf, so as to produce some effect: and it may be also, added she with a blush, you will regain a Friend zealous for your interests, and in sufficient credit with Honorius.

You may well conjecture, Sir, that my Master was easily perswaded, and that Placidia's discourse gave him hopes, which otherwise he durst not have conceived. Nevertheless, before he would return an answer in testimony of his acknowledgment, he consulted the fair eyes of his Princess with a passionate look, seeming to demand whether Theodolinda consented to the Queen of the Goths proposal: and not observing any reluctance to the establishment of his good fortune in the eyes of her that was to raise it, he return'd Placidia thanks, and then pursuing his design, "Madam, said he, I would renounce both Aquitain, and all the Kingdoms of the world, would the divine Theodolinda vouchsafe to crown all those Grandeurs, and add thereto one happiness infinitely above all the Empires in the earth. "Think you, replied the Sister of Honorius, that your lovely Princess is so unjust, as neither to be mov'd with Wallia's virtue, nor so many services which that generous Prince has perform'd for her sake? You are little acquainted with her upon my word, if you think her capable of such a coyness; nor did I ever observe that she ever gave you cause to have any such suspicion. "Ah, Madam, replied the enamour'd Wallia, that I should have so little reason to be at quiet in my mind, seeing I am not able to gather any precise or punctual answer from the lips of my Princess, so that my heart continually floats in a cruel uncertainty. For 'tis very probable that the King of the Huns may be advis'd of a sudden to make some alliance for the advantage of his Kingdom, where I am every moment likely to be depriv'd of the Princess whom I adore; for there is no doubt but the over-nice Theodolinda will certainly obey those commands, though never so fatal to the fortunate Wallia. I must confess, replied the Princess, I shall never dispute the case. "Then confess to boot, replied Placidia, that you will never dispute the case, if you are permitted the choice of Prince Wallia.

Theodolinda giving no other answer to those words, than by her silence and a modest blush, that displayed it self in her cheeks, my Master addressing his speech to her with a vehemence accompanied with submission: "Since you return no answer, Madam, said he, you desire there should be nothing of certainty in those hopes with which you are requested to bless me. "Ah, Wallia, replied she, you have little reason to complain, since I have sufficiently declared to you the meaning of my thoughts, by permitting you the boldness to urge me so far, without fearing to displeas me. "Very good, replied Placi- “dia, and do you think that to be a plenary satisfaction to the Prince? Do you think it “does not become him rather to have those assurances which he demands from your own “lips? For my part, pursued she, I will know before we part, whether Theodolinda and “Wallia shall be happy or no: promise me then, dear Princess, the matter wholly depends “upon you; and therefore vanquish I conjure you a nicety of less moment than Wallia’s “merit; and which with some sort of justice may give place to that affection which you “have for Placidia. I find, fair Queen, replied the Princess of the Huns, that I must obey “your commands; and therefore I declare to Prince Wallia, that he shall never have any reason to “complain of his destiny, if Theodolinda can contribute to his happiness.

She could not conclude those words without blushing, and then continuing her speech on purpose to recover her self, Tousee, said she with more boldness, what you have obliged me to say, yet not repenting of my conformity to the illustrious Placidia’s thoughts, besides that it would not be civility to disobey the Queen of the Goths in Autalph’s Court. My Master overjoyed to hear so charming a protestation, testified his acknowledgment to both Princess-ses, but in such expressions as are not easily repeated by one not inspired with the same passion.

Thus, Sir, stood things at what time Theodolinda and the Queen of the Goths parted.
 The former took her way for Ravenna, accompanied by Wallia, and the greatest part of the Roman Ladies who had accompanied that Princess: and Placidia in a short time after set forward for Barcinona with the King her Husband. My Master had all his Letters, his Commissions, and his instructions in the most full and amplest manner: and being thus furnished with the means of establishing his fortune, and having also every moment the opportunity of enjoying the company of his beloved Mistress, he forgot all his past troubles, pleasing himself in the assurance of his hopes. Honorius received Theodolinda with the same testimonies of his affection which he could have given Placidia: and Wallia he treated also with so many marks of his esteem and confidence, that only Constance could have expected such a welcome. In a few days the alliance between the two Nations was made; Aquitain was promised to Wallia; and Honorius, whose mind was wholly set upon Bellamira, undertook to unite my Master’s and the fortune of the Princess of the Huns together.
 On the other side, Autalph sent for Wallia, and after he had conferred with him, and settled affairs together, he gave him twenty thousand men, either to serve the Romans if they had occasion, or to take possession of that part of Gallia which was promised him. But you know, Sir, that there happened such strange revolutions afterwards, both among the Visigoths, as also in the Court of Honorius, that my Master’s good fortune was very much disturbed, if we may not fear its total overthrow. In short, Sigeric understanding Autalph’s intentions, plotted against him more than ever; and by gifts and promises wrought so far to discredit his Government, and render the King odious to the people and the Soldiers, that the people first murmured against their Prince, and soon after brake out into open Rebellion: Autalph was killed in his Palace, and Placidia forced to flee from a City where her party was not strong enough to assist her against the Rebels. Wallia no sooner understood the news of this terrible revolution, but he marches for his own Country with all the principal Officers of the Army; but notwithstanding all the haste he could make, he heard that Sigeric was crowned King before he came to the Borders of Spain. And therefore though it is very probable he might have made great alterations again, in regard of the high authority he had among the Visigoths, yet considering that his Enemy was his King, that the crimes he had committed were done when he was a private person, and that he sat in Autalph’s Throne by right of succession, he resolved not to give any pernicious President to those that sought to authorize their ambition. However, he went to Tarracona, where he understood that Autalph’s Widow was retired, offering to serve that fair Queen to the utmost of his power. Placidia having returned him her thanks, and given him to understand the comfort she enjoyed by his presence: I know, pursued she, by what means this sedition was raised so fatal to the King my Husband; yet after all that, I have no great reason to revenge his death.

Then she enquired after Theodolinda, and told him how willing she should be to return to the Court of Honorius. In answer whereto, my Master gave her a full account of all things, and promised withal to convoy her safe into Italy. But the Queen of Albion being then at Tarracona, whither she came to be resolved by Placidia in certain jealousies of Constantine’s fidelity. The two Queens entered into such a strict league of Friendship, that they resolved never to part but in the Territories of the Gauls, and to travel together some part of each others way in their return to their native Country. Octavia, to whom renown had several times reported Wallia’s famous Deeds was very glad to be acquainted with such a Prince, giving

giving him such marks of her esteem, as were little different from the Queen of the Goths. Thereupon those three illustrious personages having given orders for their departure, set forward with a numerous Train toward Gallia Narbonnensis, where my Master's Army lay. But when we came thither, news was brought us, that made us alter our Road and intentions. For my Master was inform'd by a Visigoth Knight, that Theodolinda was gone from Rome, that Honorius set out in a short while after to attend the Princesses to the Frontiers of Germany: How, said Wallia, impatiently interrupting him, is Honorius become my Rival? Have the eyes of my Princess kindled a fire so prejudicial to my hopes? All people would think so, replied he, and you your self might well think so: however, upon my word you have no reason to fear him. But the truth, Sir, is, that Theodolinda and Bellamira having held a correspondence together all along, the Emperour discovered at length that they had appointed a Rendezvous: so that he resolv'd to follow the Princess incognito, that he might come upon the charming Princess before she was aware. But, cryed Wallia, very impatiently interrupting him, know you not where Theodolinda intends to stop? In Pharamond's Army no question, replied the Visigoth, for as I crossed the Province of the Romans, I understood that Constance, Artabure, Taxander and the Princess Cleomira are now in the Camp of the Franks.

My Master finding so much probability in his discourse, desired to go thither where he thought he should find his Princess: and having told Placidia the whole Story, as it was related to him, only leaving out any mention of Constance, he found her easily disposed to change her journey: Octavia also not being willing to forsake the Sister of Honorius, has crossed along with her all the Provinces of Gallia, intending to take shipping in Belgia when she returns into her own Kingdom. Thus came these two Princesses to the Banks of the River Rhine, and Wallia as well to serve the great Constance, as to preserve his Title to Aquitain, is returned toward his own Army, with an intention to march them back to the relief of Pharamond. However, finding in himself a reluctancy to fight against an Army where you are engaged, notwithstanding all the reasons that urged him to take the other side, he sent me to make his most solemn excuse: and for my part, I know no better excuse to make, than by relating to you the story of his amours, to shew you the reasons that tie him to the interests of the Romans.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

Hilderic had no sooner made an end of speaking, but the Prince testified the satisfaction which he received from his Relation; giving him to understand with much joy, that he perceived in the fortune of Wallia many probabilities of favourable success. But it being now late, the Visigoth retired to his Chamber; and Balamir went to Bed, with less disposition to sleep, than to muse upon the charming Idea that was always hovering in his fancy. Sometimes he was transported with joy when he reflected upon Bellamira's affection, and called to mind what he had heard of her unshaken constancy. Nevertheless, when he came to examine the severity of her last orders, and found himself not able to obey them, he muttered in his heart, and privately upbraided the divine Lady that he adored. He passed the night in that uncertainty, and day appeared before he could precisely tell whether he had most cause to think himself happy in the prosperity of his amours, or to complain of his hard fate. In the mean time, it behov'd him to be gone to fight Harmaxes; for which purpose he quickly made himself ready, and got him out of the Trenches. But because he was inform'd that Mundisic sought all opportunities to fight him, with whom his Generosity would not permit him to encounter, not so much regarding his valour, as his wounds, he left Telanor in the Camp, and putting on a plain Coat of Arms that he might not be known, he took the direct way to the Wood, believing that Mundisic would stay for him in the high way between the Camps. But while he is thus parted from the Cimbrian Army, the Princess Albisinda's Esquire comes thither from Cologne in that post haste as put them in expectation of some strange news. Presently he went to the King of the Suevians, to give him an account of the reason of his return, which was to tell him that the Citizens of Agrippina were resolv'd to detain the Queens of the Cimbrians and Turingiens, the Princesses of Suevia and the Lombards in their City till the end of the war. The Father of Albisinda seem'd to be less surpris'd than indeed he was: but in regard he was slow to demand any farther Relation, the Squire went on with his message: "Our Princesses, said he, were no sooner arrived at Cologne, but they were received by the Magistrates with all the submission of Loyal Subjects; and when it was perceived that they intended to go farther to meet the Constantinopolitan Troops, the Magistrates came again and besought them to change their resolutions, and to stay in their City, there being no place more convenient for their Sex and Dignity than a Spacious and Noble Town." But the Princess of Suevia, in obedience to your commands, persuaded the Cimbrian Queen to meet the Army. Rosamond preferring Albisinda's satisfaction on before any other consideration, return'd a civil answer to the Citizens of Agrippina, but instead of giving ear to their request, gave order for their departure: thereupon the people mutinied, and threatened to take Arms, while Martian and Ambiomer endeavour'd to bridle their insolency with such as they could procure to stand by them. But that which was most to be wonder'd at, was the remissness and tameness of the Persian Prince that used to be so zealous, and so amorous; and not only so, but he encouraged the Deputies that came to speak to the Queen. He told the Queen that she had no reason to blame the Citizens of Cologne, if fortune having by accident thrown into their City a “Gage sufficient to save them harmless from the dammages of the war, wherever the victory fell, they let not slip the opportunities that were put into their hands.

While he spake in that manner, Briomer was seen riding from street to street, exhorting the people to stand firm to that resolution, which as it was thought he himself had inspir'd into them. The Princesses no sooner understood that the Bohemian was in Agrippina, but they no farther questioned who had laid the foundations of that tumult: And examining Varanez's proceeding, they made as little doubt of his being in confederacy with the Cimbrian, and that your Majesty was not ignorant of the accident: And therefore they thought it convenient, rather than to venture the lives of Ambiomer and Martian, and for fear of having any thing of ill usage put upon them, not agreeable to the respect due to their quality; they sent me, Sir, for your advice upon an adventure so surprizing. Ought they not to wonder, replied the King of Suevia, that the City should be loth to let them go, when their presence is so profitable to the inhabitants? Or is it for persons of their Sex to refuse such a security as that when it is offered?

By that brisk answer Albisinda's Squire rightly judged, that his Mistress's Father had more than an ordinary share in the violence offer'd to the Princesses, and therefore knowing and fearing his humour he said no more. But the King of Sueden for some time eagerly beholding him, in regard he had often felt his pulse but knew not what to think of him, now tryed him again in this manner.

Vinderic, said he, I never thought I was deceived, when I advanced you to the service of my Daughter, believing you to be a faithful Servant, and that you would never prefer the slight rewards of Albisinda, before the substantial favours of your Prince, which are to employ you in the most important affairs of my house, and to give you other opportunities to raise your fortunes: To oblige thee yet more I will trust thee with a secret, and in a few words let thee understand the reason of this action. Know then that Briomer and I have taken notice, that there is a wonderful kindness between Balamir and our irreconcilable Enemy, which private amity has given us alarms so much the more terrible, by how much the more dangerous we apprehend the effects of it must be. For certain it is that Balamir carries a very great sway with Rosamond, and that she a foolish Princess, has a kindness for him whom she ought mortally to hate: So that the Prince of the Huns having all the Cimbrians under his command, and their Queen at his beck, will not fail to oblige Pharamond, to the end he may give him the possession of Hunnimonda. By this pernicious exchange shall our league be dissolved, the murderer of Theobald and Vindimir, shall triumph over mine and Briomer's antipathy, and thou wilt see me die for grief, after the overthrow of all my designs. For this cause we thought fit to remove Rosamond from the Camp, and to drill her into a strong City, whose interest it is to keep her safe. Briomer no less courageous, than faithful to his Master whom he has lost, is gone to Cologne to keep the hearts of the Citizens firm, and you see that Varanez is of our opinion, to whom we imputed the design as being a Prince, that has a natural antipathy against Pharamond. In the mean time this Army shall advance toward Agrippina, and there joyning with that which comes from the East, we shall be able not only to secure a place, where we have stored so inestimable a treasure, but also to defend it against the King of the Franks and all the world beside.

Having thus declared to you what concerns our party in general, I must discover now my own particular interests: You may easily guess Vinderic, what an affliction it is to me to see Viridomar in Pharamond's Camp, and to hear how the Coward fights for the Sister of the most odious of all my Enemies. Unnatural bruit, be forget that that very Pharamond whom he so ignominiously courts, killed his Brother, robbed me not only of a Son, but also of an eldest Son and the Heir to my Crown. I have laboured all I can to reduce this ingrateful, that so obstinately disobeyes me, and to reunite him to my Fatherly affection, but to the grief of my heart, all my endeavours have proved vain. I must now seek other ways to accomplish my ends, since this perfidious youth has deserted me, I must get into my power the absolute Mistress of his will, and to recover my only Son, I must have my enemies Sister at my disposal. You may contribute to this double satisfaction which I hope for, and I doubt not but you will perform your duty, chusing rather to assure to those rewards which you may expect at my hands, than to dye tormented for betraying your Sovereign. You are only to go to the Camp of the Franks, to see Viridomar as if you had been sent by his Sister, and to tell him what has happened at Cologne as a Cloak of your coming. You may tell him then that Albisinda desires you to see the Princess Polyxena, and to complement her in her behalf. This is what I would have at present, and be assured that though the command be slight, I shall measure my liberality by the importance of your service, rather than by the pains which you take.

Vinderic overjoyed to be a sharer in the secrets of the King, promised him to obey his orders with all exactness and fidelity imaginable, and as he was preparing to be gone to Pharamond's Army, there was a rumour spread it self in the Cimbrian Tents, growing still louder and louder till it came to the King of Suevia's Quarters: Thereupon the King desirous to understand the reason, was about to have sent out, when of a sudden there entered three or four Officers into his Chamber looking very melancholy, that brought along with them a Knight, who presently averred that Balamir was slain. The dissembling King counterfeited both wonder and affliction in his eyes, and manifesting a desire to know the circumstances of an accident which he called so fatal, he commanded a short Relation to be made him, not so much out of compassion as to feed his revenge, with such tidings as he had impatiently looked for. Thereupon the person who was brought before him, began his relation and told him, that he saw Balamir run through in several places of the body, dead and stretched forth upon the ground, that several of the Franks had taken away his body, and carried it probably into their own Camp. That the Prince had defended himself even to admiration, but was at length forced to yield to number, and the obstinacy of those that assailed him.

At those words the King of Suevia seeming to be moved for the death of Balamir, cried out aloud, that the whole confederacy had sustained a very great loss, for that he believed there was no person in the Army, who had won greater fame by his honourable Achievements. Then making a shew as if he desired to be better inform'd, the Crowd that was in his Chamber retired out of respect, and the Soldier approaching very near him, Well then, said the King with a low voice and an apparent satisfaction, which till then he had dissembled; are my orders obeyed? is it certain that Balamir is slain? He is slain without all peradventure, answered the other: But, replied the King, are you sure you are not deceived? Not at all, added the cut-throat, for though the courage and valour of the Prince of the Huns had not made it apparent, yet his arms, remarkable for the Lyons painted upon them, were a sufficient testimony of our not being mistaken. And where are your Companions, replied the King somewhat disturb'd: We have lost three, answered the other, the rest I believe will return suddenly to the Camp. The King of Suevia being thus settled in his mind, sent away the Soldier, and published the death of Balamir through the whole Army.

This mortal report strook all the Cimbrians into a deadly consternation, and among the rest all persons that honoured virtue, were sensibly afflicted. The faithful Telanor was like one pierced with a Thunderbolt, but resolving to search into every particular of an accident; that concerned a person much more dear to him than his own life, away he posted to inform himself more exactly, and no sooner was he satisfied as he desired to be, but he felt a considerable abatement of his grief. In short, he judged by the relation which they made him that it was Mundisic who was slain, knowing that Balamir had not put on his Arms painted with Lyons that day, and not believing that he had taken that Rode where the murder was said to be committed: So that after he had out of his affection to his Sovereign, bewailed the death of his Son, he more admired the justice of heaven, in the reward of so signal a punishment. For indeed Mundisic lost his life, in the violent design that was laid against his Brother, and Balamir escaped the danger by means of his generosity, that avoided an enemy, whose obstinate malice dispens'd with a circumspection so exact. Though Telanor no way doubted of the truth, yet he thought it not convenient to disabuse the world, believing that the secret enemies of his Master, acted less warily in the strength of their belief: So that it was probable he might discover their thoughts, and the motives that had arm'd them against the life of so great a Prince, as well in the Forest of Lisurgis before, as now upon the Rode between the two Camps. He had a notable suspicion of the Kings of Suevia and the Herules, and if his generosity forbore not to stop there, prudence yet enjoined him not to omit any means to secure a life, which had been fought after from time to time by enemies so dangerous.

Thereupon he went to the principal of the Cimbrian Commanders, and in regard he was assured of their fidelity to his Master, he discovered to them without any more to do, what he knew in reference to the Prince. Afterwards he conjured them to be ready to fight for the interests of their Prince, if those enemies whom his vertue had raised him up, should make more open attempts upon his life, having twice already missed their secret contrivances.

The Bobemians had so great a veneration for Balamir, thrt they were overjoyed to hear, that the report of his death was false, and having promised all things to the faithful Squire, that he could expect from their affection, they went to order their affairs with all the prudence, requisite to conceal their design.

In the mean time the King of Suevia sent word to Gondisic, Arderic and Godegesile, that he desired to confer with them about a matter of great weight. The three Princes being come, he beheld them very earnestly, and thus addressing his speech to them all, Your good fortune, said he, has delivered you from an enemy who was so much the more to be feared, by how much the more he was able to hurt you, without being suspected. You guess right if you think I mean Balamir, and I make no question that none of you can deny, but that he was a more terrible enemy as a private friend of Pharamond's, than as a Lover of the Queen of the Bohemians.

After he had thus prepared their ears, he repeated to them all that he had already said to Vinderic, and perceiving that they were very much concerned in his discourse, he continued after this manner with more vehemence than before. Besides that, Balamir, said he, was then in a condition to have deprived ye all of Rosamond, and to betray her into the hands of the King of the Franks, he went about to purchase a privilege, openly to dispose of that fair Princess, and to reconcile himself with Pharamond. That which I go about to tell ye is wonderful, but unhappily for us too true: You know that the King of the Cimbrians had so great a kindness for Briomer, that he trusted him with his only Son, while he was yet but a mere infant. At that very time the Narisquians invaded Bohemia, and all the Kingdom was in such a hubbub, that they were forced to seek a Sanctuary for young Theobald out of his Father's dominions. Briomer chose the Country of the Quadians for his retreat, and made his abode in the City of Rhobodunum, at what time young Balamir, second Son to the King of the Huns, was brought to Singone a City of the same Country. That infant was of the same age as the Cimbrian Prince, and Valamber Telanor's Father had the charge of him, as Briomer had of the Brother of Rosamond. The Guardians of these two Princes visited each other very often, and had contracted a kind of friendship together, rather through the conformity of their employments, than any agreement between their humours. In short, I have often heard say that Valamber was of a sweet disposition, moderate in his desires, and upright in his dealings. On the contrary, we know that Briomer was of a working brain, a haughty humour, and a courage that would not easily stoop: Those qualities proper to second the ambition of the Bohemian, bred in him hopes that were extraordinary, and infused into him a design to advance his posterity to the Sovereign dominion of his Country. He thought that in the opportunity that offered it self, he should meet with but few obstacles proportionable to the importance of the attempt: For in short, he knew he should not be recalled in a long time to a Country, where troubles every day increased, besides he was certain that all who attended the young Infant out of Bohemia, depended upon him (though there were no occasion of trusting many) so that he resolved to put an only Son of his own, into the place of young Theobald. However though the conjuncture were favourable, and that fatherly affection confirm'd him in his design, yet when he saw himself going about to betray a Master, that had trusted in his hands all that was dear to him in the world, he could not chuse but have some checks of conscience. As immovable as he was wont to be in all assaults of danger, he was at a stand more than once, and that which made him sometimes repent the execution of his design, was the smiling infancy of young Theobald, that laughed in his Arms when he took him out of his Cradle, to lay his Son in his Room. Being thus disturbed he sought out a way to calm his disturbances, he thought he should be the less troubled, the less damage he did his own Prince, for which reason he resolved to send away young Balamir quite, and to lay young Theobald in his place: So that he only changed from one Family Royal to another. The enterprize at first succeeded happily enough, but not with that series of success which he desired, for Valamber returning to Singone, sooner than was convenient for Briomer's project, and perceiving what he had lost, took Horse and pursued those that had taken away young Balamir with an extraordinary diligence,

Here the King of Suevia repeated Valamber's encounter with Menebaldus, how Ambiorix found young Balamir whom he named Ambiomer, together with all the particulars which he had learn'd from Briomer's own mouth. At the end of that repetition the King continuing his discourse; Thus you see, said he, that Balamir who lived among us as General of the Cimbrians, was the true Theobald Brother of Rosamond, and that Ambiomer who is now at Cologne with the Princesses, is the real Balamir second Son to the King of the Huns, and that Theobald whom Pharamond killed before Rosamond's face, was only a Son of Briomer's.

Those words having redoubled the Princes wonder, they beheld each other for some time without speaking a word, till at length the King of the Burgundians breaking silence, I am apt to believe, said he, that Theobald who was thought to be the Prince of the Cimbrians was Briomer's Child, his natural fierceness and something of his Air in the Youth's face, and lastly, Briomer's implacable hatred of Pharamond, serves to convince us fully of the truth. For Briomer would never continue so obdurate against the King of the Franks, had not his valour deprived him of a Prince, whom he made it his only care to advance, and when he was so near being King of Bohemia, I make as little question but that that Balamir who is killed was Rosamond's

Brother, in regard of that trust and confidence which they had each for the other, and the little scruple they made to manifest their affection is a testimony sufficient, should we omit the extraordinary reverence which the Cimbrians bare to their General, which was nothing but an instinct of nature which carried them to love their Prince. For my part, added the King of the Gepides, I not only agree to the truth of what has been already said, but I am of the same opinion also in relation to Ambiomer; for certainly such a person as he could never descend but from a Royal Extraction.

The King of Suevia observing that the three other Kings were convinced, Judge you now, said he, whether Briomer had not reason to fear, lest Balamir should come to be known, and lest the Prince whom you mortally hate should be reconciled to the fair Queen, at whose feet you sigh your selves. He had a most terrible apprehension of it, that he sought by all means to avoid it, and endeavoured himself to have slain Balamir, to the end, that they who knew the truth, might care the less to put themselves to the trouble of declaring it, in regard the person was dead. To this intent therefore it was, that Briomer caus'd him to be set upon in the Forest of Lysurgis, when fortune, favourable to Pharamond, conducted him to the succour of that very person that only could establish his felicity. The Cimbrian was mad at his ill success, and believing that Balamir would be better guarded for the future, he sent into Pannonia to kill Velamber, thereby to rid himself of the only person in the world whom he had reason to fear. But all those attempts proving fruitless, the last of his enterprises has been more prosperous. In short, Keva not only rescued Velamber, but took Menebaldus, who is brought along by the Ambassadors to discover all those pranks which he has committed by Briomer's order.

Now, Sirs, that we may the more successfully oppose Pharamond, in regard that the death of Balamir enlivens us still with some hopes that we may conceal his extraction, my most weighty advice is this. Let us write to Keva, if you think it to the purpose, not to discover the exchange which was made in the Province of the Quades: we will lay before him that 'twere a piece of inhumanity to afflict the Queen of the Bohemians to no purpose, in regard that he himself may well conjecture, that this new grief will work so much the more violently in the heart of that Princess, by how much the more Balamir's merit surmounted the pretended Theobald's, who was slain by Pharamond. That instead of discovering to Rosamond the loss of a Brother not to be recovered again, it were better for him to conceal the real ground of his Embassy under some other pretence apparent enough to be believed. To which purpose nothing could be more probable than to say that the end of his coming was to propose a match between Rosamond and Balamir, a Prince to be endowed with all those noble qualities to be beloved of her, and feared by her Subjects already accustomed to obey him.

The King had no sooner concluded, when Gondioch, Ardaric and Godegisilus agreed that it was necessary to send some experienced and faithful person to Keva, to act according to their intentions; and having pitched upon a certain Sueve of a nimble and quick wit, they dispatched him away with all speed with Letters and all other necessary instructions.

In the mean time, the King of the Lombards had other thoughts in his mind: for he was so concern'd for the pretended death of Balamir, that he took Horse, and rode forth out of the Line better to inform himself of an accident of so great importance, for which he was greatly afflicted notwithstanding the predominant sorrows that almost stifled his heart. He had not rode far upon the great Road that led to Pharamond's Camp, but he met certain Horsemen of whom he thought he might receive intelligence: and no sooner had he asked the question, but one of the Troop, to whom he more particularly addressed himself, return'd this answer, "I believe, said he, that none of my companions can better satisfy your curiosity than myself, being a witness of the greatest part of those things which you desire to understand. Know then, Sir, said he, that as I was this morning riding to visit a Captain of my acquaintance in the King of the Herules Army, I discovered a top of yonder rising ground before us the marks of a Combat, but newly ended. There were Bodies of men lay dead very sorely cut and mangled, among the rest a Soldier of a noble presence run through in several parts of his Body with all the signs of a dying man. Cleomer being upon the Road, and riding up to the Prince, who was ready to expire, while three or four Franks, by his order, pursued two Horsemen that endeavoured to save themselves with equal swiftness. "Courage, Sir, cryed Pharamond's Esquire, relief is come, and your murderers shall soon feel the punishment of their crime in torments. "So saying he went about to disarm Balamir ——" How, cryed the King of the Lombards, was it that renowned Prince whom you beheld in that extremity. "There is no question but it was he, replied the unknown person, and you will be of my opinion when you hear all. I will tell you then, that Cleomer's good intentions nothing availed to a person that was past relief, and who expired at the same time. So that all the comfort which the gene“rous Frank had, was, to take two of the Assassins, and to carry them disar’m’d. At first the Esquire examined them softly, but when he had heard them with astonishment, Surely; cryed he aloud, the enemies of that great Prince were extremely blinded by their own rage, or else they would never have acted so much against their own interest: for they saw not what advantages they might have expected from the valour of a Soldier who was the principal support of their party. As for Briomer I wonder not that he should conspire against Balamir, seeing that his brain’d Cimbrian was only born to attempt the lives of great men; but I admire that persons whose thoughts should be answerable to their Dignities, could be guilty of a deed so treacherous and black. “After that he commanded the body of Balamir to be taken up, and “carried to Pharamond’s Camp. This is all, Sir, that I know of this dismal accident: but “yonder, added he, is Cleomer, if I am not deceived; probably from him you may receive “better satisfaction.

The King of the Lombards civilly returning thanks to the unknown person, rode up to Pharamond’s Esquire, and that he might speak his mind with less distrust, he made no scruple to discover himself. Cleomer transported to see a Prince, famous for so many great victories, in testimony of his joy that he had met him, and could better satiate the great Agelmond, without any more ado told the King of the Lombards, that it was Mundisc was slain: “But, Sir, replied he, by the confession of these two prisoners, Balamir’s life is in “no small jeopardy, so that I am resolved to make all the haste I can to the Cimbrian Camp, “to give him notice of the dangers that threaten him, and to offer him all assistance in my “Master’s name. “You will not find Balamir there, replied Agelmond, for I came forth “on purpose to seek him: either he is with the Princess of the Goths, or else we shall find “him in this Wood. “Let us make haste then, said Cleomer, and beat the Wood, for I “am sure Balamir is not with the Princess Hunnimonds. Agelmond consenting, they took several ways, appointing to rendezvous at the place where Theon and Melusina met. The King, conducted by his good Genius, had not rode far, but he heard the clattering of weapons, whereby he understood that there was some encounter or other hard by. Immediately he descryed two, who most furiously animated against each other, laid on with an extraordinary valour, but with a remarkable difference of skill and strength. One of those Knights had receiv’d but one slight wound; the other had given his Adversary three that were considerable. Besides that, there was not only a terror in his countenance, but something so dreadful in his manner of fighting, whereby a man might easily be persuaded that such a person as he was not wont to be vanquished. For he no sooner understood that people were coming, but fearing to be parted before he had concluded the Combat, he discharged so furious a back blow upon the head of his Enemy, that his Head-piece flew from his Head, the Buckles being cut away, whereby Harmaxes, for he it was, was compelled to shew his face: so that Agelmond knowing him by his countenance, out of a wonderful Generosity stepped into his relief. “Valiant Knight, cried he, turning himself round, shd not I beseech you the blood of so many great Princes in the person of your “Enemy; but be contented with those advantages you have won, without completing “your victory.

The Prince of the Huns no sooner heard Agelmond’s voice, but he let fall the point of his Sword, and lifting up the Viser of his Helmet, “Balamir, said he, scorns to take away the life of a person that is not able to defend it. But is it possible that the King of “the Lombards should concern himself so vehemently for the Prince of the Venedians? “Alas, Sir, replied he sighing, what would not a real Lover do for a Princess’s sake that he “adores? I promised the divine Gilismene that I would never attempt any thing against “the life of any Prince related to her: and I should believe I had failed her in my word, “should I not endeavour to rescue Prince Harmaxes from the danger that now threatens “him.

Concluding those words he turn’d toward his Rival, and addressing himself to him, “Sir, “said he in a very friendly manner, that Agelmond whom you so vigorously hate, is now come “to tender you all the services which you can expect from the most faithful of your Friends. Instead of saying more, both Balamir and he prepared to disarm Harmaxes, and to look after his wounds, when the Sarmatian, who looked very furiously at first, began to relent, and with a low and feeble voice return’d this answer, “Go, happy Agelmond, said he, go “and possess thy Gilismene, and leave a miserable creature to perish, whose frauds and trea- “sons have so little availed.

The passionate King not knowing how to interpret those words, “Ah, Sir, I beseech you “explain your meaning, and do not think that an unfortunate person that has lost all his “hopes, can flatter himself with so slight an intimation only. “Therefore it is certain,

“ replied the Prince of the Venedians, that Gilismene lives: ’twas I that took her from thee; and rais’d the report of her death; and Agathyrfus, who drove me out of my Dominions, for thee preserves that fair Princess, who would at this hour be surrounded with delights, did not thy absence cause her to sigh in the midst of—— He would not have concluded, but that he began to faint away; and soon after gave up the Ghost; as if those moments of life had only been spared him, to tell Agelmond the happy resolution of a fortune which had so long and so unjustly crossed him. Balamir and Agelmond could not but pity his untimely fate; but when they had caus’d him to be carried off, Balamir perceiving that the King of the Lombards was still in doubt of those acceptable tydings, “ Sir, said he, I must acknowledge that there is something in the Venedian Prince’s last words very much to be admired: but though the speech of a dying man were little to be heeded, there is no accident whatever, of which the Adventures of the Princess of the Goths will not confirm the probability. For in short, Sir, why should not Harmaxes do as much to coven you, as Mundisc did to cheat me? He took Hunnimonda from me, he buried her in the opinion of the world, and the report of her being dead; and wherefore may not Harmaxes use the same deceit that Mundisc used?

Those words somewhat abated the King of the Lombards grief; yet not being able to let so much joy into his Soul at once, as such a happy change deserved to produce, he resolved for Sarmatia, so soon as he should return to the Cimbrian Camp. But notwithstanding the agitations of his thoughts at such a conjuncture, he minded Balamir’s security: and therefore to advertise the Prince of what had passed, “ Sir, said he, I know not whether Harmaxes made use of the same contrivances as Mundisc did, but I am certain both those Princes have undergone the same destiny to day, being both slain in search of our lives. “ How, replied Balamir, is Mundisc dead? “ He is most certainly dead, replied the King of the Lombards, for Cleomer, King Pharamond’s Esquire, saw him expire of his wounds: he also caused his Body to be carried into the Camp of the Franks, where, it is said, they intend to keep him, till the King of the Huns pleasure be known. “ I protest, said Balamir, I bewail the loss of that Prince, notwithstanding all his violent humours: for to say truth, methinks Generosity compels me to pity his fate.

While he was pursuing this discourse, Agelmond led him to the place where he had appointed Cleomer to meet him, and by the way he told him the whole contrivance which was laid against him in the Cimbrian Camp. Balamir was not much surpris’d, having already discovered some of Briomer’s designs, and knew the humour of those Princes that were in league with that famous Villain. However, he could not chuse but be nettled, and as his moderation kept him within bounds, one way for Viridomar’s and Albisinda’s sake; on the other side, the wounds of Godegesilus suspended his rancour. Nevertheless, he could not conceive why those two Kings who had conspired with Briomer to take away his life, should go about to deprive their party of an assistance not readily to be despis’d, unless they had some very powerful reason. And indeed Agelmond and he were diving into the nature of this foul and unworthy secret, when Cleomer drew near, and in discharge of his Commission, offered him a hundred men, and the King of France at the head of them. Balamir return’d an answer to that obliging language, with all the acknowledgment which he thought due to Pharamond; and having carress’d his Esquire according to his quality, he would needs return with Agelmond to the Cimbrian Camp, though Cleomer would fain have perswaded them to have gone another way.

So soon as he came to the Trenches he met Telanor, who no sooner spyed him, but he ran towards him with all the marks of an extraordinary joy: and being come near his illustrious Master, not able to moderate his transportment, Welcome, Sir, said he, for the Gods your visible protectors not only restore you to the vows and wishes of all good and virtuous men, but it is their pleasure at length that you be acknowledged for the true Theobaldus, Brother of the incomparable Rosamond. For Theobald? cryed Balamir, interrupting him, and with a surpris’e that made him change colour. Yes, Sir, for the same person, replied Telanor, nor is there any person through the whole Army that questions but that you are King of the Cimbrians, and that Ambiomere is the Son of the King of the Huns, and the real Balamir.

After that he told the Prince succinctly all that the King of Suevia had discovered to the three Kings: how they had wrote to Keza, who was come to Cologne already, and to convince him that he spake nothing but truth, he thus pursued.

The Embassadors of the Huns very patiently heard the Suedish Deputy, but how potent soever their Arguments were, or how considerable soever they were in their persons, Keza would not declare his mind either one way or other. In the mean time he went to visit the Princess of the Cimbrians, there he discovered all Briomer’s crimes, and rather chose to afflict afflict her with your pretended death, than longer to keep her in an error which rendering her the enemy of Pharamond, had prolonged a war between so many various Nations.

The incomparable Rosamond was easily persuaded to believe what Keos and Menebaldus said, a hundred circumstances seemed to support the Relation, but then remembering that affection which she always had had for him, she looked upon it to be an effect of nature, and that absolutely convinced her. But hearing that this Brother newly brought to light was as newly slain, she was so sensibly afflicted that she fainted away, and the fairest eyes in the world began to be lavish of their tears. This news being spread abroad, caused a strange surprize in Cologne and in our Army, and you may well think, Sir, that it was variously received according to the variety of accidents. For my part, in regard I could give a better account of your condition, I dispatched away messengers both to Cologne and to the Camp of the Franks, as well to disabuse and revive the incomparable Rosamond, as to excite the great Pharamond to succour a Prince, to whom he would now most certainly shew redoubled kindnesses: Not but that the Cimbrians impatiently expect their King, or that they are not disposed to spend their blood to the very last drop in your service; but you know there are so many Princes in our Army jealous of Pharamond's happiness, that there is no question but they will oppose the belief of a truth, so prejudicial to your interest, and it may be take up Arms against you, if they find you inclinable to the King of the Franks interest.

Balamir having listned with very great attention, Is it possible, cryed he, that one day should be famous for so many strange accidents? How fortunate, Sir, should we be, if what we have heard from the mouth of Harmaxes and Telanor, should prove as true as the probabilities seem to promise? Let us go then, let us go where our destinies call us. For my part, said the Lombard King, I shall return into Sarinatia without any farther consideration, though my heart mis-gives me that my hopes are groundless. But, Sir, added he in a most obliging manner, 'tis but juſt before I go, for me to ſtudy, which way I may be ſerviceable to Agelmond's defender, upon all important occasions that may befall him: For the Cimbrians being overjoyed to have found their loſt King, will without any reluctance acknowledge their Sovereign: So that there will be no obstacle of my departure. If my advancement be ſo near as I am promiſed, replied Balamir, I had rather you would ſtay with us, that when you ſee what befalls me, it may be a confirming omen of what you are to expect.

Concluding these words he entred the Camp, and Telanor being gone before to give notice of his return, all the young Cimbrians came to attend the person of their King. The Soldiers of that Nation were presently in Arms, and the principal Officers meeting him in a body saluted him King, and carried him on their shoulders upon a buckler to shew him to their Army, commanding their Shouts and Acclamations: So that the Sky resounded nothing but,

God save King THEOBALD: Let our Great King Live: And let the Traitor BRIOMER dye, that would have deprived us of such an accomplished Prince.

These loud cries surprized Arderic and Gondioch, but the King of the Suevians and the Herules were so raging mad at it, that they were about at first to have openly declared against Balamir, and to have set upon his forces. But foreseeing the consequences of such a division in the Army, they resolv'd to take another course: So that instead of sending to complement the new King of the Cimbrians, they went in person and told him, ordinary civilities were not sufficient upon extraordinary accidents. Theobald who had a fair prospect of their inward thoughts, received them with an indifference, which he was not wont to shew to persons of that dignity, and if other considerations had not held him within the limits of moderation, he had certainly told them more of his mind,

The King of Suevia surprized at his carriage, was so raging mad at it that he looked red again in the face: nevertheless dissembling his choler, that he might act more conformably to his designs, he undertook to speak addressing himself to the Brother of Rosamond. Or

I am deceived, Sir, said he, or else you no less inherit the King your Father's disposition, than his Dominions, so that there is little probability of your proving any great friend to Pharamond, in regard that he who gave you being, left the antipathy which he had for the common enemy of our League, as a Legacy to his Son by his Will and Testament. You see however Sir, replied the King of the Cimbrians, that the foundation of that hatred is quite taken away, for it is impossible for me to be the Brother of Rosamond, unless at the same time you will acknowledge, that Pharamond never slew the real Theobald. "How! added the King of the Herules, you speak in justification of Pharamond, not taking notice that you cannot be kind to that enemy of the Bohemians, without being unjust to many other great Kings, who have exposed their lives, and sacrificed their subjects in your Sisters quarrel, and for the defence of your people. "I cannot tell, very regardlessly cried Theobald, but that those great Kings you mean, minded more their own particular interests, than the service of the Queen of the Cimbrians. "What signifies it, cried the Suevian King, impatiently interrupting the other, whether those Princes acted for love of Rosamond, or out of hatred to Pharamond? Is it not sufficient that while they are thus united, you are Master of the most powerful Army in the world, if you know how to make use of those advantages which Fortune offers you? For you will be looked upon as Head of the League, and as the sole disposer of Rosamond: And in regard both sweetness and honour wait upon command, no doubt but you will delay the marriage of your Sister, to keep those Princes that fight for her at your devotion. "'Tis very like I may be of your opinion, replied the King of the Cimbrians, but I am not bound to tell you my thoughts, only this I will declare before ye all, that I will always give Rosamond the freedom of her own will, and as I am one that either have no enemies, or none that I much care for, I shall never labour much for those preferments which you would heap upon me. "I confess, replied the King of Suevia, there are few enemies can scare a courage like yours: Yet for all that you must confess you have an enemy, if you are entirely persuaded that you are the Son of a Prince, that mortally hated Pharamond. "Otherwise, added Godegesile, think it not ill that we carry on our councils, distinctly according to the diversity of our designs. "Let every one do as he pleases, fiercely replied the King of the Bohemians, for ye have known Balamir long enough, to think that Theobald will easily change his resolution.

Upon those words the Kings of the Suevians and the Herules, seemed to be more exasperated than before, and were about to have displayed their passion, had not Gondioch and Arderic entred at the same time, who come to pay their visits to a Prince, whose good will they gladly endeavoured to purchase: So that their discourse was not so tart as before though it continued not long, by reason that they all laid a great constraint upon themselves, disguising their thoughts according to their different interests. Thereupon they all took their leaves of Theobald, not with that coldness as they ought to have done, if they thought him to be a Friend of Pharamond's, nor with that kindness which they owed him, had they taken him for the Brother of Rosamond. Being altogether at the King of Suevia's Quarters, they cursed the fatal destiny, that to the overthrow of all their designs, had at the same time and in the same Country, kept alive all those very persons that could have been picked out, for the discovery of Balamir and Ambiomere's extraction. In short, they discoursed of Menebaldus's imprisonment, the arrival of Ambiorix, the exactness of Keza, and Theon's answer to Balamir and Ambiomere, when they consulted him in relation to their future fortunes, at the intreaty of several Ladies. They were so much concern'd in that discourse, that it had certainly continued longer, had it not been interrupted by Vinderic's return.

The King of Suevia no sooner had spied Albisinda's Squire, but impatient of the news which he brought from Pharamond's Army, "Well Vinderic, said he, hast thou seen my enemies Sister? "Yes, Sir, replied the Squire, I have not only seen her, but also for the Princess Albisinda's sake, I was received with all the favour and kindness which I could have expected, either from the Queen of the Turingiens or Albisinda herself.

At these words the King of Suevia longed to hear something, which might flatter that new passion which had taken root in his heart, notwithstanding all the hatred that reigned there. But being obliged to be somewhat wary before Arderic, Godegesile, and Gondioch, they were no sooner gone, but the Lover of Polixena calling Albisinda's Squire to him again, "Speak, said he, and be sure you call to mind every particular that concerns the Princess of the Franks, "Sir, said he, as soon as I came into Pharamond's Camp, Prince Vidorimar demanded of me, whether your Majesty continued in the same severity of humour as before, and whether you had the same antipathy against the Brother of a Princess,

“for whom to his knowledge you had such a passionate affection. “No, no, replied the King, interrupting him, and blushing, I will never forgive the murderer of Vindimir, nor the Lover of Polyxena. But go on, said he, and if you saw Vindomar in the company of my Enemy’s Sister, tell me how the Princess receiv’d the testimonies of his passion that so much torments me. “To say truth, Sir, replied Vinderic, the Prince of Suevia is not much in fault; for Polyxena is a most charming Lady, and if I am not deceiv’d, she has no unkindness for him. “The danger then is greater than I thought, replied the jealous King, so that I must lose no time, if I intend to separate two persons that are so mutually affectionate each to other. And therefore since Polyxena has so kindly entertained Albisinda’s Complements, return you to Cologne, and after you have given your Mistress an account of her own affairs, find out Briomer, and tell him that Polyxena will receive the present, coming in Albisinda’s name, that I have an impatience to see the business brought to pass; and having done my part, the rest remains for him to do, and that therefore I desire him to make all the haste which the design requires.

He had no sooner dispatched his Daughter’s Esquire, but he went to the King of the Herales, where he understood both Gondioch and Arduric were: “Sirs, said the King of Suevia, since it is too certain to our sorrow, and that the Prince which we have known by the name of Balamir, is the real Theobald, let us never stand to oppose a truth so apparently confirm’d, but let us contrive to put a stop to all his intentions to the prejudice of the League. Never dream that your passions for the Princess his Sister must bring you to dance after his pipe. But on the contrary, if you find that he intends to dispose of that Lady according to his own humour, it behoves you to turn your Arms against him, and look upon him rather as Pharamond’s Friend, than the Brother of Rosamond. “How ever, ’tis the best way, answered the King of the Gepides, for us to see which way he drives, before we resolve in a heat and a tumult how to proceed against him. “How, said Godegefilus, briskly interrupting him, do we not see plain enough already whither his inclinations bend; and if it happen that he come to be in a condition to chuse Rosamond a Husband, without discovering his design to us, is it for us to doubt but that he will favour the most odious of all our Rivals? “if he be so cruelly bent against us, pursued the King of the Burgundians, addressing his speech to the King of the Gepides, ’tis most certain that we shall have nothing else to mind, and that the interest of our Love will bear us out in whatever we shall undertake for the preservation of our hopes. “It absolutely behoves us to hold together, cried the King of Suevia, and to act by consent, if ever we intend to cross the designs of Theobald to the prejudice of our solemn League. We must also take Arms against the Cimbrians, if they pretend the support of a person whom above all others in the world we ought to hate, when we find him about to act a piece of infidelity, which he sees already so much in his power to perform.

While the King of Suevia takes this resolution, and inspires it into the rest of his Enemy’s Rivals, Theobald sent one of his chief Officers to the French Camp, to give an account to his Princess of what had happened; as also to return thanks to Pharamond for the obliging proffers he had made him by Cleomer: and by that time he had dispatched the Messenger, Narva return’d from Cologne, whither Telanor had sent him, and brought word that the Princesses were still there detain’d, as Vinderic had related to the King of Suevia. The King of the Cimbrians was incens’d with this piece of injustice. However, not having interrupted Narva, he understood farther, that the report in Cologne was, that the King of the Sarmatians and the Prince of the Saxons were both in the Constantinopolitan Army.

Theobald no sooner understood the last particular, when he was not only glad thereof for Agelmond’s sake, but he resolv’d to find out that Prince, and give him intelligence thereof in person. As soon as he met with him, with a satisfaction in his countenance that shewed how much he shared in his good or bad fortune: You know, Sir, said he, that I never doubted but that Harmaxes spake true, when he told you those tidings wherewith you durst not flatter the hopes of an afflicted heart. However, if you think I was too easily persuaded to believe a Prince whose cursed plots have cost so much, you may be quickly better inform’d; for the King of Sarmatia, who is certainly arrived at Cologne, will soon satisfy you, whether I was deceiv’d in giving credit to a dying man. How, Sir, replied Agelmond in a surprize, Agathyrus to whom I am so infinitely beholding, Agathyrus, the Brother of my Princess, is he so near this Army? At least, replied Theobald, he is in the Army which Theodotius and Pulcheria have sent to reinforce this party for Varancz and Martian’s sake. Ah, if it be true, replied Agelmond with an air less pensive, that the King of the Sarmatians is alive, and in these Countries, I desire not of seeing a revolution in my fortune. But alas! added he immediately, what ground have I for this alteration? May I imagine for my consolation, that there is that correspondency between the misfortunes of the Brother and the Sister, which may be sufficient for me to judge of Gilismene's Fate, by the adventures of Agathyrus. I know, replied the King of the Cimbrians, that there is no reason that Gilismene should be alive, because the King of the Sarmatians is not dead. Yet Sir, it is upon the last breath of Harmaxes that I settle my belief: For if he spoke true in relation to Agathyrus, it is as unlikely that he would betray his own thoughts, when he came to speak of the Princess Gilismene. Away then, away, and learn from the Lips of the Sarmatian King himself, whether I be not more in the right as to what concerns the King of the Lombards, than he himself. Yes Sir, replied Agelmond, I will be gone, to meet my friend that laboured so much in vain for me, but I will not stir till I see the great Theobald fixed in his Throne, that all the Enemies of his virtue shall not be able to move him. I would not refuse the assistance of the valiant King of the Lombards, replied the Cimbrian King, did I fear too great a Tempest would pour down, upon an authority but new established and void of succour. But having the Cimbrians on my side, and the support if need be of the King of the Franks, there is no necessity for you to defer the satisfaction, which you may receive from Agathyrus. The danger lurks in this Camp, replied Agelmond, the King of the Franks is not nigh enough, and many Armies may of a sudden unite against yours, so that I am resolved not to forsake you, till you are in a condition to withstand the confederacy that is hatching against you, the effects whereof you will feel, when they find you inclined to do justice to the merits of Pharamond. Fear not however that I will be long absent from the King of the Sarmatians, for if I am not mistaken the face of things will soon teach us how to steer our course. In the meantime I can know by a messenger whether it be true, that Agathyrus be in Cologne or in the Army, and where I may meet him: For as for my Divine Princess, I have not confidence sufficient yet, to ask what is become of her.

Theobald would not yield for all that, but urged the King of the Lombards with all the Arguments he could use, till at length seeing he could by no means prevail, he was constrained to quit the Generous Prince, and leave him to his own inclinations. He was no sooner come out of Agelmond's Quarters, but a great Commander of the Cimbrians met him, and advertised him that the Kings of the Suevians, Herules, Turgundians, and Gepides, had had frequent and long conferences, and that no question they were hatching some design, the execution whereof it concern'd him to prevent.

The King of the Bohemians as little guilty of negligence as fear, immediately gave such orders as were necessary at that time, and suffering himself to be controuled by the grandeur of his courage and his just resentment, he boldly went to the Quarters of Godegeste, where he no sooner entred, but after some cold complements that had passed between them, he thus began, though he were alone in the company of four Kings, by whom he knew himself but ill beloved. Sirs, said he, since ye would have the world believe, that ye have taken up Arms only in the defence of Rosamond's quarrel, methinks you should not be unwilling to joyn your forces with mine, to rescue that Princess out of a City, where she is detained contrary to all right and justice. They who detain her there, replied the King of Suevia, do it only that she may be safe from such inconveniences, as may befall her in this Army, and seeing that I am contented, that Albitinda shall remain at Cologne till the end of the war, you may as well permit a Princess to abide with her, for whom you have had so long since such a Brotherly affection. Our humours are so different, replied the Cimbrian King, that I do not wonder we are so opposite in our opinions: And therefore without examining whether you act as a Father toward Albitinda, or whether I have loved the Cimbrian Princess as a Sister, before I knew she was so indeed, let us follow our own inclinations, without putting any constraint the one upon the other. You may protect if you please such seditious people in Cologne, that Briomer has encouraged to make a tumult, and I will endeavour to serve those Princesses, of whom you seem to take but little care. Were you not engaged with Pharamond, replied the King of Suevia in a heat, you would put a more favourable interpretation, upon the care which we have for those persons that you pretend to serve. And were you not wholly prepossessed by Briomer, impatiently replied Theobald, you would less condemn the good opinion, which is generally conceived of the King of the Franks. Well then, smartly replied the Suevian King, do you embrace Pharamond's interest, whither your inclinations lead you. And do you, cried Theobald interrupting him, follow Briomer's inspirations, and let it appear by the success, whether the generosity of a noble Prince whom you so unjustly hate, will at length yield to the crafty tricks of a person, that so little deserves the protection which you afford him.

Having so said he flung out of their presence, and having observed in the Countenance of Pharamond's enemies, that they intended an absolute Rupture. He sent for the principal pal Officers of the Cimbrians to his Chamber, and there represented to them how tyrannically the confederate Princes intended to make themselves Masters of Rosamond's destiny. The Officers had such a reverence for their valiant Prince, that they professed themselves ready to obey his orders, of what nature soever they might be. And in regard they all admired the virtues of Pharamond, and safely then might they their dislike of Primer, they openly declared that Pharamond was only worthy of their Princes. "In short, Sir, judged one of the most considerable of all the Commanders, was it not Pharamond's Sword that slew the false Theobald, which delivered us from all those mischiefs, we had reason to fear from the Son of Briomer, advanced to the Throne of our Nation, and did not the same Prince rescue our lawful Sovereign in the Forest of Lisurgis, to be the delight and glory of his people?"

Theobald satisfied to see the Cimbrians such as he wished them to be, made no question but that they would consent to retreat into the Army of the Franks, and that they would be glad to leave a Camp, where they were every day exposed to the assaults of a million of enemies. Nor was he deceived in his conjecture, so that he no sooner proposed it to the Bohemians, to take that part where justice and generosity reigned, but they promised to follow wherever he led them. Such a noble ardor as this was not to be neglected by Theobald, and therefore he was so far from letting it cool, that he order'd the several Commanders, to go and make sure of the Troops that were under their particular commands. However he thought it not convenient, whatever cause he had to break the League so soon, but out of a pure sincerity rather chose to demand the liberty of the Princesses, before he came to those extremities, that might prove fatal to so many thousand men. For that reason he went to the King of the Basternes, and sent Telanor to Arderic, judging that it might not be impossible to draw to his side two Princes, in whom he had observed much of moderation. He laid before them the bad usage of the Princesses, by detaining them in Cologne against their will, but whatever he said to them was all in vain, for young Humbert was afraid of displeasing Albifred's Father. On the other side, the King of the Gepides was loth to be contributory to Pharamond's good fortune, believing that if he should declare for Theobald, he should but strengthen the strongest part already of his Rivals, and weaken at the same time those forces, which were only united to hinder Rosamond from being taken away, and carried to the King of the Franks: So that Theobald being now clear of all scruples, nourished only disdain and anger in his breast, and determin'd to leave an Army which he could not look upon, but as the refuge and protection of injustice.

This resolution pleased him in more than one respect, for first it cleared him from the guilt of those disorders, which were committed by the King of Suevia's command, and the councils of Briomer, and thereby he hoped to deliver Rosamond and make Pharamond happy. But his chiefest transportation proceeded from hence, that he was marching to a Camp, where he should be inseparable from his Princess, and where perhaps it would be permitted him to pretend to a felicity, which he could not enjoy for so many years past. "Divine Hunnimonda, said he to himself suddenly, shall I have the satisfaction of your company, and shall I entertain you a thousand times a day without obstruction? Nothing shall ever rend thee again from my hopes, for apparently fortune is now my reconciled good friend, since she has surceased to cross that passion, which begat the felicity of my life.

While he played with those sweet thoughts, the Messenger whom he had sent to the French Camp, came to acquaint him that Hunnimonda, how moderate soever she used to be, seemed now more than ordinarily satisfied to understand, that a Prince whom she always thought so worthy of her esteem, was no way guilty of the crime whereof he stood accused with so much appearance of reason. As for what concerns the King of the Franks, I do assure you Sir, that there appeared in his face, the visible signs of an unspeakable joy, whether he spoke of the Revolution that he foresaw, as a Lover of the incomparable Princess of the Cimbrians, or as a Friend of that valiant Balamir, who had filled the world with the loud report of his famous Achievements. More than that, I took notice, that all the forces of that Prince are unanimously agreed, to fight for the interests of your Majesty, and that they are not only ready to come to your assistance, but that they are resolved to show the utmost bravery of their courage, to satisfy the courage and generosity of their famous Leader.

Upon the Conclusion of those words, a confused noise of war diffused it self through every Quarter of that numerous Army, which by and by begat such a tumultuous hubbub, as gave Theobald timely notice that he was no longer to be idle. In short, he saw that his enemies were arming themselves, and that they would thunder all upon him, thinking perhaps to overwhelm him under the burthen of that dreadful multitude that marched under so many various Standards. Nevertheless, our great Captain expecting to be assailed, and wanting nothing of foresight, was so far from being surpris'd, that he found all things ready for a vigorous resistance. Those Cimbrians that were foremost beholding that noble fierceness that enlivened his countenance, begged only leave to signalize their Loyalty. Theobald now perceiv'd what the Confederates intended; for he saw the Suevians, the Burgundians, the Alains, the Gepides, and the Basternes all ranged under their particular Ensigns, by order of their Generals: fearing therefore lest he should be too remote from the succours which he expected from the Franks, or to be inclosed up in a Camp where he had so many Enemies, he threw down all the Fortifications upon his Quarter, and commanded Telanor to lead the Van and march towards Pharamond's Army, keeping along by the River, that they might not be environed on every side.

While the faithful Squire obeyed his orders, though not a little troubled to be so far remote from his Master, whom he had left in the place of greatest danger, Theobald brings up the reer, consisting of the old Soldiers, there with an undaunted bravery expecting the dismal tempest that threatened him. He had no sooner secured his men in the best posture he could, but word was brought, that the Suevians, Herules and Burgundians were at hand, and that the Alains, Gepides and Basternes were to be the reserve. The King of the Bohemians heard the messenger, but the tydings rather excited his fury than appalled his courage; and therefore turning toward those Officers that were about him, he beheld them with an aspect that would have infus'd courage into the most timorous of Cowards, and thus incens'd their warlike anger.

My dear Companions and Friends, I make no question but that you are this day willing all to signalize your valour in the preservation of a Prince whom ye have recovered, notwithstanding all the cunning of a Cimbrian, who would have deprived ye of him so many years ago. Remember then that ye have taken Arms for the defence of your King, and for the liberty of your Princess; and that so just a quarrel promises favourable success. On the other side, am not I at the head of ye? and is not Pharamond coming to your assistance? What have ye then to fear? What though your Enemies were never so numerous, their number will but render your Victory more glorious.

No sooner had he spoken these words, but a Soldier of a most noble presence came and joyned himself to Theobald, attended by half a dozen other Horsemen. The King immediately knew him to be the great Agelmond, who, to shew how sensible he was of the others Generosity, I fear me, said he, you will not find me so successful as you were prosperous when ye fought for my interest. Rather, replied the King, I shall find, that instead of one Rival of yours whom I assailed, that you are about to encounter enemies without number in my quarrel. However, the wonders which I have heard perform'd by the great Agelmond, instruct me that I need not wonder at his manner of acting, and that I ought not to refuse the assistance of so valiant a person.

They said no more; for the Bohemians advancing to the place where Theobald thought the Franks would joyn, the enemies seeing him at a distance from the Body of the Army, sent out a numerous party led by Gondioch, who flew like lightning upon the Body of

Horfe that Theobald kept near his perfon. At other times, neither that Prince nor Agelmund were wont to expect their Enemies, but were always the Affailants. But now they were obliged to mind the prefervation of the Bobemians, rather than to fatisfie their own courage: they threw to the ground all thofe that durft venture to feel their firft blows, and having in a fhort time beaten back feveral Bodies that rashly attacked them, Ardarie was forced to haften to the fuccour of the King of the Burgundians, with the Battalia under his command. At the fame time thofe two Lovers of Rofamond leaving the conjunction of the Cimbrians and Franks redoubled their fury, thinking to have ruined Theobald before Pharamond could come to his affiftance, but though they perform'd great things, and that they far exceeded Agelmund and Theobald in number, the victory was obftinately difputed, and the Cimbrians had undoubtedly carried the day, had not the whole Army of the Confederates come in all of a fudden: yet, notwithstanding the inequality of the two parties, the Bobemians testified an incredible refolution. But being now all either wounded or wearied, their refiftance began to flacken, and not long after they were put to a very great diforder, infomuch that Theobald endeavouring to rally them, neither by words nor his example could do it, fo great was the terrour amongst them. And therefore the valiant King afpiring only to die with honour, flew among the thickeft of his Enemies, feeking out for the principal Leaders, and like Thunder overturning whatever oppofed his paffage, at length meeting with Gondioch, who was encouraging his men to the purfuit of the Cimbrians, King of the Burgundians, cryed he, 'tis more proper for thee to turn thy Sword upon fuch an Adverfary as Balamir; for as I am Theobald, thou art to look upon him as the only obftacle of all thy hopes. By that confeffion, briskly replied Gondioch, I am releafed from fhewing thee any kindnefs as Rofamond's Brother; and I take thee for no other than a perfidious creature, that haft broken thy faith with us to take Pharamond's part.

To thofe words the incens'd Theobald made no reply, but with a back ftroke he let drive at Gondioch's head, and that with fo good a will, that the Burgundian Prince was wounded, notwithstanding the goodnefs of his Helmet, and reeled in his Saddle: but being young and vigorous, he quickly recovered himfelf, and made a thruft with fo much ftrength and animofity, that he pierced the King of the Cimbrians Buckler, and gave him a flight wound in his Thigh; which incenſing Theobald's rage, he preffed fo hard upon Gondioch, that he drew more blood from him, and flew upon him to put a period to a Combat that hindered him from looking after Agelmund, and a Troop of young Gentlemen of Quality that fought about the perfon of their Prince. As for Agelmund, he was come to handy ftrokes with Ardarie; but though the Lombard had advantage enough, yet there was little likelihood that his valour or Theobald's could fave the Cimbrians, or snatch a victory out of the hands of fuch a number. But when thofe two great perfonages, invincible till then, were menaced with utter deftruction, the Cimbrian Bands that had almoft forfaken the Field, of a fudden return'd to the charge with an extraordinary courage. Theobald was at firft furprifed, but believing that new confidence might be occafioned by the arrival of the Franks, he turn'd about to fee if he were not deceived in his conjectures. Then it was, that caſting his eyes upon certain Squadrons that haſtily advanced to his relief, he faw feveral young Soldiers whoſe prefence and beauty begat his admiration. But though they were all able to have produced the fame effect, yet was it no difficult thing to obferve ſome difference between them, but among fo many there were two that were particularly remarkable, the King of the Franks, and the famous Prince of the Suevians. Thoſe two Princes and Theobald no ſooner met, but that they vehemently defired to ſhew the proofs of that eſteem and value which they had each for other. Viridomar unwilling to attack the Sueves, flew upon the Gepides with an impetuofity that nothing but Thunder could parallel. Theobald threw himfelf into the thickeft of the Herules, and performing wonders worthy his fame, brought death or terrour among all the Troops of Godegeſile. At the fame time the King of the Franks having drawn his Sword to defend the Brother of his Princefs, and being free from all confiderations that might withhold his Arm, charged the Burgundians with fuch a rapid fury, that he threw down all that ſtood before him, and pierced as far as Gondioch, who was rallying his own men, and laboured to bring them to a new charge, notwithstanding the dreadful Adverfary that ſtood before him. The King of the Franks no ſooner ſpyed the Burgundian King, but he made toward him, when a younger Brother of Gunttran, to ſhew himfelf worthy of the illuſtrious blood from whence he ſprang, reſolv'd to guard his King, advancing between Pharamond and Gondioch, and to make good his attempt, he offered ſome blows at the moſt famous Soldier of the world. But having either ſtrength nor luck to maintain the Grandeur of his enterprife, he was preſently beaten to the ground. True it is, that he was no ſooner out of the Fight, but he was out of danger, for he was drawn from among the Horfes heels by some of his own Officers. On the other side that obstacle being taken away by the fall of the Burgundian Prince, the two fiery Rivals joyn'd, and assailed each other with that cruel animosity, as if that day were to have been the last of thier lives. Pharamond could not moderate his anger against an ungrateful person that endeavoured to deprive him of his Princess: and Gondioch's jealousy rag'd to see Pharamond fight for the liberty of Rosamond, and in the defence of her Brother. But how equal soever the animosity of those two Warriours appeared, there was a great difference between their strength; for the victor-fate of the King of the Franks threaten'd Gondioch with a most fatalevent, at what time that Prince, desperately wounded as he was, was carried away by the press of one of his own Squadrons that fled. Nor was it possible for the Burgundians to make any long resistance, especially the Gepides and the Herules giving ground, seeing themselves ready to be attack'd by a Body of Franks led by Constance, the King of the Britains, the King of the Tongres and the valiant Artabure.

Those renowned Captains made haste to the relief of Pharamond, Theobald and Viridomar, but when they came to fight, they found they had nothing to do but to pursue. In the mean time, Gondioch and Ardaric, wounded as they were, did all they could to encourage their Troops. They shew'd themselves to the Soldiers, and not only told them that the Confederates were still stronger than the Bobemians or Franks, but that they were the more secure, having Cologne their Friend, and the Army of Theodosius being at hand. On the other side, the Kings of the Suevians and the Herules left nothing undone that could be thought upon on their part, understanding to their unspeakable vexation, that their party was routed, they caus'd themselves to be carried among the Troops that were most disorder'd, and by threats and promises endeavour'd to restore that courage to their Army, which their more valiant Enemies had taken from them. While they bestir'd themselves every way, Briomer, transport'd by his implacable hatred, comes in from Cologne with some of the Militia which he had scrap'd together; but his endeavours were all to little purpose, as had been before the utmost diligence of four Kings, incens'd against the life of Pharamond. And all that great multitude that would have swallowed up Theobald, were now no other than a frighted Remnant that fled for safety to the Woods, and to the City of Cologne,

The King of the Franks, Theobald, the Prince of Suevia, Constance, Agelmond, Constantine, Taxander and Artabure, always accustomed to overcome, were so far from being puffed up with the victory, or eager to prosecute farther, that they advanced toward each other; and having in imitation of Pharamond surrounded the new King of the Cimbrians, they testified their joy to see him advanced to the Throne of his Ancestors, Theobald most gratefully acknowledged the marks of their esteem and affection; but taking notice that Pharamond and those other Captains would have given him the honour of the day, he yielded them the victory, looking upon them as his protectour, and upon himself as only safe in their triumph. In a word, where nothing a little before was to be heard, but the horrible cries of the miserable, nothing to be seen but slaughter and desolation, there nothing now appeared but kindness and Generosity. Pharamond could not but with tenderness behold the Brother of that Princess whom he adored: and Theobald, who could not forget the obligations which the King of the Franks had laid upon him, passionately desired to deliver Rosamond, to the end he might complete the felicity of a Prince that so well deserv'd to be happy, as well for the qualities of his Soul, as person. But now it was high time to take care of the Army and their own preservation: thereupon orders were given to take care of the wounded, and for Burial of the dead; and Pharamond propos'd to lodge the Army in the Camp which the Enemy had forsaken: Viridomar, Constance, the King of the Britains, Tongres, and Artabure not only agreed that this change would be very convenient, but themselves ready to assist the King of the Franks in any thing that he thought conducing to his designs. As for Theobald, in regard he had not seen Hunnimonda since he was acknowledged to be King of the Cimbrians, and for that he seem'd not much to like the resolution they had taken, I see, Sir, said Pharamond, that you are in as much haste for Segodunum, as I am desirous to stay near Cologne: go then whither your passion calls you, receive the glorious recompense which is your due, and never absent your self any longer from a most incomparable Princess, who by a secret conduct of destiny has been always preserv'd for Theobald, notwithstanding the infidelity of Balamir.

At those words the King of the Cimbrians fetch'd a deep sigh, which he offer'd to Hunnimonda's absence: and after that resuming a more pleasant posture, I will go, Sir, said he, since our Enemies are in no condition to hurt us, and in hopes that you will pardon my impatience, that so well have experienced the force and power of love.

He had no sooner resolv'd to visit Hunnimonda, but Pharamond resolv'd to send for the Princesses to the new Camp, and to give the same Apartments which Rosamond, Amalazontha, Albifinda and Agione had held before. The King of the Cimbrians offered to be their Convoy, and having received full Commissions from Viridomar and the rest of the illustrious Lovers concerning their Princesses, he put himself in the front of a numerous Convoy which Pharamond particularly ordered to attend him; and taking the Road that led to his felicity, he marched to it with all the speed that a Lover could make, encouraged by a hope above all crosses and misfortunes.

The End of the Third Book of the Eleventh Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

NO sooner had he left the Camp which Pharamond had quitted, but he enquired after Hunnimonda; but as he rid on toward the place where she lay, Prinam, Charamont and many other considerable persons among the Franks who had been left behind for the Guard of the Princesses, meeting with all the respect and all the satisfaction they could shew him, conducted him to the very place, deferring till another time to do him those honours which were due to so great a Prince and the Brother of Rosamond. Polyxena and Placidia being at that time with the Princesses of the Goths when they understood of his arrival, would have left their Friend, but whatever excuse they made to be gone, the Princesses of the Goths knew their meaning, and with a modest blush endeavoured to stay them, but she could not obtain what civility made her request; for the two Princesses, without taking any farther notice, left her in a kind of perplexity that seem'd to have something in it very moving, and infinitely amiable. But if modesty added new charms to her Beauty, 'tis as certain there appeared a new splendour of Grandeur in the presence and carriage of the King of the Cimbrians, whether it reflected from his new Dignity, or from the victory which he brought along, whereof he had won so glorious a share, or from the fair hopes that enlivened him. For this reason those two persons so worthy the admiration of all the world, at first beheld each other with amazement. And though they were prepossessed with so much esteem each for other, yet was it impossible to avoid this mutual surprize. But in a short while after, the King of the Cimbrians threw himself at the feet of his divine Hunnimonda, and transported with love and joy, Celestial Princess, cryed he, behold Theobald who comes to justify Balamir: he offers you a Scepter instead of many others which you have refus'd for his sake: protesting that nothing more joys him to ascend the Throne of his Ancestors, than that he is thereby able to fix you there: that he cares not for his Crown, but as the recovery thereof demonstrates to you that he never was unfaithful, and that he never loved the Queen of the Cimbrians, but with an affection which nearness of blood produced.

He had no sooner concluded these words, but he eagerly expected her answer, and to read his destiny in Hunnimonda's eyes, he cast his own upon that famous beauty that had caused so many revolutions in the world, which after he had surveyed for some time with a tenderness mixed with fear, What my dear Princess, pursued he, are you still at a stand whether you shall declare your thoughts to me or no, especially now you're convinced of my innocence? And is it possible that you should be provoked against Theobald, because it became Balamir to love Rosamond?

At those words, which a violent and respectful passion seemed to force from his Lips, the Princess of the Goths brake silence, though not before she had cast a look upon the King of the Cimbrians, enough to have charmed and set on fire a thousand hearts. You conjecture right, Sir, answered she, that my anger ought to go along with the cause that produces it: So that it will never trouble me to let Balamir love where he pleases, so long as Theobald continues true to Hunnimonda.

That obliging answer so sensibly mov'd a Prince, already passionately in love, and very much enfeebled in body, that his excessive joy had like to have proved fatal. But Hunnimonda perceiving the condition he was in, made it her request to him to have a care of himself, so that at her entreaty the King of the Cimbrians was forced to retire, giving a short visit to those other Ladies that were in Pharamond's Camp, who were almost all together with the Princess of the Huns, whom he had not seen since Mundisic was slain. 'Tis true that the death of Mundisic had not caused any extraordinary sorrow, which was the reason that there were some complements past which he would not have used, had the affliction been more solemn, but he concluded them as soon, that he might have time to talk of a loss considerable enough, to be the first subject of the entertainment. For how violent soever Mundisic had been, he had been Brother to the Princess of the Huns, and heir presumptive to one of the fairest Monarchies in the world, so that the Princess of the Huns who was of an excellent good nature, was very much grieved at his death, which made all those illustrious persons that were with her, to bear a share in her affliction. But to comfort her they desired her to consider the happiness of that famous Balamir, who had been always so dear to her, and Theobald himself who had always looked upon her as a Sister, after he had given her all the marks of a brotherly tenderness, told her how she had found another Balamir, equally recommendable for all noble and virtuous qualities, to the bravest men in the world. But dear Sister, said he, have you heard all the particulars that make out the discovery of the real Balamir? Yes Brother, said she, (for the King of the Cimbrians would not admit of any other appellation) I am better instructed in what relates to the family from whence I am descended, than you think: For besides what I understand concerning Ambiomir who is now the real Balamir, I know that the King of the Huns is coming into those parts to meet his children and relations, and that he set forth from Alba-Julia, some days after Keva's departure. I am very glad of the news you tell me, replied Theobald, but Sister, do you think the affection which the King your Father has for you, will be enough to engage him to our party, or that Balamir's love for the Princess of the Lombards, will not make him take up the interests of the Persian Prince, "I never heard, replied the Queen of the Goths, that there was any such familiarity between Varanez and Ambiomir, and therefore it can never be for the Prince of Persia's sake, if the King of the Huns declare against us, but rather it is some particular league, that engages him to reinforce our enemies. Certain it is that Ambiomir is bound to Agelmond by the charms of Agione, that Agelmond will never quit the Brother of Gilismene, and I know that Agathyrus loves so well the Prince of Persia, as to embrace any part that Varanez takes without any consideration. But why, replied Polixena, should we fear that the King of the Huns will declare against us? I rather hope that by his mediation, there may be a peace made to the joy of so many Nations. I confess Madam, replied Theobald, that for the good of Europe, it were well that all these troubles were allayed, that have so long divided it, and laid desolate the fairest part of all her Provinces. But to tell you the truth, I see no probability of such a speedy conclusion of our miseries: For besides that the King of the Suedes humour and Briomer's frauds, are altogether opposite thereto, the pretensions which so many Princes united against Pharamond have to Rosamond, are obstacles not easily to be surmounted. Is it impossible for these enemies of the King of the Franks to be ever capable of reason, replied the Queen of Albion, or that so many Princes should never be able to open their eyes, which they have closed with so much obstinacy, to see the reproaches which they lie liable to every hour? She uttered these words with a disturbance that was observed by all the company, and no question it was very much wondred at, that a Princess who had so little reason to fear for her own Territories, torics, should so earnestly desire an end of a war, by which in all likelihood her Island could endure little or no inconvenience.

However Placidia and Theodolinda, thought it better to break off a discourse which had been so tedious for Theobald, rather than to desire her to explain her meaning, after which they begged him to take his repose, so that to pleasure them he was constrained to go to his Chamber, where his trusty Squire Telmor order'd his wounds to be searched, more diligently than they had been after the Battel. That Night he rested better than was expected, and the next morning so soon as it was convenient, all the persons of Note that were left in the Camp, came to visit a Prince, whose far-applauded Reputation they had so often admired. And it was observed that every one had a tenderness and respect for so famous a warrior, and the proofs which they gave thereof, were little different from those which Pharamond himself could have expected. Nor were the Franks the only persons so zealous to serve him, for Gondemar and Guntran who by the turn that had happened, saw themselves no longer obliged to look upon the Cimbrian King as their friend, yet forbore not however to pay him their devoirs, and to congratulate him for his happy restoration: So that Theobald finding himself obliged to those two Princes, I confess, answered he, your generosity is very great, since it permits you to rejoyce at an adventure that cannot please King Gondicoh, and which carries off the Cimbrians quite from your party. For my part, replied Gondemar, 'twould never trouble me to see the confederacy broken, and I wish with all my heart that the King my Brother would not so obstinately contend against Pharamond's right and Rosamond's inclinations. I fear me, Sir, replied the King of the Cimbrians smiling, you would not take the right way to gain the good will of Albitinda's Father, to shew your self so just, and whether the King, being of that temper you know he is, would receive you kindly, did he but understand what your opinion is of the Franks, and the Princess of the Bohemians. As there is a time, replied the Prince of the Burgundians, that I hope for nothing either from him or from his daughter, perhaps I should be less concern'd than you think for, at all his anger against me: And it may be, said he blushing, if a greater change than this should happen, he could not accuse me either of infidelity or lighness. In short, Sir, you know that Albitinda always prefer'd Marcomire before Gondemar, and you may well guess that when the war is done, the King of the Suedes will rather declare for the King of the Batavernes, than for a Prince that wants a Kingdom, and that Viridomar likewise whom I unwarily caused to be imprisoned, will never plead for me to the King her Brother. For which reason if another Mistress were ready to take possession of my heart, my reason would submit to her charms, and maintain them against a Princess whose own inclinations, and whose Parents would advance my Rivals before me. Ah Prince, replied Theobald, since you call your reason thus in question, I fear me you are a prisoner in this Army in more than one capacity, and by all outward appearances, Albitinda is not in your eye the most amiable person in the world. I am of your opinion, replied Gondemar no way disturbed, and I cannot tell whether the Prince here in our company, will not also confess that he has much ado, to withstand certain beauties that abide in this Camp. 'Tis very true, replied Guntran; that there are some whose power is irresistible, nor do I wonder that I have lost my liberty among them, since your heart, pre-engaged as it was, could not defend it self against their puissance.

These words increased the King of the Cimbrians curiosity to have understood more, but at the same time he was advertised, that the Queens of the Goths and Britains, Theodolinda and Adelaida were come to visit him. He received those illustrious persons with all the respect and civility, that the condition he was in would allow him: For he could not raise himself in his bed, by reason his indisposition began to increase through the neglect of his wounds: Nor was he so well satisfied as at first, not seeing his Princess among the rest: So that he cast his eye about the Room, demanding by his looks that which was wanting to make up the honour of the visit: which when the Sister of Honorius observed not without some trouble, I see Sir, said she, that inwardly you take us not to be your friends, and that you think we neglected, to bring the Princess Hunnimonda along with us. But you must know, replied Theodolinda, *that we omitted no argument to persuade her, but to tell you the truth, she could not in civility prefer Theobald before Polixena. That Princess has taken her along with her, to see a most magnificent pinnace sent her by the Suevian Princess, and Vinderic Albitinda's Squire, besought us also to have born her Company. They say there is a most costly banquet prepared, for those persons that will take their pleasure in this Vessel by water. But for our parts, we rather chose to be contented with seeing than making use of it: And thus being divided as you see, some of us are gone with the Princess of the Franks, and some of us are come to visit the Cimbrian King. Hunnimonda indeed to whom Vinderic had particular recommendations, was in some measure obliged not to quit Polixena, so that Cleomira and Blefinda having agreed to stay* with them, we could not but leave them to their discretions. But, replyed Theobald very impatiently, can you not return to your illustrious Friends? Or ought I to suffer you to leave them for my sake, and not use the utmost of my strength to conduci you to them again? No, my dear Brother, replyed Theodolinda, 'tis not for you to stir out of your Chamber, and perhaps I should have more blame than you are aware of, should I suffer you to go abroad without the consent of your Physicians.

The content which the Prince of the Cimbrians took in those last expressions pleas'd him not a little; however, after he had considered a while, I would fain know, said he, whether this Vinderic you speak of be a person known, and whether he come certainly from the Princess Albisinda? There is no question to be made of it, replyed the Queen of Albion, for I know that Viridomar himself presented him to the Princess of the Franks. For my part, I dare assure you, said Adelaiada, that this same Sueve told Polyxena that Albisinda would be overjoyed to entertain a correspondency of friendship, notwithstanding the war. I have order, Madam, added he in these very words, to tell you, that the Sister of Viridomar will begin first, as it is her duty, provided you will be contented to receive what she shall send you for your diversion. Judge you now, continued Theodolinda, whether Vinderic can be any way suspected, being known and presented to her by Viridomar himself, and whether Polyxena could refuse a present sent her from the Sister of Viridomar, and Maicomire's Mistress? "

She had no sooner concluded those words, but a confused noise of Trumpets and other warlike instruments disturbed their discourse. Immediately news was brought that Wallia and Thrasimond were near the Camp, and that Priam was mounted to meet the two Princes with a Body of the French Cavalry. Theodolinda was not a little discomposed when she heard the news, but Placidia taking notice of it, and knowing the cause, lest the blushes that spread themselves in her cheeks should be discovered, I confess, said she, that I shall be very glad to see Thrasimond; for in regard he was so highly esteem'd at Constantinople, I would fain know by what qualities these Vandals win the friendship of my nearest Relations. As far as I have heard, replyed Queen Octavia, the Brother of Gunderic's pretensions were far different from Stilicon's. And I am assured that he never strove to win Theodotus's favour, but upon designs which the other never could have. He is then more unfortunate than I: for, replyed the Queen of the Visigoths, I know nothing more insupportable for a man that is in love, than to sigh for a person that cannot truly love him. But, my dear Sister, said the King of the Cimbrians, whispering to Theodolinda, 'tis but just that the Prince that comes along with Thrasimond should enjoy a better fortune. 'Tis not in Theodolinda's power, replyed the blushing, to be the Mistress either of his good or bad fortune. But hold you, added Placidia, we never mind that our discourse has held very long, and that it is time for us to leave our sick patient, unless we intend to retard his cure. Upon the conclusion of those words, the four Princesses took their leaves of the Cimbrian King, after they had perswaded him to follow Telanor's advice in reference to his health.

No sooner was the pationate Theobald alone in his Chamber, but all his thoughts ran upon Hunnimonda: but notwithstanding all the satisfaction which the charming Idea that filled his Soul could afford him, he felt certain secret disturbances which he could not throw off: he sent to her Lodgings to be better inform'd what the meaning should be of this taking the air, a thing which as it no way liked him, would by no means go out of his mind; but her Attendants return'd him for answer, that they did not expect their Mistress till the Evening, there being a magnificent Supper and rare Musick provided; and besides, that the Boat was to return by the light of several artificial fires by night to conclude the Solemnity of the Entertainment. The King of the Cimbrians saw very well that there was likelyhood enough that Albisinda might be thus facetious to divert Polyxena. However, that opinion instead of becalming his mind, turmoiled it with secret fears, till they were suspended by the arrival of Wallia and Thrasimond. They were desirous with the first opportunity to visit that great personage, whose renown since had published through all the world. Theobald was as glad to see two valiant Soldiers whose Adventures he had heard of, for as Hilderic's Relation had begat in him a respect for Wallia, Mortian had given him no less a character of Thrasimond, and touched him with a desire to understand the concerns of Gunderic. For which reasons he testified all the demonstrations of joy that he could testify at a time when his Soul was under such an afflicting prognostication. And certainly they were truly worthy of that Reception; for besides the lustre of their Birth, and the noble Reputation which they had won, the qualities of their minds and persons were such, that it was no difficult thing to afford them something more of esteem than is due to ordinary merit. Wallia had an air more brisk and lively in his carriage: but in Thrasimond's countenance there appeared a sweet languishment that moderated the fierceness of his looks, and which without much trouble was capable of touching the heart with the quickest motions of affection: Sirs, said the Cimbrian King, your arrival permits me not to doubt the success of this war: for since Pharamond's valour receives this day such a reinforcement, I dare say the justest side is not the weakest. Great King, replied Walia, our assistance was so needless, and the event of the war so assured, especially where you command an Army with Pharamond; that it must be thought that nothing but our proper interest brought us hither, since all the world knows, that they who would be victorious, need only follow those invincible Princes, to whom we offer both our Forces and our Sword. For my part, pursued the Brother of Gunderic, I must ingenuously confess, that my Services will be little or no obligation to the Army where I shall perform them, rather must I be engaged to the Bohemians and Franks: for in regard these warlike Nations never fight without success, I cannot die in their service, without losing honourably a life which I linger out in misery. I never heard, replied Theobald, that you have had any such cause to complain of fortune: for by what Martian has related to me of your Adventures, I do not remember any misfortune capable of infusing such melancholy thoughts into your mind. Then it seems, replied the Prince of the Vandals, my friend has not told you any thing concerning the King my Brother, or what has befallen me since my departure from Constantinople. I grant it, answered the King of the Cimbrians. But, Sir, you may be pleased your self to perfect his Relation, and to grant me the favour which I beg, not so much out of a curiosity, but because I would willingly contribute to your ease, bearing so great a share as I do in your sorrows. Though your intentions were not so obliging, replied Thrasimond, there is nothing that I can refuse the King of the Cimbrians. Besides that, it seldom happens that a person in misery desires to lose an opportunity to talk of his misfortunes.

Having concluded those words, he took notice that Theobald and Walia began to listen: so that after he had paused a while upon what he had to say, he thus brake silence, addressing himself to the King of the Cimbrians.

The History of Gunderic.

THOUGH I am but young in years, yet I have found by my own experience, that the pride of men has but weak foundations, since there needs but one bare reflection to overturn it; and it is impossible for us to defend it, if we but consider our own weakness for is there any thing besides our thoughts that is within our power? But if we form them into resolutions, do we not find them always attended by a success quite contrary to our hopes? To give you a remarkable example hereof, I need no more than relate the Story which you require: give me leave to tell you then, that the Vandals, after they had maintain'd several bloody Wars, and often changed their Habitations, at length invaded Spain under the conduct of their King Gunderic, a Prince of a vast ambition, and if I may presume to say it, of a great and magnanimous courage. While we advanced toward the River Betis, and that the Romans had gathered an Army together to give us Battel, a person of a goodly presence and well stricken in years came into our Camp toward the close of the day, who declaring that he had business of importance, was conducted to the King's Tent: Gunderic, though naturally proud, received the stranger very courteously. The Vandals retired to the other end of the Room, and I was about to follow, when the King holding me by the hand, Prince, said he to me, do you think I keep any thing secret from such a Brother as Thrasimond? Upon those words I made a stop in a posture of acknowledgment, and observed that the unknown person was nothing frighted at the splendour of Majesty: but on the contrary, he accosted the King of the Vandals like a person of Quality, and having made him an obeysance in a posture as far from abject humility, as from pride, Sir, said he, I make no question but that you have foreseen those obstacles which you will meet with in the design which you have contrived: you march against the Romans and Spaniards, Nations powerful and warlike, who can every moment be recruited from Countries where you will find none but enemies. But, Sir, I come to offer you a way just, certain and acceptable, how to purchase the hearts of the Inhabitants of this Country, and how to establish a noble and lawful Monarchy in those Provinces, from whence, if you will not follow my counsel, you will be driven out by the whole Nation as an odious Usurper. I have correspondencies in most of the greatest Cities, several Troops of chosen and active men at my command, who only expect my orders to declare themselves; and what is more considerable I have at my disposal, the only Heiress of the Kingdom which you pretend to conquer, This Princess was born with an abundance of whose perfections which most people admire. And if you never heard of her beauty and her jurisdictions, 'twas only because she was privately carried away and kept concealed, for fear the Romans should make use of some cruel way of prevention against a person, so likely to raise them up great enemies. Consider now, Sir, whether you will seat her upon the Throne of her Ancestors, and sit there with her your self or no. This alliance will so unite the Spaniards and the Vandals, that you will be no longer looked upon as Strangers, you will fight them for your own advantage and we may be able with our joynt forces, not to drive them only out of Betique Spain, but also, wage war with their whole Empire.

He had no-sooner done speaking but I began to be of his mind, and in regard it appeared in my face, I observed as much gladness in his, and that he seemed in some measure to acknowledge it. But he received not the same satisfaction from Gunderic, for that Prince naturally ambitious, consulting his own pride rather than the other's solid reasons, return'd him an answer much to this purpose, I grant you, said he, that the claims of your young Princess are just and beyond controversy. I believe also you have forces and intelligence, sufficient to procure me the victory. However I declare to you I shall not accept your proposition, for I had rather be beholding to my Sword, for that which you would give me by the marriage and in right of a woman. I will make use of no other but the Conquerours right, I will march against the Romans and Spaniards at the head of my own Vandals, and if I flatter not my self too much, I believe I shall overcome them both, and that you will suddenly see me in Hispaly, Master of all Betica. Then you may speak to me in the behalf of that fair Lady, whom the Spaniards had despoiled of her Dominions, and then you will find that in that place, I shall be more prone to be liberal to give, than now to receive that assistance, to which I must be beholding for a part of my victories.

The Stranger was nettled at this answer, and beholding Gunderic with a dissatisfied look; Perhaps, said he, you will not find those victories so easily won, which you scorn to share. But should you fight with all the success you could desire, never believe that I intend to put you in mind of your promises: For I had rather dye or pass the rest of my days in exile, than become a suppliant to a Prince, to whom I repent that I have made such advantageous offers. Having uttered these few words with a kind of disdain he went his way, leaving the King of the Vandals strangely surpris'd at his boldness, such as he was not wont to suffer in his presence. Nevertheless, the King who was truly generous, never took care to stop the Spaniard, but on the contrary turning toward me full of moderation, he asked me what I thought of the boldness of that unknown person. Sir, said I, I believe the Stranger was fully perswaded, that you would have listned to his propositions, and that in all probability you would have accepted what you have now refused. But Brother, said he, what would you have done in the same case? Speak, pursued he, perceiving I was unwilling to tell my opinion, for I find by your countenance, my thoughts and yours are not conformable. Since your Majesty commands me, answered I, to speak my opinion concerning this matter, I confess that I should have well examined the matter, and if I had thought that I could have made those advantages which he opposed, I should without any more to do, have made the alliance which he offered me. You could not then be said to have vanquished the Romans, answered Gunderic, but by the assistance of the Spaniards, and so instead of founding of a Monarchy of Vandals, you would only but fix the Empire of your confederates. I grant it, said I, 'twould have been less honourable to have acted in that manner. But Sir, as my thoughts are less exalted than your Majesties, I should have been contented to have taken the surest way. And then you would have married a person, answered Gunderic, that had no other fortune but what you might have won by your Sword. If this Princess be so fair as they report, said I, I should not have been so unwilling to unite my fortune to hers; and her want of estate would have been a new charm to have allured me. In short, I should have thought that acknowledgment had begat my love, and that as upon one hand she had made me lawful possessor of her Territories, that very obligation would have proved thereby the more happy. For my part, said the King of the Vandals, I will not love any woman that is not the greatest Queen in the world, and I declare to you there must be something else besides beautiful cheeks, to move Gunderic's heart. By what I find Sir, replied I, the difference of our humours is as great as the difference between our qualities: For I should rather love a person that were of a condition inferiour to mine, believing it to be a pleasure to advance what we love, and still to be looked upon with acknowledgment.

Thus instead of convincing one another of our opposite opinions, we both of us kept our own, but these disputes were now to give place to other thoughts, opportunity offering us an occasion to invade Betica, while the Alains and Gepides under their Kings Acaces and Arderic, fell upon the other side of Spain, and were advanced almost as far as the River Iberus. We were overjoyed to see so powerful a diversion of the Roman Arms, and indeed we did not find that Honorius had Captains enough, to oppose against so many enemies. In short, it was reported that Stilicon's authority diminished every day, and that he had resolved to stir no more from his Master's fight, for fear of losing the remaining stock of his credit, by such ill offices as might be done him in his absence. Not but that renown had already filled our ears with the fame of the renowned Constance, but we hardly believed that being not above four and twenty years of age, they would chuse him Captain, to undergo the weight of so important a war: So that considering the kindness of the opportunity, we marched toward Betis full of hopes.

The Romans and Spaniards with a body of four and twenty thousand men, commanded by Maximinus, Anaxilla, and Licinius, expected us upon the banks of the River, having walled all the Country round about, to starve our Army which was very numerous and in an enemies Country: But Gunderic being young and fierce, made such hast that we had no want of victuals, and withal came suddenly in sight of Maximinus, though he had sent out several little bodies to dispute the passes, and annoy us upon all occasions wherein we always had the upper hand.

These small successes though seemingly of no great importance, yet produced very considerable effects, for the Spaniards took them for omens of a great victory, so that many of the Soldiers came and joyned with us, and several of their Cities opened their Gates to our Forces. The Roman Generals finding that their Conduct had nor succeeded according to their hopes, resolved to come to a pitch'd field, to regain the reputation of their Arms, for they saw that if they were victors, we were without all manner of recruits, that if fortune should not favour them that then they could retire over the Betis, break down the bridges, defend the passage of the River, and every moment receive recruits from the Spaniards, whom common interest called to the defence of his Country.

Thereupon the two Armies advanced in very good order, the King gave me the command of the right wing, the left was led by Gidiseles a famous Soldier among the Vandals, a kinsman and relation of Stilicon's. On the other side Anaxilla was opposed against me, Licinius fought against our left wing, and Maximinus was to bear the brunt of the valiant Gunderic, who thunder'd in upon his enemies with such an impetuous violence, that he brake immediately the first ranks of the enemy, and forced his way even to Maximinus himself, whom he challenged and encountred. Gunderic was run through the shoulder, but Maximinus was run through the body and fell off his horse: Licinius hastned to rally and sustain the main battel. But for Anaxilla I held him so in play, that he could give little or no relief to Maximinus. In short Sir, I had no reason to complain of my fortune, I had the good luck to beat the left Wing of the Romans, to wound Anaxilla and take him prisoner. Then intending to help the King, I found him in a vigorous pursuit of the enemy, having wounded and taken Licinius prisoner: So that the victory was compleat on our side, having slain above thirty thousand, with the loss of ten thousand men. And certainly their defeat had been the greatest that ever was, had they not been succoured by a miracle.

For while Licinius ran about the field encouraging the Soldiers, which the valour of Gunderic and the fall of Maximinus had altogether dismayed, a certain person splendidly arm'd, and followed by several Squadrons threw himself into the Battel, and declaring for the Romans fought for the King of the Vandals, in all places where he thought there was most danger. Gidiseles coming to joyn with Gunderic met this unknown person, and after a tedious combat remarkable for the valour of those two great Soldiers, they parted with some loss on the Vandals side. For this unknown person took several of our Officers prisoners, rallied several Troops and retreated in view of us like a great Captain, making use of all advantages, either of the ways which he knew better than we, or the obscurity of the night which by that time began to grow on apace. Not long after he made great fires upon a hill which he had got possession of, and judging well that we would certainly believe that he intended to keep that post, he steals away toward the River in the dark, passed it, and made use of all advantages to hinder us from pursuing him: So that when we came to the River side, we were forced to stop there, till we had made boats enough to pass the Army over. In the mean time the Officers who were sent back upon exchange, assured us, that the unknown person was not at all for the Roman interest, but on the contrary quite opposite to all their enterprizes, and that he had nor served them at this time, but that he bare a greater hatred to the King of the Vandals, against whom he was resolved to arm all Spain, protesting that if fortune were so unjust as to favour the designs of a usurper, he would exile himself from a Country miserably enslaved, and end his days in some dire solitude beyond the Seas, in expectation of some happy revolution:

This Relation made us conjecture that this Enemy of the King of the Vandals was the same Stranger who made these proposals which I have mentioned; and that which confirm'd us in our conjectures, was, that it was also reported, that the same Spaniard testified a far different opinion of me, than he had of my Brother: "I am very glad, said the King, that you are so well beloved by this unknown person: but to say the truth, I could be very well pleased that he had not such an antipathy against me. However, 'tis not because he is a brave person and a great Captain that I desire his friendship: but, said he, smiling, because he has a fair Lady at his disposal. Nor for that cause neither, replyed he to himself, for were she the most charming Beauty in the world I could never love her: nay, I will go a little farther, I do not believe 'tis possible for me to fight for any Beauty living, to whom fortune had refused those Grandeurs to which my ambition aspires. "Then, replyed I, 'tis only out of a natural inclination to be beloved of as many you can, that you desire the Spaniard should change those bad thoughts which he has of your inclinations. "The design you speak of, replyed he, is in me too general to be too deeply sensible of it: and yet I must acknowledge that at this time I find a certain alteration within me, which it becomes not a person of my humour to undergo for one that he never saw in his life. But, Brother, added he of a sudden, upbraid not the weakness that I have discovered, I will soon chase it from the heart of Gunderic, I will hate the person that hates me. Nor can I tell whether he will not find it as troublesome to protect himself from the effects of my anger, as for Gunderic to defend himself against his threats.

Having made known his design, he minded nothing but performance, and to that end he so encouraged the workmen, that in a few days we had Boats enough ready to pass the River. The King himself led the way, and so encouraged others by his example, that notwithstanding whole showers of Arrows, we gain'd the other side of the River, chasing the Enemy, after a bloody fight and a long resistance, Atalorque, for so was that Soldier named that spoke so boldly to Gunderic, caused himself to be carried, wounded as he was, from Rank to Rank, to encourage and rally those Troops of his that either the hardness or impetuosity of ours had disordered and frighted; but all the Spanish Captain endeavoured, did but serve to prolong the Fight and the Slaughter, we remain'd Masters of the Field; and indeed that victory was the conquest of Betica. But while he was preparing to subdue the whole, and to besiege certain places that still held out against us, we received intelligence that the famous Constance had defeated the Gepides and Alains, that King Acaces was slain, and that Ardaric hardly escaped with eight or ten Horsemen. Moreover, that the Conquerour of these two Kings was marching against us, together with Artabure and Ariobindus; and that Atalorque mainly solicited and hastened his advance, being ready to reinforce them with an Army of ten thousand men.

The two Armies dally'd a long time, watching their advantages; but at length the Romans made a shew of besieging a Town that was garrison'd by ours, on purpose to draw the proud and fierce King into places where the Romans were well acquainted. Gunderic failed not to hasten to the relief of his own people, and marching his people with less caution than he ought to have done, considering he had to deal with such a Captain as Constance, he engaged a little too far between two Hills, the tops whereof were guarded by Atalorque, who knew all the secret turnings and by-ways of the Mountains: so that all of a sudden we were almost overwhelmed with Darts and Stones; whereupon the King of the Vandals perceiving his error, instead of repenting to no purpose, he only took care to repair his losses by some extraordinary action. To that intent he alighted, covered himself with his Buckler, and followed by the Volunteers of his Army with an undaunted confidence, he mounted the Hill through a thousand dangers, till he fell into an Ambuscade, where he thought he should meet with Atalorque: and by the resistance which he found, he knew he was not deceived, besides that Atalorque several times appeared at the head of his own men, encouraging them as well by his word, as by his example. Nevertheless, there was nothing impossible to the Vandals led by their King, they forced their Troops from their Entrenchments, wounded their Captain; and in a word, made themselves Masters of that Post. But this advantage cost Gunderic dear; for in the mean time Constance had won a victory far more considerable; for he set upon our Army with that vigour and conduct which had already subdued several Kings, and was so signally seconded by Artabure and Ariobindus, that he defeated the greatest part of our Troops, and put all the rest into disorder, and a more dreadful flight. Gunderic no sooner beheld the rout of his people, but he shewed himself much more disheartened than he was wont to be at other times in dangers of the same nature, At first he resolv'd to die honourably among the thickest of his his Enemies, but we opposed him in the execution of so martial a design, partly by our prayers, partly by laying before him how much that resolution would be unworthy his great courage, especially when things were not in such a desperate condition as to require it. Thereupon he made it his business to rally and save the remainder of his Vandals, which he did with so much experience and speed, that he got together above thirty thousand men, and regained the Hill which Atalorque had fortified: Constance who could not despise such an Enemy, though weakened, and in a very bad condition, followed us, and seizing all the Avenues of the Mountain, resolves to besiege us. The undaunted Gunderic, instead of appearing surpris'd at the news, prepared to force his way through the Roman Army by dint of Sword; but when he examined the matter more seriously, he found there was no good to be done that way; for he found he had above twelve thousand men wounded, and the rest quite tired out, and but enough to tend the sick; and that he could not perform what he intended, but by forsaking and abandoning his own people, and that though he should break through, yet 'twas impossible for him to hold out against a victorious Army, and in a Country enraged against him for all those miseries he had brought on it. These reflections shook him, being seconded by those arguments which we laid before him; and yet I cannot tell whether he would have desired Articles, had he been to deal with an Enemy less generous than Constance. But in regard he infinitely esteem'd that great person whose virtues all the world adored, he sent a Trumpeter to desire an Interview, which the Lieutenant of Honorius very obligingly condescended to. In conclusion we quitted Spain, with a promise never to return thither again so long as Constance had any thing to do with the Roman interest, yet resolved to try the total conquest of it, if there should happen any change in the fortune of that renowned Roman who had driven us to forsake it: After this our Army being recruited with those Soldiers which we drew out of the Garrisons which we delivered back into Constance's hands, Gunderic bethought himself what famous Enterprize to undertake, that might satisfy his ambition with some more remarkable conquest than that of Spain. So that while his Troops lay to refresh themselves, and that his Navy was fitting up in the Sea-port Towns, he was studying which way to steer his course, and in what part of the world he might most conveniently lay the foundation of that Monarchy which he intended to rear. At length out of that greedy desire of greatness with which his Soul was continually turmoiled, he threw aside several determinations, embracing only two, which he found most conformable to the grandeur of his courage; he was therefore at a stand whether he should attack Carthage, or carry the war into the Eastern Empire: his first design seem'd less honourable, the latter more difficult. Africa was unprovided of Soldiers ever since the wars between Gildon and Mescezel; so that the Vandals being Master only of some of the Sea-port Towns, might easily enlarge into the Continent, and become Lord of the third part of the world. Nevertheless, for fear of disobliging Constance, whom he truly loved, he would not invade any of the Roman Territories before he knew whether the Lieutenant of Honorius, who was become his Friend, would consent that he should seek to plant himself in these parts. He sent therefore Gidisdies into Italy, and rendezvouzing all his Naval Forces, he set sail for Constantinople with an intention to set upon that City, which he might do without offending Constance, in regard the Emperours at that time were more related in blood, than united in friendship. I shall omit the particulars of this Voyage, the Relation whereof you have heard from Martian, who was sent against us by Theodosius.

'Tis very true, said the King of the Cimbrians, interrupting him, that the renowned Lover of Pulcheria spake to me of Prince Thrasimond, but it was in such language as gave me a more perfect knowledge of him than all that you have said: so that I have too patiently suffered you to conceal out of a modesty a hundred noble exploits, which Martian would have more justly related than you have done; for had he not published your valour by comparing you to the God of War, I could never have known it by those Adventures which you have recounted.

In regard that friendship misprizes hyperboles, and in some measure excuses them, replied the Vandal Prince, Martian was not obliged to use so much sincerity in my applause, only he thought to speak that of Thrasimond, which Thrasimond would have spoken of Martian with more justice and good will. But since he has so highly applauded the little I have done, I will content my self to tell you, that after several Engagements upon the Egean Sea, at length we came to a set Fight, which having very much weakened both sides, both parties thought good to put an end to a war, which through the valour of their Captains could not chuse but be very bloody, without any great advantage to the Victor. To this purpose Martian and Gunderic had several parleys, and in regard I was generally admitted to their Conferences, the Lieutenant of Theodosius took an affection to me, and sympathy

Sympathy wrought the same effect in his, as merit produced in mine. In a word, we lov'd entirely, and I went upon his engagement to Constantinople, to agree with the Emperour upon such things which Martian had not power to conclude.

Here the enamoured Thrasimond stop'd to give free passage to some sighs, and to appease certain storms that arose in his breast, when he called to mind that fatal voyage that had occasioned all his misfortunes. Then resuming his relation with a more penitive Air, and a countenance altogether changed, Alas Sir, continued he, that Martian should leave my adventures unfinished, thus to revive my sorrows? But I shall not tell you all the particulars, for besides that they are known to you already, 'tis the Story of the King of the Vandals that you expect, and not of the valiant Thrasimond. You must know then, that that man whose desires were so moderate, that man who would love nothing but what was beneath himself, fell in love immediately at the Court of Theodosius, nay he loved the most exalted person in the world without exception, since he loved the Empress of the Orient, at that time when the Roman Empress was dead. But Sir, I say nothing, when I tell you that I loved the incomparable Athenais, the divine Eudoxia, if at the same time I forget to tell you that I loved her without hope, in such a manner as would have drawn compassion from my enemies. In short, Sir, all that Martian could speak upon this subject, did but imperfectly express my torments, and the torments that I shall endure while I linger out this miserable life. But not to engage my self in a subject, from whence it is impossible for me to retire, let us see what became of the King of the Vandals, during my abode at Constantinople.

While he was in treaty with Martian, the report ran that there was a rebellion in Spain, and that the illustrious Constance was slain, but the particulars of his death were unknown. Gunderic was extremely afflicted at such a rumour, concerning a person whom he both esteem'd and loved, and had presently sent to Rome to have been satisfied of the truth, but that he thought that Gidiscles then at Rome in the Court of Honorius, would have infallibly sent him word had it been a truth. So that he only dispatched away a light Vessel to the coast of Betica, and in expectation of the return thereof he obtained leave of Martian, not only to refresh himself for a Month in some Island of the Archipelago, but also gave him liberty to chuse which he thought most convenient. You may well guess that he was not long determining, for he immediately landed in Creet, the fairest and most renowned Island in all the Egean Sea.

After the Army had refreshed themselves, the Officers were desirous to see the rarities of so famous a Country, and were shewed by the most knowing of the Islanders, all that remained of the Temple, and other Monuments raised in honour of Jupiter, to whom that Island was consecrated. But Gunderic was for satisfying another piece of curiosity, according to his humour. He examined the strength and government of the Island, and when he went a hunting he took great delight, to observe the places where battels had been fought, either during the war between Mark Anthony the renowned lover of Cleopatra, and the young Augustus, or else during the war that Metellus so prosperously ended, when by the entire conquest of that Island he obtained the Sirname of Cretan.

One day that the Prince had rid very hard, he had a great desire to rest himself as he crossed a pleasant wood, which the King of the Vandals beheld with that pleasure, which he had seldom before been accustomed to betray, and thereupon alighting, he walked about in search of a commodious place to lye down. Immediately he found one as fit for his purpose as he could desire, covered with high grass and a thick tuft of trees. Gunderic, being tyred fought no farther but lay down, and while the company kept at a distance, soon buried in sleep all those cares with which his ambition perplexed him. When he waked instead of rising, he lay musing and feeding his eyes with the pleasures of the prospect, and while he turned them about to view the fair variety of objects, he spied two women that were discoursing together not perceiving him. Their habits were very ordinary according to the Country mode in that place; and though Gunderic had no desire to hear what people said, that he thought could discourse of nothing but either of their Gardens or of their sheep, yet without any design of listening, he overheard one of the two continue a discourse begun between them both after this manner, But did we ever think, said she, when we chose this Island for a retirement, that we should have seen an Army, especially an Army of the Vandals, landed in the Territories of the great Theodosius?

Those last words somewhat nettled Gunderic, for believing that his nation were monstrously set out among the Greeks, and that those people had a strange aversion toward his Countrymen, because they were so far remote from all commerce. That reflexion made him curious to understand more, and not only to know what opinion they had of his Army, but also whether they had any reason to make any complaint. To that purpose he went toward them with all the civility imaginable, that he might not put them into any affright, but no sooner had he cast his eyes upon the countenance of the youngest, but he found himself smitten with a most dazzling splendour. And his Soul was seized with that admiration, which he had never experienced in all his life before. He was so unable to step a step farther, that he became immoveable: He could do nothing more than look, nor could he tell but that what he saw was one of those Deities, that were said to have appeared formerly in that Island. On the other side the two Strangers were truly surpris'd, to meet in such a solitary place, a person so magnificently habited, and whose presence was answerable to his Royal Dignity. But in regard their astonishment had not wrought the same effect in them, as it had produced in Gunderic, they rose and took a private path, that led in all likelihood to the house which they had chosen for their retirement. The King not being able to suffer the departure, of that which already he so passionately lov'd, went after the wonderful person that had becharm'd his heart, and holding her by the garment with a trembling hand, and a respect that took notice of his natural fierceness, I beseech you, said he, let me not fright you hence, for if you will not permit me to admire but for a little while, whatever was fair upon this earth, I will retire for fear of troubling your repose, though I am sure you have robbed me of mine, all the rest of my life.

While he uttered these words, he beheld her with an unspeakable joy, and through the pleasure which he tasted, he deeply thrust into his heart the fatal dart, which was already entred too far, the wound whereof so dolefully tormented him afterwards. But Sir, to justify the Prince, it behoves me to describe the person who enthralled that liberty, which till then he had so proudly preserved.

The fair Virgin was about seventeen years of age, her Stature was very tall, streight, free and admirably shap'd. Her complection was a dazzling white, with only such a tincture as could give it life to the eye: her mouth perfect in proportion, and her Lips a most glorious vermilion: her hair the brightest in the world, and her eyes more charming than all the rest, blew, large, and sparkling with such a lively fire, that you might as well behold the Sun as them. Besides all this, there was in her presence and in her countenance, such an air of grandeur as seem'd to be above her mortal condition, and attracted respect from the most morose of men. Thus Sir, methinks I have said enough of her, for a person whose fancy is taken up only with the Idea of the most incomparable Eudoxia, and hereby I have shewed you how difficult a thing it was for Gunderic, not prepossessed with any other passion, to defend his heart against a beauty so accomplished. Alas! he never took care so much as to resist it, but suffering himself to be allured by that sweetness, which Lovers usually slip from such interviews, or rather suffering himself to be carried away by the force of his own destiny, he opened a passage to his heart for that poyson which afterwards proved so fatal to him. In short, Sir, he was so far from slisting that mischief in the birth, the production whereof he cared not to examine, that he abandoned himself in such a manner, to the pleasure of beholding that lovely Stranger, that he forgot his dignity, his ambition, and all these noble designs of never loving, unless it were one of the greatest Princesses in the world. And thus Sir, you see how anger'd heaven sported with Gunderic's resolutions as well as mine.

In the mean while to return to the charming Stranger, I must tell you that she entreated the King to let her go along with her mother: But the passionate Prince not being able to give his consent; How, said he fetching a deep sigh, can you leave so soon a place so pleasant, or can you be afraid to meet a man, you that carry in your eyes enough to make your person revered by all the earth. Sir, answered she, you may do well to reserve your obliging discourse to persons of another condition, and who have more leisure to hear you. Having so said she made an offer to be gone, when the enamour'd Gunderic beholding her with a transportation of tenderness and astonishment; Oh! said he, that you should so little understand your power over souls, or so little know the anguish of my heart, since you have so little regard for a King. Upon those words the two Strangers beheld each other with surprize, and the younger undertaking to speak with more courage than before, Sir, replied she, then you must give me leave to tell you that I am the more obliged to see your company, and that I shall avoid it as much as lies in my power. Instead of attending Gunderic's answer, she pulled her garment briskly out of the King's hand, and tripped away in great haste cross the Wood. The King of the Vandals could not chuse but follow her a few steps, and taking hold of her by the Coat, Once more for heavens sake, cryed he, stop but one moment, and do not think a King is a monster prepared to devour you. I have a better opinion of Kings, replied she, than you are aware of, turning towards him, for I believe they know more and love virtue better than ther men, For that reason, added she very coyly, I wonder that you thus pursue me, and seek to put a force upon a person who is none of your subject, a person whose Sex ought to be used with more respect by yours.

The Majesty wherewith she pronounced these words, surpris'd Gunderic, terrified and stopp'd him, but it the fear of displeasing that severe Lady kept him from running after her, his love would not permit him to neglect the means of seeing her again. After he had followed the fair Stranger with his eyes as far as it was possible, finding those passages for his eyes which a thousand great Trees seem'd to deny him, he call'd his Attendants, and chosing out the most nimble witted among them, he commanded them to divide themselves and to look for a house which could not be far off in some part of the Wood or other. Then he told them all these circumstances that might serve for their instruction, and some that were nothing to the purpose, so great a care he had not to omit those that were necessary, and after he had with many aggravations, but confusedly, describ'd to them the person that he would have them find out, he promis'd them great rewards if they brought him tydings according to his mind, such as he expected from their fidelity and cunning. He call'd them back also more than once, to repeat to them what he had said already, and returned home with such a change as well in his face as in his humour, that all the Court was astonish'd, and earnestly sought to know the cause. However it was no easie thing to conjecture, what should be the reason of Gunderic's disquiet, for in regard it was believ'd that only ambition reigned in his Soul, it was thought he might have received some ill news and that his melancholy proceeded rather from the Court of Rome or Constantinople, than from any retirement in the Island of Crete. But it far'd not with the King of the Vandals, as with those Lovers who knew not the nature of their distemper, he knew his own as soon as he felt it, for the fire of his love having enlightn'd his mind by setting his heart on fire, he found that he loved, but he found he loved a person of a mean birth, and all this he saw with grief, vexation and shame. Is it a becoming thing, (said he to himself when he saw himself surrounded with his Officers) for a Prince that commands so many valiant men, to submit so pusillanimously to the first assault of an unworthy passion, which he should have repuls'd with all his vigour? Are these, Gunderic, thy noble resolutions and thy great designs? Is this the Monarchy whereof thou wouldst lay the foundations? or dost thou shew thy self worthy of such an undertaking, to sigh so poorly for a Girl that it may be the meanest of thy Domesticks would despise?

He had no sooner thus rebuk'd himself in silence, but he felt a lively repentance and grew pale, as if the fair Lady that he had offended, had indeed received that injury in a heart wherein he knew he was settled notwithstanding all his wise reflections. He also demand'd pardon of the charming Lady, he confess'd he had committed a crime worthy of her anger, and calling to mind all those beauties that he had observ'd in her, he strongly maintain'd against his own reason, that the lustre of her eyes was to be preferred far before the splendour of Crowns. He accus'd the Cretan inhabitants of blindness, because they did not publickly adore that wonderful Stranger, but suffer'd her to live obscurely in a desert, that deserv'd to reign over all the world, or at least over an Island which had formerly erected temples to persons less worthy to be adored.

While his love inspir'd him with these thoughts, he saw one of the Vandals coming, whom he had sent to inform himself of all that concern'd the Lady that so fully possess'd his heart, but withal he saw himself in a great passion. Immediately suffering himself to be transported with the motions of his love, he went to the Officer and having consult'd his face, he was overjoyed when he found nothing but good success in his eyes. Well Athenil, said he receiving him very courteously, bringest thou any certain tydings of what I desire to know? Yes Sir, said he, for I have not only seen the fair Lady whom you met in the Wood Minos, but I know also where she lives, and that the house which she has chosen for her retreat, belongs to the Father of Cydillion, who often attends your Majesty a mornings.

Thereupon instead of staying till Cydillion came to see him, he sent to speak with him, and the young Greek proud that the King of the Vandals had sent for him, made hast to the Prince, who thus obligingly expostulated with him. I cannot tell, said I, why I should be so much your friend as I am, after that severe unkindness which you have shew'd me, wherefore should you conceal from me a thing, which you ought to have told me of with the soonest, and though you might think your self not oblig'd to do it out of affection, am I not a Stranger, and ought you not to have shewn me the chiefest rarities in your Island?

Cydillion not apprehending what the King of the Vandals meant, How, reply'd the Prince, have I not spoken plain enough, and must I be forced to complain of you for your better understanding, that you would never let me know you have one of the most beautiful persons in the world, in one of your Houses? I protest, Sir, replied the Islander, 'tis more than I know myself; only I have heard, and that but confusedly neither, that my Father has entertained certain Strangers in a House of his near the Wood Minos. Then you ought to thank me for my news; replied Gunderic, and you are obliged in gratitude to carry me to a place where you can go when you please. That shall be when your Majesty thinks convenient, replied he, and I believe the best excuse we can make, will be to hunt that way. Can we not make that match to-morrow? replied the enamoured Gunderic. No question but I may, replied Cydillion, for I shall prefer your Majesty's satisfaction before any other business of my own.

The King of the Vandals had no sooner received that promise from Cydillion, but he gave all orders necessary in reference to his design, so that the joys which he felt were only crossed by the length of a day, to which his felicity was next to succeed. Not but that at first he would willingly have deferred the seeing of a person whom he had not yet given liberty enough to recover her self out of a surprize which he himself had occasioned; but the heat of his temper being joyned to the ardour of his love, was so far from enduring any such delay, that it inspired into his mind a resolution to make himself happy by that infallible means which he seem'd to have in his power. Yes, Sir, the famous Gunderic, who had made his way through so many Provinces of his Enemies with his Sword in his hand, that Gunderic that pretended to lay the foundations of a Vandal Monarchy, he that would love none but the chiefest Princesses and Sovereignesses of the world, that very Gunderic determines all of a sudden to marry an unknown Lady that wanted both extraction and fortune: and to remove those obstacles which his ambition might lay in his way, he called to mind the example of Theodosius, who advanced to the Imperial Throne the fair Athenais, Daughter of the Philosopher Leontinus. The next day away he went with all the satisfaction which the hopes of so supreme a felicity could afford him, not doubting but to mollifie the disdain of his unknown Mistress, and to gain the affection of those persons whose wills he was obliged to follow, so soon as he should make known his intentions. To this purpose he made as much haste as one that runs to meet a certain happiness; nor was it without an extraordinary commotion of mind, that he discovered the Wood that had been so fatal to his liberty. Cydillion would have told him that Minos was formerly a Park, which carryed the name of the ancient King of Crete: but Gunderic not being in a condition to listen to his Tale, gave little heed to his words, his fancy being wholly taken up with the passion that had vanquished his inclinations! he was so incapable to resolve what he had to do, that Cydillion perceiving it, Sir, said he, since your Majesty has made your self known, I know not whether persons not accustomed to see great Princes will be willing to appear before the King of the Vandals, and whether it would not be better for me to go before and prepare the Lady to receive a visit so extraordinary? For God's sake go then, answered Gunderic, and be assured that you take this pains no less for the advancement of the Lady, and Cydillion's good fortune, than for the repose of the King of the Vandals.

Long it was ere the Ladies would be won to receive an unnecessary visit from the King, till at length the entreaties and persuasions of their Governess more than Cydillion's prevailed. When they had given their consent, the King entred the Hall where they were, never giving them leave to meet him, in case they had thought themselves obliged to do it: immediately he asked which was the Mother of Philinira, (for that was the name of the beautiful Stranger) and after he had address'd to her his first complements, "if you know the merit of your incomparable Daughter, said he, you would be less surpris'd to see a King come to find her out in such a place as this, than you would be to see him neglect his attendance on a person to whom all the world ought to do homage." Sir, answered Herminia, (for that was her name) I so little expected to hear any such discourse, especially from the lips of a great Prince, that 'tis no wonder to see me so unable to answer your Majesty as others might do more accustomed to such conversation.

While she uttered those words, the enamoured Gunderic covetously cast his eyes upon the charming Philinira, and though she kept behind her Mother, and that her Mother had but half unveil'd her face, he presently knew her again, whether it were that she had never been absent from his fancy, or whether there reflected from Philinira's Beauty any splendour more than usually enlightening the sight. The diligent Cydillion, observing the King of the Vandals looks: cunningly drew near Herminia, and in regard she was a person that lay in his Father's House whom he had not yet seen, he made it a plausible pretence first to complement her, then to entertain her in discourse, thereby to give Gunderic an opportunity to discourse the young Philinira.

The Prince lost not a moment, but going to her with an extraordinary commotion of mind, Fair, but too rigorous Lady, cried he, I confess that the first time I saw you, I drove you from the place of your content: But in regard it was contrary to my desire that you left it, I have less reason to beg your pardon than to complain of your cruelty, to flee that person that adored your beauties. 'Tis very true Sir, answered she, that your Majesty was the cause, that I retired sooner than I should have done, yet you must grant me withal that it was not civility for me, to tarry in a wood with a person that I knew not, and that the same civility commands me to implore your Majesty not to return thither any more, unless you give your self the trouble for some other reason, than to disturb those persons that only seek retirement. The disproportion between our conditions and your exalted dignity, cannot suffer—— Pitiless Philinira, cryed the King interrupting her, why would you deprive me of so great a happiness, before you know my intentions that carry me thither? Know then that I come to repair the injustice of fortune, you were born divinely beautiful, and together with that beauty, there shines a virtue which is above your charms, and in regard that having all these admirable qualities, you yet want a Throne, the King of the Vandals comes to offer you a Crown. Yes Madam, Gunderic lays his Scepter at your feet, troubled only that he has none of greater value to give you, and they that wonder that he has so suddenly resolved upon a matter of so great importance, let them only cast their eyes upon the heavenly Philinira, and consider the force of an extraordinary merit. "I am willing to believe, replied she, that your Majesty speaks according to the reality of your intentions, and that you have that kindness for an unknown person, that you hardly ever saw before, which you only ought to reserve for some great Princess. But Sir, to tell you my thoughts alter my humble thanks to your Majesty, my humble supplication is, that you would be pleased not to engage your self any farther, in uniting two persons between whose extractions there is so wide a difference, it may be far greater than you are aware of. "Though yours, replied Gunderic, were as mean as it ought to be exalted, to keep any proportion with your virtue, that shall be no obstruction to my purpose, rather will it be a greater satisfaction and joy to Gunderic, to have brought you out of that obscurity, to shew you to the world with all that splendour, wherewith you ought to be surrounded. "I cannot tell, replied she, whether your Majesty can bring those things to pass so easily as you imagine, and whether your will, which has been accustomed to be a Law among the Vandals, has the same power at this time. "How cruel fair one, replied he beholding her with eyes full of tenderness and grief, Am I become so abominable in your sight, to refuse the Crowns I offer, for fear you should make me happy by your acceptance? I should be too unjust, replied Philinira, to nourish any such ill grounded scorn, nor is it for that reason that I oppose the King of the Vandals intentions, but only to spare him the pains which he knows how to spend, more profitably in enterprizes of a higher nature. The most important design I have, replied the enamoured Prince, is to move the heart of the incomparable Philinira, and since that through her contempt of my Scepter, I know she is above all the grandeurs that I can proffer her, I shall only employ my services and respects, but services both long and faithful, and respects as deep as it is possible for me, to tender the greatest Princess upon earth.

Thus ended their first entertainment, and Gunderic took his leave of Philinira, firmly resolved to omit no means unattempted, to gain the esteem of so fair a person: And Philinira having hearkned to Gunderic with an admirable moderation, notwithstanding all his promises, contented her self only to return all those respects, which she thought due to so great a Prince: That is to say to value his degree and merit. But whether she were touched with the proofs of his generous affection, that preferred an unknown Virgin before all those Princesses, to whom such a Prince as Gunderic might pretend, I know not.

The passionate Lover return'd home very well satisfied, that he had made his mind known to Philinira, and though the fair Stranger had not testified all the acknowledgment which he thought she would have done, yet was he not a little overjoyed, that he had cross'd those discontents that foster'd his melancholy. She seem'd to him so prudent, and so worthy the esteem he had for her, that running toward Cydillion, "Think you, said he, that there are many Ladies of Philinira's humour? Are ye acquainted with any more of those young and fair Ladies, that would have been so reserved hearing such promises made, such a fortune offered as would have enflamed the ambition of the most moderate among them. For my part I cannot believe, but there are certain beauties in the Soul of this Stranger, as admirable as those that shine in her face, though her graces be the most perfect and most charming that ever I beheld.

Then he made a description of her beauty, and several times asked Cydillion if he had taken notice of such and such Lineaments, but above all things he entreated the young Greek to carry him again the next day to his Fathers house. But Sir, answered Cydillion, I believe your Majesty would do better not to move so violently, for the too frequent visits of a King, may chance chance to leave persons at first that are not in a condition high enough to receive them. Quite contrary, replied the enamoured Gunderic, it behoves me to use no delay, for if I should be so negligent as you say, I should persuade Philinira, that all my promises were but outward Courtship, without any thing of sincerity. In short, Cydillion, you might do as you please, but for Gunderic who will never be accounted a dissembler by any person living, especially by Philinira, he will certainly go to morrow, as well to confirm the promises he has made to day, as to throw himself ready to perform them, when ever Philinira shall give her consent. Cydillion understanding the Kings resolution, thought it the best way to submit, and from that time forward he devoted himself to the Prince, for the remainder of his life.

Gunderic was not only well satisfied but returned him thanks, regarding not only the Islanders merit, but knowing the kindness he might do by assisting him in his Courtship, which was now become his only business.

The next day Gunderic failed not to make another journey to the wood Minos, and that with all the speed, that a most passionate Lover could have done upon the same occasion: He was no sooner come near the house, but his joys augmented in such a manner, that it is impossible for me to express the signs that he gave of his passion. But Sir, to see that so much delight should be changed of a sudden, into such an overwhelming sorrow. For no sooner had the King enquired for Philinira, but answer was made that she had left the Island with two other Strangers, not discovering in the least whither they went to seek a new retirement. Upon that terrible and surprising answer, Gunderic stood like a man that had been thunderstruck, then casting forth such looks as easily shewed the trouble of his mind, he caused the people to repeat those fatal words, which he had heard too often already.

The Governess of Cydillions family, related to him more precisely what he desired to know, but what she said being all to little or no other purpose, than only to give him the greater assurances of his misfortune, he had suffered himself doubtless to have been transported by the violence of his despair, if his faithful Cydillion who foresaw it, had not persuaded him that 'twas not for him at such a time to stand bewailing himself to no purpose, but that it behoved him to dispatch away Posts to all the ports of Creet, and to leave nothing undone to get intelligence, which way Philinira was gone. I will do whatever you think good, answered the King fetching a deep sigh, but since the ungentle Philinira flees the unfortunate Gunderic, will she not take that proof of my love for a new persecution, and is it not better for me to dye for grief, than trouble the repose of a person whom I adore, notwithstanding all the cruelties that altogether void of pity she exercises toward me? Then turning toward the woman that gave him the answer, and promising her vast rewards, I beseech you, said he, if you can, give me some better information concerning Philinira. Is she not concealed in this Island? does she not lye somewhere hid to avoid the company of Gunderic? Know you not how I have disoblighed her? Is there no means to appease her anger and obtain pardon?

The disconsolate Prince demanded a hundred things of this nature over and over again, but taking notice that he either asked the question in vain, or that the person to whom he addressed himself, either knew nothing at all, or was else so faithful to Philinira as not to reveal the secret, he e'ne followed Cydillions advice and returned back, to the end he might send away messengers to the several Port Towns, to inform themselves if it might be done, what was become of the Stranger so lately departed.

While the Messengers were upon their duty, he himself went to visit the Wood Minos, as a place which he revered, as a place that was conformable to his thoughts, and a place that would make him always think upon Philinira. Nevertheless he was no sooner come thither, but he found a remarkable change, the very shades themselves seemed more obscure and pensive, the grass looked not so fresh and verdant, the murmuring fountains pleased not his ears, the chirping of the Birds seemed harsh and unpleasant, and what more tormented the enamoured Prince, Philinira was not there. How many times fetching deep sighs, did he demand her of the Trees, the Fountains and the Rocks? how many times, while he accused them to have neglected their own advantage, did he upbraid them? In short Sir, neither Cydillion nor the most considerable of the Vandal Officers that were about them, could by any means allwage the sorrows of Gunderic. They were so numerous that they soon begat an alteration in his countenance, and when upon the return of his messengers, he found no likelihood of hearing any news of Philinira, he fell into a languishing distemper, not unlike to that which seiz'd upon me, when I separated from the incomparable Eudoxia. I arrived about that time in the Island of Creet, being forced from the Court of Constantinople, by the cruel order of the Empress: And though I took little notice of those things which did not concern that heavenly person, yet when I saw my brother reduced to that lamentable condition, the burthen of my sorrows was more than too heavy by that addition of grief. At first we blush'd and sigh'd, though then we neither of us knew the cause of our misfortunes, and as I was about to testify the share which I took in his misfortunes, "Ah Prince, said he, how happy should I be were it in your power, to act successfully for my consolation. But only fate has overwhelm'd my quiet, and only fate can restore my repose.

He fetch'd a sigh at the conclusion of these words, and beholding me as earnestly as the troubles that turmoyl'd him would give him leave, "Brother, pursued he, either I am very much deceived, or you are as little in health as I, and enjoy as little tranquillity in your mind. "Alas Sir, replied I, that it should be so easie a thing for me, not only to grant what your Majesty has said, but also to acknowledge my self the most miserable creature upon earth. "It well appears, replied Gunderic, that you know not what my misfortune is, while you contend for superiority with me in sadness, or think you have more reason to complain than I, or any other far more miserable than Thrasimond. If you think there be any such, said I, you know not what it is to love passionately without hope. I know it too well, replied he, and the proof of it which I apprehend, is far beyond your experience. For in short, Brother, you seem'd formerly dispos'd only to love with moderation, to love only those that would be glad, to receive the marks of your favour and be thankful. "'Tis very true Brother, replied I, that was my fancy once when you fancied quite the contrary. But a malignant Star has intruded it self to dispose of my inclinations, and to make them so soaringly bold, as to aspire to the Empress of the East. You have heard of the virtues of the fair Athenais, and her obligations to Theodosius, and therefore it will be no surprize to you, when I tell you that it was she that severely commanded me to begone from Constantinople, forbidding me absolutely to return thither while she lived. In pursuit of these words I gave him a relation of all the passages between me and Eudoxia, which when Gunderic with great attention had heard, "I confess, said he, your fate is hard: But ere long you will acknowledge that Gunderic's is much more severe. In short, Brother, you have the comfort to love a great Princess, to know where she is, to hear her discours'd of every hour, and you may see her in disguise. But Gunderic the King of a warlike Nation, Gunderic that loves honour and nourishes in his breast all that ambition, which keeps persons of his rank and age in perpetual motion: That Gunderic no sooner cast his eyes upon an unknown Lady that he met in the Country, but he loved her with all the heat and passion imaginable. However Prince, this was but the beginning of my misfortunes, this Virgin, seemingly but of a mean extraction, rudely treats the humbled Prince of the Vandals, she refuses a Crown which I offer her, and as if she had only shewn her self to make me miserable, no sooner she appeared but she vanish'd, and cruelly leaves in my heart those flaming darts that consume it, and hurry me headlong to my Tomb. Thus the two unfortunate Brothers bewailed their own miseries, and though generally the unhappy receive some consolation from the mutual repetition of their afflictions, it far'd not so with Gunderic and Thrasimond.

On the contrary it rather augmented their grief, every time that they repeated the cause of their sufferings: This it was that cast us both into a languishing distemper, that would not let us think of any thing else but of our loves, and as for the King of the Vandals, he so totally abandon'd himself to the remembrance of his unknown Mistress, that he minded neither Army nor enterprizes, nor so much as his own honour. At the same time Gidiseles returned from Rome, and told us, transported with his disgust against Honorius, that the Western Empire was threatned with a speedy and absolute ruine, that his Kinsman Stilicon was killed by Heraclian, that Constance was certainly dead, and that Alaric was marching toward Italy, at the head of a formidable Army. He added that it was not fit for the Vandals to lose so fair an opportunity as this, to fix themselves in Spain, which Gunderic had all along design'd, and that Atalorque had rais'd great divisions, between the Romans and the Inhabitants.

This news which would have been most welcome to the ambitious Gunderic, was but coldly received by the disconsolate Lover of Pbilinira, and if he bewailed the great and generous Constance, he never minded the conquest which Gidiseles propos'd to him. The Vandals astonish'd at so great a change, languish'd like their leader Gunderic, yet not daring to murmur against their Prince. But while they were in that general consternation, and that all our affairs went to wrack, I began my self to have some sense of pity, for a Nation that had been always dear to me, and that for their sakes I might preserve the life of Gunderic, I went to the Prince, and after I had some time discours'd him concerning the unknown Philinira, Sir, said I, were it not better for us to seek an honourable death at the head of an Army, than thus to abandon our selves to the consuming poison of love melancholy? Is it fitting for the great King of the Vandals to end his days in obscurity? Is it for him to die in an Island as if he were banished, or that he were commanded and durst not stir out of it? Let us be gone, let us hasten out of a Country so fatal to your quiet; and when you begin to act like a great King, all the world will strive to please you, and will find out Philinira for you. You have drawn these poor people from their homes, will you leave them without habitations, when you may so easily settle them in fair and fertile Provinces? I took notice that Gunderic began to hearken to my discourse, which made me continue it more vehemently and vigorously than before: Gidiscles and Cydilion were my seconds, so that at length we obtained orders from Gunderic to be ready to set sail in a few days for Betick Spain, which we had begun already to call Vandalusia, after we had made those conquests already mentioned.

Here the Prince of the Vandals broke off his Relation, not thinking fit to continue it any longer, as well by reason of the King of the Cimbrians indisposition of Body, as for that he heard people at the Chamber Door, whom he judged to be such as had particular business with Theobald. Thereupon he rose, promising to finish the rest when it might be done without injury to an illustrious person, whose health was too precious to the world not to be taken care of to the utmost of humane ability. The King of the Cimbrians made answer to those obliging expressions with all the acknowledgment imaginable, and signifying that he would hear the rest of the Story of Gunderic in Thrasimond's Apartment, he testified withal how great a share he bore in the misfortunes of two Princes so well worthy of a better fortune. After that, as Wallia had taken his leave, and was going forth in Thrasimond's company, Theobald addressing himself to both, I am glad, said he, there is so strict a friendship between two Princes of so fair renown. But, Sir, said Wallia, have you taken notice of the correspondency between Thrasimond's life and mine. The Gods and Theodolinda, replied the penfive Lover preserve you from such a resemblance. I confess, answered the Prince of the Visigoths, that the divine Princess whom you last mentioned has not yet disposed of her heart, as the fair Athenais has done in favour of Theodosius; but if you except that only circumstance, you will find few accidents in my life that do not answer yours. In short, we were both born among warlike Nations that have quitted their own to seek out more pleasant Habitations; you were sent to the Eastern Emperour by Gunderic, and I by the King of the Goths to the Court of Honorius: you are in friendship with Martian, and Constance has honoured me with his: and in a word, we both lost our liberties during the time of our Negotiations, you at Constantinople, and I at Rome.

Upon the conclusion of this discourse, the report that had already flown abroad began to encrease; so that the two Princes took their leaves, that they might not intrench too far upon the privacies of the Cimbrian King. They were no sooner gone out of the Chamber, when Telanor entred with a strange alteration in his countenance, and presenting a strange Officer to the King his Master: Sir, said he, behold here one of the King of Suevia's and Briomer's Agents; behold that Vinderic whom your Majesty may probably have formerly seen attending upon the Princess Albisinda. How! cried Theobald, interrupting him, a servant of Albisinda, and act for Briomer the most deadly of my Enemies, and the most wicked person living! Ah, my Princess, continued he, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, what is become of thee, if what I hear be true? Then turning toward the Sueve, speak, pursued he, speak, and stay not till I tear from thy lips the truth which I long to know. The Boat which was to be for their Divertisement, and was sent as a present from Albisinda, was it not some trick of Briomer's contrivance? The Sueve then preparing to speak with more confidence than became his guilt, Sir, said he to the King of the Bohemians, before I answer to your Majesty's demands, I must declare that the Princess Hunnimonda, in the place where she is, will find no better usage than I shall find here. And now, Sir, I must tell you, that I am come hither by the order of the King of Suevia, according to which I acted. In short, Sir, 'twas I that conveyed away Hunnimonda; and Briomer, whose contrivance it was, is now conducting her to Cologne, to — O, Heavens, cried the disconsolate Theobald, interrupting him, can ye suffer the most famous Villain that ever was to be the Master of Hunnimonda's destiny, and that the chiefest piece of Nature's workmanship should be snatched out of your hands to be delivered up into the power of the most perfidious among men? But let us flie, added he, raising himself in his Bed, let us flie to the rescue of my Princess, and not lose in unprofitable complaints that precious time which may be still employed in her delivery. "Sir, answered Vinderic, your Majesty will but put your self to a vain trouble; for be assured, that having served the King my Master, I would not have been the messenger of a loss which I my self had a hand in, but that I know how to repair it at the same hour. 'Tis not for nothing that "I dare appear before a Prince whom I have provoked, but that I come with a remedy

 "proper to cure the wounds which I my self have given : and therefore I must tell you,
 "Sir, it will be your fault if Hunnimonda do not return when you please ; you have a "great predominancy over Pharamond, and you are only desired to use your power so far "as to make an alliance with the King of Suevia by the marriage of Polyxena. " I will
 "joyfully make the proposals, and I question not but successfully too, replied the Cimbrian
 "King, for besides that such a reconciliation will restore peace to Europe, the merit of Vi-
 "ridomar is so great that I shall be overjoyed to———" 'Tis not for the Prince of Suevia
 "that I speak, 'tis for the King his Father, cryed Vinderic, interrupting him, who passio"nately loves the Princess of the Franks, and has obstinately resolv'd the enjoyment of "her, or to perish, having resolv'd in his ruine more persons than you are aware of. He "holds in his hand that which Theobald accounts most dear to him in all the world, and
 "what Pharamond esteems above his life ; so that he can bring you both to an advantageous
 "composition when he pleases, or make you tremble in the midst of your victories. " And
 "we, cryed Theobald, impatiently interrupting him, can deliver our Princesses, maugre all "the assistance of Theodosius, or the Ramparts of Cologne. In the mean time, talk no
 "no more to me in the behalf of a Prince whose injustice I abominate : retire you where "Telanor shall conduct you, and fear nothing for Hunnimonda's sake ; for though you have
 "thus cruelly afflicted me, I shall take more care of your safety, than the dearest of your "Friends : I will be your convoy, I will expose my life for your preservation ; and since "the fantastical conduct of fortune will have it so, the fair Princess whom you have be"trayed, shall be the cause that you receive such advantageous rewards of infidelity.

The End of the Eleventh Part of

PHARAMOND.

PHARAMOND.

The Twelfth and Last Part.

BOOK I.

He passionate King of the Cimbrians burn'd with so fervent an impatience to deliver Hannimonda; that having clos'd his ears against all the admonitions of the Surgeons, he caus'd himself to be made ready, notwithstanding the pain and trouble of his wounds, resolving personally to act in all things which might be advantageous to his love. Immediately he went to the Queen of the Visigoths, where he found Osavia, Theodolinda and Adelaiada, and hardly giving him so much time as to pay them his respects, so deeply was he press'd with his own grief, he made his addresses to them in this manner, after he had taken notice that their sorrow was as great as he could possibly expect it to be: "I see, said he, most generous Ladies, that you are most sensibly touch'd with the misfortunes of your illustrious Friends, and that you will not take it ill to be hasten'd from hence, to the end that our Forces being united, may be in a condition in a few days to march against the common Enemy. "Sir, answered Placidia, we are resolv'd to second your intentions to the utmost that persons of our Sex can contribute there-to. "And it shall be none of our faults, pursued the Queen of Albion, if this very day you do not quit this Camp to return to the King of the Franks. Theodolinda and Adelaiada immediately told him that they were ready to go forthwith, and pray'd the King of the Bohemians not to take care for any thing that might concern their departure. The Prince however was not slack to use all the diligence which the troubles that tormented his mind would permit him; and after he had issued out all necessary orders that concern'd the Troops, Wallia, Ibrahmond, Priam and several others of the chief Commanders undertook to see them carefully put in execution. Afterwards they conjur'd Theobald to rely upon their conduct, and urg'd him so earnestly, that at length he was well satisfied, how contrary soever it were to his natural activity. True it is, that his mind was never the more at rest; for in regard he was not Master either of his love or of his resentment, the violence whereof he could not keep enclosed in his Breast, he was glad of a slight occasion to retire for three or four hours, where he might not be encumber'd with company. Understanding therefore that Marcomire had a design to give him a visit, he was resolv'd to prevent him, and to seek him out on the other side of Segoduna, in a little Village, whither by the advice of the Physicians he had withdrawn himself, for the more quick recovery of his health. But as he was just ready to go, there came a person from Cologne to speak with him from Keva, with a command also to attend the Princess Theodolinda. That Officer had no sooner obtain'd the audience which he desired, but he advertis'd Theobald, that the King of the Huns would be the next day at Agrippina: that he had not laid much to heart the death of Mundescic, having exchanged for such a Son as Ambiomer, and understanding besides that the illustrious Balamir so generally esteemed, and always so affectionately beloved by himself, was now discovered to be the true successor to the Kings of Bohemia. Theobald who forgot not the least particular of that gratitude, which he owed to a person to whom he was so deeply engaged, as well for his education as for many other marks of his liberality, enquired after the prosperity of that Prince, with all the vehemency that his grief would permit him, and when Keza's messenger had satisfied him in all other things, he inform'd him in few words, how joyfully the King of the Huns had acknowledg'd, and own'd his Son Ambiomer instead of Balamir. But can you not tell me, replied the enamour'd Theobald transported with his passion, whether Hunnimonda were at Agrippina, when you came from thence? or if she be there, how the King of Suevia behaves himself toward her. Sir, answered the Hun, the report that I heard was that they had carried that Princess to Cologne, with other very considerable persons in her company. And that the King of Suevia had caused them to be cunningly stoln away, to the end the Citizens of Agrippina, might be in a condition to make the better conditions with your self and the King of the Franks, if for the future, victory should attend you both, with that success as hitherto it has done. But Sir, added he, take no care I beseech you for the Princess of the Goths, neither she nor any of the rest need be afraid, in a City which must be forced to implore their protection: Nor is there any thing which they dare deny them, only the liberty of going out of the Town. Not that the Princess of the Franks enjoys the same repose with the rest of her companions, for (to speak ingenuously) the King of Suevia loves her with an extraordinary affection as the report goes. But considering his humour, you may well imagine that his company cannot be very acceptable, especially it being so impossible for him to conceal the implacable hatred, which he so choicely foment against Pharamond and Vi-aidomar.

When the Hun had given Theobald an accompt of those things which he desired to now, he was sent back with a most obliging answer, and while he went to attend the Princess Theodclinda, the King of the Cimbrians made choice of Narva, for his envoy to the King of the Huns, for which purpose he gave him a Letter and instructions what he had to say. You shall assure the King, added Theobald, *that I shall always think my self happy in the Title of his Son, and that I beseech him to preserve for Theobald that affection, with which he always honoured Balamir. Tell him that I would most gladly wait upon him, were it safe for me to come into a City, where my enemies have an absolute power, and that he would sensibly oblige me, would he but afford me the opportunity of a meeting, and I might make him the same protestations which I make by another. But Narva, pursued he blushing, and earnestly beholding the Hun, above all things discharge your self of this farther commission which I shall give you in trust. Beseech the King of the Huns to protect my Princess upon all occasions, wherein she shall have need of his support. Put him in mind that he had often design'd the little Hunnimonda for the young Balamir: and therefore since he never had any dislike of that innocent affection, which I ever had for that most admirable Lady, tell him that he has some reason, and is in some measure concern'd to contribute to that union which he approved, and formerly so earnestly sought after. For your part, Narva, I make no question but when you are at Cologne, you will endeavour to find out the fair Bellamira, if you prove so happy, and see withal my most adored Princess, can you sufficiently represent to her what I undergo for her sake? Can you describe my sorrows to her? were you ever in love? But, added he immediately, it is impossible that you should have ever loved so passionately as the unfortunate Theobald, and so it is impossible you should ever express my thoughts. However endeavour to omit nothing that you can imagine I would say to my Princess, could I come to Cologne without prejudice to that party, which must fight for her liberty.*

The enamour'd Prince used many other passionate expressions to Narva, but at length having dismissed him with much ado, he went away himself to visit Marcomire, as he had fully resolv'd before.

No sooner was he gone beyond the Trenches, but the beauty and misfortunes of his Princess crowd'd into his thoughts: But when he began to consider that Hunnimonda had been forcibly taken from him, at a time when there was no obstacle between him and her happiness, he began to be so far transported as to complain of the cruelty of his destiny. Divine Princess, cry'd he as if he had heard him, was it not enough that thy innocent life has been cross'd with so many misfortunes, but that thou must fall into the hands of the most unjust of all Princes, and under the power of the most wicked villain that ever lived.

Having so said he began to consider with horror, the affrights wherewith Hunnimonda might be daily terrified, the rudeness of the King of Sueden and Briomer's cruelty: and then the constancy which that most incomparable Lady had shewn upon all occasions the most dangerous, dangerous, instead of putting him out of fear, cast him into new apprehensions, perswading him every moment, that Hunnimonda's courage might provoke and incense her persecutors.

He was as it were ingulph'd in those sad reflections, when a great noise awaken'd his contemplations: When turning his head he saw two parties of Soldiers in combat one against the other. Immediately he rode up to the place where the skirmish was, and he had no sooner observed the difference of their Armes, but he perceived that about three hundred Romans fought, retreating before a greater number of Vandals who vigorously pursued them, to the end they might compleat the victory which they had already in their hands. The generous Theobald never stood to consider what he had to do, but advancing with his Sword prepared to strike, he resolv'd either to moderate their fury by some gentle admonition, or else to take the weakest side if they refused to give fair Quarter. He was just about to execute what he intended, when a certain Roman addressing himself to that Vandal who fought with greatest fury, Hold, said he, spare the life of the great Theodosius, 'tis Honorius whom thou pursuest. Rather the murderer of Serene and Stilicon, cryed the fierce Vandal interrupting him, and therefore oppose not my resentment, which arms me to punish that Tyrant, if thou intendest to avoid the destiny.

By the surliness of his answer, the King of the Cimbrians guessed the Vandal to be that Gidifcles, of whom Thrasimond had made mention in the History of Gunderic, and therefore never considering that Honorius was his Rival, or examining what design might bring that Prince where Bellamira was, he only applyed himself to divert the storm that threaten'd him. To which purpose addressing himself to the enemy of Honorius, after he had lifted up his Viser, You speak of Stilicon, said he, like a person so deeply concern'd for him that I believe you are Gidifcles: So that I am apt to think when you understand that my Name is Theobald, you will at my entreaty moderate that fury, which carries you on to revenge your Kinsmans death. Those words and the countenance of the King, having suspended a while the Vandals rage, How Sir, replyed Gidifcles, for it was really he, will such a Prince as you protect ingratitude and perfidy? For indeed by the death of Serene you are sufficiently dispens'd with, though you extinguish those effects of your generosity, toward persons so unworthy to merit them.

Concluding those words he would have fallen upon the Emperour of the Romans, when Theobald displaying his Sword aloft, Hold Gidifcles, cryed he with a commanding utterance, and force me not to fight against those Troops which are come to our succour. You may do as you please, surlily replyed the Vandal, but for my part I must attaque Honorius wherever I find him. At the same time he endeavoured to come at the Prince, but the King of the Cimbrians having pulled down his viser, opposed the charge of the Vandal, standing only firm at first between them. But Gidifcles being moved with that action, spurred on his horse, whether it were that he was not master of that violence which exasperated his mind, or whether he thought that the respect which he had for a Prince of so much valour, would not be looked upon as a piece of Cowardise: Inasmuch that Theobald incensed at his rudeness, summon'd up together all the powers that sustain'd his great courage, and notwithstanding his wounds which were not a little troublesome to him, he let fall to terrible a blow upon Gidifcles's head, that he broke his Helmet and made the Vandal reel.

Thereupon certain Officers who had attended the Bohemian King, clos'd up to his person, and the Romans recovering their courage upon the sight of a succour so little expected, rallied with that speed, and joyned themselves to their defender with that bravery, as was not unworthy the honour of their Nation. However their assistance seem'd to be of little use to Theobald, for that valiant Prince had made his way into the thickest of his enemies, and had already with an amazing and overbearing impetuosity, overthrown whatever made resistance against him. Not but that Gidifcles whom the generous Soldier had spared, was come to himself again, and endeavoured all he could with words and actions, all in vain to encourage his party. For the Prince being accustomed to vanquish, the face of the Combat immediately changed, and victory having declared for that great personage whom she never forsook, the victor now began to look after the preservation of those he had overcome. Retire, cryed he several times aloud, and compel us not to be your enemies, contrary to the desire we have to take your parts upon all occasions.

He repeated the same thing so often and in so many places, that at length Gidifcles having received a wound which hindred him from opposing the Prince's design, he obtained his end, and the Vandals retreated to the Camp, owning their acknowledgments to the Prince.

After that Theobald calling to him a person of quality among the Cimbrians, Go find out Thrasimond, said he, and without laying any blame upon Gidifcles to his prejudice, excuse me as the Prince of the Vandals with all the excuses of a Friend who was so unhappily engaged to fight his Troops.

He had just given that order when Honorius came to him with all the marks of acknowledgment that the seasonable assistance which he had received deserved: Sir, said he, were the life which you have preserved as dear to me as it is uncomfortable, I could not be more sensible of the obligation which you have laid upon me. Sir, modestly answered the King of the Cimbrians, I have done no more for the Emperour of the Romans, but what he might have expected from any other person, who with less Generosity had met with the same opportunity to serve him as I did; and to take the part of so great a Prince, so furiously pursued by such an advantageous number of Enemies. But, Sir, said he through the motion of his love, neither what I have done, nor all that I am able to do for you can discharge me of the debt which the divine Bellamira, whom I only adore, stands engaged for to your Imperial Favours. Do you adore Bellamira, cryed Honorius interrupting him with a strange discomposure in his face, ah, Sir, if that be true I am yet more miserable than I thought my self, since I find my self constrain'd to combat a passion in my heart, a passion which is infinitely more dear to me than the life for which I am beholding to your Sword.

Having so said, the passionate Honorius made a reflection upon his Rival's words, he examined his countenance also; and finding those symptoms therein, that Bellamira's Lover was not a person hated by her, he blushed, he sigh'd, and breaking silence of a sudden, Ah, Sir, cryed he, wherefore did you not suffer me to perish by the Arms of the Vandals, seeing you could not but be acquainted with all my misfortunes when you heard my name? Instead of saying any more he turn'd away his head, without doubt to hide the symptoms of his discontent. And Theobald, who gave a shrewd guess in what condition he was, let him ride on without interrupting him in his thoughtful contemplations.

In the mean time, Marcomire, who was coming toward the Camp, so soon as he drew near the Body of Horse, presently knew the King of the Cimbrians, and advancing toward him with an air which sufficiently evidenced the part he took in the change of his fortune; Sir, said he, if I am come too late to testify to King Theobald with how much joy I receiv'd the news of his being restor'd to the Throne of his Ancestors, it behoves you rather to accuse Balamir's valour, than the neglect of Marcomire. For all the world will agree with me, that the honour of singly engaging that famous Soldier, is usually attended with those consequences which will not always permit a man to do that which he knows necessary to be done. That Balamir you mention, modestly replyed Theobald, was better assisted by his own Troops, than the King of the Franks was seconded by those which he commanded; and you know very well, Sir, that it was the valour of the Chieftains that decided the Battel between us.

These obliging complements having continued for some time on both sides, Theobald gave Marcomire to understand, that he had not stirr'd from the Camp but only to give him a visit; and then thinking it but civil to present him to the Emperour of the Romans, he did it with these Encomiums whereof the Brother of Pharamond was no way unworthy, as well in respect of his own merit, as the Grandeur of his Extraction. Honorius, notwithstanding the sadness which appeared in his countenance, received the Prince of the Franks with all those honours which he had accustomed to render to personages of his high Degree and Reputation; and after many complements usual upon such occasions, he continued his march toward the Camp, attended by his Romans; the King of the Cimbrians and Marcomire riding on each hand of him. No sooner was he entred the Camp, but Theobald and the Brother of Pharamond took care of a wound which he had received; but in regard it was but slight, he was resolv'd to visit the Queen of the Visigoths, before he took that repose which he might well be thought to want. Placidia, who had all the virtuous inclinations of a good Sister, was no sooner advertis'd of his arrival, but she was overjoyed, and came to meet the Emperour with all the eagerness imaginable, and with all the marks of affection which he could expect. But the delight which the Emperour of the Romans and the fair Widow of Autalpb took at first meeting, suddenly gave place to a more pensive conversation; for those two illustrious persons could not behold each other without calling to mind the misfortunes that had persecuted them. Placidia with her fair eyes swimming in tears talk'd of the irruption of the Goths into Italy, the sacking of Rome, the fatal wound that detained Constance in the City of the Teciosages, when his assistance was so much required for the safety of his Country; and lastly she bewailed the loss of her Husband in the fury of a sedition of which she had been the innocent cause. The passionate Honorius, instead of continuing a discourse that no way concern'd Bellamira, impatiently enquired after the welfare of that most incomparable Lady whom he had so exceedingly lov'd, and still lov'd so tenderly. The Queen of the Goths told him in few words words that Bellamira was Hunnimonda; and afterwards explaining her self more at large, she gave him to understand that that fair Princess had not run through so many dangers, had not despised death, and refused Empires, had it not been for Balamir's sake, who was now discovered to be King of the Cimbrians: So that, Sir, pursued she, being so just as you are, I have no reason to doubt that you have any design to interrupt so noble an affection: especially after such an exploit of Theobald, as merits that you should in some measure strive with your self in favour of so generous a Prince.

Upon those words the Emperour sigh'd, and seem'd to be strangely accused by his own thoughts: when Placidia perceiving that her discourse had made some impression in his mind, Ab, Sir, pursued she; consider I beseech you how far Hunnimonda might be engag'd before ever you saw her; and if you have thoughts of that Princess worthy of her, renounce all your own pretences to her. Instead of contending with her inclinations, instead of attempting to render that incomparable Princess unfaithful to a Prince so worthy of her affection, and to whom you are beholding for saving your life, do that which acknowledgment challenges, and change that violent passion which you have for Hunnimonda into a rational friendship: so shall you not only preserve the esteem of that fair Princess, but also engage to your interests a King, whose valour will be no mean assistance to you, at a time when all the world is up in Arms, and the two Empires shaken by the invasion of so many Nations. Your counsel is good, Madam, replied Honorius sighing, and I must confess that you have said nothing to me but what my reason has advis'd me to a thousand times. But, my dear Sister, pursued he, how little your advice, how little my resolutions are able to prevail over a heart where reigns the fairest person that ever was! however, forbear not continually to tell me of my duty; speak to me often of the illustrious Theobald, lay before me all the justice of his glorious hopes, and procure for me Bellamira's conversation, or at least a Letter from her, to the end, that the wisdom of that incomparable person may in some measure appease the tumults of my mind, and at length produce the effects which you desire. Nevertheless, do not believe that I desire so powerful an assistance, to spare my self the labour in an affair of this importance: for I intend my self to use all my endeavours, and I leave you now, added he with a serious discomposure in his countenance, to enter into a Combat where I am sure I shall never get the victory, and wherein I cannot tell whether I should be glad to be the Victor.

The sorrowful Honorius had no sooner concluded those words but he left the Princess Placidia's Chamber, and went to the Apartment which was prepar'd for him, where he minded more to recollect in his mind whatever could fortifie his reason, than to take that rest which was necessary for him. He call'd to mind the virtues of the great Theodosius, that he might not do any thing unworthy his Birth; he perswaded himself upon good ground that Bellamira would be as constant at Cologne, as she had been at Ravenna, when she never hop'd to see that Prince again to whom she had bequeath'd her affection: and lastly he rais'd up against himself the acknowledgment due to a Rival who had ventured his own for the preservation of his life. However, he could not bring his design to perfection, so that it behov'd him to use other endeavours to break those Fetters wherewith Bellamira had chain'd him, Bellamira whom all the world admir'd. However, he despaired not altogether to conform his passion to Hunnimonda's will, and that he might omit nothing that could further his intention, he went to visit the Princesses, not so much in point of decency, as out of hope that Theodolinda's eyes, which had once enthralled him, might still make some impression in his heart, which would not prove disadvantageous to the design which he had laid. Nevertheless, that visit produced not the effect which he expected; for after the usual complements, they fell into a discourse of Vinderic's treachery, and for that reason it was impossible to talk of those fair Princesses which had been carried away by force, without giving a thousand applauses to the incomparable Bellamira: So that Honorius was altogether as deep in love when he left the Queen of Albion's Lodgings, where Theodolinda and Adelaiada also were, as before: and therefore being resolv'd to testify his acknowledgment to the King of the Cimbrians, he was met by that Prince in the company of Marcomire, Wallia, Priam, and several other of the chief Commanders. As for Gondemar and Guntran they did not think themselves oblig'd to that visit, in regard that Gondiech was an Enemy of the Romans: not but that the Prince of the Burgundians had something of kindness for Honorius, because the Princess Cleomira was brought up in his Court: but besides, that particular interest was not to be preferred before the honour of his Nation, his love was not yet so well known to justify an action that would have soon reach'd the King his Brother's ear. On the other side, Thrasimond had more reason to be nice in his conduct at that time; for when he considered that Gunderic had got possession of Betica, and that Gidifles had attack'd Honorius himself with all the fury of the most irreconcilable enemy. He thought himself no way obliged to visit a Prince, who had so great an aversion against the Vandals, yet knowing that Gunderic for Constance's sake, was willing to come to an accommodation with the Romans, he came to be of another mind, and believed that he might pay that respect to Honorius, which was due from a Prince of his quality, to an Emperour of whose friendship and alliance he had no need. And as he was highly incensed against Gidifles, and had already made more excuses to Theobald, than he was willing to receive, he thought it but a piece of Royal civility, to give Honorius all the satisfaction that lay in his power. He seriously protested that he was so far from countenancing Stilicon's Kinsman, that he condemned the action as altogether unjust, and that he would himself go and declare to him in King Gunderic's name, that the Vandals were not only no longer the enemies of the Romans, but that they came for no other reason to assist the King of the Franks, but because they heard that the great Constance had taken Pharamond's part. The Emperour received his complement in a most obliging manner, and afterwards gave to Thrasimond when he came to visit him, all the honours that were due to a Prince of his Birth and merit.

Nevertheless these interviews lasted not long, for besides that the most part of those Princes, were prepossessed with a passion, that called them several other ways, it behoved them to depart and to shew themselves, where Pharamond had made a stand with his victorious Army. For all the whole League was ready to march, except the learned Melufina, who seemed somewhat unwilling to leave a retirement she had upon the Segua, where she was deeply employed in the discovery of those future Grandeurs, which the Stars seemed to promise for the future to the Monarchy of France. While the learned Theon made the same observations in another retirement, which he had chosen near Cologne. The next morning the Army march'd out of their Trenches, and Theobald having sent to give Pharamond notice of the Emperours Arrival, the fair Train of Princes and Princesses, that accompanied Honorius and Placidia, were pleasingly surpris'd to meet between the two Camps, the illustrious King of the Franks, the great Constance, the King of the Tongres, and the famous Artabure, attended by a numerous Convoy of Officers, of goodly presence and magnificently arm'd.

The Son of the great Theodosius, how highly soever he were prepossessed by fame to the advantage of Pharamond, nevertheless could not chuse but behold that Prince with some kind of astonishment, and plainly manifested a greater value and esteem for him, than ever he had shewed to any person in the world before. Afterwards he received the King of the Tongres with all the demonstrations of friendship and acknowledgment, that the most interested of all his Allies could pretend to. But when Constance advanced toward his Emperour, the Prince out of a Transport of joy, greater than any that he had expressed for some time before, called him aloud his support, his consolation and his true friend. But when the famous Warriour drew near him, he cast his Arms about his neck and hugged him with tears, and shewed a vehement affection for him, which neither his Love for Belamira, nor the absence of several years could extinguish in his heart.

Now Constance and Artabure being persons free from all thoughts of injustice, they no way flattered the passion of Honorius, but on the contrary taking a liberty little different from what the Queen of the Goths had taken, they vigorously represented to him how unjust he was, to oppose himself to the happiness of those persons whom he loved, and to whom he was beholding. Artabure never spake of the matter, but still fetching deep sighs, and struggling with himself to bring out his words: whereupon the Emperour perceiving, that those persons whom he accounted most dear to him of any in the world, still repeated to him what his reason had so oftentimes already done, undertook a deep contemplation within self, to determine upon the final resolution which he had to take.

On the other side Pharamond and Theobald, having accosted each other with all the marks of esteem and friendship, which they mutually owed to each other, began to discourse of the violent carrying away of the Princesses against their wills, with an indignation conformable to their great courage; and the noble fire that sparkled in their eyes seemed to pronounce that there was no power upon earth, that could protect their enemies from that just resentment, which inspired their amorous hearts. After that the King of the Franks overtook Placidia's Chariot, and when he had rode a while by the side thereof, discoursing either with that incomparable Princess, or the Queen of Albion, he sought for Wallia whom he found with Theodolinda, while Taxander pleaded himself in the company of his lovely Adelaiada.

Pharamond gave the Prince of the Visigoths, all the marks of esteem that were due to his virtue, but instead of engaging in a long discourse with him, as he might have done at another nother time, he left him with the Princess of the Huns and advanced toward Thrasimond, whom he had descried among a great company of Vandal Officers. To that Prince he made known the high opinion, which he had conceived of his extraordinary merit, and taking notice that he was possessed with a deep melancholy, he omitted nothing which he thought might contribute to his consolation, hoping that he should soon be in a better condition, than upon a march, to render as well to him as to Wallia, those honours which were due to Princes of their illustrious birth and unspotted reputation.

In the mean time Theobald was not without some fears in reference to Vinderic, so that whatever confidence he had in Telanor, to whose care he had committed him, he felt in himself some certain disturbances, which he could by no means quiet. To say the truth, he thought and that upon very good grounds, that in the confusion of such a noble meeting of so many illustrious persons, the Suede might be tempted to make his escape, and that being sufficiently hated and as sufficiently known, he might be killed in the execution of his design: Inasmuch that the enamoured Prince sought for him, as soon as in point of decency and civility he could, with all the earnestness and all the fear of a true and real friend. But he no sooner met the Troop which guarded that same Traitor, but his fears were as soon over, for he perceived that Telanor was very careful of his charge, and that Vinderic was so far from shewing any discontent in his face, that he marched along with that tranquility of mind, which offences generally do not afford the guilty.

When they came near the Camp, Constantine and Viridomar marching out with a fair Train, advanced three or four furlongs to meet Honorius, and received that Prince with all the honours that were due both to the Emperour of the West, and the Son of the great Theodosius. The King of the Britains addressing his speech to him in the behalf of Constance, who presented him to Honorius, Sir, said he, I confess I have not always been a friend of the Romans, but though my Conqueror would not have made my peace, as he did at Arles in the most generous manner in the world, I believe I should have found some other way to have courted the favour of a Prince, who disdaining to march against me himself, only sent his Lieutenant to overcome me. I am beholding in all things, replied Honorius, to that Lieutenant of mine: For without doubt that great Captain, has always been the support of my Empire. But Sir, added he, among all the most important services which he has done, I am apt to believe that the amity of the King of the Britains, is one of the greatest advantages which his courage has procured me.

They were going on in their discourse, when the Prince of Suevia appeared, and was received by Honorius after such a manner, as a famous Warriour, renowned for so many great actions ought to be, besides that he was descended from a house, that had been an ancient confederate of the Romans. However he stayed not long with the Emperour, in his thoughts being all enflamed for the taking away of Polixena, he soon returned leaving Constance and Artabare to entertain Honorius, the King of the Britains being gone to attend a fair Lady, that no longer opposed his happiness. But if Constantine enjoyed that sweetness which ordinarily Lovers taste, when having made their peace they feel their satisfaction renewed, the afflicted Viridomar found himself plunged in sorrows of a different nature: At first he visited the Princesses, whether it were that civility obliged him to it, or that he desired to speak of Polixena to them: However being agitated with a restless disquiet, that permitted him not to rest long in a place nor with the same persons, he quitted them, though he knew not where to meet with more acceptable company. He could not possibly resolve what to do, so highly did those passions transport him that reigned in his heart, till at length perceiving Theobald, he made hast to meet him, imagining that he might perhaps find some consolation from a Prince, who having had the same loss might perhaps have the same thoughts. But no sooner had he accosted the King of the Cimbrians, when spying Vinderic in the Troop which had the Guard of him, he could not Master that resentment which redoubled the violence of his fury: Inasmuch that having drawn his Sword he spurred his horse forward, with an intention to have flown upon the criminal, and attacking him with a most terrible look, "Ah Traitor, cried he, thou shalt dye, nor has the justice of heaven give me this opportunity, but that thou shouldst receive the punishment of thy crime.

At the sight of that action, the enamoured Theobald looked pale and trembled, and and throwing himself between Vinderic and the assailant, "What, said Viridomar, do you take the part of this perfidious Traitor. "Yes, replied the King of the Cimbrians, (with no less trouble than was the fury which transported the other) I defend Vinderic, and I am commanded so to do for Bellamira's sake, and to venture my life for the preservation of this Suede which you attacke,

At those words the prepossessed Viridomar, whose reason was in an uproar, instead of calmly informing himself grew more incensed; neither had Theobald either time or thought to answer with that moderation which he might have preserv'd upon an accident less astonishing.

Thus these two formidable Warriours turn'd their Weapons one against another, and met notwithstanding the great number that fought to oppose their meeting. They had time also to bestow upon each other two desperate blows, and they were going about to lay on more vigorously, when the King of the Franks having espied them, made all the haste he could, and throwing himself between the two Combatants, Valiant Princes, cryed he, what evil Demon, the fatal Enemy of our League, labours to ruine us by your divisions: forbear I beseech ye, to signalize your valour till we come to meet with the oppressours of our Princesses, and let not that valour prove fatal to each other, which only ought to appear to the prejudice of our Enemies.

Those words were so prevalent over persons that revered the Prince who had pronounced them, that Theobald and Viridomar, who had an infinite esteem one for another, not only quenched that heat which enflamed them, but also knit that knot of friendship in a few minutes that tied them together all the rest of their lives. Thereupon the King of the Cimbrians addressing his speech to Pharamond, Sir, said he, when you shall understand that Hunnimonda is threatened at Cologne with the same usage that Vinderic shall find among us, you will not wonder without doubt that I should go about to save the life of a person upon whose life depends the destiny of my Princess: I would have explain'd my self to Viridomar would he but have vouchsafed me time: but in regard he was surpris'd of a sudden at the sight of a Domestick who had betrayed him after the most cruel manner in the world, during the just resentment that transported him, he could not with patience give ear to the Defender of a perfidious miscreant, against whom he could not be more incensed than I was. Viridomar taking notice that Theobald spoke in his behalf: "Ah, Sir, said he, interrupting him, excuse me not I beseech you, my prepossession cannot justify what I have done. Yes, generous Prince, added he in a most obliging manner, I am guilty, though I have sufficiently made it out, that my reason could not be free, since that in attacking you I ran to punish the fault which I committed. But consider that I am also a Lover, that I have lost what I love, and that I met unexpectedly with the person that committed the force, a Ravisser, from whom I had some reason to have expected actions quite contrary to this that has thrown me into this despair. For, pursued he, sighing, and addressing himself to both the Kings, I see my fortune is in a most deplorable condition, I understand all the malignity of it, and I find it more strange than that whereof you have cause to complain. For besides that he is a servant of my Sister that has betrayed me, and put me to take pains to ruine my self, he has robbed me of the Princess of the Franks, only to put her into the power of the King of Suevia, whose violent humour you know full well; so that the divine Polyxena is in the hands of an unjust Lover, who will prove her most pitiless persecutor, and whether she hate him, and whether she may be induced to love him, I must be always miserable, since my Princess must be either always unhappy, or else render my Rival fortunate. Yet could I not be thought to be perfectly miserable, were it in my power to take away his life that robs me of my love: but more than miserable as I am, I cannot behold my Rival but I must see my Father, and I find my soul in such a disorder, what through my Duty to my Parent, what through the interest of my love, that I know not what course to take for the delivery of my Princess, or which way to act that I may not offend a Prince from whom I received my being.

He pronounced those words with so sad an air, that the two Kings being deeply touch'd therewith, gave a cessation to their own grief, to the end they might wholly intend the consolation of Viridomar, all the way they had still to ride before they entred into the Camp.

They were no sooner arrived but they began to consult which way to attack a City wherein their Princesses and their Mistresses were enclosed. Thereupon a Council of War was called, as well in reference to the Siege of Cologne, as in giving battel to those that should come to relieve it. At first they thought of meeting in the Tent of Honorius; but that Prince making his excuses to Pharamond, who gave him notice of the general intentions: Alas, Sir, said he, sighing, to whom do you address your self? My thoughts are so little at liberty, and I am so far from being in a condition to give my own opinion in a matter of so great importance, that I begin to be a weary of the Government of my own Empire. However, Constance, upon whom I can safely rely, shall go if you think fit, and take the place which I should have held, not so much with the Title of Emperour, as being a Friend to the Great Pharamond. Nevertheless the King of the Franks forbore not to press Honorius, but seeing it vain he was contented that the meeting should be at his own Apartment; the Castle where Rosamond, the Queen of the Turingiens, Albisinda, and the Sister of the King of the Lombards had lodged before, being left for the Princesses.

But now the noise of the Army no sooner fill'd the new Camp of the Franks, but that Gundemar and Guntran, who were now in a condition to retire to Cologne, resolv'd to be gone, lest their presence might raise any new suspicions. To which purpose they immediately took their leaves of the most considerable persons of the Army, they were just going out of the King of the Franks Apartment, at the very instant that Sunnon arriv'd, after a long absence, and they took notice that he had a more numerous Train, than was usually accustomed to attend him. But they soon perceived that it was compos'd of several persons of quality of the Turingien Nation, who would not forsake a Prince to whom they were so much oblig'd, for having settled the affairs of that Kingdom. Nor were they wanting publickly to declare, how much they were engag'd to their valiant protector; and one of the most considerable among them, having taken his opportunity to speak to Pharamond, at a time when Sunnon was otherwise employ'd, gave him an exact account as follows, of all that pass'd in the Capital City of that Countrey.

“ You have been inform'd Sir, said he, without doubt, how strangely the King of Suevia and Briomer, were transported against the fair Amalazontha; when she sent back her Army into Turingia, being unwilling they should serve against a Prince, that had so infinitely oblig'd her. Now as the fury of persons of that humour never sleeps, but continually wakes for mischief, you cannot wonder at the effects which it produced to the prejudice of the Turingiens. You must know then Sir, that the King of Suevia had particular conferences with the General of our Army, before it march'd from the confederacy; wherein he laid before him whatever could flatter his ambition. He told him he ought not to neglect the opportunity which he had of raising himself to the Throne, and enjoying a fair and lovely Princess, who would be constrain'd to espouse him for the preservation of her Dominions. We will here, added he, safely keep Amalazontha as a pledge for the promise I have made you, you have the power in your hands, you are going into a Kingdom where there is no King and where you may easily have the Sovereign power, purchasing, as it is easie for you to do, the good will of the Souldiery. Besides, said he, you shall receive continual supplies of men and money from me, I will also give you hostages for the performance of my word, and which is more I do not believe you can find any obstacle to your pretences, how difficult soever they may seem to be at first: For I do not see that the Turingiens have any Captain, who is able to oppose your designs. Nor can I believe them to be so much the enemies of their own honour, as to chuse rather to obey a Stranger than one of their own Nation, to whom the stoutest among them are contented to submit themselves already, and who already understands the Laws and Customs of their Countrey.

“ In a word Sir, the King of Suevia made it out, that there was so little difficulty in the enterprize which he propos'd, that Hildion, for so was the name of our General, shut his eyes against all that reason could lay before him, and abandon'd himself intirely to the conduct of a Prince, who had promised him the possession of so fair a Queen, together with the Sovereign power over the Nation.

“ The Ambitious General therefore having labour'd to make himself Master of the Army under his command, in a short time accomplish'd his design: For they no longer obey'd any orders but his, finding the Scepter of Turingia in the hands of a person, that knew not how to make use of a Sword. However Prince Sunnon would not forsake the Army of a Princess, whose interests were so infinitely dear to him, whether it were that he suspected any thing of Hildion's design, or that he would not stir from an Army that was not formidable enough of it self to defend themselves, if assaulted on their march. However it were, he resolv'd to march along with us even into Turingia it self, whatever persuasions our General could use to him, not to absent himself at too great a distance from the Camp of the Franks. Though it be very true that he made no great opposition to the Prince's intentions, not believing he had any reason to be afraid of a single person, but rather conceiving it to be for his advantage, that he had in his power a Brother of Pharamond.

“ No sooner were we arriv'd at Lephante, which as you know well is the Metropolis of Turingia, but Hildion endeavour'd to gain the people, as he had got the hearts of the Souldiery, and he swelled to that degree of insolence in a short time, that he undertook to dispose of Offices and Commands, without making Amalazontha privy to his Actions. Sunnon could not endure that any one should usurp the rights of that Princess, but having assembled together the remainder of those, that continued faithful in Lephante, he not only opposed Hildion in his designs, but by actions full of wonder upheld Amalazontha's tottering Throne, having with only four thousand men raised in haste, overthrown seven-teen thousand Turingiens, reinforced with three thousand Saxons and as many Suevians. In a word Sir, the Prince shewed himself a person worthy to be the Brother of the great Pharamond upon all occasions, wherein he had an opportunity to signalize his valour, and constraining the Rebels whose leader he had slain to beg their peace, he restored a perfect calm, and established Amalazontha's authority over all Turingia. Nor have our people proved ingrateful, but having given a thousand thanks to heaven for their protector and set up his Statue with an honourable inscription in the Piazza of Lephante, they have deputed me for Cologne with a sufficient Train, to make their humble address to the Queen, and to propose to her in all humility, that as well out of acknowledgment as for the good of her Kingdom, she would not refuse to make choice for her Spouse, of a Prince who preserved her Crown upon her head, and who is able to keep it fixed, as well by his own valour, as by the assistance of the Franks. But my commission Sir reaches farther, for the government not being absolutely Monarchical, as it is not in many other parts of Germany, I have order to speak more home, if Amalazontha refuse to yield to the reasons and supplications of her Subjects. Without doubt, replied the King of the Franks, you do more for Prince Sunnon than he himself requires at your hands: But generous Thanaric, I dare assure you that he has so great an affection for the interests of the Turingiens, that you need not go about to oblige him, by doing him any kind Offices with Amalazontha: Rather I believe it would be a grief to him, to hear that there should be any violence or constraint put upon the intentions of that fair Princess: So that if you will take my counsel, instead of endeavouring to force a consent which should be always left free, let Prince Sunnon only have the liberty to obtain it by his services, which he may have daily opportunities of rendering her, while you afford him the occasions.

Pharamond was thus discoursing with Thanaric, when the Prince of whom they were speaking entered the Chamber, and besought his Brother that he might go to Cologne to visit the Queen of the Turingiens. Provided you might do it with safety, answered the King, I would very willingly spare you for so small a journey, and that you should go to a City where I would be glad to go my self, could I do it without the ruine of our designs. But Brother, consider that the King of Suevia and Briomer keep there so exact a Guard in that place, that it is impossible for any single person to enter into Agrippina, till they have examin'd him from whence he comes, and what business he has there. Sir, replied Sunnon, I know it is of great importance for me not to be stopped at Cologne, because it is only my desire to see the Queen of Turingia, and to return so soon as your affairs call me away, and therefore I have made such provision, that certainly I cannot fail in the success. I know that the two Burgundian Princes which are in the Camp, are now about to return, and therefore in regard that Guntran had never any particular quarrel with any Prince of your family; but on the contrary that he became a Captive to a Princess of your blood, while he was a prisoner of war in your Army, I thought he would not deny me a favour which I durst not demand of Gundemar. To that purpose I requested of Guntran, that he would permit me to ride along as one of his Train, there being no fear that any of them should be observed or examin'd, at the Gate of a City into which they were known to enter friends. Nor did the Prince scruple in the least to grant me my desire, deeming perhaps that it was only love that drew me to Cologne, or else believing that I might do him some greater piece of service. Thus Sir, you see that I am certain to get into the Town, without any likelihood of being discovered, and if I am not deceived, you will easily agree with me, that it will be an easie thing for me to return before you can lay any formal Siege to the City. Besides Sir, Thanaric will never be refused the liberty of going out of the Town, when ever Amalazontha shall think fit to send him back, and to carry along with him as many attendants as he brought, so that it will be easie for him to leave one of his own men behind with the Queen, and to take me in his room along with him. But, answered Pharamond, in regard that most of them that follow Thanaric, may be suspected by the jealous King of Suevia, my apprehensions are that they will be as strictly examin'd when they go away, as when their names were given in at their entry. And therefore good Brother, if you do not think my fears to be groundless, do nothing rashly but stay with Amalazontha, till you have a more convenient opportunity to return, and take heed of being kept in restraint from us, out of too eager a zeal to come to our assistance. Sunnon testified his acknowledgment to his Brother, for his respectful admonitions, and was about to have explained himself more precisely, when Theobald came to visit Pharamond, and for some time interrupted their discourse.

True it is that they fell into it again soon after; for the King of the Franks addressing himself

self to the King of the Cimbrians, Sir, said he, there is a Lover in my Chamber, that is likely to be more happy at Cologne than either Theobald or Pharamond in this Army, so that as it is impossible for him to spend all his time with the Princess which he loves, it will be in his power to speak in the behalf of the King of the Cimbrians, and not to forget the interests of Pharamond.

Having so said, he told him in a few words of Sumon's resolution, and having also inform'd him how Tbanaric was likewise bound for the same place, You see Sir, said he, that I have here a very secure opportunity to write to Rosamond, if you will be but pleased to give me leave. You know Sir, that you may do it obligingly, answered Theobald, and I believe that Pharamond's merit has a greater influence over my Sister, than the near relation of a Brother. I confess, replied the King of the Franks, that I have formerly taken the liberty, but it was when I knew no person that had the privilege to grant me such a favour. I understand, replied Theobald, you would have authority from the Brother of Rosamond, and I am content with a cheerfulness equal to your affection, which is a truth I believe you little question.

Thus the two Kings parted, but with an intention to meet again so soon as they had writ their Letters, which they had an intention to shew each other but did not however: For Theobald refusing to look upon Pharamond's, Sir, said he, you know that love chooses to keep his Courtships private, and you may perhaps incense her by letting a Brother see, what you have only designed to the Sister. However, replied the King of the Franks, methinks it would be a surplussage of satisfaction, if the Princess Rosamond should only see what the King of the Cimbrians had singly approved. “Your virtue, replied Theobald, governs me in that particular “far beyond your biller, so that you may write to my Sister whenever you have an oppor- “tunity, without any regard to my inspection, which would but injure that friendship, “which we have sworn to preserve as long as we live. But Sir, continued he, a Brothers “Letter and a Lovers Letter are two different things, and therefore you may look upon “what I have writ to Rosamond, and never fear to deprive my thoughts of that sweetness “which is wrapped up in a passionate Billet.

Having so said he presented his Letter to the King of the Franks, but the Prince having refused to take it, “Sir, said he, I am sufficiently satisfied what I am to expect from you “at this time, for the great Theobald's generosity is so well known to me, that I question “not the new encomiums you have given of me, without being so curious as to look into “your Letter. Upon those words, the King of the Cimbrians never urging the King of the Franks any farther, gave his Letter to Tbanaric and not to Prince Sumon, not only because he thought it more decent, but also because it seemed to him more probable that a Letter written in Pharamond's behalf, might be less suspected, and produce a better effect if it were delivered by a Stranger, than by the Brother of the King of the Franks, who for his part gave his own Letter to his Brother Sumon: and though he had expressed therein, all that tenderness could inspire into the most passionate Lovers upon such occasions, yet was he dissatisfied in his own Oratory, and prayed Sumon to add by the advantage of conversation, whatever he found omitted in the Letter. “Brother, pursued he, since you have for “Amalazontha's sake felt the whole power of love, and in regard you have a friendship “for Pharamond, it will be a needless thing to recommend my interests to your care. For “I cannot imagine that you will omit any thing to the advantage of a Brother so dear to “you, and who suffers as much as any man can suffer, by the absence of the person whom “he loves.

After these words and some other expressions of affection, which it was impossible for him not to add, he gave Sumon leave to depart, who carried the Turingien Deputy to his Chamber, where he fell into a long discourse with him concerning the Princess, who had no less the possession of his thoughts, than the Sovereignty over his heart in words to this effect. “Generous Tbanaric, said he, you will have the advantage to see our Queen sooner than I, since I must be constrained to attend the motion of two Princes, that perhaps “stay all night in our Camp, and therefore I conjure you to speak to the divine Amalazontha, as little as possibly you can, concerning the services which you say I have done her. “Attribute to the faithfulness of her subjects, what we have hitherto imputed to my fidelity, and never make use of the unfortunate Sumon's name, to raise any new discontent in “the Princess whom he adores. You know that Amalazontha is full of acknowledgment “and justice, and I know moreover that there is not any inclination in that fair Soul, which “is not favourable to Sumon. For assuredly Tbanaric, it would be no small trouble to her, “to see her self obliged to a person that she has no desire, or it may be no will to love, “besides that the believing my presence to be a kind of reproach of her ingratitude, the “sight of me would become the most insupportable thing in the world, and I should prove “the most unhappy Lover in the world.

The Turingien, mov'd with the expressions and looks of Sumon to a compassion mixed with astonishment, and having thought upon a means to give him an answer, without engaging himself to any thing that might offend the generous Prince: Sir, said he, neither you nor I can justly tell what we have to say to the Queen; but as I am not altogether ignorant of her disposition, and for that I intend to observe how she stands affected, before I explain myself, you have no reason to fear that I will ever go about to overthrow that which I so fervently desire may be effectually established. He made some farther protestations also which fully satisfied the respectful Lover. After which the Turingien took his leave, and departed for Cologne, attended by those of his Nation who were ordered to wait on him in his Deputation.

On the other side, Pharamond being inform'd that the famous Keva was coming to the Camp, testified no small gladness at the news, as well for the merit of the Knight, as for that he thought him sent by the King of the Huns, he received him therefore with all the marks of his esteem, and with a most hearty welcome; but before he suffered him to speak a word of his journey, he carried him to Theodolinda's Apartment, that he might not retard the joy which he knew the Princess would receive at the sight of a messenger from her Father. The Princess therefore had no sooner paid all the civilities to Keva which he could possibly expect, but he began to unfold the contents of his Deputation as follows: "It would be a difficult thing, Madam, said he, for me to express either to your self, or to the King of the Cimbrians how much overjoyed the King was, when he understood that you were both in this Army; and that notwithstanding the great journeys which the Princess has undertaken, and the change that has fallen out in the fortune of our first Balamir, you have still the same tender respect for him which you had at Alba Julia: for that reason has he given me order to assure you in his name, that he has still the same paternal affection for you which ever he had, and that he has an extraordinary impatience to let you see the truth of his words, chusing rather to come to this Camp, than to send for you to a City where he is every day a witness of their injustice and violence. Besides, he has an infinite desire to visit the great Pharamond, whose Renown is so far spread, and to be likewise acquainted with the famous Constance, who has so long upheld the Roman Empire, the illustrious Viridomar, and all those other Princes in this Army, who have rendred their names famous by so many renowned Actions. The King of the Sarmatians, and the Prince of the Saxons having the same desire may be induced to come along with him: so that if I am not deceived, you will have a good part of the company at Cologne in your own Camp before the Forces of either party be in a condition to undertake any enterprise. But what do you say concerning the Princess of the Goths? suddenly replied Theobald interrupting him. "That she is highly esteemed in Cologne, replied Keva, that she is admired by all; but that no person dares presume to make love to her, having heard the stories of her immoveable constancy, which made her despise death, and refuse Empires for a Prince's sake that she never expected to see again as long as she lived. The King of the Huns and Prince Balamir, who still adhere close to her interests in whatever concerns her, not only take particular care of them, but are also resolv'd to crown her Queen of the Goths, and to restore her these Provinces which they had won from her Father. Hunnimonda return'd her thanks to the King with a moderation becoming the Grandeur of her Soul; and after she had given him to understand that neither her disposition was inclinable, nor the season proper for the ceremonies which they propounded: she added, that as for the restitution of her Dominions, she would refer her self in reference to that affair to the King of the Cimbrians. "I am in a rapture of joy, replied the King of the Huns, and my Son Theobald shall not only seat you again upon the Throne of your Ancestors, but he shall also have when he pleases under his command the entire disposal of all those conquests for which I am beholding to his valour. His Brother who hears me will not contradict me in what I say: for as I leave him a large Dominion besides, and the friendship of the King of the Cimbrians, I believe he will have little reason to complain. "I should have had some reason to complain however, replied the generous Balamir, if all that your Majesty has spoken had befallen me by the loss of such a Father. But, Sir, I shall be very well contented with my fortune as long as your Majesty rules that Monarchy which you govern with so much fame, provided withal, that the King of the Bobenians has the same kindness for me which you have assured me of.

Theobald was very much satisfied in what Keva had repeated to him: and having obliged him to tell them some more particular news of the Princess of the Goths, the Queen of the Cimbrians, and all the other Ladies in Cologne, he took particular care of the Knight, and and staying a while with Theodolinda, he entertained her in discourses either of the Generosity of the Princes of the Huns, or of the extraordinary qualities which he admired in the Princess Hunnimonda.

In the mean time, Pharamond going to visit the two Princes of the Visigoths and Vandals, who lay together, where he found Constance with Wallia his ancient Friend, understood that Thrasimond was retired to a private Chamber with a Stranger that brought him tidings of Gunderic. The King of the Franks, as Constance had already done, forbade Thrasimond's Attendants to tell their Master, being unwilling to interrupt the Prince in a conversation which was in all probability of such importance to him: so that he entertained himself with the Prince of the Goths, and the Lieutenaut of Honorius. Afterwards he went with the illustrious Roman to Queen Placidia's Apartment, where he met the Emperour, and a great number of other persons of Honour. As for Wallia, he return'd to Thrasimond, and in regard he took part in all things that concern'd him, he was overjoyed to see him less penive than he was wont to be. He was about to have testified his joy, when the Prince of the Vandals taking the words out of his mouth, and presenting the Stranger to Wallia, Generous Friend, said he; this is Cydillion, of whom I have so often made mention. He comes from Betica, and brings me news that the King of the Vandals is very like to be happy. You could not have told me more pleasing tidings, answered Wallia, after he had most obligingly received Cydillion, and there nothing remains but that I may see a change in your fortune. Ab, Prince, said Thrasimond interrupting him, how unlikely is that change to be! for in short, should Theodosius die, and his divine Widow consent to give me her hand, could I think to render my self happy to her prejudice; Would it be just that the Empress of the East should espouse Thrasimond without a Crown or Kingdom? No, no, Wallia, the divine Eudoxia would never condescend to so mean a fall from the most exalted degree, wherein all the world admires her: so that all I can hope for is to die with some consolation for the good fortune of the King of the Vandals. In a word, if you would be so kind as to employ your interest with the great Constance in his behalf, I make no question but he will peaceably enjoy all Betica, to which he may pretend as well by the conquest he has made of it, as in right of a Princess which he is now about to espouse. To say the truth, replied Wallia, I do not well apprehend upon what ground you build this pretension; for if the King your Brother espouse the Heiress of Betica, I cannot see what happiness that will be to him, considering the violent passion which he had for his unknown Philinira: so that I would willingly be a little better informed of his Adventures, wherein I hold my self very much concerned, and wherein it behoves me to be the better instructed, that I may be the better able to speak to Constance and the Emperour. Though there be no great necessity for that, replied Thrasimond, yet you may well believe that I would not deny you the rehearsal which you request, and that your friendship is a Law as binding as any consideration which you can alledge: and therefore, if we be not interrupted, you shall hear in an hours time all that I have more to repeat of the story of the King of the Vandals, and what I have since heard from Cydillion's mouth.

Having so said, after Wallia had forbid that any person should be admitted till farther order, he began his recital as follows.

The Continuation of the Story of Gunderic.

You know, Sir, that the King of the Vandals was at last moved by our Entreaties, and having made a generous contest with the profound grief which had almost overwhelm'd him, he resolv'd upon the conquest of some pleasant Country wherein to settle himself. He also looked with an eye of his former tenderness upon his people that followed him in so many perillous adventures, and that for so long time had undergone the tedious toils of painful war with him. Thereupon he gave orders for our departure, which we speedily put in execution. So that in a few days being in a readiness to quit the Isle of Crete, we sailed away for the Coast of Betic Spain, where we earnestly desired to found a Monarchy of our own name, and to put an end to all those labours which Nations are forced to undergo, that have no subsistence but what they win by their Swords. Our Army was in a good condition, and very numerous, besides a reinforcement of Volunteers which Cydillion brought him, who had also hired into Gunderic's service one of the most skillful Chyrurgeons that was to be had, not only in Greece, but all over Europe, and his name was so famous for the wonderful cures he had done, that when he was brought to Gunderic, Theodosius would have drawn him to Constantinople, with large proffers answerable to the merit of his art and skill. Thus we embarked in our Vessels full of men, and furnished with all necessary provisions: and the report being spread abroad in what place we were like to land, Atalorque made no question but that we would first set footing in Betica, of which he had made himself almost the sole Master, by many Victories which he had obtained against the Romans. We were about ten leagues a this side the mouth of the River, when we descried a Fleet consisting of several Sail making toward us; and when we came within ken of them, we discovered that they carried at the Top Mast head the Standard of Honorius. At the sight of those Eagles, so dreaded in all places, new desire of Honour, so natural to our Nation, began to kindle in our Breasts. However, I must confess, that we should not have refused a Treaty, had the great Constance at that time been concern'd in the affairs of the Empire. But in regard we did not so much as know what was become of him who was the only illustrious Soldier, for whose sake Gunderic would have withheld his Arm, we resolv'd without scruple to mind nothing more than to extend our Conquests as far as possibly we could.

You have heard how the King of the Vandals signalized himself in that first Battel, and therefore not to dwell upon particulars, it shall suffice that I mention only those things which were most worthy observation. Atalorque and Maximinus made towards us with eighteen Gallies and forty Vessels, and they both fought us with extraordinary courage and conduct, though to say truth, it was with something of inequality; and as true it is that the exploits of the Spaniards far excelled the performances of the Romans, and that Atalorque did not only appear every where, where his presence was required, but I must confess that whereever he shewed himself, he acted the part not only of a Captain, but a private Soldier, according to the difference of occasions. But all his stoutness, whatever he could do, could not long prevail, nor dispute the victory with the King of the Vandals: that Prince flew among his Vessels like a whirlwind which nothing could oppose; and shewing himself upon a stately prow, he brought death or terrour with him whereever he came, the art of his Pilot seconding the vehemency of his fury whenever he had a mind to come to grapple. The Soldiers, encouraged by the example of such a Captain, grappled, boarded, and overthrew whatever came in their way: so that we were Victors in that Sea-fight, with all the advantages that we could desire.

But, Sir, cryed Wallia, interrupting him, do you think I will be satisfied with knowing how Gunderic behaved himself, unless you also inform me what Thrasimond did?

I must confess, since you will have it so, replied Thrasimond, that the Vandals were very well satisfied with my courage that day; for as you have been told already, after that fatal amour wherein the wrath of Heaven engaged me, I fought all ways carelessly to lose; so that our Soldiers might have beheld my actions with astonishment, had not the actions of the King drawn off their admiration. In short, we took four Gallies and twelve Ships, and pursued the rest to New Carthage, which you know is the best port which the Spaniards have in the Mediterranean. Gunderic not willing to lose time, but land his men during the rout and fear among his Enemies, made back again toward the mouth of the River Betis: but before he landed, he sent for such prisoners as could give him the best information both of the Shoar, and of the Country. Immediately they brought before him a Nephew of Maximinus called Sextilius, whom the King having received very civilly, made a sign for all others to depart the Cabin, unless it were my self: and then addressing his speech to the Roman, I know, said he, that you are none of these persons that are to be threatened: and I know also that you will find me troublesome in demanding questions which you will be unwilling to answer, and indeed such as you cannot well answer without prejudice to your Country. But may I not enquire how Maximinus and Atalorque came to joyn together, since their pretensions are different? Sir, answered Sextilius, it may be they are not so different as you imagine them; for I cannot tell but that you have caused them to take up an interest which they will hold together as long as they live: for upon the news that you had an intention to make your self Lord of Betica, there happened that which usually falls out upon such occasions, that is to say, that Maximinus and Atalorque came to an accommodation without any more to do, and agreed to joyn together against an Adversary whom they called the common enemy. Now as they often visited each other during the Treaty, Maximinus beheld in Atalorque's Palace a young Princess with whom he straight fell in love, and that most desperately, she being a Lady that would have easily inspired the same passion into any person less capable to receive it.

I then prayed Sextilius to describe that lovely Spaniard, for to say truth, I could have been content that Gunderic would have fallen in love with her, to have taken off his inclinations toward the unknown Philinira, as also that in right of the Heiress of Betica, for I made made no question but that she was the person, he might the more securely settle himself, and with less loss of the Vandals.

Sextilius then returning his discourse, "This incomparable Lady, said he, had hardly attained to seventeen years of age, yet as young as she is her stature is very tall, straight and free, with an air of grandeur that enlivens both her gait and her behaviour. Her complexion is extremely clear and lively, her hair most beautifully white, her mouth little with a vermilion Lip, her eyes blew, equidistant, and sparkling, are for ought I know the fairest eyes in the world.

"Ah Sir, (cryed I, addressing myself to the King of the Vandals) how do I wish that you had seen this Princess, when Atalorque had proposed you the match, for as Sextilius describes her she resembles Philinira so exactly, that I make no question but you would have loved her at first sight. Thereby would you ere this have enjoyed so fair a Lady, and been King of all Betique Spain quietly and without any noise. "How Brother, said he smartly interrupting me, do you believe this Princess is to be as beautiful as that incomparable Lady which I saw in Crete? Sir, answered I, what I heard of Philinira then and what Sextilius tells us, do most justly agree together, and I am apt to think your Majesty would confirm me in my opinion, if I durst presume to beg Philinira's picture. "That which you desire is not so easie to be had, replied the prejudicated Prince, and had you seen that charming Lady, you would agree with me that she carries in her face, something of splendor and divinity, which is rather to be conceived than expressed: And therefore brother, let us forbear to make comparisons between people that we know not, and give Sextilius leave to go on.

"Sir, I cannot tell whether that Philinira which you seem to prefer before the Princess of Hispaly, were able to challenge her for beauty before dis-interested Judges: But I know that all the world agrees that Spain never produced so perfect a creature. 'Tis needless to give you a list of all her Charms, she enthralled Maximinus at first sight, who coveted as a supreme happiness, the enjoyment of such a Lady so really deserving for a thousand incomparable qualities.

Atalorque was little or nothing offended at his passion, for Maximinius was a handsome person, and descended from one of the most noble Families in Rome, and in regard there was no other likelihood but that he might enjoy a peaceable dominion in Spain, could they but once oblige you to fix your pretensions another way, there seemed to be no obstacle to hinder an alliance between the Romans and the Spaniards, by the marriage of our General to the Heiress of Betica. "But who is that Atalorque, said the King interrupting him, whom you mention so often? and what right has he to dispose of a Princess, not being her Father? "Sir, answered Sextilius, that Spaniard is of a very noble extraction, descending from the Race of King Mandonius, who found the great Scipio so much work, being in league with Indibilis, in defending those Countries in Spain which were not yet under the power of the Romans. However it has been observed for a long time, that Atalorque's predecessors, never exacted more honour than was their due, but on the contrary that they lived with a moderation, which was most proper to gain the good will of the Spaniards, and to remove all suspicions which the Romans might have, of persons that assumed too high Titles. True it is that there has been a strange alteration of affairs, since the death of the great Theodosius: For under the Empire of his successors, the greatest part of those noble persons, who either in right of inheritance or by plain force could make any advantage upon the alteration of government, made their parties to shake off the Roman yolk, and to settle themselves in better fortunes; insomuch that at that time so liable to revolutions, Atalorque united friendship and interest with a Prince, who drew his Original from the ancient Kings of Betica, and who was indeed the true and lawful Heir. He went farther, and to tie the bonds more strongly between him and Cordubare, for that was the name of his confederate, he gave him to wife his only Sister named Thargire, a Princess of a charming beauty. This alliance was at first most fortunate in the consequences, but in regard that several armed Nations, afterwards spread themselves over the territories of both Empires, Atalorque and Cordubar resolutely determining to make all the advantage they could of that opportunity, took the field with all the friends and all the forces they could raise, with an intention to drive the Romans quite out of Spain, and to make themselves Masters of all those Countries, where their predecessors had formerly reigned. At first they succeeded very prosperously, and several people rebelling in favour of them, cut the throats of the Garrisons that remained in their Cities, and tearing down the Eagles that had been dreaded for so many ages, set up the Ensign of the confederate Princes, and shewed themselves on their side with all the zeal, that such well pretended novelties could infuse into the head of a rebellious multitude. "Some-

“Sometime afterwards Cordubare transported by his great courage, fell into an ambuscade which they had laid for him, where after he had most valiantly behaved himself, he received a wound of which he dyed the next day. He spent the remaining hours of his life, in taking care for the Princeſs his wife and the young Atanalifa, the laſt remainder of a long ſtock of Kings, whom he moſt earnestly recommended to Atalorque's care, who not only brought up Atanalifa with all the tenderness of a Father, but he also refused to marry, that he might employ his time and pains more sedulously upon the young Princeſs, whom he always looked upon as his own daughter. It may be said also that he sacrificed his ambition, and in some measure a part of his honour to the safety of Atanalifa, in regard that contrary to his natural inclinations, he laid aside his great design to husband his own life, the loss whereof would have left the two Princes without any support, and exposed to the fury of their enemies. Certain it is that though he made a peace with the Romans, however he did not omit privately to preserve his friends, and waiting till the party which had been shaken by the death of Cordubare, had recovered their former courage, to take arms upon the first opportunity that might favour an enterprise of that importance. The calm which Spain did at that time enjoy was very smooth, and continued so till such time as the report was spread, that Gunderic intended to invade Spain. Then the Romans and Spaniards who had continued in friendship with them, vigorously prepared to repulse your Army, when Atalorque overjoyed at the news which so terrified all the world, made no question but the hour to establish and provide for Atanalifa was come. For he knew himself able to give the victory to the Vandals, by reinforcing them with the potent faction which he had in Betica, whereby it was not only in his power under the protection of Gondemar, to authorize the pretensions of Atanalifa, but also in right of the fair Princeſs, to legitimate all the conquests of the King of the Vandals. Having thus conceived these great and well grounded hopes in his mind, he thought of nothing else but of marrying Atanalifa to Gunderic, and you may remember that he proposed you a match, which I have heard say you did not think so needful, as Atalorque thought it was, considering the success of your Arms.

“Atalorque being enraged at this refusal, contrived in his mind a short time after, to do that by the means of Maximinus, which he had proffered to you, provided the Spaniards and Romans could drive your power out of the Country. For it had been no great difficulty to have established Maximinus in the Sovereign Authority, in regard that Honorius minding nothing but his Suit to Bellamira, took no care of the affairs of the Empire, while on the other side the great Constance, having renounced the cares of this world, lay sick in the City of the Tectosages expecting death, which he thought too slow in putting an end to his miseries.

“How, said Gunderic interrupting him, is the famous Constance yet alive? “Yes, Sir, he lives, replied Sextilius, if to spin out the remainder of his unfortunate days may be called living. But is there no cure for the distemper of so great a personage, answered the King of the Vandals with that vehemency, which testified how much he was concerned for his preservation. “I do not believe, replied the Roman, that there is any cure to be found, since the wound which a poisoned dart has made mortal, is not the most dangerous of his evils, it being certain that the loss of Placidia, solemnly promised him by Honorius, threw him into that despair which makes him wish for death, as the only felicity that can befall him in so miserable a condition.

Upon these words Gunderic fell into a deep study, but remembering that Sextilius had been interrupted, he made him a sign to go on. “Thereupon, said he, Atalorque finding that neither Honorius nor Constance could prove any obstruction to Maximinus's pretences, insinuated into the Roman those hopes, the success whereof he judged would prove most advantageous to Atanalifa, and therefore you need not wonder Sir, to see them united against a Prince, who would overthrow the foundations which they have laid of so splendid a fortune.

“That is to say, replied Gunderic, with more disturbance than was thought he would have shewed, that Maximinus would enjoy Atanalifa and Betica both together. You conjecture right Sir, that he would have been overjoyed at a such a double felicity, and I make no question but he will use all his endeavours to defend Hispaly, and give the other parts of Spain time to succour Betica. “Well, said Gunderic interrupting him, you have your liberty to go and tell Maximinus, that it is high time for him to be in a readiness, for that I am marching directly to the Capital City of that Country, where he expects to reign himself, and you shall suddenly see who will carry it, the King of the Vandals, or a subject of Honorius, that revolts against his Prince to usurp a Crown.

Having thus dismissed Sextilius after he had given him his liberty, he retired to write to the great Constance, and sent Timander to him, though he understood the inconvenient absence of such an assistant. You have heard how that most skillful Chirurgeon cur'd Honorius of a distemper, which all the world thought incurable. Gunderic had no sooner dispatch'd him away, but he gave order for one part of the Army to land, while the other remained aboard, so to block up Hissaly both by Sea and Land, and to hinder any relief from coming to the Town. He gave me the command of his forces by Sea, making Cydillion my Lieutenant-General, and giving Gidiscles the same employment by land, he put himself at the head of those forces, with which he had designed to attack the City. Here setting other circumstances aside it will suffice to tell you, that Thargire and Atanalisa were retired into Hissaly, and that Atalorque and Maximin finding themselves straitned, by the King of the Vandals, laboured to save those two Princesses, mortally afraid lest they should fall into the hands of Gunderic.

Thereupon it was designed that Maximin should make a sally upon the Kings quarter, and that while the chiefest number, and the valiantest of the besiegers were bulie in fight, Atalorque should sally out on the other side, and let forth a Chariot which he was to convoy with a Squadron of select men. In the mean time in regard the uncertainty of the success held Maximinus in a cruel suspense, Atalorque taking notice of his melancholy, demanded the cause, when the Roman fetching a sigh, Ab Sir, said he, how unfortunate should I be should the enemy recover the Princesses, and Gunderic behold Atanalisa's beauty. I never heard said Atalorque, that there is any reason to be afraid of Gunderic, in reference to what you apprehend. I grant it, replied the General of the Romans, that the reputation of that Prince stands fair enough to persuade me, that he will by no means abuse the power that his victories give him. But Sir in a word, Gunderic would see Atanalisa, and if Atanalisa has those charms, which are sufficient in a moment to captivate the most haughty liberties, Gunderic is young, handsome and valiant: Besides he is a King he will be a Conquerour, and that fortune which bears her favours upon those persons, which she begins once to smile upon, may honour Gunderic with more than one sort of triumph. Sir, answered the Spanish Prince, I could tell you some particulars in reference to this business, that would encourage you to have a better heart, but not having time now, I shall only solemnly engage my word, that you shall never see Atanalisa in the hands of Gunderic.

Upon those words Maximin who knew Atalorque's humour, felt his disturbances calm'd; and giving thanks to the Kinsman of the Princess, manifested a fiery impatience to put the design in execution, which they had framed together. At first the enterprize in both places had very good success, for at the same time that Gunderic was engaged with Maximinus, Atalorque attended by a stout and chosen Squadron, marched toward Gidiscles purposing to break through the Vandals, and to open a passage for the two Princesses. Gunderic's Lieutenant no sooner perceived them, but he furiously advanced till the Vandals having made a stout resistance for some time, were forced to give ground to Atalorque, who conducted the Chariot out of our Line, and brought up the Rear of his Spaniards to make good their retreat.

The fiery Gunderic who had driven Maximinus back to the very walls of the City, being advertised of the advantage which the Enemy had got, immediately flew where his presence was most requir'd, and no sooner had he rallied his men again, but they charged the Spaniards with a redoubled valour: whether it were that their Kings example elevated their courage, or that they were touched to the quick for shame, that they could not vanquish under the conduct of a Prince, who was so accustomed to victory. On the other side Atalorque made a stand, like a Soldier who was not so easie to be stirred, so that in the Bickering which was not a little terrible, the two Captains fought for each other, signaling themselves by exploits that were altogether extraordinary, bringing death or fear along with them, wherever they broke through to come at each other. At length they met, and knowing one another by the mark which easily distinguished them from the rest of the medley, they disdain'd all other opposition that kept them asunder from a single Combat, wherein they engaged with an impetuosity little different. But Sir, how vigorous soever Atalorque shewed himself, how great soever his courage was, he was forced at length to submit to Gunderic's more puissant strength, and it may be said that he made no other resistance but what became him, while two Princesses sat looking on, the witnesses of his noble actions. In short, during the Combat between the King and him, the Vandals having driven the Spaniards to the very Chariot, which I told you was gone before, brought back Thargire and Atanalisa, who arriv'd time enough to see that Atalorque disputed the victory with Gunderic. At first they rejoiced to find their Kinsman alive, who was so dear to them, but presently the fear wherein Gunderic's valour put them, balanced that satisfaction, seeing the unfortunate Atalorque staggering upon a sudden, and presently after fallen all along under his Horses feet. When they beheld a sight that so sensibly touched them, they shrieked out so loud, that the King seeing them, alighted, and coming toward Atalorque, whom they beheld with tears in their eyes, their affliction struck him with a strange kind of disquiet, which ill became him after a victory, and during the tumult of a fight.

Thereupon he commanded Atalorque to be disarm'd, and to be attended with relief, if he were in a condition to receive it, and very courteously advanced toward the Princesses, that he might in some measure assuage their grief: but he was no sooner come near enough so as to discern their countenances, but he was struck with a flash of Lightning, and by a surprize that stopped his pace, where he stuck like one dismayed, and quite forlorn: for you must know, Sir, that he had no sooner cast his eyes upon the youngest of the two Princesses, but he knew her to be the charming Philinira, which he had always preserv'd in his memory. Yes, Sir, he found that the fair unknown Lady that reign'd in his heart was the Heir of Betica, who had been offered him, and whom he had already refused. Nevertheless, how strange soever the astonishment were, into which such an unexpected adventure had cast him, he could not chuse but feel those pleasing motions of joy which awaken at the sight of the beloved object. But when he began to make reflections upon the Combat between him and Atalorque, he so violently disturbed himself, that he seem'd to be mad at the victory which he had obtain'd: Fatal Victory! cryed he, and not being able to say more, with so many various passions was his mind turmoiled, he approached the afflicted Atanalisa, guided rather by the motion of his heart, than out of any resolution that he had taken. Then beholding Atanalisa with eyes full of love and grief, Divine Princess, cryed he with a respectful utterance, and kneeling with one knee, could fate ordain no otherwise but that I should meet the most incomparable Philinira, only to be the occasion of that sadness of which I see the marks in her eyes?

Atanalisa, busily employed in assisting Atalorque, gave little heed to his words: but as Gunderic was about to have proceeded in his submission, the turn'd toward him, and looking upon him with eyes which drowned in tears as they were, yet darted forth a thousand Beams of fire through those clouds of sorrow, she return'd him an answer with more disdain than seem'd to become her present grief: What, Sir, said she, will you persecute me over all the world? Can I find no Sanctuary out of your reach, neither beyond the Seas, nor in my own Dominions?

She would have said more out of the indignation that emboldened her, had not the assistance which she owed her Kinsman obliged her to help Thargyre, who bestowed all her cares and fears upon a Brother that was infinitely dear to her.

In the mean while, Gunderic remain'd like one that had been Thunder struck, at those expressions so terrible to a heart enamoured as his: and when the Spanish Prince was disarm'd, he beheld the wound with so much fear as plainly evidenced his sorrow, and testified to the assistants that he waited the success of the cure, as the decision of his destiny: so that not being able to moderate his impatience, he issued out several orders at the same time, and caused them to be put in execution with a celerity not to be conceiv'd; he commanded Atalorque to be carried to his own Tent, which he quitted for his sake, he sent for the most able Surgeons in the Army and City: he wished for the famous Timander; he promised great rewards to those that could be helpful to Atanalisa's Kinsman: and lastly, he charged them aloud, that they should take more care of him, than they would have taken of his own person, had he himself been in the same condition. This way of proceeding of his, accompanied with so many other marks of Generosity and tenderness, at length so far prevailed upon the heart of the just Philinira, that she began to moderate her resentment against the Conquerour of Atalorque: but neither Gunderic's extraordinary diligence, nor his grief, nor his tears themselves could overcome that disdain which that haughty Lady thought her self obliged to preserve in her Breast toward a proud King that had scorn'd to receive a Scepter at her hands. In vain he sought to entertain that fair, but severe Princess, with so much cunning she still avoided his company: so that the unfortunate Lover, transported with the violence of his passion, was one day forced to take hold of her Garment, as she was nimbly whisking by him into Atalorque's Chamber, according to her common custom when she met the King of the Vandals: Ah, Madam, cryed he, I beseech you stop but one moment: and if you find me guilty when you have heard me, I will sacrifice a life which deserves to be hated by all the world, if it be detested by a Princess whom I adore.

Atanalisa, instead of giving ear to the enamoured King, endeavoured to get away from him, him, but finding that all her striving was in vain, What is it you have to say to me, said she; do you give me notice to prepare my self to be your suppliant at the feet of that Throne which you are now erecting in Hispaly? Al, Madam, replied he, fetching a sigh, can you be so unjust that are so charming? and will you not open your eyes to behold the over-ruling power of fate in all things that have befallen us? By the decree of Heaven you are descended from an extraction that entitles you to a great part of Spain. But, Madam, your endowments are infinitely beyond all those advantages which you have gain'd by your Birth, and to these divine Qualities the Gods have subjected the heart of Gunderic: it was by the lustre of your eyes, rather than by all the splendour of your progeny that I was dazzled. In a word, Madam, 'tis not the ambition of Gunderic, but the merit of Atanalisa that makes me renounce my liberty to lead my self in your glorious Fetters. And tell me most beloved Princess, added he more vehemently than before, have you not observed, that before I saw you, I was nothing mov'd with all those Conquests and Crowns which Prince Atalorque promised me; but at the very moment that I beheld those eyes of yours, unknown, in Country Weeds, and in a desert place, you triumphed over my heart: and that then I testified more subjection to your Glances, than upon all those honourable proposals which were made me?

He had continued his discourse without doubt, though he found that it made but little impression, if Thargyre had not interrupted him, coming of a sudden out of Atalorque's Chamber. That Princess treated Gunderic very civilly: and in regard she passionately longed for peace, she made him some overtures that day, and the morrow after she sent to Maximinus to let him know, that there was not any thing wherein he could so sensibly oblige her, as in putting an end to the miseries and calamities that wasted a Country so dear to her. But the Roman having intelligence of what passed in the Camp, understood that the King of the Vandals was his Rival, and therefore hating him now worse than he did before, he set himself with all his might and main to the defence of a City, which, if taken, would be the ruine of all his hopes: so that how submissive soever Gunderic might be to Thargyre, and whatever protestations of obedience Maximinus had made her, there was no likelihood of any accommodation, since neither would renounce their pretences to Atanalisa. Thereupon, as soon as the truce which they had made at Thargyre's mediation was expired, acts of Hostility began again on both sides with greater fury than before: and Gunderic prepared to carry Hispaly with all the speed that might be, not enduring his Enemy should command a place where he resolv'd to crown his Princess. But before he went about to batter a City which he had a desire to preserve undefaced, that he might restore it to Atanalisa in its flourishing condition, he went to the fair Princess to know of her what her thoughts were upon the resolution which he had taken. No sooner had he cast his eyes upon that miraculous Beauty that had so suddenly charm'd him in the Isle of Crete, but transported with an odd kind of mixture of love, delight and grief, he was about to have complain'd of all his sufferings ever since the fatal moment that he first saw Philinira: but discerning I know not what kind of dreadful Majesty in her countenance, he sigh'd instead of speaking, and durst not open his lips, but only in these few words, You know, Madam, said he, that Maximinus refuses to leave the Capital City of your Dominions; nevertheless, if it be your pleasure that I should drive him thence, and will but give Gunderic a Commission to that purpose, it may be in a few days he will let you see he is not every way unfortunate, but that victory is more kind to him than the Princess he adores. But, Madam, if I must be constrain'd to fight against a City where your Subjects are intermingled with Rebels and Usurpers of the Crown, 'tis only that I may restore you to the Throne of your Ancestors, only that the Vandals may recover for you a Scepter, which the Romans had long since taken from your Predecessors. No, no, Sir, answered she, take you no thought for that, but follow your own ambitious inclinations that moved you to invade Betica at the head of such an Army, and leave me to my quiet, which you cannot disturb but with your injustice, having little reason to bring a war into a Country so far remote from the place of your Nativity.

She had no sooner concluded those words, but new discontents appeared in her face, and it was easily perceived, that she would have quitted the King of the Vandals, would civil decency have permitted her. Gunderic took notice of it to his sorrow; however, instead of complaining, he only made this answer with all the marks of submission. Since you have mentioned, said he, the design which I might have upon Spain, I will not make use of the reasons of Conquerours, in regard it is not as a Conquerour that I would speak in your presence; I will not confess to you that I ever believed the Vandals could take from the Romans, what the Romans had taken from the Spaniards. But, Madam, I will make you this protestation, that I have no other pretensions at this time than to make good the claim which you lay by right of Birth and Inheritance. Sir, said she, I thought I had already sufficiently explain'd my self upon the offers you have already made me, nevertheless to reinforce that resentment which you thought began to grow weak, not having apprehended the whole scope of my words, I do tell you once again, that I renounce the hopes of all your promises, and that I would rather refuse the Empire of the world, than be obliged to a Prince from whom I am resolved never to accept a kindness. Wherein do I oblige you Madam, replied he sighing, who am wholly devoted to your service, and resolved to sacrifice my life to your satisfaction and interests? Yes Madam, I will sacrifice this life which is yours though you cannot abide it, or if I preserve it still contrary to the intention I have to displease you, 'tis only that I may free you from the ambition of a Rival unworthy of you, a Rival who is not only but a bare Citizen of Rome, but also being a Rebel to his Prince, gives you sufficient cause to believe, that he will never acknowledge those favours wherewith you have honoured him.

The unfortunate Lover made use of many other most respectful expressions, and pronounced them with so much love and grief, that Philinira appeared at length less disdainful and more moderate. However being in a high degree tender of her honour, she believed that generosity obliged her to be inflexible toward a Prince, by whom she thought she had been slighted even to contempt.

Atalorque also having the same thoughts as Atanalisa, was in a terrible perplexity, for he found himself constrained to behold with sorrow, the good Offices which the King of the Vandals did him. He was unwilling to be ungrateful, and yet he could not forget the denial which had armed him against Gunderic, nor did he think it became him ever to forget it. So that this uncertainty what to do insupportably turmoiling him, he ponder'd and considered how he might calm the troubles of his Soul, and act in such a manner as neither to prove ingrateful to Gunderic, nor be forced to ingratiate Atanalisa, with a Prince against whom he had provoked her.

Having weighed several resolutions in his mind, wherewith he did not find himself entirely satisfied, he determined at length upon that which he thought most proper to second his designs, though before he put it in execution he deemed it convenient, to attend the success of the siege of Hispaly. In the mean time he desired Atanalisa by the help of Atigia, one of her Attendants wherein the most of all confided, not to carry her self so strangely toward the King of the Vandals as she had done, and to endeavour to vanquish that aversion which she had for him. Philinira who was well acquainted with Atalorque's constancy, was strangely surpris'd at the orders which he had given Atigia, however she acted conformable to the Spanish Princes will, having as much reverence for him as she could have had for a real Father. Gunderic presently perceived by conversing with her, the alteration which Atalorque's new intentions had produced: However whatever joy he felt in a heart so passionate as his, he was not only not the more remiss in carrying on the siege, but maintained it rather more vigorously than before, being encouraged by the fair hopes that began to flatter him.

He sent me orders to land the greatest part of the forces which I commanded, and in regard the enemy was not strong enough to oblige me to keep the Sea, the King gave me leave together with Cydillion to come ashore, being desirous to signalize our selves at such a time of danger, wherein of necessity honour was to be won. We landed then at the head of our best Soldiers and most of our Volunteers, and in a few days after we had joyned with Gunderic, the enamoured Prince not enduring to stay till we had fully refreshed our selves, caused the Rams to be brought, and battered the Walls with so much vigour and so little intermission, that we had soon made breaches wide enough to enter.

Gunderic thereupon not content to encourage his men, by those noble exploits which they saw him perform every day before their eyes, exhorted them to follow him to the taking of a City, wherein he promised them they should find that repose, which they had so long fought for. On the other side Maximinus represented to the Romans and Spaniards, what a shame it would be, to be driven out of their habitations, and to leave their estates, their wives and children, a prey to a hodge-podge of Barbarians. These two Rivals afterwards made good by their valour the remonstrances they had given out: They spied each other at the breach, they challenged each other and met, and the proofs of their valour prolonging the fight, proved fatal to some thousands of men. But at length Gunderic forced virtue to declare for us, notwithstanding the resistance made by two warlike Nations in a fortress. And Maximinus finding himself wounded, and not in a condition to rally his men, was so afraid of falling into Gunderic's hands, that without regard to his honour, he saved himself in the tumult, at the very time when we entred Hispaly.

The King of the Vandals perceiving his fury to assuage, as the resistance and number of his enemies abated, cryed out to the Citizens not to fear any thing, that he had only made the conquest for Atanalisfa's sake, and that he gave them quarter in the name of that Princess, though he might take another course by the laws of war.

Upon those words the Spaniards and Romans retreating, chose rather to stand to the clemency of the victor, than to attempt his repulse in vain. Thereupon they not only opened to the right and left, to let him pass through them, but also turned the points of their Swords downward, whereby they seemed to beg that good quarter which he had promis'd. Gunderic kept his word exactly, he forbid killing and plundering, he caused the Garrison to be safe conveyed to a fortress, that still held out for Honorius, and reduced the City into so good order and in so short a time, that before Night all things were as quiet as before the Siege. He had also that respect for his Princess, that he would not leave in Hispany the least footstep of his victory, nor of the war which he had almost put to an end: So that he caused the Vandals to retire to their Camp, while he had prepared all things for her reception, according to his first resolution.

After that he went to visit the fair Lady, but with an air that testified more of love and submission, than of that haughtiness that usually sits upon the Conquerours brow. Divine Princess, said he, accosting her in a very respectful manner, I am come to return you thanks, for the victory which I owe to the justice of your claim, and to offer you the Scepter which your Ancestors have wielded heretofore in Betica. Hispany Madam is yours, the Romans are departed, and I make no question but the rest of your dominions, which have always depended upon it, will follow the example of the Capital City. "Sir, answered Atanalisfa, you know that I never pretended that you should fight for me, when you fought against Maximinus, so that you cannot be surpris'd, if I refuse to reap the fruit of your labours, and to accept of a Crown which you have purchased with the blood of your subjects, and by exposing your own person to a thousand dangers.

Though the King of the Vandals looked for this denial, he could not however but be afflicted, nor could he relish the sweetness of those words, wherein Atanalisfa had left something of an obliging fence. For indeed the Princess had insinuated by her expressions, that she was not altogether displeas'd that Gunderic had so well escap'd, being inform'd without doubt of the dangers, wherewith the life of that Prince had been threatned. However he was not quite satisfis'd, but looking upon the charming Philinira with a passionate Air, "Fair but cruel Princess, said he, explain your commands I beseech you more precisely, and if you refuse the Scepter which I offer you, only because you will not receive it from the hand of Gunderic, if you refuse to ascend the Throne for fear lest Gunderic should be your companion, fear not that a Prince your adorer, has any design to make you an envenom'd present. You may rest assur'd most beloved Princess, and I solemnly protest that when I am satisfis'd, that Maximinus shall be forbid to pride himself in those glorious hopes which he has conceiv'd, I will free you from the presence of a person so odious, whose unfortunate neglect you so tacitly upbraid. For this unfortunate person that cannot move your heart, nor live being hated by the divine Atanalisfa, shall expire at your feet so soon as he has seen you crown'd in Hispany, and finds that the rest of his miserable life will be of no use to his Princess.

He continued this his courtship in so submissive and respectful a manner, he spoke with so many marks of love and grief, that it was ealie to perceive that Philinira was not altogether insensible. That disdain which she had formerly shew'd the King of the Vandals, appear'd no longer in her eyes, and by the moderation which succeeded, it was thought that Gunderic was not forbid to hope a more favourable alteration. Certain it is however, that the scrupulous Princess was only careful at first, not to shew her self ungrateful to the King of the Vandals, and for fear of giving him any opportunity of discovering the least Symptome of that affection, which perhaps she might already be sensible of, she only testified a bare acknowledgment, without accompanying her words with any obliging air, she went also somewhat farther, and to avoid her being entangled in any conversation with Gunderic, she entreated him to address himself to Prince Atalorque, when he had any thing to say of business that concern'd her. But how reserved soever Atanalisfa was, Gunderic perceiv'd some glimpses of consolation in the midst of those disturbances, with which his love infest'd his thoughts, finding his Princess alter from that aversion which she had shewn him, to a behaviour wherein there was nothing froward or churlish.

The pleasure of these thoughts was soon after attended by another, for in the evening of the same day, Timander returned back from the City of the Tectosages, after he had cured the famous Constance of that infirmity, which till then was thought incurable. First he returned the acknowledgments of the Roman from whom he came, and then continuing his discourse "I have order, added he, from the great Constance, to assure you that he will not only never “ oppose your settlement in Betica, but that he takes so great a part in your concerns, that “ he will not fail either to speak or write in your behalf to the Emperour: nor have you “ any reason to doubt of the success of his mediation; for besides the great power which “ he has over Honorius, that Prince is so passionately in love with the incomparable Bella-

 “ mira, that he takes very little care of the affairs of the Empire, insomuch that there is no “ fear of his coming to disturb you where you are entred with so formidable and victori“ ous an Army.

Those words greatly rejoiced Gunderic, and as a generous Friend he was overjoyed that he contributed so much to the cure of the great Constance, and that he saw such fair hopes that his Princess might reign peaceably in Betica, considering the powerful protection which was promised her.

The tidings that Timander brought, and the alteration of Atanalisa's humour in favour of the King of the Vandals, made such a noise, that the report was soon spread abroad over all the City; in so much that some of the best of the inhabitants that still adhered to Maximin, failed not to give him intelligence of all things that fell out to the advantage of the King of the Vandals. The General of the Romans received the news with an unexpressible grief: And in regard he passionately loved the Princess of Hispania, with whom he was just upon conclusion of a Marriage, and could not without dying, renounce those fair hopes which he had conceived, he made it his business by all manner of ways, to oppose the happiness of his Rival. And therefore, calling to him the chiefest of his Confidants, he conferred in private with them what course was best to be taken: and after they had thought upon, and rejected several designs, he determined at length to examine whether he could without any blemish to his honour, take that course of which he had made choice in the transportment of several violent passions. True it is, that before he put his design in execution, he was desirous to write to Atalorque; putting into his Letter all the expressions which he thought proper to make an impression in the mind of a Prince whose consent was necessary for the establishment of Gonderic's good fortune.

All this while Atanalisa's Uncle was extraordinarily disquieted: And I believe it would not have much troubled him had his Distemper lasted longer; that he might have made use of it as a kind of Sanctuary, wherein he thought they would not be so troublesome as to urge him to explain himself, how he intended to dispose of the Princess. But at length, when his cure began to be more forward than his desire, he found, to his sorrow, that he could no longer delay to give an answer to Gonderic's Proposals. So that he began to revolve in his mind all that he had observed in the Carriage of that Prince, his former Affronts, and present Obligations. Then he found himself in a strange necessity, either to give Atanalisa to a haughty Soldier, who seem'd to have despised her, or to deny her to a King, young, handsome and renowned; and who, ever since he knew the Princess, had served her with an entire submission. In this uncertainty wherein he wavered, they say that Acknowledgment would have prevailed above his Resentment, if at the same time that his heart was agitated with two such contrary motions, a Roman Officer had not found him out, and delivered him the following Letter, which Maximinus, as I said before, had writ to him.

Maximinus to Prince Atalorque.

IS it possible, Sir, that my intelligence should be true, that you are about to consent to the felicity of my Rival, against the Engagements which you have so solemnly made me? You know you promised me, that I should never see Atanalisa in the possession of Gonderic; and yet I am told, you are about to deliver up that fair Princess a Prey to the Barbarian; and to bestow her upon a Stranger, remarkable for nothing, but for having wasted your Country with Fire and Sword. What, shall Success be preferred before Merit and Vertue? and shall a Vandal be advanced before me, because Fortune has pampered him up with Victory? An, no, no, Sir, you must not act such a piece of Injustice: For I hope you are so far from changing your mind, out of an inconstancy unworthy the Greatness of your Courage, that you will wholly apply your self to the execution of a design that we have resolved upon. The Officer that brings you this Note is my faithful Confident, and will inform you what course we intend to take, and will assure you above all things, that I had rather die a thousand times, than forsake your Interests.

Atalorque

Atalorque had no sooner read this Letter, but with an augmented disturbance, instead of returning an Answer, he held his peace for some time; whether it were to study what he had to say, or that he would not speak till he found his mind better settled. At length, when he thought that more Moderation appeared in his Countenance, turning toward the Roman: “You may tell Maximinus, said he, that I remember the promise that I made him; but you may tell him withal, that he has no reason to claim it, nor that I should dispose of the Princess Atanalisa in favour of him, or forget the Obligations which I have received from the King of the Vandals. On the contrary, I declare that I will do for that Prince all that lies in my power, to make him amends; and provided I do not prefer him before Maximinus, I have no reason to fear any ill grounded Reproaches that he can lay upon me. But, Sir, replied the Roman, if you are willing that I should discover, how by acting with the Roman General you may surprize the Vandals, and the ——— Heavens forbid, cryed Atalorque, interrupting him, that I should retaliate with Treachery all the good Offices which I received from a Prince who was no way bound to have performed them. And you would do better, added he imperiously, to find out a master willing to listen to such enormities, than to give me advice that no way pleases a person of my disposition.

Having thus dismissed Maximinus's Agent, he reflected upon the present conjuncture, and came to this result with himself, that in failing to make good the promise which he had made, and which he was desirous to stand to, he should throw himself into a strange labyrinth, if Gunderic should come to demand of him Atanalisa for his wife: wherefore he resolv'd to delay no longer the execution of that resolution which he had fix'd upon before Hispaly was taken, to which end he sent for Cydillion to come to him, believing that his mediation would be very useful to bring his design about. The Greek Officer fail'd not to wait immediately upon Atalorque: and he was no sooner come to the Bed side, but addressing his speech to him, Generous Cydillion, said he, 'tis a long time since your Father became my Friend, and gave me sufficient testimonies of his fidelity, which made me trust him, as you know, with the destiny of two Princesses which are infinitely dear to me. And if at your first coming into these parts, I did not discover to you the secret which I now make known to you, that the unknown Philinira is the Princess Atanalisa, it was only because you took part with the Vandals. But the face of things being changed, it behoves me now to act after a quite contrary manner, and that I not only open to you the bottom of my heart, but also beg your counsel and assistance. Sir, answered Cydillion, I dare not presume to believe that it is in my power to do you any service; but in regard I am perswaded that you expect no other services but what I am capable of performing, you need not question but that I shall obey your commands with all the zeal the Son of Aristoclitus, and one so well acquainted with Atalorque's virtue can pay to your high desert. After so obliging a protestation, replied he, I must tell you, that being oblig'd to Gunderic for so many favours, and being also desirous to settle a Princess whom I have look'd upon as my Daughter for many years, I have resolv'd to bestow Atanalisa with all her Claim and Title to this part of Spain, upon Thrasimond, knowing how to open a way for Gunderic to the Crown of Lusitania. Ah, Sir, I beseech you alter your intention, and do not believe, that by any such resolution you will gratifie those illustrious persons. For either I am very much deceiv'd, if Gunderic does not prefer the enjoyment of his adored Philinira before all the Grandeurs that can flatter his ambition; and I cannot tell whether Atanalisa would be glad to—— Atanalisa, answered he, will be always obedient to Thargyre's and my will, and so may I be able to discharge my obligations to the King of the Vandals without thwarting Atanalisa's inclinations. But, Sir, added Cydillion, what should hinder you from being grateful to Gunderic with his own good liking, since it is for Atanalisa's advantage? No doubt, replied Atalorque, blushing, but that you have heard, that the King of the Vandals refus'd a proposal which he would now gladly accept: but besides my resentment of such an injurious denial, I have a private reason which hinders me from uniting Atanalisa's fortune and Gunderic's together. And therefore, Cydillion, assist me I beseech you, and take such order in these affairs of mine as much as in you lies, that they may succeed according to the intentions of a person who has a love for you, and whom you find in a strange labyrinth. I shall omit nothing, replied Cydillion, but to tell you the truth, Sir, I fear I shall not prosper in what I undertake, being a design which will never be approved by those who are chiefly concern'd.

Thus Atalorque and Cydillion parted; the latter leaving the Spanish Prince's Chamber, with a great desire to serve him, but with little hopes of serving him effectually, considering the love which all the world knew Gunderic bore to Philinira. However, he had a mind to discover how Atanalisa stood affected to the business; next how my self would relish such a proposal, to the end he might the better satisfy Atalorque. He knew that I had relinquish'd my liberty at the Court of Theodosius, and that I passionately adored the divine Athenais. However, he came to me, and desiring to speak with me in private, he threw me into a great surprize, and sensibly displeas'd me when he had made known to me Atalorque's design. I was amaz'd that the Spanish Prince should prefer me before the King of the Vandals, and I was sorry to see him deal so unjustly by Gunderic. On the other side, I was vexed to see my self reduced to that necessity, that I should be forced to confess, that I could not love Philinira, and so expose her to the indignity of a second refusal. To avoid all which inconveniencies, I thought it my best way to abate my self for some time: so that after I had return'd Cydillion many thanks, and desired him not to speak a word of what he had discovered to me, I prepared to leave Spain; and to lay the grounds of a plausible pretence, I went to the King, and without ever discovering Atalorque's intentions, You see, Sir, said I, that the Romans are utterly defeated and ruined in Betica, and not only that they have not strength enough in any other part of Spain to make any attempts upon your new Conquests, but also that neither Honorius nor Constance are either in a condition, or dispos'd to relieve them, or to seek to regain their Territories in these parts: so that in my opinion you may do well to send away some part of your Army, to ease a Country where you intend that Atanalisa should reign, and to gain the hearts of a people which your victories have subjected under your Dominion. With that part of the Army which you think fit to send away, if you hold it convenient, I will march to the City of the Tectosages, and offer them to the conduct of the great Constance, whose fortune I will follow, whether he intend to lead them against Nations that overdeluge the Empire, or whether, which is the most received opinion, he intend to chuse his party in the great Wars upon the Banks of the Rhine, rather to end his miseries, than to augment the honour which he has purchased by so many renowned exploits.

When I had thus deliver'd my mind, I waited for Gunderic's answer; but the King, instead of speaking to me, look'd upon me with such an eye, as told me he would first consider of my request. After a long silence, "Brother, said he, fetching a sigh, I do not believe you make any question but that the concerns of my Princess are the highest concerns to me in the earth; that I would not only give her Betica, but all the Kingdoms of the world in a flourishing condition. Nevertheless, I would willingly desire you to change your resolution: for I must confess I never found that reluctance to endure your absence as at this time. "I know, Sir, wherefore you would now detain me, replied I, counterfeiting a smile to cheat his melancholy, because you are here with that person who is more terrible to you than all the world besides. But, Sir, Philinira will be better pleas'd to see you send away fifteen or twenty thousand men that only subsist upon the spoil of her Subjects, than with the unprofitable stay of a Brother that can do you no remarkable service. "You will have your reasons more prevalent than mine, replied the King of the Vandals: Well then, Prince, said he, take your course; but to tell you the truth, I am very loath to consent.

In regard he utter'd those words with a sad air, I feign'd a forc'd mirth to divertise him, all the rest of that day. But the morrow after, I made it my business to muster those men that were to march, and to provide all things necessary for my journey. Atalorque was extremely surpris'd at my departure; and suspecting that I understood his intention, he conjectur'd presently that the reasons of my leaving Spain, was, because I saw my self constrain'd either to accept or refuse the offers which he had made. Thereupon he griev'd exceedingly, and keeping himself private all that day, he walk'd about the Chamber in a melancholy posture, as long as the faintness of his body would permit him: What, said he to himself, does Thrasimond, whose disposition always appear'd mild and courteous, does he alter his disposition so suddenly in contempt of my alliance? And must I be still the person born unfortunately to bring affronts upon a Princess worthy of a more noble usage?

Then he made all the malicious reflections imaginable upon what had come to pass, and he resolv'd more than once to be revenged upon Gunderic, by the means of Atanalisa's disdain, because that his pride had been the original of all his discontent. But no sooner had he fram'd that unjust design, but he repented of it, and found himself in a strange perplexity. For it became him to be grateful to a Prince who had laid such obligations upon him: on the other side, besides the resentment which he had renew'd in his heart against Gunderic, he could not flatter the passion of that Prince with any hope, after the promise which he had made to the Roman General. In this contrariety of thoughts he had neither strength nor humour to dissemble before the King of the Vandals: so that accounting it some ease to him to avoid his presence, he resolv'd to retire to a little house which he had by the side of the River Betis for change of air. But in truth, to stay there till he had more precisely contriv'd which way to behave himself toward Gunderic. Thargyre and Atanalisa

Atanalisa would not stay behind a Prince that was so dear to both; and you may well believe that the King of the Vandals would have been overjoyed to have been of the company; but that he was afraid to interrupt that liberty, for the sake of which in all likelihood Atalorque retired into the Country, so that he was forced to part with Philinira, not daring to follow her; but with so much grief, that I am not able to express it. Immediately every thing became insupportable to him, even his very Army that went to be his sole delight, seemed to be an importunate multitude that environed him, as he thought only to keep him from thinking upon his Princess. So that sometimes he shut himself up whole days together, that he might more absolutely give himself over to his unquiet thoughts; and to contemplate without any obstacle upon the satisfaction, which he had lost by the departure of Atanalisa. However that was but cold comfort to the enamoured Gunderic, the passionate Lover could not live without seeing the charming Philinira, and having spent some days in a melancholy unexpressible, he was at length constrained to send to Ibargire, to know whether he might give her a visit, without any disturbance to her retirement.

The Mother of Atanalisa who had never been very obstinate against the King of the Vandals, received his complement with all the civility which she thought due to his rank and virtue, and Gunderic no sooner understood that Ibargire had given her consent, but he made hast to be gone, notwithstanding the trouble and pain of his wounds. Thereupon he speedily gave such orders as concern'd the Army and Garrison, and though Timander that attended him perswaded him to make use of a Litter, yet he would needs ride a horseback; that he might be the sooner at the desired end of his journey. Upon the way he met with ten or twelve horsemen, who having spied them quitted the great Rode, and flew into the forest with that speed that it might be easily conjectured, that they neither desired to be pursued or known. By their Arms they seemed to be Romans, but the Kings thoughts being wholly taken up with the charms of that fair Lady which he was going to visit, he minded them no farther, but when he discovered the Towers of Medelina, then did he feel the agitations of redoubled joy, and redoubled melancholy both at once in his heart.

No sooner was he arrived, but he enquired after the health of the Princesses, and being conducted where they were, he was received with all the honours due to his grandeur, but not with those marks of a confiding friendship, which he would fain have observed in their countenances. Atalorque himself seemed more cold and more reserved, nor was it a difficult thing to take notice, that he laboured as far as civility would permit him, to avoid being alone with the King of the Vandals, to whom he was resolved to make no promises, having passed his word to Maximinus. Thus Gunderic found that Atalorque did nothing favour his intentions, and because he knew him to be constant in his resolution, and that Philinira bare him an absolute reverence, he apprehended that his sufferings would be tedious, in regard he could expect no change but with the alteration of a humour, that was not easily stirred. This so afflicted him that the marks of his grief appeared in his face, yet before he abandoned himself to his discontents, he had a mind to understand Philinira's inclinations, and whether that Princess would be more just than Atalorque.

He sought therefore all ways to express himself to Philinira, but the understanding his drift and Atalorque's mind, would not afford him any opportunity to entertain her in private, well considering in what a Labyrinth she should be, to be constrained to give or quite bereave the Prince of those hopes, which seemed to be so legally his due. But the impatient Gunderic not able to live in uncertainty, took his time at length, and understanding that Atanalisa was alone in her Chamber, with no other person but Aligia, he entred notwithstanding the apprehensions which his love infused into him, and after he had made his obeysance with a profound respect, I cannot tell Madam, said he, whether a miserable person whose company you seem to avoid, may approach your presence without intruding upon your liberty, Sir, answered she, I have not yet forgot that you are the Conquerour of Atalorque, and that Atanalisa is King Gunderic's prisoner: This is my answer instead of giving you that leave which you seem to desire. Ah Madam, replied he sighing, that you should be so severe to impute the faults of fortune to me, to upbraid me with the discontents you have received, and to perswade me that you are a prisoner to a person that adores you, and one whom you have laden with your fetters. But over cruel Philinira, tell me I beseech you by what carriage of mine, I have incens'd you against the unfortunate Gunderic, and if it be true that I am guilty, I will be so far from craving a pardon of which I am unworthy, that I will pour forth my blood even to the last drop, as an expiation for my crime.

He pronounced these words with so sad an air, that Atanalisa could not chuse but be mollified, however deeming that it was impossible for the pretensions of the Prince, to have any favourable success, she would not afford him the least glimpse of hope, only contented her self to tell him, that she was so far from having any reason to complain of his actions, that she was highly bound to extol his generosity. But to say truth she spoke in that manner, rather at the instigation of her innate equity, than out of the true meaning of her heart, giving him to understand that she would never dispose of her affections, without the consent of Atalorque.

Gunderic fretting at that injustice of which he durst not complain, retired, not being master of his grief, and no sooner had he quitted the Chamber with an air that testified his affliction, but Atigia was deeply touched therewith, and resolved to take the unfortunate Prince's part. She was about to have opened her lips in favour of him, when she perceived the melancholy that clouded fair Philinira's eyes, and discern'd that the Princess was so far from having that indifferency for Gunderic, which that Prince had seemingly so much reason to accuse her of: So that instead of taxing her incomparable Mistress, she took compassion of her, and set her self rather to calm her discontents, than to speak of the King of the Vandals.

In the mean while Atanalisa unwilling to be disturb'd in those contemplations to which she had abandoned her thoughts, took a walk in the cool of the evening, the Sun being upon setting in a little Grove, which served her always for a retiring place when she avoided company, or had a mind to open her mind to her faithful Atigia. She was no sooner in a place as solitary as she could well desire, but she sat down upon the grass at the foot of a great Tree, and Atigia kneeling down by her, made it her business to divertise her with pleasing discourse. Presently she took one of her fair hands, kissed it, and pressing it between her own, My most fair Princess, said she, beholding her with eyes full of affection, will you not tell me the cause of your sorrow, at a time when all things succeed so prosperously, and when fortune seems to be weary of being your enemy? I cannot tell, answered she, upon what grounds you build that reconciliation, but I know I have been too unfortunate from my infancy, to expect any such propitious change. How Madam, can you complain when you disarm the Conquerour himself, when you save your Country and are restored to your Throne? But if it be not convenient for me to accept his Offer and his friendly Offices, do you think they are not as displeasing to me, as you believe them acceptable? I confess, replied she, I cannot apprehend wherefore you should be so much troubled to be beholding to the King of the Vandals: For if he carried himself to Atalorque like a young Soldier who had only ambition in his heart, have not you had since the pleasure to humble his pride? and when he knew the value of the felicity which was offered him, has he not coveted it with all the eagerness imaginable? "I confess it," answered she, but then you "must likewise acknowledge that I am never a whit the more happy, seeing that difference of carriage overwhelms me with an insupportable discontent. For would it not be more for my repose, that I should either absolutely hate or absolutely love Gunderic, than to live in this suspense what to determine." "But my dear Princess," added Atigia in a most soothing and engaging manner, will you not tell me what thoughts you would rather be obliged to have, were it in your power to chose, or that it had been in your power to have controuled Gunderic, when he first made war upon Etica.

That question put Atanalisa to a stand, and occasioned a pleasing blush to ascend into her cheeks, "Ah Madam speak I beseech you, and think it not strange that I am unwilling to let you seek for an evasion, when there is a necessity to be sincere. Then Philinira recovered her self, and beholding Atigia with more confidence than before, "It may be," said she, "I may explain my thoughts with less reluctance than you thought for: But Atigia, added she smiling, do not you put a bad interpretation upon my words, when I tell you that methinks it is more natural to desire that we may receive kindness, and that it might be in our power to shew our acknowledgment, than that we should be constrained to continue our resentment for injuries done us.

The Princess said no more, but in regard she blushed upon the conclusion of those words, Atigia began to be assured of what she only suspected before. However she desired to be better satisfied, that she might be able more successfully to serve a Mistress, to whom she believed her scrupulous humour was very prejudicial: So that having let her rest a while, "I would not willingly Madam," said she, "that the boldness which I take presuming upon your goodness, should prove impenitent or troublesome, and yet there is a little curiosity remaining behind, wherein with your leave I would fain be satisfied. I believe pleasantly," replied Philinira, "that you would have me tell you more than I know my self, and indeed you have been the occasion already, that I have made reflections upon some things which I never yet examined. I should be overjoyed Madam if that were true, for indeed Madam we are sometimes unfortunate, because we believe our selves so, and many times it happens that we are really miserable, at a time when we may make an exchange of our “ misfortunes for a considerable happinels. While you speak but in general, replied the Princess, I must tell you you may be deceived, when you come to that particular application to which I see you tending: But it grows late, added she, and therefore 'tis better to retire home, than to enter farther upon this discourse.

Concluding these words she rose up, but as she was going to take the path that led to the house, of a sudden ten or twelve armed men presented themselves before her, and presently after she knew the chief of them to be Maximinus. At an adventure so unexpected Aligiz gave a loud shriek, and Philinira seemed extraordinarily surpris'd, but being a Virgin of great courage she presently recovered her self, and beheld Maximinus with less fear than indignation, I see Madam, said he, that you never understood of my coming to Medelin, to spoil the design that was contriving against me. But know Madam, I would have crossed the Seas and gone to the worlds end, to have been revenged of your injustice and Atalorque's breach of promise, by snatching you out of the hands of a Vandal, whom you would prefer before me. “ How Maximinus, answered she, come you then hither only to commit crimes, and do you think you can carry off your booty with success and scot-free? No, no, Maximinus,—— “ Madam, (said he interrupting her, as not willing to lose time) I will hear what you have to say, when you are within my jurisdiction.

He had no sooner concluded these words, but he seized Philinira, and was just carrying her away, when the courageous Lady bestirring her self in his Arms, Ab Coward, cryed she is it by treachery that you think to gain the affections of Atanalisa? More she could not say finding her self environ'd by some of Maximinus's complices, who having no respect for her, were the more rudely diligent to serve their Master: So that the fair Princess having made all the resistance that modesty would permit her, had like to have become a prey to Maximinus, if five or six of her attendants, who waited according to custom at the side of the wood, had not speeded to her assistance, drawn thither by Aligiz's shrieks. But when they came they found themselves too weak, to accomplish their generous design to rescue the Princess, only they put a stop to the Ravishers till better fortune happened. They did what they could, but were cut in pieces, by an enemy more numerous and better arm'd: And by and by appeared a Troop of Romans at the very Castle Gate, to beat all that should issue forth to relieve the distressed Atanalisa: So that the fortune of that fair Princess was in Maximinus's hands, when two women that had not entred into the Thicket, came and advertis'd Atalorque what had happened.

The Spanish Prince hearing the news, made no question but that Maximinus was the Ravisher, doing that justice to the King of the Vandals as not to suspect him in the least, though Gunderic loved with as little hope as his Rival. Atalorque transported with fury against an ingratelul person, for whom he had had so great an esteem, ran to his Sword not having time to arm himself, he put himself at the head of such of his servants, which he could hastily rally together to pursue after the Princess. But no sooner was he out of the Castle gates, but he found an obstacle not so ealie to be overcome, and yet so far was he from ceasing to prosecute his intention, though he saw but little hopes, that he flew upon the Romans that stood in his way with an astonishing vigour. But while he fought with more likelihood of death than victory, considering the inequality of the number, the enemies set fire to the Castle Gate, at what time some of Atalorque's servants told Gunderic, that they were murdering his Master.

Then did the King of the Vandals remember the severity of the Spaniard, yet understanding he was in danger, his love and generosity prevailing over his resentment, he flew to expose his life for the preservation of a person without pity, who had so many times set a dagger to his breast. He came just in the very nick to save his life, for just as he was come up with the Combatants, he saw a Roman ready to have run him through behind with his javelin, while he was fighting with two of his enemies before him. The enamoured Gunderic foamed to see the danger that threaten'd Atanalisa's uncle, and throwing himself between the Spanish Prince and his enemy, received the Blow which would have proved more dangerous where it was directed, but little dream'd of by Atalorque. The Spanish Prince observed the noble action of the King of the Vandals, which not only infused into him a full sense of acknowledgment, but also renewed his valour by the confidence which he had in the assistance of a Soldier famous for so many victories: Insomuch that the Combat was so boysterous and bloody; that Maximinus found himself constrained, to leave Atanalisa in the custody of five or six of his men, and hasten to the relief of his own party. Immediately he made himself known to encourage his Romans, when Gunderic having heard him nam'd, singled him out, and transported with love and jealousy, flew upon him with a most dismal impetuosity. Maximin, cryed he, turn, turn against Gunderic those weapons, with which thou seekest to lay violent hands upon our Princess. Yes, answered he very surlily, I will turn them against thee; for I desire not to enjoy Atanalisa, but by Gonderic's defeat.

Thereupon they began a most terrible combat, wherein the King to rescue Philinira, prodigal of his own blood, fought nothing but the life of Maximinus. Immediately he let drive a most furious back blow at Maximinus, and perceiving himself environed by the Romans, and wounded in several places, he pressed however upon his enemy with such an undaunted fury, that maugre their number and his resistance, he thrust his Sword up to the Hilt in his Body. Upon the fall of the Captain of the Enterprize, the rest were soon dispersed. But that which was most doleful after so prosperous a success, was, that both Gunderic and Atalorque fainting away, fell both of a sudden to the ground, without any appearance of life. Thargyre, Atanalisa, Astigia, Timander, and many Officers run with all speed to their assistance; and seeing both the Princes in so deplorable a condition, by their shrieks and by their tears they manifested the height of their affection.

But understanding presently that both those Illustrious Soldiers were yet alive, they all diligently set themselves to work for their recovery, according to Timander's directions. That skilful Chirurgeon omitted nothing for the preservation of those two great men. He stanch'd their blood, bound up their Wounds, whereinto he had first poured his healing Balsoms; and caused them to be carried to the Castle, as charily and as gently as possible could be. They had no sooner opened their eyes, but the King of the Vandals enquired whether Atanalisa were at liberty: And as soon as they had made him answer that she was, and were about to give him an account in few words of what had happened; Tell me rather, said he, what is become of Atalorque? He is very much wounded, as well as you, answered Timander: But, Sir,—— How, cryed he, impatiently interrupting him, is Atalorque wounded, and you not with him? Ah Timander; That you should know no better how to cure Gunderic. But Sir, replied he, must I not also take care of your Majesty? Not at all, replied the passionate Lover; you are to bestow all your time upon Atalorque: For I had rather that Gunderic should perish, than that my Princess should be in the least danger of losing so Illustrious a Kins-man. In short, the enamoured Prince would not let Timander stay, but sent him away immediately to Atalorque. By which Action of his he made such an impression in the hearts of all the Assistants, that immediately they ran to inform the Princesses therewith; which they could not do, but with tears and admiration. Thargyre and Atanalisa, sensibly touched with this last act of Generosity, went to visit the King of the Vandals; wherein they so behaved themselves, that they made it clearly manifest, that Atanalisa was no longer his Enemy, but that her Repentment had given place to a more equal Gratitude. On the other side, Atalorque charmed with Gunderic's Noble Qualities, caused himself to be carried into his Chamber, notwithstanding all the Chirurgeons Directions to the contrary. And no sooner had they placed him so near the Prince as to be understood, but with all the marks of a real joy; Sir, said he, it is a long time since your virtue won our hearts; but we could not till now, confess our selves vanquished, or acknowledge your Victory. Having concluded those words, he grew faint, and made Thargyre a sign to go on; which she did: declaring that there had been an Engagement between Atalorque and Maximinus; and that in regard his Conquest had removed that Obstacle out of the way, there was nothing now could put a stop to his Pretensions. The passionate King of the Vandals listened to Atanalisa's Mother with such a Transportation of joy, that I am not able to express: And for an addition to his Felicity, having consulted the fair Princesses eyes, he soon discovered that she gave her consent according to Thargyre's words. He beheld in those bright Mirrors the willing kindness she had for him, he observed therein an obliging sadness: nay, they seemed to make excuses for that mixture of Acknowledgment and Repentment they had so odly shewed at other times.

After this they left the two wounded persons to their repose, and sent Maximinus's body to Sextilius, who no way approved his Kinsman's design.

Thus, Sir, you have an account of the Change that has happened in the King, my Brother's Fortune: And now Cydhillion brings me word, that both his, as well as Atalorque's wounds are almost cured; and there is nothing more wanting to compleat his happiness, but that the Emperor, by the Mediation of Constance, would grant him the quiet Possession of all his Conquests, and that Atanalisa, according to her Claim, may be restored to the Throne of her Ancestors.

Pharamond had no sooner ended his Relation, but Wallia testified the satisfaction he had received thereby; and went that Evening to Honorius, to sollicite for Gunderic's Interest; which he did with all the zeal of a real Friend, and with all the success that Gunderic could have wished or desired.

The end of the First Book of the Twelfth and last Part.

BOOK II.

HE next morning the two Burgundian Princes were no sooner in a condition to leave the Camp, but they departed for Cologne: And Sunnon, having thrust himself amongst Guntran's Domestick Servants, took the same Road, highly impatient to see the Queen of the Turingiens. But when they arrived at the City where Amalazontha, Cleomira and Blesinda were enclosed, the Lovers of these three Princesses felt a strange commotion in their minds. The Enamoured Sunnon, more passionate, but more unfortunate than the rest, was seized with certain discontents which would not have been concealed in his face, but that he marched all the way with his Beaver down, because he would not be discovered. The Captain of the Guard at the Gate, was extremely glad to see Gondemar and Guntran; and sending to advertise Gondioch of their Return, he received them with all the Civility imaginable. Now, in regard it happened, that day that neither Citizens nor Suevians were upon the Guard, which was only of Herules and Gepides, there was nothing but a salutation pass'd between them and the Prince's Attendants; so that Sunnon had the less trouble to conceal himself: and when he was entred Agrippina, he return'd Guntran thanks in a few words, and went to Thanaric's Lodging. The first thing he did so soon as he saw the Turingien, was to enquire after Amalazontha: "Well, Thanaric, said he with an extraordinary impatience, have you seen my divine Princess, have you had any words concerning me? And when you discoursed to her of that unfortunate Lover, did you not gather from her discourse, did you not observe in her celestial eyes that cold indifferency that causes the misfortune of my life?" "Sir, answered he, I could not make any true conjectures upon the Queen's thoughts; for besides that a profound sadness that reigns in her countenance, conceals the marks of other passions, I staid so short a while with her, and she for her part had so little time to answer me, and to declare her mind to me, that I dare not venture to assert any thing in relation to the Queen's intentions." "However, replied the enamoured Prince, interrupting him, let your conjectures be never so uncertain, you may tell me what you think; for whatever comes from Amalazontha is of too great value to me, to let me rest till you have told me your thoughts.

Upon those words, taking notice that Thanaric was at a loss, his curiosity redoubled, inasmuch that not having that reservedness in a conversation which concern'd his love as he might have had at other times, he put the Turingien so hard to it, that he was forced to make this answer: "Since you constrain me to speak, Sir, said he, I must confess that I mentioned to her the preserver of Turingia, and related all the high services he had done her with all the applause that I thought it was requisite for me to give him, when I spoke to a Princess who is still obliged to him for the Crown she now wears." "Oh, Thanaric, replied the Prince interrupting him, wherefore were you not more faithful to me?" "Because I could not, replied Thanaric, unless I should have been a Traitor to my Queen, and ungrateful to my Benefactor." "And Amalazombha, replied he, was not she vexed

“and troubled to be beholding for services done to a Prince whom she cannot love? The Princess was moved with some kind of acknowledgment, answered Thamaric, but instead of explaining her self any farther, she sigh'd and cast her eyes downward. “I foresaw, cry'd she “Prince, that you would plunge her into that perplexity. You see that Amalazontha's “shame does but too unhappily correspond with those thoughts which I always told you “she had for the unfortunate Sunnon: and I was hated too severely before by the Queen “that I adore, for any person to take so much pains to render my person more odious: I “know your intention was good, but I knew better that it would not produce the effects “which you expected.

He had no sooner spoke those words, but he paused a while, and then resolv'd at length to go and see Amalazontha, whether he followed the insligations of his love, or thought to pacifie those discontents which his great obligations had been the cause of. The Queen of the Turingiens had languish'd under a double excess of melancholy, ever since Balamir had been acknowledged for Theobald: for that unfortunate Princess not finding any reason why she should look upon Pharamond as Rosamond's enemy, could not altogether forgo the hopes which she had conceived, without falling into a relapse of grief which she could not conceal. However, her sorrows were accompanied with a certain languishment that rendred her charms more powerful; so that the enamour'd Sunnon's heart being but the more subdued thereby, felt at that interview something which he had not experienced through the whole course of his passion, how violent soever it were. Amalazontha received him with all the civility that her sadness would permit her, and after the first ceremonies of complement she thus continued: “Prince, said she, I have understood by Thamaric the new obligations which you have laid upon me, and my resolution is not to be “long ungrateful, if the Crown which you have preserv'd will enable me. “How, Ma- “dam, cry'd the passionate Sunnon, do you think you can be any ways obliged to a person, “who being wholly devoted to your service, does nothing but what you are to challenge “from his Duty? No, no, Madam, you are not in the least beholding to me, and if I “should be so inconsiderate as to expect any reward from the Sovereign Mistress of my “heart, my pretensions would favour of more boldness than perhaps you are aware of. “For in short, Madam, I fear me they would aspire to those inestimable affections which are “infinitely above the Scepter which you offer me. “Having done such great things for my “sake, replied Amalazontha, I may lawfully declare to you that I am sorry it is not in my “power to give you that recompense which you desire. But, Prince, that I may not deceive “you, it behoves me to make a sincere profession of my present condition: know then, “that so long as I live, I shall always preserve that esteem for your person which your “high qualities deserve, and all the acknowledgment which I owe for the signal good of- “fices you have done me. But if you expect from Amalazontha any thoughts more ten- “der, you expect them in vain from an unfortunate person that cannot dispose her self to “gratifie your requests.

Concluding those words, she sigh'd, and Sunnon beholding her with eyes full of love and sorrow, Ab, Madam, cry'd he, that I should be so unfortunate, if the obstacle that opposes my happiness be invincible. But, divine Princess, proceeds this misfortune from any difficulty which I can mend, or from any natural antipathy which you are not able to vanquish. “It “proceeds rather from my injustice, replied the Queen of the Turingiens: but alas, Prince, “I find little likelyhood that I shall prove more just to you: but I am not however so blind “but that I see well enough that you are worthy of a better fortune, which I wish you “with all my heart: I am sorry for your sake, and perhaps I have more reason to be sorry “than you. This is all that I can say, and therefore I beseech you cease your suit, and “retire to your Brother the King's Camp, instead of staying in a City where you cannot “come to be discovered but with extreme hazard to your person. That misfortune which “will not suffer me to have that affection for you which you have right to claim, does not “hinder me from interesting my self in what concerns your conservation, and I have con- “vincing reasons not to be altogether ungrateful. But, Madam, sadly replied Sunnon, “wherefore should you take care of a life which you have reduced to such a fatal necessity? I “beseech you, Madam, said he bending upon one knee, which Amalazontha could not hinder him from doing, either render that life altogether happy, since it is in your power, or permit me to surrender it up to such a despair, as may soon put an end to that and to the sufferings which attend it; for I am now a miserable creature that have no more to do in this world: for as the violence of an ill requited passion consumes me, and hurries me to my Tomb, I had rather die at Cologne than in Pharamond's Army: I had rather be in the City where you reside, than in the midst of all my Kindred and Relations. Nor will I Madam, renounce these hopes wherewith I take delight to flatter myself every moment, till you shall be mov'd to take pity upon those deplorable miseries that threaten the end of my unhappy days.

Upon those words he sigh'd, instead of continuing any farther: and the Queen of the Turingiens was about to answer him, when they brought her word, that the Princess of the Lombards and Tongres desired admittance; Sannon retired, not so much out of fear to shew himself to those Ladies whom he suspected not in the least, but because that after that conversation which they had interrupted, he did not find himself in a condition to be good company in another, wherein perhaps he might be little concern'd. Thereupon he was constrain'd to leave Amalazontha, and he was no sooner out of her Chamber, but he went without any more to do to the Princess of the Cimbrians, to court her on Pharamond's behalf. True it is, that hearing that Thanaric was with her, he stay'd till the Turingien had delivered his Embassy, which he did, no doubt, with a great deal of fidelity. He began to discourse very quaintly whatever he thought might be pleasing to Rosamond, in relation to Theobald and Pharamond; and having presented the King of the Bohemians Letter to that incomparable Princess, she opened it with no less impatience than joy, and found therein the following contents.

King Theobald to the Princess Rosamond.

I make no question, dear Sister, of your willingness to resign, since 'tis in exchange for the recovery of a lost Brother, and that you are no way griev'd to see that settled upon Theobald, which you would have parted with for Balamir's repose. Besides, it is as certain, that on the change of our fortunes there is such an equality of condition, that while I ascend the Throne of my Ancestors, you have the choice to reign over a Nation renowned for many victories over all the world. But, my dear Sister, the Kingdom which you have restored me, and the Monarchy which is offered you, is inconsiderable to the price of those other benefits which we are to expect. For you will agree with me that the enjoyment of Hunnimonda, and the heart of Pharamond are infinitely above all the Empires which the most boundless ambition can aspire to: what a happiness it will be to us, when we shall spend our lives with those two illustrious persons! Heaven has ordain'd that our destinies shall be united to theirs, and sufficiently attests it, having by the discovery of the real Theobald removed the obstacles that might have crossed our hopes. After so happy a revolution, we cannot say, but that our misfortunes are at an end; and that the just Rosamond is now free to dispose of her heart to him, that of all persons in the world best deserves it.

There was also a Postscript to this effect.

You may also without any scruple return an answer to the King of the Franks, and that in favour of his desires, and if there be nothing wanting but the entreaties of a Brother to persuade you to it, Theobald makes it his absolute hearty request.

The fair Princess had no sooner read the Letter, but she perused it over again with the same delight, as coming from a person so infinitely dear to her: And after she had examined the most weighty Clauses therein; casting upon Thanaric those Celestial eyes, that caused the joy and grief of so many great Princes, she demanded from the Turingien many more particulars in relation to the King of the Cimbrians. Madam, answered he, that Prince has no other thoughts at present, than of reducing into his power a City that so unjustly keeps you in restraint: And as there is nothing that equals the merit of Pharamond, nor the passion which he has for the Cimbrian Princess, no doubt, but that, as soon as he has set you at liberty, he will endeavour to tie you more strongly, and with more content to the King of the Franks. Upon those words, a lovely Carnation dyed the fair cheeks of the Princess; and in regard that Thanaric knew the quality of that tincture to be such, that it proceeded from nothing of displeasure, he began to applaud the admirable Vertues of Pharamond; which he did with so much fervency, that the modest Rosamond thought it not convenient to hear him out. So that, interrupting him: As far as I see, said she, finishing, you come not only from the King my Brother; or else Theobald is not the only Prince that you admire in the Camp from whence you bring us news. I grant it, Madam, replied Thanaric; and I believe you are not much surpris'd to hear that I have the same veneration for the King of the Franks, which all the world owes to his Vertue.

After the Turingien had a while continued this discourse, he took his leave of Rosamond; but the fair Princess was not a little surpris'd, when she took notice that Theobald should make his earnest request to her, to return an answer to the King of the Franks, and yet that Thanaric should not deliver her any Letter from that mighty Prince; which caus'd in her a disturbance, of which she was not altogether the Mistress. Thereupon, recalling the Turingien back, as he was going toward the Chamber door: Are you going then, Thanaric, said she? Yes, Madam, answered he; For having done the business for which I came, if you have no other Commands to lay upon me, it behoves me to give way in a place where the greatest Princes in the world would be glad to succeed me. Then you had nothing else to deliver me, but the King of the Bohemian's Letter? replied she, blushing, and holding a part of her Veil which she had in her hand before her face. I had no other most certainly, Madam, replied Thanaric: But, added he immediately, understanding what Rosamond meant, I believe Prince Sunnon will within these few hours, bring a Letter from the King his Brother; and will give you an account, better than I can do, of the condition of the Army which is to fight for your Liberty. The Turingien had no sooner returned that answer, but he related in short to Sunnon, what he thought the Princess of the Cimbrians would be very joyful to hear: And immediately he went to visit the fair Amalazontha, and to receive from her such Orders as were necessary for him to carry to Lephane.

He was no sooner departed Rosamond's Chamber, but the Prince was introduced; and after he had been received by the Princess in a most obliging manner, when the first Ceremonies were over, he presented her with the passionate Pharamond's Letter. Rosamond took it, but not without blushing; nor did she presume to open it in Sunnon's presence. I beseech you, Madam, thereupon, said he, carry not your self so strangely to me; for besides, that you are no way oblig'd to it, it may be I may have some Additions to make by word of mouth to what my Brother has written; and I fear the loss of such an advantage, if you delay to grant me the favour; in regard it would not be permitted me to visit you any more, should I be discovered when I leave your Apartment. For that reason, and upon his farther earnest entreaty, the incomparable Princess condescended to his request; and read those lines to him, which she would rather have perus'd without Witnesses. So that it was no difficult thing for Sunnon to observe the little changes in her Countenance, when she rehear'd those words that gave her to understand the affection of the most Illustrious of her Lovers, and with what thoughts that Affection was accompanied in the most noble heart in the world.

The King of the Franks to his Divine Princess.

AT length, Madam, Heaven has done justice to the Great Theobald: But in restoring him the Crown of his Ancestors, it makes him a Present less considerable, than the favour that it affords me, while he takes my part, and pleads for me to his Divine Sister. Not that his approbation renders me worthy of my Divine Princess; but I am apt to believe it permits me to aspire, as well as the rest of my Rivals, to an Honour which they no better deserve than Pharamond. I speak with certainty of an event which may seem uncertain. But, Madam, I speak of it with those Advantages that suffer me not to make any question of it. Considering the reinforcements of Men and Friends which I daily receive, does it not behove me to fight against your Oppressors? Am I not assisted by the great Theobald? And after all, Madam, is it not lawful for me to be tender of one party, that is become yours? We hope that it is for that Party that you will pray for Victory. But most dear Princess, how happy should I be, if the Prayers you make would not be all for a Brother, but that Pharamond, your faithful Pharamond, might have some share therein! His Valor has more need thereof, than that of the Invincible Theobald: And though your own interest did not oblige you to fortifie it with your assistance, methinks you should allow something to the most tender, and most respectful passion that ever was.

The fair Princess, so soon as she had read the King of the Franks Letter, could not forbear to cast her eye upon it once more; but being Mistress, for the present, of that desire which she had to examine every Clause, she turned toward Sunnon, and thus address'd her self to him: "I do not think, Sir, said she, that there is any necessity for us to confer tocerns you, though perhaps you may think there does. How! Madam, replied Sunnon, do you think I have no share in the most important Affair of the King of the Franks? and that after I have delivered you a Letter from that Prince, I should be remiss in observing what impression it makes in your mind? Ah, Madam! I beseech you do me more justice; and be persuaded, that as long as I live, I shall be always most deeply sensible of whatever concerns such a Brother as Pharamond. You know, Madam, and all the world beside knows it, that he lives only for your sake. You know to what dangers your disaffection has exposed him hitherto. But now that his Destiny must change with the illustrious Balamir's, I cannot believe that you can, with your former aversion, look upon what the King of the Franks has done, or whatever he is ready to do for the Princess he adores. And therefore, I will not scruple to require your Answer to that Prince: And if I dare not presume to speak of Pharamond's Merit for the attaining of it, yet me thinks I may be suffered to put you in mind of the protection which the Generous King of the Cimbrians himself allows him. Rosamond feeling a Contest in her breast, between her Modesty, and the strong Inclination that she had for the King of the Franks, could by no means resolve what Answer to give Sunnon: But the Prince not ceasing to press her; with an air that gave him no small satisfaction, "Sir, said she, seeing you are not presently to depart, and for that I am not accustomed to do that which you desire me, I must beg some time to consider what I have to say. How, Madam! cried he, somewhat impatiently, are you to consult any other thoughts than those with which your Justice shall inspire you. I cannot tell, replied she, smiling, whether the qualities of an affectionate Brother, such as you are, be compatible with those of a good Friend. But however it be, to grant you that satisfaction which you will not allow me; I must confess that I have no inclination to disoblige a Prince that fights for my Liberty; and who is united by Interest and Friendship with the King of the Bohemians.

Thus ended that dispute, the Kings of the Burgundians and the Herules both entering the Chamber, to whom the Princess rendered that civility which was due to their quality, not thinking her self obliged to treat them as Allies, who were indeed her persecutors. In the mean time Sunnon visited Hunnimonda, and spake to her as effectually as the King of the Cimbrians could desire: But for Polixena, he knew not which way to see her, the King of Suevia kept so strict a Guard upon that Princess, in a house where he had shut her up. Rosamond, the Princess of the Gobbs, Albisinda, the Queen of the Iuringiens, Agione, Cleomira and Blesinda, had made it their request to live with her, but notwithstanding all the endeavours they could use to obtain permission, the King of Suevia obstinately refused them, making a kind of an obliging excuse, that it was not for them to be used like the Sister of Pharamond. However they would not give over so, but the next day returning to the King of Suevia, they pressed him so earnestly that he made a semblance at least of yielding to their request. Fair Princess, said he, since you are so earnest that besides Polixena's Maids of honour, there should be one of her friends to bear her company; I allow her Albisinda for a companion, not only to cheer the solitude of a Princess, whom I cannot look upon as any way guilty of Pharamond's crimes, but also to punish a person that is not altogether an enemy of Marcomire, and has too great a kindness for Viridomar.

Rosamond taking her beloved Sisters part, justified her in relation to the disguise, wherewith Marcomire and Gondemar had deluded her, and then continuing in a more earnest manner, Sir, added she, for what concerns the affection which the Princess Albisinda has for the Prince of Suevia, you must be prepossessed by some contrary interest, to be so unjust as to condemn her: For when you have said all you can, Viridomar is a Brother too illustrious, and too——Viridomar, cried he smartly interrupting her, is a Rebel, and since Albisinda preserves a friendship for him that sullies her innocence, she deserves a punishment more severe, than that which I go about to inflict upon her. I grant, replied the Princess of the Bohemians, that the conversation of that incomparable person, will afford her more satisfaction than a solitude which cannot but afflict her: So that you may as well suffer me to bear her company, and allow me as a kindness that which you would inflict upon her as a punishment. Ah Madam, (cried he with a tone less severe, perceiving Gondioch and Godegesle to enter the Room) the Gods preserve me from giving my consent to your request, and from making many great Princes my enemies, from whom you desire that I should keep you safe. I shall soon find in Cologne both the Soldiers and the inhabitants rise against me, and make it their business to break your prison, employing those arms to that end which are designed for our defence. Beside, it would be thought strange that a Princess so accustomed to fetter others, should lose her liberty among her adorers.

He had not time to say more, because at the same instant the Kings of the Burgundians and Herules entered the Room, who had no sooner taken their seats, but the King of Suevia addressing addressing his speech to them, Sirs, said he, I am contesting for your interests, with a person to whom all the world submits without resistance. I see very well, replied Godegesile, that you have taken our part against a Princess, that without doubt complied with our enemies. But I cannot tell, added he, transported with jealousy and the violence of his humour, whether Rosamond showing her self so favourable to Pharamond, does not give us an occasion to treat her otherwise than we have hitherto done, to the end she may be constrained to carry her self toward us after another manner. “Truly I cannot tell, replied Rosamond with a scornful coldness and “indifferency, whether if you change your course of proceeding, we may have those “thoughts for you which we have hitherto dispens’d with. But I am deceived if I expect “more moderation in you or more quiet for my self, for you are altogether for putting me “to a double persecution. With that the incomparable Bellamira, who under the softest and mildest temper in the world, concealed the constancy of an hero, took Rosamond’s part, and looking upon Godegesile with a kind of indignation, “I wonder not at all, said she, that a person “so accomplished as the last person you spoke of, has so much reason to complain of her “fortune, in the midst of so many occasions that she has to bless the liberality of heaven: “but I think it very strange that you should go about to gain her heart by continual inju- “rics. What, pursued she more vehemently than before, can you think her obliged to grant “you her affection, at a time when you refuse her her liberty? when you fight against her “brother, and venture your lives only to detain her in prison? “I must confess, replied the “King of the Herules with a bitter smile, that the Princess of the Goths is very generous, in “taking part with Theobald’s Sister, with so much heat as she testifies, seeing she is to be “Queen of the Cimbrians. “But Madam, pursued he addressing himself to Hunnimonda, “there are no such probabilities but that you may wait long enough for the Crown which “is promised you: For I believe the war will last long enough, or perhaps may be ended “with a success quite contrary to your hopes.

Upon those words a lovely carnation overspread the fair Bellamira’s cheeks, and that courageous Lady casting a look full of disdain upon Godegesile, “As far as I see, replied she, you “are cutting out more work for the King of the Bohemians valour, than I expected: and “for what concerns the events of a war which you desire so much to prolong, give me leave “to make my conjectures of the future by what is past: For in so doing I have less reason “to fear the fortune of the King of the Bohemians, than of the King of the Herules.

She had just uttered these words, when the King of the Huns and Prince Balamir entered the Chamber, and perceiving the disturbance in her countenance, they took upon them to speak their minds, and gave the rest to understand that they were clearly of that incomparable Princesses side.

The King of Suevia who mainly feared a division in the league, which he laboured to preserve entire, dexterously changed the discourse, and Gondioch who had the same fears, made answer, that he did not admire that the Princess of the Goths, and the King of the Herules had engaged with so much heat upon a subject, wherein it was not easy for them to accord, since the King of the Cimbrians was the occasion of their discourse. “I do not apprehend however, replied the King of the Huns, why they should be of such different judgments in that particular, and why Godegesile should be an enemy to a Brother, for whose “Sister he has publickly declared so great an affection. “For my part, replied the King of “Suevia, I am no way surpris’d at it, that two persons so different as Rosamond and Theo- “bald, should be the causes of such discording passions in others. “Nevertheless you see “in your own family, replied Rosamond, an example very conformable to what the King “of the Huns has spoken, since in despite of the war between the Franks, and Suedes, Prince “Viridomar is become the friend of Pharamond, contracting that friendship from the very “time he knew that that Prince govern’d the destiny of Polixena. “How Madam, answered the King of Suevia with fire in his eyes, do you quote a guilty criminal, a Rebel, an “unnatural Son, whose very name I abominate to hear pronounced? do you compare his “rath and wicked carriage, to the proceedings of the King of the Herules, who has always “hated what it became him never to love?

That violent Prince would have shewed himself much more transported, at a time wherein his love was so much interested, had he not feared to disoblige the most considerable of his party, by disobliging Rosamond: and if the King of the Huns had not also interrupted him in a dispute, that began already to be so sharp. But in regard that Prince was a person that could not flatter, he spoke for Viridomar and very boldly, and with much justice declared himself in reference to Rosamond’s concerns: So that the whole company soon parted, not being able long to hold together, by reason of the diversity of their opinions. It may be also said that there were two parties in Cologne, one that had conspired the death of Pharamond, Pharamond, the other that sought an accommodation and to pacifie Varanez, who was the only person that stood out against the King of the Franks. The King of Suevia and the Burgundians, Godegefile and Briomer composed the first faction, and had all the same intentions. As for the Kings of the Gepides and Basternes, they were led away by those Princes, but it was rather through the engagement of their Amours, which they had for Rosamond and Aphsinda, than for any particular spleen conceived against Pharamond. And for the Prince of the Saxons, Condemar and Gautran, they were less violent for that Cabal than either Arderic or Humbert.

On the other side the Kings of the Huns and Sarmatians, Agelmoud, Martian and the new Balamir, were engaged by their own to follow the fortune of Varanez, and yet continually pealing that Prince in the ear, they never gave over perswading him to lay aside these violent inclinations, that had rendred him guilty of adhering to that unjust cause, which the league had embraced. But Agathyrfus uled his endeavours more than any other, to oblige him to depart out of a Countrey, so far remote from that potent Monarchy to which he was the immediate heir: And knowing the vastness of that Prince's ambition, he laboured to increase the force of that natural passion, that he might counterbalance the powerful impression, which the charms of Rosamond had imprinted in his heart. However it was not so easie for him to bring about his design, and therefore the King of the Sarmatians finding that his reasons could not prevail against the beauty of the Cimbrian Queen, resolv'd not to flatter Varanez, but to discover to him the danger he was in of finding a usurper in the Empire, if he staid but a month longer in Germany.

He had no sooner displayed in a few words, what he had good grounds to suspect, but the Prince as much enamoured as he was, began to be very much troubled, and addressing himself to the King of the Sarmatians, Sir, said he, will you not more precisely give me a relation, in what condition you left the Court of Persia, and let me understand by what good fortune my Father came to obtain the friendship of the illustrious Agathyrfus, the most formidable enemy that ever he had to deal with. I will not only obey your commands, replied the King of the Sarmatians blushing, but Sir, continued he, I had made you the recital which you desire long before now, could I have found as convenient an opportunity as now I have, by reason of your earnest solicitations of a Princess, who to speak ingenuously is really deserved by the King of the Franks and to whom I am apt to believe she is already engaged.

Upon those words Varanez blush'd, but having recalled his passion, I know not, answer'd he, why they should be more obliged to bestow Rosamond upon Pharamond, than upon the Prince of Persia, nor can I tell who should so well instruct you in the knowledge of interests which are not so easily divid'd into. "I will tell you however, replied Agathyrfus, if you please, that there needs but a very cursory examination, of the Prince of Persia's and the King of the Franks pretensions, to make a man admire wherefore a person that has been so publickly remarkable for acts of generosity as you have been, should give your self the liberty to disturb affections so lawfully and innocently grounded. For Sir, you cannot be ignorant that by the secret conduct of heaven, it was Pharamond that killed the Son of Briomer, it was Pharamond that saved the real Theobald's life, it was by the valour of that Prince that Bobemia has been deliver'd from her oppressor and usurper, and that Rosamond finds out an illustrious Brother instead of a wicked villain, that would have infected her house with the blood of Eriomer. "I do not speak this, added he, to moderate the fierceness of Varanez's indignation, or that you might not have performed what the King of the Franks has done, But fortune that apparently designs him the possession of Rosamond, has made choice of him to give him those opportunities to serve that Princess, which she has denyed you. Nevertheless Rosamond ceases not to be absolutely perswaded, not only of the grandeur of your courage, but of your zeal to serve her or whatever concerns your interest. She does you justice in that, as well as in all other particulars: She knows the advantages she might enjoy by yielding to Varanez, and though she be ignorant of the large extent of your Empire, yet I am apt to think she considers no less the lustre of your degree, than the endowments of your person.

Agathyrfus taking notice that Varanez began to take his words into consideration, "Wonder not, proceeded he, that I speak so positively of Rosamond's thoughts, and that I so vehemently labour to retrieve your heart, from the power of a Princess that cannot give you hers. For Rosamond her self who has made me a clear confession of her most secret thoughts, she begged of me to beseech you in her name to be satisfied with her esteem, and to remember at all times that she was not in a condition to dispose of her affection, when you first arriv'd in these parts. She cannot but with an extraordinary disquiet of mind, behold you here engaged in a war, the success whereof can never be advantageous to that passion, “ which you seem to have. For in short if you are a victor, that can only be by the death “ of Theobald and Pharamond, who perhaps is no less dear to your Mistress than her beloved “ Brother, and if on the contrary the Franks and Cimbrians triumph over their enemies, “ you imagine to be preferred before your Vanquisher. What honour could you draw from “ your defeat, or rather what a grief will it be to your Father and to all Persia, when “ they shall hear that without any necessity, you are going about to extinguish the hopes of “ one of the greatest Monarchies in the world? “ You believe then, replied Varanez with “ some disturbance, that ’tis in vain to contest with a happy Rival. If it be so, you never “ were in love, and I will be so far from following your advice, that I declare to you I am “ resolved to dispute the possession of Rosamond to the last drop of my blood. “ I cannot tell, “ coldly replied Agathyrus, whether that Princess intends to bequeath her self to the most “ valiant of her adorers: But this I know that they who assail the life of Pharamond, will “ most sensibly disoblige her, and that she would willingly that Varanez, whom she esteems “ above all the Princes that environ her, would retire from an association that only fights to “ keep her in prison. She shall affirm to your face whatever I have said, and when that in“ comparable person shall explain her own meaning, you will hear questionless with more “ patience the same which I have told you, it may be a little too home. I hope Sir you will “ pardon me this little heat, which may perhaps have given you distaste. For besides that “ justice urged me to speak in this manner, I may excuse the liberty which I have taken, by “ declaring that I have a passionate love for your person, and that my destiny depends abso“ lutely upon yours. “ Yes Sir, added he blushing, I shall be happy if you please, and in the “ honour to which you may advance me, I shall find those advantages which—— “ Never talk of advantages, replied Varanez interrupting him, but be assured without any “ regard to the promises you seem to make me, I shall do for your satisfaction all those things “ that lye in my power. But if to establish your felicity, there is no other way for me but “ to part from the Queen of the Cimbrians, I cannot tell whether I shall be so good a Friend

 “ as to do it; or whether it will be possible for me to labour for your happiness to the “ prejudice of my own repose as long as I live. I should be very unjust, answered the King “ of the Sarmatians, should I go about to build my content upon your misfortunes. But, Sir, “ before I make you a relation wherein you will see what you have to hope or fear as well as I, let “ us visit the Cimbrian Queen, and when she has discovered to you the real thoughts of her Soul, “ you may take up a resolution conformable to your fortune, and the grandeur of your cou“ rage.

The Prince of Persia, who was all fire and love, could not without disturbance hearken to what the King of the Sarmatians had said: and you may assure your self he did not over patiently endure the pains which that Prince had taken to shew him a way which he had so little disposition to follow. However, he kept his indignation concealed, notwithstanding his quarrelsome and contradictory humour; and he had so much moderation as not to break forth in language against an illustrious personage to whom he knew his Father was most signally obliged; and to whom he was also himself beholding for a potent reinforcement: for in truth, Agathyrus, besides the Sarmatians, had at his disposal the Huns and the Lombards, by reason of the great share that Agelmond and Balamir had in the interests of Gilismene and Agione; so that Varanez observing that that concatenation of friendship rendred him considerable in the league, and being moreover satisfied of Agathyrus’s good intentions toward him, he consented without reluctance to go along with him to visit Rosamond. But it was not so much out of any design to change his mind, as to shew himself complaisant toward the King of the Sarmatians, but more especially to gratify himself with the sight of his beloved object; he found Martian in company with the the Cimbrian Princess: however, the presence of a person so prudent, and so much his Friend, did not hinder him from speaking his mind, so soon as they had finished those ceremonies which proceed from a regulated knowledge among persons of the highest degree: I make no question, Madam, said he, but the King of the Sarmatians told me the truth, when he gave me to understand that you would not be offended to see Varanez among the number of your slaves. Truly, answered she, I should be very glad that you were not of my Enemies side, and that such a Prince as you, whom I really esteem, and for whom I still desire to preserve the same respect, would not strengthen the chains that hold me in prison. Do you take one of the fairest Cities in Europe, Madam, replied the Prince, to be a prison; a City wherein you are attended and adored by so many great and potent Princes? I see, replied Rosamond, that we are not agreed what Title to give Cologne: but for my part I cannot tell by what other name to distinguish a place, from whence I would fain depart, but that I am detained by force. You might have your full liberty, replied Varanez, but that they fear you will make use of it in favour of the King of the Franks. But after all this, added he, transported by his love, and a sentiment of that pride which was natural to him; What is there that you see in the person of Pharamond, that you may not meet with in the person of Varanez: And as for the Fortune of either, are you so prepossessed in favour of my Rival, not to see the difference between the Empire of Persia, and the Kingdom of Franconia? I know the difference very well, replied she, with a haughty air; for though all the world were ignorant what degree the Kings of Persia hold in the world, you have told me so often your self, that I cannot but bear it in mind.

Agathyrus and Marcian, being willing to pacify a dispute that began to grow so sharp, were about to have spoken: But Rosamond not giving them time; "Sir, continued she, "addressing her self to Varanez; when to that Franconia, you shall see those fair and noble "Provinces joyned, which are comprehended under the name of Gallia, I believe the Prince "that reigns over that Extent of ground, will have no great cause to complain of his fortune. Especially, replied Agathyrus, to appease Rosamond, that great Kingdom being "in a flourishing condition, and in one of the most fertile Situations of the world. And "being governed, added Martian, by such a Prince as Pharamond. Varanez, upon that, blushing for madness, he beheld Marcian and Agathyrus with an air that sensibly reviled them; yet being resolved not to shew his passion, though they were never so much prepossessed to the advantage of his Enemy, he departed, carrying a fire in his Countenance, that displayed the agitation of his soul. The King of the Sarmatians and the Lover of Pulcheria immediately followed him, not only to moderate his transportation, but also because they read in Rosamond's fair eyes, how much she would take it in good part, if they should take the pains to temper the fierce spirit of that Prince, in regard the power of his Party bore such a sway to encline the whole League to Peace, or continue the War. The King of the Sarmatians first accosting him, in regard he had most reason to preserve his Friendship: "Sir, said he, I find that my freedom of speech has given you distaste; but "besides that we desire to put a stop to the Repentment of that fair Princess whom you so "admire, yet have so highly incensed, we thought it a piece of treachery to flatter you "with a poor spirited compliance, at such a time when your Repose and Honour lay at "stake. This is not all, added Marcian, for I believe we shall not long have the disposal "of the Troops that are come from Constantinople; for I understand that the Court of "Theodosius is divided into different Factions, and that the Imperial Family is very much "disunited within it self. How deeply soever Varanez was perplexed with the thoughts of his Love and Jealousie, he could not forbear being surprized at this news, nor from making enquiry into some particulars: So that Marcian resuming the discourse: "That "which I have been inform'd, said he, appears so unlikely, that I beg you to dispence with "me from giving you any farther account, till I am better satisfied by a person who is come "to me on the behalf of Pulcheria. But, Sir, so long as we have so brave an Army under "our Command, I would fain that so great a Prince as you, would be a means to restore "Peace to Europe, to set so many fair Princesses at liberty, and to give them their freedom "entire to dispose of their affections as they themselves shall think most proper, according "to their own Inclinations. This would be a piece of Generosity that would spread far "and near, and worthy such a Prince as Varanez: and yet I fear that instead of pretending "to that Honour, you will suffer your self to be lead astray, by maintaining a Party, whose "Cause is too unjust to be protected by Heaven. And indeed, was it ever seen, that men; "without any pretence of Right, should detain in prison those very Ladies whom they "pretend to love, as they do here in Cologne? And with what Countenance can we admit "of a Reception into a Town, where so many fair and Illustrious Ladies are confined under so severe a Restraint. In the mean time, Rosamond has requested me to tell the King "of Suevia roundly of his Injustice, and to speak to him in the behalf of the King of the "Franks; but if he refuses me that which of necessity you see he ought not to deny me, "shall I be obliged to venture my life for the Interest of his passions? Besides, you may easily perceive that this League is every moment likely to be dissolved, through the divisions that begin to arise between the Captains that are all for Tyrannical proceedings, and "those other Princes who are for Moderation. I will say no more, added he, that I may "not press too far upon the impatience of such a friend as Varanez: And I believe you are "willing I should leave you, having undertaken to discharge my Commission to the King "of Suevia, while you, for your part, are going to take such resolutions from your great "Courage, which shall be no less honourable than the most famous Victory that ever you "obtained.

Martian being thus parted from Varanez without expecting any answer, went to the King of Suevia but could not find him, because he was gone to visit the Princess Polixena, whom he would not suffer to rest one minute hardly in quiet. So soon as he was entred into that fair Princess's Chamber, he consulted her eyes, and labouring to sweeten the fierceness of his own, he began a discourse of the following nature, not being able altogether to bow his humour to that respectful manner of speaking and acting, which is usual to persons that know how to love. Well Madam, said he, shall I find you in the same obstinacy which I met with yesterday? Have you not considered that Viridomar whom you esteem so highly, is a Rebel, odious to his King to his Parents and to his Country? In whose embraces I shall see you suddenly in a destitute condition, wandring from Province to Province without either refuge or subsistence? And yet Madam, you prefer him as miserable as he is and fortuneless, to a Prince that offers you a Crown, and who adores you notwithstanding your injustice and your imbecility. Speak Madam, speak, but before you explain your mind remember, that upon your answer depends all the repose or calamity of your life. For in short, if you drive me to a despair that may change my love into hatred, I shall look upon you no otherwise than as the Sister of Pharamond, that is to say, as a person upon whom I shall only take pleasure, to satisfy my aversion and revenge.

He accompanied these words with an Air sufficiently conformable to his threatening language, when the generous Polixena beholding him with a look, which as modest as she was demonstrated a most manly constancy, Sir, said she with a stern utterance, I have told you already that I am not the mistress of my own will, of which the King of the Franks has the entire and sole disposal. Nevertheless to make you a more exact protestation, I declare to you that for the Father of Albisinda and Viridomar, I shall always preserve that respect which is due to his rank and age: But on the other side I shall never have that sort of affection for him which he insists upon. Then you design that for your beloved Viridomar, replied he with a rage which he labour'd to dissimble. But without studying much to tell you, that a perfidious fellow that has betrayed me, may as well prove unfaithful to you, I will as sincerely unfold my own thoughts to you as you have done to me. Know then that I will make use of the power which is in my hands, to hinder you from giving your hand to Viridomar, and to obstruct your idle intentions, there is no extremity to which I am not able to carry my resentment. And in a word, I will not spare either Sword or poyson to satisfy my self and injure you: and by my actions past you may guess, whether I am a person so easily wrought upon, to quit the resolutions I have once taken.

Those words were attended with a dreadful look; but the undaunted Princess instead of being terrified, I am descended from a family, replied she with a regardless coldness, and an extraordinary Majesty, that is sufficiently acquainted with your violent proceedings, and how far your indignations can reach, but as you never saw any of my relations that were ever frightened with menaces or dangers, it may be you will find in Polixena a heart, not unworthy the Royal blood from which she is descended. Persons of my Sex have their opportunities to signalize their courage, and if their modesty does not permit them to seek honour in Arms, they may meet with it elsewhere, and it suffices for them that they know to look death in the face, rather than change their resolutions, when they are assured they cannot do it with justice. We shall suddenly see, replied he with a cruel jealousy, how far that constancy of yours will extend, for when I have advised with Briomer, it may be you may find that since I cannot move your love, I may cause my self to be feared, notwithstanding that generosity which you affect to shew, now that you see no danger near.

Having concluded these words he flung out of the Chamber in such a heat, that he had not time to take notice that at the name of Briomer Polixena changed colour, not so much however out of any apprehension that concern'd her, as out of the antipathy which for the sake of her Brother's interest she had against a Villain, who not long before had conspir'd the death of so great a Prince.

So soon as the violent King of Suevia was come to his own Apartment, he sent to seek out Briomer, and while he expected him with an extraordinary impatience, Martian came to see him, and after the first ceremonies of their complements were over, he spoke in Rosamond's name on the behalf of the Princess of the Franks. Sir, said he, I believe that Polixena cannot be safer in the house where you have enclosed her up, than if she had as much liberty as is permitted to persons of her rank and Sex who are in this City. For which reason all the Princesses and particularly the Cimbrian, have desired me that I would make it their request to you that—— Sir, (said the King interrupting him, with an extraordinary disturbance in his countenance) before you make an end of what I understand but too well already, I would fain know whether Rosamond have given you the trouble, to come to exact from me that which she may well believe I cannot grant her, or whether it be to oblige “oblige Pharamond, whom I look upon as the most hateful of all my enemies.

That kind of answer displeas'd Martian, but in regard he was a person of great moderation, and one that desired to mediate successfully for Polixena, he was so far from showing his resentment that he only made this reply. Sir, said he, you think the intentions of Rosamond to be very scanty, as if it were such a strange thing to see them engaged, for the interests of a person of the same Sex, of equal rank and merit little different. Those noble qualities which you applaud in Polixena, replied the King of Suevia, shall not hinder me from keeping her in that place where she is guarded by my order, if you have no other reasons for what you desire of me. When you have told me the arguments that move you to treat that Princess so unworthily as you do, replied Martian somewhat nettled, I may perhaps in my turn tell you more of my mind, I hate Polixena, replied he blushing, because she is the Sister of Pharamond. And for the same cause, answered Martian, Rosamond loves the Princess of the Franks, in regard that Pharamond is a friend and ally of the King of the Cimbrians. But Sir, (added he very hastily, hearing that some persons were come to attend the Suevian King) I did not believe you would have refused me that, which indeed you ought not to have given me an occasion to require, and I thought you would have considered that it is the Princess of the Cimbrians that sent me to request you, and that it is the Lieutenant of the Emperour Theodosius that makes the request.

He took his leave having spoken these words, contrary to his accustomed moderation, and few minutes after Briomer succeeding him, by his only presence calm'd all the disturbances of the Suevian King. He embraced the Cimbrian with all the demonstrations of amity which he was able to testify, and addressing his speech to him, My dear Briomer, said he, I must confess you are come in season according to my wishes. For indeed I had an extraordinary impatience, to have your advice upon a resolution which I have taken, finding my self at a strange loss. Thereupon he repeated to him all that Martian had said, and then continuing his discourse, “You see, added he, to what an extremity I am reduced, either I must deprive my self of the means of enjoying Polixena's company, or else I must break with Rosamond and Martian, who you know have a great strength and much credit in our association. “I did verily believe Sir, answered the Cimbrian, that you would not be well pleas'd with Martian's visit: I never lik'd the disposition of that man, and to speak ingenuously 'twas my self that sent in word, that there was company stay'd to speak with your Majesty, on purpose to free you from his tiresome converse: But now Sir, I cannot see why you should stand to consider what you have to do, for in my opinion you may give Polixena the liberty which the other Princesses enjoy, without any disappointment or injury to the design you have in hand. “How Briomer, replied the Suevian King in a surprise, can you give me the counsel so contrary to my own inclinations and your repose? “However, answered he, I must presume to tell you, that you have no other way to take but that: For if your Majesty obstinately refuse to grant Rosamond her request, she may not only cause a mutiny in the Army, but also have a plausible pretence to render you odious to the inhabitants of Cologne, with whom it absolutely behoves you to keep a fair correspondence. But replied the passionate King, when the greatest part of the Princes behold Polixena, what if they should become my Rivals, and as they are in better esteem than I, should lay new obstacles in the way of my pretensions. Then Sir, replied the Cimbrian, you may lock her up in the same place again, and Briomer that brought her out of Pharamond's Camp, dares still engage his word, without being suspected by your Majesty to make you the Master of Polixena's destiny whenever you please. “Would to God, replied the King sighing, that I could really dispose of the fortune of that enemy of mine, though I purchas'd the means to do it with a part of my dominions.

After these words he paused a while, and then stedfastly fixing his eyes upon Briomer's face, “What shall we do, cry'd he, so to manage the differing judgments that are among us, that we preserve the authority which we have hitherto maintained? Speak, Briomer, speak I conjure you, you know the trouble into which this strange passion has plunged me, succour me then at a time when your assistance is so needful, for you know I have no other person faithful to me in the world to confer withal. Besides I have always found in you a quick apprehension and a daring courage, together with a soul free from faintness or scruple. In short, you have the qualities to be desired in a friend, to whom a King would commit the management of his fortune; so that I question not but you will give me advice beyond all the reflections I have made, and that you will tell me precisely by which way I shall carry my self both toward the Princesses, and toward the Captains of those Troops that compose our League. “Sir, answered Briomer with many marks of satisfaction in his countenance, there is no necessity for me to study an answer to what your Majesty demands. In the first place I must tell you, it is absolutely necessary for you to make sure of Varanez, for besides that the valour of that Prince will be no mean assistance to us, it is most certain that the Constantinopolitan Army depend chiefly upon his directions. In the mean time I am informed by those persons, which I continually gain among the creatures of the most considerable Princes, that Varanez is not well satisfied with the Princess of the Cimbrians, that he is very much sollicited to abandon our interests, so that in regard he is not a person of much constancy, having already forgot Athanaïs for Rosamond, he may change again and leave us, when we have most need of his Arm and his forces: So that Sir, it being my judgment that you ought to preserve his friendship, your business is to flatter his love and feed his haughty humour. You may make a seeming engagement to him to assure him of Rosamond, you may promise him the full possession of her, not only because he is superiour in all things to the rest of his Rivals, but because you should take it for a great happiness to advance to the Throne of Persia, a Princess, which was recommended to your care by your dying friend. When this is done, who can hinder you from nourishing the same hopes in the rest of Rosamond's Suitors, grounding your promises variously according to the different humours of those Princes to whom you make them? When you speak to Gondioch, after you have extolled his valour and the victories he has obtained over the Romans, you may represent to him how much he ought to be preferred, and that it cannot be otherwise, in regard that he being the first that had the honour to serve the Cimbrian Princess, it would be an injustice for him to be turned back from the race which he had always run, while later Princes were suffered to get before him. You will have yet less trouble to Cajole the King of the Herules, to whom it will be sufficient to make a protestation, that that correspondence of thought and judgment that has always been between you will never permit you to forsake his interests. As for Arderic, you must court him upon the score of his virtue, wherein as he thinks he excels the rest of his Rivals, you may easily persuade him that being so well known to Rosamond and you, he has no reason to fear being supplanted by his Competitors, who have less share in yours and the esteem of a Princess whom he courts. Then you may tell Gondioch and the Kings of the Herules and Gepides, that you intend vigorously to oppose the pretensions of Varanez, coveting rather a confederate in Germany, than in a Country whence you can never expect assistance. In the mean time without being a slave to your promises, you may sacrifice those Princes to your particular interests, at all times that fortune shall give you an advantage to put them upon the hazard of their lives. You know, replied the Suevian King, that I am not so simple to scruple the following your counsel, for indeed I may assure you that you have advised me to nothing which I had not resolved upon before. But Briomer, I am at a greater loss how to carry my self toward three Princesses, who have a strange influence upon the several parties of our league, As to what concerns Rosamond, replied the Cimbrian, you must never stand to consider but make your self absolute Master of her fortune, and delay her marriage as much as in you lies, to the end you may keep the several Princes who are in hopes the longer in suspense. By Bellamira's means you may draw off Honorius to your party, as you have already the Emperour of Constantinople, where you have all the refuge and sanctuary you can desire, if the success of your affairs should fall out contrary to your expectation. But Briomer, cried the enamoured Prince with a blush, How shall I do to mollifie the Sister of Pharamond? When complaisance and kindness prove in vain, replied the Cimbrian, you have then the liberty to proceed in a different manner, not following the example of young Lovers, that vex themselves with plaints and sighs, but by acting like a King, who having a desire has also the power to satisfy himself, being Master of the means to qualifie the most violent fires that burn within him.

The King of Suevia listned to this discourse with an extraordinary attention, and making afterwards some reflections upon Polixena's disposition and his own, which he perceived to be flattered by a pernicious confidence, You speak reason Briomer, said he, and I am already ashamed of the respect which I have shewn to a person, that has rendred her self so unworthy of it, by a behaviour too injurious to be endured. I will alter my manner of proceeding, and I will use the haughty Polixena not only as the Sister of my most irreconcilable enemy, but as a slave that ought to be entirely at my disposal. And therefore since we have resolved what course to take, let us hasten to put our results in execution, and I desire you not to omit any thing that may bring us to a prosperous conclusion of what we have design'd together. You would do well in my opinion, replied the Cimbrian, to send and make some obliging overtures to Honorius, whose ally you have been for a long time, and to promise him the possession of Bellamira, if he will but be pleased to trust himself with his forces, in a City where he may enjoy the company of that Princess every day. 'Tis time also that you should give out orders for a general Muster, not only because it is necessary to know in what condition your Army is, but that the inhabitants of Cologne may be the more encouraged to continue faithful to your side. You see Sir, how important it is for you to be absolut in Agrippina, for if a division should happen, they may easily be induced to open their Gates to the enemy. I am very glad, replied the Suevoian King, to find that you and I so well agree in our opinions. To-morrow I will see Varanez, and the most considerable Chiefs of our party, and it may be I shall without much trouble persuade them to approve our resolutions, I mean those only which it is convenient for me to make known: For you must not think me so imprudent to discover all. In the mean time because you think it fitting, and for that there is such an obstinate bustle about it, I will give Polixena the same liberty which the other Princesses enjoy. But Briomer, added he blushing all of a sudden, if by so doing I chance to procure my self a formidable Rival among the Princes of the League, you promise me to return the person whom I love into my own power again. 'Tis only Sir because you are in love, coldly replied the Cimbrian, that you suspect Briomer's ingenuity, and that you have forgot the proofs which he has continually given you thereof upon all occasions, when you had otherwise little likelihood of success. In a word Sir, without being obliged to convey them away by force into any other place, or using any other contrivances, 'tis but telling the Princesses that the people begin to murmur against them, and that the inhabitants and Soldiers look upon them as the cause of the war, and that therefore it is convenient they should have a stronger guard for their own security. And then Sir, which of the Princes can better pretend than you, to chuse such Soldiers as you shall think convenient to be entrusted with a treasure so inestimable? You may be sure that none of Rosamond's Lovers will be offended at it, for they looking upon one another with an eye of suspicion, every one of them will be more ready to injure his Rival, than to allow him so great a privilege. Besides there is not one that does not believe you to be her friend and an enemy of Pharamond, so that you need not doubt but they will all agree to give your Majesty that precedency, which will easily make you Master of the fortune of the Princesses. There is an apparent probability in what you say, replied the King of Suevia, but who is there that I can confide in at such a nice conjuncture as this, unless I rely upon my faithful Briomer? For besides that for the good of the whole party, you are obliged to look after all things, the fortifications, the Arms, the provisions, the Engines of war, perhaps you are not so well beloved by the rest, because you are not guilty of those general condescendencies, which are usually accompanied with effeminacy and cowardise.

He had no sooner concluded those words, but he began to consider who was the fittest among all the chief Commanders, to be entrusted with an employment of so great a consequence, and after he had studied a while, "I cannot think of any but the Prince of the Burgundians, said he, whom I can better trust upon such a ticklish occasion, for besides that he has as much courage as such a charge can require, his affection for Albisinda whom I will promise him, will be security enough for Polixena and Rosamond. "But Sir, replied the suspicious Briomer, can you away with that humour which they call virtue in Gondemar? or do you think that he will answer your expectations? 'Tis for the reputation of that Prince that I approve the choice I have made, and until you can find me out another more likely to second my intentions, I shall not alter my thoughts in reference to the charge, which I have resolved to trust to Gondemar's fidelity. "But Briomer, added he, as far as I see you do not take notice that we are not yet at the end of our designs, for there is an absolute necessity for me to get Viridomar into my possession, to the end I may have him within my reach, and that I may declare him a Rebel, and unworthy to succeed before the most considerable of the Suedish Nobility. "I must confess, replied the Cimbrian with a mischievous joy, I have not yet spoken of the punishment which the Prince deserves, but Sir, it was not out of any neglect of your concerns, but on the contrary because I was persuaded that Viridomar being revolted to your Majesties enemies, has condemned himself sufficiently to the punishment which you shall inflict, without observing any formalities in reference to a crime which he has perpetrated in the face of the world. However, said he, you must not speak a word to any of Viridomar's accomplices, for fear of losing an opportunity to entrap him.†

While the King of Suevia and Briomer were thus complotting mischief, the enamoured Sunnon spent his time with the penfive Amalazombas. Balsmir entertained the Princess of the Lombards, and Rosamond was perplexed with the importunities of Gondioch, Godegesile, and Arderic. As for Varanez he, being naturally impatient and fiery, ponder'd with vexation upon what the Cimbrian Princess, the King of the Sarmatians and Mariam had said to him, and not enduring they should all speak for Pharamond, "Yes, yes, cried he walking alone in his Chamber, I will follow the counsel which you give me, I will take a resolution worthy of Varanez, rather I will not delay one moment to execute the resolution which I have already taken. Your Pharamond cannot forget upon what terms we parted, upon the

“the Enterview between Theon and Melufina; and though he be so happy to contest with me “in the heart of a Princess prepossessed in favour of him, perhaps he may not always be “so fortunate, but that he may be forced to yield in Combat; to which I will not chal“lenge him, but with Arms alike, and equal advantages.

Upon those words suffering himself to be hurried away by the impetuosity of his humour, he was about to call Mitrancs to send him away with a Trumpet to the Camp of the Franks, when the King of Suevia, who was in a perpetual motion, came to the Prince for his approbation of the general muster which he and Briomer had agreed upon; Varanez believing it would be a means to enliven the league, consented immediately, and notwithstanding the eager desire which he had to fight Pharamond, he promised to be at the Rendezvous in the head of all his forces under his command. The King of Suevia had no sooner received that answer, but he visited Gondioch, Godegesilus, Ardaric and Martian with the same success. Then he went to those other Princes that had not brought along with them such numerous Armies as the King of the Huns, the King of the Lombards, Agathyrfus, the Prince of the Saxons, and the new Balamir, and many other Captains who were sufficiently considerable to be admitted into their consultations. While he thus employed himself, Briomer made it his chief business to consider of a fit person to send as an Envoy to offer Bellamira to Honorius, provided he would change his party; he endeavoured to debauch the chief Officers of the Suevian Army, to give their consent to declare Viridommar unworthy to succeed his Father: but as for the order which they had agreed upon, to give Bellamira the same liberty which the other Princesses had, Briomer would by no means meddle with it, whether it were that he looked upon the Princess of the Franks as the Sister of Pharamond, or that he had a natural reluctance to do her any kindness, was best known to himself. Therefore that he might rid himself of that which she esteemed so great a trouble, he impowered Chilric, Captain of the King of Suzvia's Guards, to give the Princess that freedom which she was allowed, and gave him likewise a commission to attend the Emperour of the Romans, esteeming him the most proper person for that employment. Though it was not possible for him to go to the Camp of the King of the Franks till such time as the Muster was over, not only for that he was to serve his Master at such a time when his Army was to appear in its greatest splendour, but that being to go along with certain Princes that were to visit Pharamond, he had the better opportunity to observe their behaviour, and to take notice of their very words and looks.

The next day there was nothing to be heard but the sound of a thousand warlike instruments, varying according to the variety of those Nations that were united against the King of the Franks. In all parts the Officers were to be seen running and riding about, some exercising the Soldiers, while others took a view of the Arms and Horses, others of the Engines of War. They sent to know whether the Princesses would be pleased to see the Army drawn up in Battalia, but Rosamond, Bellamira and Polyxena absolutely refused to go; not judging it a delightful object for them to see such a Muster of their Enemies: Amalzontha, Albifinda, Cleomira and Blesinda, whose interests were little different, return'd the same answer; and Agione would not forsake the company of those most incomparable persons, not so much out of any engagement that she had to be of Pharamond's side, as out of a meer motion of tenderness and Generosity.

Varanez, Gondioch, Godegesilus and Humbert were not a little mad at the refusal which they took to be a slight of their Dignity, so that they forbore not to complain of it in publick, and took it to be a strange contempt, though it were no more than they expected. The King of Suevia more severely nettled, sent for Albifinda to his Quarters, and after he had loaded her with all the reproaches that his rage could dictate to his resentment, he commanded her with a sharp austerity, not to stir out of an Apartment which he had allotted her in his own Lodgings, to revenge himself of the pretended provocation that she had given him, by depriving her of the company of her illustrious Friends. On the other side, he permitted Condemar and Humbert to visit her apart, making a semblance to them as if he kept her as the reward of those services which he expected from them. The news of Albifinda's new misfortune was no sooner divulged in Cologne, but the Princesses were extremely griev'd, and being no less afraid of the violent humour of the King of Suevia, they offered to be Spectators of the Muster, provided they might enjoy the liberty of their Friend. The King of Suevia would yield neither to the one nor the other, obstinately refusing to hearken to the propositions of Rosamond and Bellamira, rightly judging that the thoughts of those Princesses were not conformable to his intentions. Moreover, because he believed that such a denial would stand him in good stead to purchase the good will of the King of the Easternes, and the Brother of Gondioch, he went to visit those two Princesses before he rode forth to the Army; and coming to Humbert, after the first complements were passed between them, Sir, said he, I know the affection which you have for Albinde, and because I would not have her prepossessed in favour of Pharamond's Brother, I thought it convenient to keep her apart from the company of those persons that maintain'd Marcomir's interests to your prejudice. Is it possible, replied the enamoured Humbert, with many marks of joy in his face, that you should for my sake refuse to restore her to the fair Princesses that desired her liberty? You are not to question it, replied the King, and farther I intend you shall have those advantages by my alliance which you never expected. You know that Viridomar has rendered himself unworthy to succeed me in the Kingdom, being revolted to the enemy; so that as the Husband of Albinde, I intend you the right of inheritance to my Crown after my decease, and to enjoy that Throne where Viridomar should have sat; that rebellious Son that menaces his rebellious Sword at his Father's Breast. However, not to flatter you, replied he with a fierce countenance, I declare that you are obliged to use all your endeavours, not only to revenge me of a Monster that I abhor, but to free your self from a Rival who is a continual plague to those Territories of which I design to leave you the peaceable possession. But, Sir, answered the astonished Humbert, would you have me forget that Viridomar is your Son, and that he is the Brother of—— “How, replied the violent King, interrupting him, do you believe that I can “look upon a Friend of Pharamond as my Son; a Lover of Polixena, a piece of Perfidiousness, that fights against his Father, and one that I intend to sacrifice to my just Resentment? I would not require your assistance, if I thought I could prevent you, and meet that Traitor, whom I would cut in a thousand pieces; for that indignation that animates me, would easily supply the weakness of my Age. And therefore, never study for the matter, quickly declare your self; either renounce my Alliance, or be an Enemy to my Enemies. Yes Viridomar is my Enemy, a dangerous Enemy, an irreconcilable Enemy, and in a word, an Enemy more odious than Pharamond. I cannot think you are surprized to hear me thus express my self; for, questionless, you know, the hate of Parents turns to an antipathy as implacable as their affection was tender before.

Upon those words he beheld Humbert with a manifest open-heartedness: And to touch the young Prince the more deeply to the quick, being yet in love, and full of hope; “Sir, said he, with a low voice, *does the report of Viridomar's Valour fright you into a Renunciation of your pretensions to Albinde, which you cannot well preserve, but by the death of that Traitor that seeks my life? For he looks upon me as the Obstacle that crosses his intentions of marrying the Sister of Pharamond, and of giving the Princess, which I design for the King of the Baïerns, to Marcomir. Is it possible*, replied Humbert, that you should put such an unkind Interpretation upon my words, as to think Humbert guilty of Cowardice; I am sure you never found me so: and I will make it evident in a short time, that I am not unworthy those Royal promises which you have made me. Yes, Sir, I will challenge Viridomar, since it is your desire, and what my Love commands me.

The King of the Suevians, over-joyed with that Answer, told Humbert, that he never questioned the greatness of his Courage. And then, to fix him in the resolution which he had already inspired into him: “Do not think, said he, *however, that I put you upon a necessity of listening to the interest of your Passions; or to the Courage that prompts you to fight for a Prince, who has the sole disposal of Albinde; For things of this nature are to be left at liberty, there being seldom good success where there is Constraint, Consider therefore what you have to do, that I may know how to deal with Gondemar. You know his Valour, you are not ignorant that he loves Albinde; and in regard that not being Heir to a Crown, as he is in hopes of the Scepter of Suevia by the Marriage of Albinde, you may well believe he will be glad to accept those Offers which I have made to you. Oh, Sir*, replied Humbert, with an extraordinary disturbance in his Countenance, wherefore should you prefer my Rival before me? What actions of mine has created any suspicions in you to my prejudice? Forbear them, I beseech you, replied he, with a passionate vehemence, and all the marks of fierceness in his looks; and be assured that I will either lose my life, or be the death of Viridomar, whom I abhor, because you hate him; and because he loves Marcomir.

The King of the Suedes transported at those last words: “Sir, said he, since I perceive you have taken so Generous a resolution, and so worthy your pretensions, my business must be to stay the Prince of the Burgundians in Cologne, by giving him some Employment, while we attack the Franks. For besides the Honour he would gain, had he that liberty, you may well guess that he has the same design that you have, and that he may prevent you, and put me to trouble, when he shall demand of me the Guerdon of those

The Lover of Albifinda could not but be sensible of a double satisfaction, to see that at the same time that the King of Suevia went about to advance his hopes, he was no less zealous to ruin Gondemar's, a formidable Rival; who besides his Merit and fair Reputation, had the advantage to be of the same side with the Basterns. In so much, that not being Master of the joys which he felt: Ab, Sir, cryed he, how apparent is your goodness! Of how large an extent it is! How happy shall I be, if your Intentions have that success which I have reason to promise my self from a Prudence like yours! How much shall I be obliged to your Majesty to the last gasp, though in satisfaction of your revenge upon Viridomar, I should lose that life which you labour to render so fortunate. For Heaven's sake, replied the Suevian King, with an appearing Generosity, let us not lose in Complements the time which we may more profitably employ; but permit me to take my leave, to the end I may go and persuade the Burgundian Prince to accept of a Trust, which your Interest will not suffer him to refuse.

Thereupon the King of Suevia went to seek out Gondemar; but it was the least of his thoughts to acquit himself of the promise he had made, or to act for the King of the Basterns, the violent Inclination which he had for Polyxena leading him to the execution of other designs. And therefore, accosting the Prince of the Burgundians with a large shew of pretended Friendship, to which the usual Austerity that appeared in his Countenance gave way: “ Generous Prince, said he, I come to make you a Proposal, which in all likelihood you cannot but approve of. You know that the chief aim of the Franks, the Cimbrians and their Allies in making War against us, is only to take from us Rosamond, Belamira and Polyxena; and to that end, they boldly threaten to besiege us. So that we may say, that though the Fortune of those Princesses depends upon us, yet is not our Fortune less tied to theirs: so that there is nothing of greater importance to us, than to keep them under a sure Guard. And therefore among all our great Commanders, I cannot think there is any one more fit to be trusted with so precious a Gage, than the Prince of the Burgundians, in whose power it may be to repair the losses we may sustain, should fortune be so cruel as to favour our Enemies. But, Sir, answered Gondemar, if the employment be of that importance you speak of, why do you not rather bestow it upon some one of the Kings, who has—— Because that in all our league, replied the King, hastily interrupting him, *there is no King or any other Commander that can better acquit himself than the illustrious Gondemar: for you know that the King of the Lombards, Agathyrus, the Prince of the Saxons, Martian and Balamir are not so much our Friends as to be entrusted with a charge that will render them the arbitrators of peace and war. On the other side, the young King of the Basternes has not sufficient experience for so great an employment: and Varanez, Gondioch, Ardoric and Godegesile will never agree to submit to to one another, so that I cannot pitch upon any person to be preferred before you: for though you are the King of the Burgundians Brother, and may be suspected by his Rivals, your virtue which is in so fair a repute will remove all their suspicions, Besides, in giving you the keeping, not only of the three Princesses already mentioned, but of all the rest, I shall preserve Albifinda in my power to bestow upon you, together with the right of succession to a Crown, which is at my disposal through the rebellion of a Traitor that should have worn it after my death.*

Gondemar felt a kind of sweetness in the hopes of an employment which would give him daily opportunities to see and serve Cleomira; so that the King of Suevia believing that the satisfaction which he observed in his countenance, proceeded from the promise he had made him, “ Yes, Sir, continued he, you may be assured of my fidelity in keeping my promise; and in acknowledgment of the double present which you will receive at my hands, I only engage you to let me have the Sister of Pharamond in my custody whenever I require her, as a pledge to secure me from an enemy who will be tender how he drives to utmost despair the person who commands his Sister's destiny.

Upon those words the generous Gondemar was at a stand, and the King of Suevia observing him with an inward vexation, “ Sir, said he, do you find any unwillingness to do according to my desire? Gondemar unwilling to declare his mind, or to discover his thoughts, “ I confess, replied he, that there is one thing which I scruple, that almost persuades me to deny the employment which you offer me as a favour: for, said he, with what honour to my self can I stay in Cologne, when all the rest of the Soldiers are signaling their valour in the Field? “ I know not whether I may be deceived or no, replied the Suevian King, but to tell you the truth, I do not believe I can bestow upon you a more honourable, or more dangerous employment: for you are entrusted with a charge which you are to defend as well against the people of Agrippina, who will be apt to move se-

“dition to make themselves Masters of so vast a treasure, as against the most formidable “Princes of our League, who for ought I know may every moment have designs, to convey “away their particular Mistresses.

To this argument he added so many others, that Gondemar accepted the employment which he had made him hope for, but not so much to obtain Albisinda by surrendring up Polixena, as to serve those fair and illustrious Ladies that were so unjustly confin'd, and to avoid meeting in the conflict with the Princess Cleomira's Brother.

Upon this the King of Suevia took his leave of Gondemar very well satisfied, not doubting but that Prince in love with Albisinda would be true to his interests. On the other side he was highly pleas'd, that he had incens'd the King of the Basternes against Viridomar, inso-much that he put on a more serene countenance than he was wont to do, all the way he march'd at the head of the principal Officers of his Army and Household, to a large Plain where the Army was to be drawn up in Battalia. The Plain was soon covered with a terrible multitude of Soldiers drawn together from a thousand different Regions, to maintain the unjustest hatred that ever was in the world. The King of the Huns, the King of the Lombards, Agathysfus, the Prince of the Saxons and the new Balamir, not having forces proportionable to their quality, joyned themselves without command to the Prince of Persia; for whose only sake they were engag'd in the League. But though they were nobly mounted and magnificently arm'd, the richness of their ornaments did not so much attract the eyes of the beholders, as the loftiness of their carriage.

The fiery Varanex glister'd with an infinite number of precious Stones, wherewith his Helmet, his Cuirass, and his Buckler were enchas'd, and his Steed which was of the famous Cartbaginian race, did not badly imitate the pride of his Master, as well in his fieryness as in his prancing. Thirty thousand foot and ten thousand horse all Greeks, were under that Prince sent him by Theodosius, they were armed with Bows and Arrows, slings and javelins. The Persian Mitranez, and Acreontes a Macedonian Captain, were the two Lieutenant Generals of that Army. Next after him march'd Martian with an air worthy the fair reputation which he had won, and the supreme dignity to which he was afterwards advanced. Under him Licastes a Corinthian commanded ten thousand Thracians, renowned for their past services, all pick'd and chosen by the order of Pulcheria. The King of Suevia's Troops were about forty thousand men, for the most part fierce and well disciplin'd, over which Cimbrian Briomer, was the first Lieutenant General, being preferred before Rodoaldus a Suede, and a person very considerable in his own Nation, as well for his birth as for his courage. Five and thirty thousand Burgundians, coming from the parts that lye beyond Gallia followed the famous Gondioch, and testified by their countenances how great confidence they had in their Prince, so well assist'd by Gondemar and Guntran.

The generous Arderic led fifteen thousand Alains and twenty thousand Gepides, and though there appeared both love and ambition in his face, yet his carriage shew'd that he knew how to curb those passions within the bounds of reason. Calisir a Gepidian Prince, and Volderan of a very high extraction among the Alains were his Lieutenant Generals. Next to him march'd a Soldier, whose meen was quite different from Arderic's, I mean the sovre Godegesile who commanded forty thousand Herules, that were all for blood and booty, being the remainder of Radagaisus's formidable power, having for his Lieutenant Generals the fiery Ricobald and the bold Guerules, Soldiers of an obscure birth, only they had advanced themselves by their courage. The young Humbert animated with the fair hopes, which the Father of Albisinda had infused into him, brought up the Rear with a most lofty aspect, and was remarkable as well for the magnificence of his Arms, as for thirty thousand Basternes that followed him, under the conduct of Zafron and Generic two experienced commanders. After which was to be seen an infinite number of Carts and Waggons, laden with warlike provisions.

While the Kings of Huns and Lombards, the illustrious Agathysfus, the Prince of the Saxons and the valiant Balamir, made their observations like great Masters in the art of war, in the midst of those prodigious numbers, Sunnon quietly enjoyed the conversation of the Princesses, and having visited Belamira and Polixena, and received from Rosamond such answers, as she thought fit to give him the trouble of carrying to Pharamond and Theobald, he devoted all the rest of his time that he had to stay in Cologne, to converse with the Turingien Queen. For her part Amalaxantha, who found nothing in the person of that Prince, nor in his behaviour, which was not worthy of a more happy fortune, answer'd him as a real friend, and gave him such advice as she thought was most proper, to restore the tranquillity which he had lost: She conjur'd him to banish from his heart a passion that caus'd all his misfortunes, but her suit was accompanied with a languishment so moving, that it served only to rivet those Chains the faster which it sought to have unloosed: So that the passion of the enamoured Sunnon was not a whit the more abated, when he was constrained to take his leave of Amalazoniba, and that he went to retire to the house where Athanasvic lodged. The Turingien had already received his dispatches and was preparing to be gone, as he did accordingly the next day with the King of the Huns, and those other Princes which were resolved to visit Pharamond's Camp.

Pharamond had no sooner intelligence of the visit which was intended him, but he resolved to ride forth to meet the illustrious company. However it was but just that Theodolinda, the King of the Cimbrians, and the Prince of the Visigoths should prevent him, and be a little before him in their observance of the King of the Huns, wherein they were so diligent that they met him just in the mid way between the two Armies, and in his company the famous Martian, Agelmond, the King of the Sarmatians, the Prince of the Saxons and Balamir.

Theobald left Wallia close by Theodolinda's Chariot, that he might have the satisfaction of giving his hand to that fair Princess, and making haste first of all toward that great King whom he had always looked upon as his Father, he accosted him with so much joy and respect, as if he had been his real Father. The King of the Huns immediately threw his Arms about his neck, he embraced him with a tenderness unimaginal, he called him a hundred times his dear Son, not being able to say any more. And in a word he expressed by his tears and his Caresses, much more than he could have done by the most eloquent of words.

Afterwards he presented Balamir to him, and in regard it was his desire that the two Princes should use all the freedom that might be between themselves, they embraced with all those marks of esteem which they had already one for another. They were about also to have made mutual protestations of an inviolable friendship, when they were interrupted by Theodolinda, who impatiently hasted to the extended Arms of a father, whom she had not seen in so long a time before. The King of the Huns received that fair Princess with a satisfaction so extraordinary, that it soon appeared in his looks notwithstanding all the care that he took to conceal some part of it. And whereas he found that his incomparable daughter had acquired at Rome something of an air which I cannot express, that she had not to that degree of perfection at Alba Julia, he had prolonged the pleasure which he took in beholding and caressing her, but that he was willing to give way to Balamir, to see and discourse with his Sister. Thereupon Balamir and Theodolinda accosted each other, and were both overjoyed mutually to behold in each other those perfections, above the descriptions which fame had already made.

But while they are thus awakening in the bottom of their hearts, an affection which a long ignorance had lull'd a sleep, the King their father gave to Wallia whom Theodolinda had presented to him, all that he could imagine due to his quality, his merit, and the services which he had payed the Princess his Daughter, and expressed himself to him in that obliging manner that it was easily to be discern'd, that he was more inclinable to consider the virtues of the Visigoth Prince, than to disrespect him as one that had not a Crown to offer his daughter. On the other side, Wallia testified to the Father of his Princess, all the acknowledgment he was capable to return: At what time, Agelmond, Martian, the King of the Sarmatians and the Prince of the Saxons came forward, not deeming it so convenient before. Agathyrsus, Aldemar, Martian and Agelmond were surpris'd at the beauty of the Princess of the Huns, though they lived in a City where they every day beheld the Rosamonds, the Balamiras and the Polixenas, that had filled the world with the loud report of their charms: But if they beheld Theodolinda with admiration, she could not chuse but cast a most steadfast look upon them, as much accustomed as she was to behold in Pharamond's Army the most lofty Aids, and the goodliest presences of the most accomplished persons living.

At length appeared Pharamond himself, and with him Constantine, Thrasimond, Taxander, Meroveus and Genebaud, while Constance, Viridomar, Marcomire and Artabure stayed behind, as well to accompany Honorius as to take care of the Princesses and the Army. What can I say more, but that all obliging expressions were made use of, and that there appeared in the countenance and looks of Pharamond, an air that attracted the eyes and surpris'd of all that beheld him.

As for the King of the Cimbrians, so far was he from appearing less amiable, that being the delight of all the Earth under the name of Balamir, it might be then said that men were overjoyed to see the goodly air of his countenance reinforced with a support of dignity, which he had so long wanted.

extraordinary esteem; and the King of the Huns at length addressing himself to the King of the Franks, made excuses for all his Friends, in that they were unfortunately engaged on his Rival's side, and then continuing his speech, "Sir, said he, when I have told you that it is love that binds those Princes to the interests of Varanez, you cannot be surpris'd at that sort of injustice which may be laid to their charge; and doubtless you will pardon them a fault which they only commit through the force of that tyranny whose power you are not ignorant of. "I have too sad an experience of it, replyed Pharamond, sighing, and for that reason, Sir, I am more inclinable to pity those persons that are subject to it, than to reserve any resentment against them. Besides, the passion you speak of has always poured upon me whatever it could invent of most cruel, and after I had endured it all from the eyes of the divine Rosmond, I cannot wonder it should raise up a new misfortune against me, through the valour of so many great Princes. But if those famous Warriours are so formidable to our party, we hope their virtue may serve as a consolation and Sanctuary to our Princesses, if there be not a greater reason for us to lay aside our fears for their sakes, while they are in a City where the King of the Huns and his illustrious Friends are able to afford them protection. "Yes, Sir, replied he, I dare undertake that my Friends will not be wanting to shew the Princesses all the offices of kindness which they can expect: for besides that their Generosity commands them, they cannot do otherwise without betraying the party to which they have engag'd themselves. "Nay, I will go a little farther, for I can assure you that the King of the Sarmatians and Martian use all their endeavours to make Varanez more just than he has been hitherto, and to draw him from a league where he is reduced to act all manner of injustice. For my part, you may well believe that I shall omit nothing to procure a general peace. For while the King of the Cimbrians and Theodolinda are in your Army, and the Princess of the Lombards and Balsmir at Cologne, I can never be able long to endure such a distraction of my affections, and Family.

Those two Princes continued their discourse when Agelmond having drawn Theobald aside: "Sir, said he, with an impatience mixed with love and joy, Gilismene is not dead, Gilismene lives: but though the King of the Sarmatians has promised her in possession to the more than happy Agelmond, I should but enjoy a more than imperfect happiness, were I not absolutely perswaded, that the great Theobald, who is deeply himself in love, will not think it strange that the claims which bind me to my Princess, have tied me for her sake to Agathyrfus's interests: I know very well, that being infinitely obliged to your—I beseech you, Sir, modestly replied the King of the Cimbrians, interrupting him, forbear to mention those pretended obligations unless it be to make me acknowledge how far you have outdone me as well in the quality as in the number of your kindnesses: for I never fought for you but against a single enemy of Agelmond, but the generous Agelmond ventured his life against above a hundred thousand enemies of Theobald. But, continued he, not to give the King of the Lombards occasion to continue this discourse, let us rather talk of our Princesses, than our interests; and as there is none that desires more to share in your concerns, as a real Friend, than my self, suffer me to enquire by what miracle the charming Gilismene has been preserv'd to her constant Agelmond.

Thereupon the King of the Lombards briefly related what the King of the Sarmatians had inform'd him of the last adventures of Gilismene; and Theobald having heard him with delight, How you overjoy me, said he, to acquaint me with the calm you enjoy after so many shipwracks as you have escaped; and how thankful should I be to my own destiny, were I so near the having of my content as you. Truly, Sir, replyed Agelmond, I do not think you are far off, nor can I believe after so many revolutions as have happened, you have so much cause to complain of fortune. You may speak in her favour, replyed the Cimbrian King, now that she has been so kind to you; but as she is implacable in the hatred she has displayed against me, I am so far from being obliged to the same acknowledgment, that I must accuse her to have taken from me that which I account most dear to me in the world, and at such a time too when there was no obstacle to my happiness. However, Sir, replyed Agelmond, I believe she will be suddenly reconciled, and make you restitution. She must either restore me my Princess, replyed Theobald, or deprive me of my life: and indeed had I been convinced that I must have renounced my hopes, I had been dead ere now. But to tell you the truth, I never yet despaired of the event of the war. At first I may perhaps look with some perplexity upon the Ramparts of Cologne, the number of your Forces, and the valour of those Princes that prepare to defend a place which we are resolv'd to assail. I confess also that my perplexities redouble, when I remember that Agelmond and his illustrious Friends have taken Varanez's part, yet I recover my hopes again when I consider that nothing ought to be impossible to Lovers, that fight for the liberty of those they love. Besides you need not question but that we have the prayers of many fair Ladies for our prosperity; and you may well guess, that such an advantage will not permit us to question the success of our enterprises.

While they were thus discoursing, Martian and Thrasimond withdrew themselves from the company so soon as they could with conveniency do it, and having embraced each other with all the testimonies of kindneses which a long continued friendship could inspire, they fell into a discourse which they knew not how to get out of, in regard it was altogether of their Princesses, Athenais and Pulcheria. Martian inform'd the Prince of the Vandals all that he had heard from the Court of Theodosius, telling him withal that he expected every day from thence tydings more than ordinary, which he would impart to him so soon as they came. After that they return'd to their company, and entred all together into Pharamond's Camp, where they were received at their first approach by Marcomire and Viridomar. So soon as the Princes were alighted, they went up to the Castle with Theodolinda, who was led by the King of the Sarmatians, and went to the Queen of the Visigoths Apartment, where they found the Queen of Albion, the Princess of the Nemetians, the Emperour of the Romans, the famous Constance and the valiant Artabure. The discourse which they began was lofty, and conformable to the quality of those illustrious persons, but it was soon interrupted by a Collation which the King of the Franks gave them, the magnificence whereof was admired by all the Court, which being ended, they discoursed a while before they retired, and when they came to talk of the Enemies Forces, Pharamond promised to shew him the next day a full muster of those Battalions that were to fight for the liberty of the Princesses.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK III.

P*Haramond, Theobald, Viridomar, Wallia, Thrasimond and Marcomire*, with all the military Ceremonies usual in so great a Court, entertained the Kings of the Huns and Lombards, Agathysus, the Prince of the Saxons, Martian and Balamir; and having acquitted themselves with an unwonted Grace, they retired severally to the particular Quarters which were assign'd each. After that, the King of the Cimbrians and the Suevian Prince went to visit the King of the Franks, where they met the enamoured Sunnon, whose fancy being wholly taken up with the Idea of Amalaxontis, he chose rather to stay with the King his Brother, where he might be free to contemplate upon the Beauties that had charm'd him, than to appear in an assembly where number would but deprive him of those pleasures which are tasted in solitude. Immediately he found himself environed with those Lovers whose Princesses he had been to wait upon; and though Pharamond, Theobald and Viridomar had a mutual respect for each other, they could not avoid interrupting the contemplative Prince more than once, while they enquired after Rosamond, Bellamira and Polixena. Sunnon satisfied them all three with all the speed that might be: he delivered to the Kings of the Cimbrians and Franks the answers which he had brought from Rosamond. Then while he turn'd toward Viridomar to speak of Albifinda and Polixena, Theobald opened the Letter which he received, and read therein the following contents.

The Princess Rosamond to the King of the Cimbrians.

“YEs, Sir, 'tis with more than an ordinary joy that I resign the Scepter of Bohemia, since
 “by that loss I gain a treasure to be preferred before the Empire of the earth: but my “joys abound, when upon the consideration of Heaven's Bounty, I find Balamir to be “Theobald and that Rosamond is the Sister of a Prince whom she had chosen for a Bro“ther from among all the men in the world. I am extremely impatient to see you that I “may be able to testify what I write: but, Sir, let not the knowledge of this desire of mine “put you upon any precipitate action; but on the contrary, be careful of your own pre“servation upon all occasions, where your honour will dispense with exposing your self to “danger. Your fair Princess commands you, and Rosamond conjures you with all her “might.

“I have sent an answer to the King of the Franks, and such a one as I believe will give “you no cause to complain. Thereby you see, Sir, that I have not failed to acknowledge “you for my Sovereign, and exactly to obey your commands.

Theobald

Theobald had no sooner read those words, but he gave his Letter to Pharamond, though the passionate Prince had no power to look upon it till some minutes after: for he had employment enough to peruse over and over again the Letter which he had received himself from his fair Princess, after he had kissed it a thousand times. For he had now no farther cause to complain of Rosamond, in regard, that since the change that had befallen the Fortune of Balamir, she had made no scruple to remit her former severity; and had testified to the most Illustrious of her Lovers, the marks of her Esteem and Acknowledgment, in a Letter containing these obliging words.

The Princess of the Cimbrians to the King of the Franks.

I Have writ you these lines by the Command of the King my Brother; but, Sir, you are not forbid to believe any otherwise, but that I obey without reluctancy. I will go a little further, and confess, that how transcendent soever my joys might be for the discovery of Theobald, they could not at the same time hinder me from remembering my obligations to the King of the Franks. You have been so far from depriving me of a Brother, that you have delivered me of an Enemy. And perhaps it has not been so much a trouble to me to have had so little cause to complain of your Valour, having so much reason to commend your Generosity. This is as much as is permitted me to discover you of my thoughts, since the last Revolution happened. And as for what concerns the prayers which you tell me I should make for your prosperity, you may very well believe, that the greatest share of my good wishes shall be for the good success of a Prince, who exposes his life for the interests of Theobald, and the liberty of Rosamond.

While the enamoured Pharamond was busied in so pleasing an employment, Theobald enquired after Hunnimonda; and Sunnon gave him a full account, as far as he knew. More than that, Sir, added he, I think it my duty to inform you, that the Captain of the King of Suevia's Guards is in the Camp, and his business is to Honorius. Honorius is generous answered Theobald: But, continued he, with some disturbance, in regard he is a lover of my divine Bellamira, it behoves me to look about me: And therefore, I think it will not be amiss to visit a resigning Rival; to the end, that by my presence I may fortifie a Vertue, whereof he has given me such obliging marks. He went his ways without saying a word more: and he was no sooner got to the Emperor of the Roman's Quarters, but the King of the Franks, the Prince of Suevia, and Marcian, who followed them presently after, informed him very earnestly of whatever concerned their Princesses.

Honorius received Theobald with all civility, though with a Countenance, wherein it was no difficult thing to discover both trouble and sadness: And after he had done him those Honours which were due to his Rank and Merit, he turned toward a certain Stranger then in the Room; and addressing his speech to him, Gilric, said he, we may hold on our discourse before a Prince, to whom I am too much beholding, to conceal from him any thing that concerns the incomparable Bellamira. Then tell the King your Master, that I am very unhappy to find, that so divine a Princess will not vouchsafe me her affection, unless I render my self yet more miserable, by drawing her hatred upon me; which I must certainly do, should I accept the proposition which you have made me. And therefore, you may well think, that I shall never change the side that I have taken. But if you could procure me the sight of Bellamira, how far should I be indebted to your kindness; or what is there that you may not expect from the acknowledgment of Honorius? Ab Gilric, added the enamoured Theobald, do us the favour, I beseech you, to let us see our Princess. I make no question, sadly replied the Emperor, addressing his speech to the King of the Cimbrians, but that we would both desire the same thing, and with the same passion; but alas! it is with different hopes.

Instead of proceeding farther, he sighed; and the generous Theobald, being touched with his grief, took his leave of the Emperor; fearing to augment the sorrows of an unfortunate Rival by his presence, while he looked upon him as the Cause of his misfortunes. However, Gilric gave Honorius to understand, that there was no possibility for him to see Bellamira, but upon the conditions which he had propounded; and so quitted his presence, perceiving the disturbances that turmoiled his soul to increase more and more. Nevertheless, he put a constraint upon himself to be at the Mulier; but it was rather out of a complaisance plaisance to Pharamond, who had requested his company, than out of any curiosity to behold Shews of that nature, how gay and pompous soever they were. And indeed, there never was any sight so stately, so magnificent, or so formidable, as the Battalions of that vast Army; being drawn up in a wide Plain, which had separated the two Armies some days before. Quite through the whole Body there was to be seen such a fair and surprizing diversity of Arms, Ensigns, Standards, and military Habiliments; such variety of warlike Instruments, such frightful Woods of Pikes and Javelins offered themselves to view, and yet their terrour afforded a delightful and pleasing prospect. But when the confusion, inseparable from such great Bodies, had given way to the order wherein the Officers had ranged the whole Army, the illustrious Pharamond appeared with an aspect so fierce and charming, that he attracted the eyes and hearts of all that numerous Multitude. Never was any thing so magnificent as the Coat and Buckler of that Prince; nor were the precious Stones that glittered every where so remarkable, as the workmanship that seem'd to exceed the materials in value. Upon his head he wore a light Headpiece, covered over with a plume that yielded to the breathings of a gentle wind, and was fastened with a knot of large Diamonds in the fore part of the Morrión. His Horses of the right Mauritanian breed, was of an Isabella colour, with a black Mane that hung down to the ground in curls, and swept the ground: but so lofty, so stately was his Gate, that he seem'd to have a redoublement of pride to find himself only under the curb of Pharamond. Upon each hand of the King rode the goodly Marcomire and the enamour'd Sannon, being followed by twenty thousand Franks, fifteen thousand Sicambres, and ten thousand Mursians, all lusty well disciplin'd, and accustomed to vanquish under their King. They marched under the command of Genebaud, Meroveus, Cleomer and several other Princes and Captains of their several Nation. Their Arms were polished and glittering, their countenances fierce; nor was it a difficult thing to observe the courage that reigned in their countenances. After them marched thirty thousand Cimbrians or Bohemians, drawn from those Countries that are enclosed by the Hereynian Mountains. Their Arms were Bows and Poleaxes, and the boldness that appeared in their looks proceeded from the renown of their past actions, and the confidence which they had in the conduct of their King. That valiant Warriour lead them with an incomparable Grace; nor did the magnificence of his Arms, nor the richness of his Plume add at all to the charming and astonishing air that caused him to be revered by all the world. His fiery Steed of a lovely shape, and the Sarmatian Breed, was of a tiger colour, and the foam that covered his Body seem'd to have made new marks. The Prince of Nomistrata, the most considerable among the Cimbrians, and Telanor were Lieutenant Generals to that Army which was followed by twenty thousand Gauls that came from the pleasant Provinces that border upon the Seine and the Loire. Those Troops composed of Archers, Slingers and Javelins, marched with an assurance that became their reputation under the command of Viridomar, by the appointment of Pharamond, who would not suffer that Prince to be without a command. The Lover of Polyxena appeared at the head of his charge, with so many marks of extraordinary valour; that he seem'd to have brought a considerable reinforcement, though he came single, to take part with the Franks, and whatever sadness he carried in his heart, he was nevertheless most magnificent in his Arms, and in his warlike Habiliments: Antenor and Dagobert were the principal Officers under him. At the reere of the Army followed another little differing in Nation from that which marched before, being drawn from those Provinces that stretch beyond the Rhine toward the coast of Massilia. Those Gauls were armed like the former, and their number was almost equal, being reinforced with four thousand Romans under the command of that great personage to whom the whole League would have resign'd the supreme authority. It was the famous Constance, the support of Honorius, and the only Pillar of the Empire, a Victor over many Kings, who upon the return of his glorious hopes had recovered that former Gayety which always accompanied him in danger. That great Captain whom so many remarkable exploits had covered with renown, was so far from accepting the obliging offers which the Princes made him, that he yielded the chief honours to Pharamond, Theobald and Viridomar, not only because those three Princes were the most valiant in the world, but also because they were the most concerned in the design, having every one of them a Mistress or a Sister to set at liberty. Valerius and Sigebert commanded under the Lieutenant of Honorius. Constantine had ten thousand Britains, which Dinox had sent him out of Armorica, and two hundred Chariots filled with Archers, arm'd with Sythes and broad blades of Swords: his Horse was bred in one of the Countries under his own Dominion; and besides that it was the best and fairest that ever was seen in that Country, it seem'd to be the more stately for having been preferred by his Prince to all his other Horses brought from remote Countries. The King of the Britains naturally of a fiery disposition, breath'd after nothing but combat, and though he might have been contented with the reputation he had purchased, and the Queen of Albion's affection, however he could not but shew a generous impatience to signalize himself for the interest of his friends.

Taxander had the same thoughts as he had, for though he were very near being married to the lovely Adelaiada, yet he was unwilling to have his Nuptials celebrated till the end of the war wherein he had taken a part, or till he had set Cleomira at liberty. His Helmet, Cuirass, his Coat of Mail and his Buckler, glittered with precious Stones in all the most remarkable parts, and with an air conformable to the grandeur of his degree, he rode at the head of fifteen Tougres and ten thousand Nemetians, of which Flavian was Lieutenant General. After him appeared the Prince of the Visigoths attended by Hilderic, who led twenty thousand fighting men, all experienced Soldiers and of approved valour. They had been at the taking of Rome, and had signaliz'd their courage as well under the famous Alaric as under the generous Wallia.

He rode with a most comely grace upon a Sorrel Horse, that was bred near the Banks of Tagus, but a Beast so lovely, so fiery, and so lofty in his prancings, that he would have busied the eyes of the spectators much more, had not the Master drawn off their eyes both by the beauties of his person, and by the magnificence of his Arms. His Helmet, covered all over with a Plume of different colours, was fastned before with a rose of Diamonds of a very great value, and the most remarkable parts of his Cuirass, his Buckler and the Hilt of his Sword were enchas'd with large Diamonds.

The penfive Thrasimond followed him negligent in his habit, for his Arms were plain, but they were polished and excellently temper'd: A large Feuille mort Plume floated upon his Helmet, and his Horse was the loveliest that was ever bred in that Coast of Spain, the melancholy that appeared in the countenance of that Prince, was so far from having any thing in it of dogged or ill-natur'd, that it was only a kind of sweetness accompanied with a certain languishment: And it so visibly appeared to proceed from a profound tenderness, that it was impossible to behold that unfortunate Lover, without sharing in his affliction. Gidifles, whose pardon Honorius had not only requested but obtain'd under Gunderic's Brother, led twenty thousand Vandals arm'd with long javelins and terrible clubs. They consisted of old disciplin'd Soldiers enured to labour: After them the valiant Artabure appear'd commanding six thousand chosen horse, who were still to be at hand where succour was required. Prince Priam brought up the Rear, having the command of the Engines of battery, and rode at the head of those Officers, who had the charge of either managing or making them. In short, the whole Army consisted of about a hundred and forty thousand foot, and sixty thousand Horse, besides those that looked after the carriages, and the sick and wounded.

The King of the Huns and the rest of those Princes that came down from Agrippina, were extremely satisfied in the Muster which they had seen: And very pleasant they were between whiles, in discoursing with the Queen of the Visigoths, the Queen of Albion, Theodolinda, and Adelaiada. But Honorius was buried in so profound a melancholy, that he spoke little, and took less notice of what passed before his eyes, nor did he break silence till the Princes were upon their return to Cologne, nor then neither but only to talk of Hunnimonda to the King of the Huns, who he knew well had almost as great an affection for that Princess, as for Theodolinda. Balamir parted from his Sister and the Cimbrian King very unwillingly, and addressing himself to Theobald; Sir, said he, 'tis not for me to bear that name which you have rendred so famous through the world, with a renown answerable to yours, but that I may not utterly ruine it by running upon a certain defeat, be pleas'd to let me understand how I may avoid you in the fight. You have prevented me, replied the King of the Cimbrians, for indeed for my own safeties sake, I should have us'd that caution before, which you have already done. After those expressions of modesty, they were agreeing upon what marks they should observe, when Thrasimond and Martian having taken the same course, embraced each other a thousand times before they parted.

As for the King of the Lombards he was very unwilling to leave the Cimbrian King, nor was Wallia less grieved to part with the Father of his Princess: And for Theodolinda, she could not chuse but shed some tears upon that occasion, though the Queen of the Visigoths and the Queen of Albion, did all they could to quiet the discontents of her mind.

In the mean time there was nothing more apparently visible, in the countenances of the Princes, than the generous impatience which they had to attack Cologne, and encounter the Army which prepared to defend it. To which purpose Pharamond would have resign'd the honour of general command to the great Constance, the vanquisher of so many Kings and warlike Nation. But the famous Roman refused it with an extraordinary modesty, giving him to understand at the same time, that no person would presume to accept of the Supreme command in an Army led by Pharamond, Theobald, and Viridomar. Every one of them having all the qualifications of a great Captain, besides that they were more concern'd than any of the rest in the enterprise it self. Nevertheless the Kings of the Franks and Cimbrians, together with the Suevian Prince, so strongly opposed the general inclination to have submitted to them, that it was at length concluded, that the whole Army should be divided into six Bodies, the first of Franks, Sicambers, and Martians, under the invincible Pharamond: the Second of Bobemians, Coldalians, and Sudinians, under the famous Theobald: The third of Gauls and the remainder of Pharamond's Army under Viridomar. The Fourth of Romans, Gauls, and Visigoths under Constance and Walita. The fifth of Britains with their scythed Chariots, and Vandals under Constantine and Thrasimond. The sixth of Tongres and Nemetians under Taxander; Artabure commanded the reserves. It was moreover agreed that these six should be Generalissimo's in their turns one day after another and that Pharamond should be the first obeyed.

But the enterprise was so difficult, that had they not been Princes whose courage was invincible, they would never have undertaken it. For it behoved them to take Cologne, a very strong and well fortified place, and they were to take it in spite of an Army, more numerous than that which was to attack it, and commanded by as great Soldiers as any were in the world. The Kings of the Franks and Cimbrians together with Viridomar, saw the difficulties that opposed their intentions, but their warlike heat was so far from being cool'd thereby, that the generosity of their Souls was but the more incens'd against those obstacles, and nothing would serve their turns but a speedy victory. Thereupon the King of the Franks desirous to know what pass'd in Agrippina and in the Camp of his Rivals, sent several parties toward the Camp and City, as well to observe the motion of the Enemy as to bring in prisoners.

To this purpose the bold Genebald with a thousand choice horse, set upon that Quarter where the Burgundians lay, and after some few skirmishes wherein he still got the better, he brought away several that yielded themselves. On the other side, Meroveus with another party equal in number, march'd toward Agrippina, and having advanced as far as the bridge whereby the Army of the League and the City corresponded together, he return'd with success little different. So that by the report of the two Princes, or by the confession of the prisoners, Pharamond, Theobald, and Viridomar understood those things which it was very necessary for them to know. They were advertis'd that the King of Sweden had an absolute power in Cologne, that the City was at his devotion as well as the inhabitants, and that Briomer in whom he entirely confid'd, had acted with so much cunning and success, that he had no cause to be afraid which way soever the victory fell, since if fortune were never so contrary to him, he had the destiny of the Princesses in his own hands. But Sir, added one of the prisoners that had undertaken to speak for the rest, the Suevian King has rais'd two forts at the end of the Bridge of Cologne, which Prince Meroveus might easily take notice of: For the defence whereof he has put into them six hundred Suevians, and six hundred Herulians, under the command of Gilric and Ricobald, two persons of an approved valour, who will not only be able to hold out, till they be succoured by the sallies from the Town, but from the body of the Army whenever it shall be requisite.

Pharamond having inform'd himself in some other little circumstances, sent for a Burgundian that Genebald had taken, who being examined made answer, that there was not a better Army in the world, than that which had undertaken to defend Cologne. It consists of six great bodies, continued he, under the command of the Prince of Persia, Marcian, the King of the Burgundians, the King of the Herules, Arderic and Humbert. But besides the confidence they have in these Captains, they promise themselves a great assistance from the four Princes that take part with the Persian Prince, meaning the King of the Sarmatians, the King of the Lombards, the Prince of the Saxons and the valiant Balamir. For as for the King of the Huns it is reported that he will stay in Cologne, on purpose to mollifie the humour of the King of Suevia, upon all occasions wherein he might be urg'd to acts of violence.

After he had declared some few other circumstances the Stranger was dismiss'd, and Constance, the Kings of the Britains and Tongres, with many other Princes and Officers came to consult with the King of the Franks, about the execution of their great design in hand. The general opinion was, that they should forthwith make a Bridge of Boats to pass some part of the Army beyond the Rhine, into the Country of the Ubians, so to begirt Agrippina in on every side. Thereupon Flavian and Dinox were ordered to march to Segodunum, there to build Vessels with all the speed that might be, to be brought into the Rhine through the mouth of the Segna. They concluded also to storm the two Forts that were kept by Gilric and Ricobald, notwithstanding all the succours that could come out of Agrippina, or from the Camp. By such a vigorous action the Princes thought they might win a reputation to their party; and that which flattered their impatience was, that by such an Attack they hoped to draw out the Body of the Enemy, and to fight him out of his Entrenchments; and so by putting it to the decision of a Battel, they should either see their Princeesses at liberty, or in the Conflict meet with the end of their lives and miseries, both together.

Thereupon, it being the King of the Franks turn to command next morning, Telanor and Valerius marched by his order towards the Bridge of Cologne. They had with them four thousand Foot: for whose relief followed Thrasimund and Sunnon, with ten thousand Horse. Those two Princes had requested that Employment, for reasons grounded upon Love and Friendship: For the Brother of Gonderic chose rather to take the Road for Agrippina, than to encounter an Army where he might meet Martian; and the passionate Sunnon took pleasure in going either to fight or die near a City, where the fair Queen of the Turingiens was immur'd. Theobald and Constance prepared to follow, with the two Bodies under their Command, the ten thousand Horse, led by Sunnon and Thrasimund; while Pharamond, Viridomar, Constantine and Taxander marched in good order toward the Camp of the Enemy. In the mean time, Telanor and Valerius being far advanced before, and discovered by the Out-Guards of the Suevians, were suddenly charged by a Party that made a most vigorous Sally, to keep them off from the Forts. But those two valiant Personages made so good use of what they had learned under the famous Constance, and the King of the Cimbrians, that after a stout resistance, and considerable loss on both sides, they repulsed Gilric and Ricobald, and had carried the Forts, had they not been charged on a sudden by the Garrison of Cologne; while on the other side, Balamir and Aldemar advanced against Thrasimund and Sunnon at the head of many thick Squadrons, followed by Arderic and Godegesile, who led the two Bodies of the Armies under their Commands. The valiant Ambiomer, and the famous Lover of Melasintha, thundred in upon Thrasimund, and the Brother of the King of the Franks: but they were encountered with so terrible an impetuosity, that their four Lances flew into a thousand pieces; and the shock of the four Warriors was made with that violence, which I believe few of the stoutest among men were able to have endured. After that they drew their dreaded Swords, incensed at a resistance with which they were not accustomed to meet: and they were about to have continued a Combat, the consequences whereof would have proved very fatal, but that the Troops that they conducted with a fiery impatience charged each other, and parted their Captains, whatever endeavours they made to meet again. So that being all four constrained to set upon Enemies less worthy of their Valour, Aldemar and Ambiomer poured in among the Gauls, which were commanded by Antenor and Dagobert, whom they threw to the ground, at the same time that Thrasimund and Sunnon having beaten Ricobald and Gilric, to the Earth, made a Squadron of the Suevians and Herules give way, who had fought till then with much obstinacy. They chased them with so much heat, that not being able to moderate their Courages, they entred the very City it self. Briomer came running to the Conflict, and foamed for madness to see so much ill success. He caused the Gates to be shut where the two Victors were entred, which he intended to have sacrificed to his Cruelty: And commanding them to be environed on every side, Thrasimund and Sunnon found themselves in the midst of a dismal shower of Darts and Javelins. But perceiving the danger wherein they were engaged, they minded less the preservation of their lives, than to fight for the interest of their Princeesses, by weakening the Forces of their Oppressors. Thereupon they flew like two enraged Lions upon the Soldiers that Briomer encouraged to their destruction, and charged them with so much fury and violence, that every blow beat down an Enemy to the ground, so that they stood almost surrounded with a Rampart of dead bodies, which, though it could not absolutely defend them, yet the terror of their Spectacle rendred them more formidable than they had been before. But in regard they had received already many wounds, and that they were in the midst of an unexhaustible deluge of adversaries, without any likelihood of being relieved, their valour must of necessity have been overpowered by number, had not the King of the Huns and the Prince of the Burgundians, espying their distress, commanded off the multitude which Briomer had got together, representing to the violent Cimbrian, that it was for his interest to preserve two such Captains that could not but be very considerable in their own party. With that they put Thrasimund and Sunnon into the hands of some of their Officers, with special order to take care of their persons, and then rode about to visit other parts of the

In the mean time, Ambioner and Aldemar having broken in among the Cavalry which Ibrahimond and Swinnon had commanded, were of a sudden surrounded by Pharamond, while Constance and Theobald, having taken the two Forts, were come to blows with Ardaric and Codegesile; and Martian and Viridomar having attacked one another, gave a thousand proofs of that conspicuous valour which had purchased them so high a renown. In another Quarter Constantine and Gondioch, Alexander and Umbert opposed each other, and met with that heat and impetuosity that the Combat portended a very fatal event: nevertheless, those famous Warriors were parted more than once, while the force of their own Troops carried them like a stream, one one way, one another, notwithstanding all their endeavours to have had a second encounter: so that they were constrained to turn their fury against meaner Foes, and to offer up lives less considerable to their revenge, than they had assailed at the beginning of the Battel. It happened also that the great Pharamond and the fiery Varanez after they had broken their Lances, and made use of their Swords, could not fully accomplish their purposes, being separated by their own Squadrons, who, encouraged by their example, maintained the fight with an extraordinary vigour. However the victory inclined to Pharamond, who was only slightly wounded, whereas the Persian Prince had received a great cut of a Sword that made him hit the pommel of his Saddle. The haughty Varanez enraged at the sight of his blood, threw himself into a Body of the Franks with such a violence as triumphed soon over all the resistance that was made against him: and the valiant Kings of the Sarmatians and Lombards being joyned with him, made way through all opposition, and having forced the Sicambres to give ground, they got as far as the ten thousand Marsyans that were in the rear of the Army: Artabure with his Reserve, Wallia with his Visigoths, and Marcomire with a reinforcement of Franks hastened to the relief of those Troops which Agathysus and Agelmond pursued: then began a Combat between those great Heroes so bloody, and so obstinate, that the success was very doubtful: the dreadful Pharamond, after he had overrun like a dismal torrent the Geecks, Ibracians and Gepides, and was got as far as the Enemies Line, was advertised of the progress of the Persian Prince, which made him turn to the assistance of those that stood in need of his aid. His presence immediately changed the face of the Combat, for Varanez's Troops being forced to retire, were in a short time after absolutely routed: So that the Prince Agathysus and Agelmond had no other thoughts but of joyning together and dying honourably.

The King of the Sarmatians took care only to defend the Prince of Persia, and Agelmond laboured only to save Agathysus, when Pharamond arriving and knowing who they were, caused the Soldiers that environed them to retire, and thus bespake them: Valiant Princes, said he, live invincible, and do not believe that among persons that know how to reverence virtue, your lives shall be exposed to sink under the inequality of multitude. The three illustrious friends moved at so magnanimous an action, and Varanez himself perceiving a certain moderation in his natural fierceness, as he began to feel a remissness also in the violence of love, undertook to speak, and addressing himself to the King of the Franks, Pharamond, said he, I must acknowledge that thy generosity surpasses mine, and that Varanez must at length yield thee that which he had resolved to dispute with thee to the last drop of his blood. He had no sooner expressed himself in that manner, but the Kings of the Sarmatians and Lombards testified their acknowledgment to Pharamond, while Marcomire, Wallia, and Artabure, came up time enough to be witnesses of what had passed.

But now in regard that Night grew on, and that the two Armies were about to retreat, before the Franks could make use of all those advantages which they had right to claim, Pharamond was willing that Varanez, Agathysus and Agelmond should return to their Camp, which they did accordingly after they had promised to return to him again, if they could act advantageously for him, either in Cologne or among the confederate forces.

They were no sooner arrived within their own entrenchments, but the King of the Sarmatians overjoyed, to see the change that had happened in the heart of Varanez, would not lose the least moment of time, in seeking to persuade him absolutely from staying in Germany, and because he had most powerful arguments for his return to Persia, he made choice of that opportunity, to insuse into him a desire of departing into his own dominions, repeating to him the generosity of the King of the Franks, and Rosamond's engagement to him. Afterwards having awakened his ambition, he gave him to understand that the Crown of Persia was but in a tottering condition, if he did not go himself to settle it upon the head of Isdigestes.

Varanez more alarm'd at that news than he had been some days before, was very curious to know what had happened in the Court of Persepolis during his absence, and requested the King of the Sarmatians to make him a Relation, to which he readily consented so soon as they had searched their wounds and had taken a little rest. Thereupon the two Princes leaving it to others to inform them of the condition of the two Armies after so signal a battle, retired into a Closet, giving order not to be interrupted. And then the King of the Sarmatians addressing his speech to the Persian Prince, thus began.

The History of the King of the Sarmatians.

I Do not believe Sir, that you expect a long recital of my Adventures, for besides that it is not for me to enlarge upon the particulars of my life, I see you so taken up with those passions wherewith your mind is agitated, that I will only insist upon those circumstances which may be most inducing, to make you determine best for your advantage. I will only tell you then, that I was about seventeen years of Age, when the King of the Huns invaded the dominions of the King my Father, while on the other side upon the banks of the great River Rba, which are the bounds between us and Scythia, the Perierbes and the Sapotrenes endeavoured to free themselves from our Yoke, and made use of an opportunity favourable to the design, which they had premeditated so long before.

Thereupon they openly revolted, and having either slain or expell'd their Governours, they gave the chief employments to those of the Rebels, who had been most forward at the beginning of the sedition. At such a troublesome conjuncture, the King of the Sarmatians determin'd to march against the Huns, as being the more formidable Enemy by the conquest of whom he should reap most honour. Whereupon, I being able to bear Arms, and unwilling to lye idle in the City when all the Court was gone to the war, the King my Father to satisfy a desire which he could not well disapprove, sent me toward the Rba with a Lieutenant General, whose experience was well known and to whom he recommended me, as a trust that was infinitely dear to him.

Nor had I any reason, Sir, to complain of fortune in my first apprenticeship in war, for after some slight skirmishes I gave the enemy a general Battel, wherein I obtained a signal victory, and reduced the Rebels to their obedience, though it be very true that I received a very considerable recruit from Adamarfes King of the Scythians, who was our confederate and had espoused the Sister of the King my Father. Syrdenia, for that was the Princess's name, was more than ordinarily tender of the concerns of her family: So that she received me with the affection of a Mother, when I came to Iffedon to return thanks to the King her Husband. While I was at the Court of Adamarfes, I was advertis'd that the King your Father was raising forces in all parts, with an intention to invade the Scythians, and to retake from them the Province of the Sogdians and a part of Bactriana, of which the Scythians had made themselves Masters, when the Monarchy of the Persians fell into the hands of the Parthians. But while he stay'd till the season of the year was fit to take the field, there was great care taken by the orders of Syrdenia for my divertisement: So that I was entertain'd with much more sumptuousness and gallantry than I expected. For I must confess ingenuously, I did not think to have found among the Scythians, either magnificence or politeness. But I was soon convinced of my error, for I beheld those publick pastimes which were accompanied with so much pomp, that I was altogether surpris'd, though all that I saw was far beneath what I admir'd in the person of the Scythian Princess. Thereupon I was so much moved with the charms of her converse, and those testimonies of kindness which she every day afforded me, created so much gratitude in my heart, that I suddenly felt for that fair and illustrious Kinswoman an affection, as tender as that which I had for the Princess of the Sarmatians. Sydemiris, that was the name of the Scythian Princess, had not yet attained the fifteenth year of her age. Yet as young as she was, she was very tall, and though her proportion were streight and full of Majesty, there was however somewhat which I cannot tell how to express, of freedom and unaffectedness which was infinitely taking. Her complexion was so clear and lively that it even dazled the eye, and her hair the fairest white in the world, hung in natural curls about her lively cheeks. Her eyes were blew, large, fairly distanc'd and glittering: Her mouth small with a vermilion lip, exact in proportion, her teeth even and white beyond compare. She has a piercing wit, aspiring, and so delicate that few persons are able to please her. I thwarted her several times, but in regard she had a real friendship for me, she freely gave me that liberty, and conversed with me with all the confidence I could expect from a Sister. One day that I was walking with her in a Gallery, where were the portraitures of several Princes, Madam, said I a little seriously, these pictures which I observe have occasion'd me to take notice; that notwithstanding all the fair qualities which we admire in you, there is something which you want, that it is not over easie for you to be Mistress of. I believe, replied she with the same Air, you need no more than cast your eye upon me to make that observation, and I dare boast that I am able to instruct you better in that argument, than all the pictures you can consult. I believe you so unable, replied I, to perform what you say, that I cannot tell whether you have not need your self of a little instruction, since if I am not deceived you want an adorer of your charms, nor is it an easie thing for you to find one worthy of them. I see very well, (added I immediately, not giving her time to return me an answer) by my observation of those pictures, that among those who are neighbours to the King your Father, Theodosius or Varanez might not be ashamed to wear your Chains, but I am disturb'd to see that fate should otherwise ordain it. For the Emperour of the East is just upon a marriage with the fair Athenais, and Varanez is preparing to invade the Dominions of Adarmartis. I must confess, replied she very pleasingly, I should do ill to complain of your little care though it be but slight, however to settle your disturbance I must tell you that I bear no envy toward the daughter of Leontin: And for the preparations which are made against us, in Persia, I assure you I am nothing afraid of them so long as you are of our side. As far as I see, merrily replied I, you are no way ingrateful to a person that would be glad to behold those eyes of yours triumphing over the most illustrious freedoms. However do not think to satisfy me with this piece of acknowledgment, I require one of another nature, for I would fain have you tell me whether Varanez does not merit the esteem of a fair Princess? Though it were only to appear generous in doing justice to our enemies, answered she, I must needs say with all the ingenuity you can expect from me, that there is no Princess in the world, that has any reason to be offended at the vows and protestations that Varanez should address to her. On the contrary, as they have described the heart of that Prince to me, I believe the person that should reign there, would have no reason to complain of the extent of her Empire. But, answered I, what if such another enemy as he should become a Slave to the incomparable Sidemiris? Well, replied she immediately, as that will never come to pass, I have as little reason to make you an answer as to content my curiosity. You know it is more probable that you may one day see the Princess of Persia, which if it should come to pass I have more reason to enquire of you, whether you could so well defend your heart against the charms of Artaxira? I am ignorant of the time to come, (answered I strangely discompos'd I knew not wherefore) But, added I endeavouring to smile, if I ever see Artaxira, and that she be so inhumane to load me with chains, I shall leave nothing unattempted to bring Varanez under your subjection: For to tell you truth Madam, if he were once but here you would return me a thousand thanks, nor would you give Varanez a worse reception than the Princess his Sister gave me.

It was thus Sir, that we sometimes discours'd of you and of the divine Artaxira, out of a kind of prediction of the future, and these pleasing conversations divertifed us from time to time, till I was forced to return to Adamarses, then in those provinces where we conjectured your Father would pour in his Army. Ours was no less numerous than his when we took the field, and that which made us more confident than the number of our Soldiers, was the news which we heard that you were departed out of Persia, and that no person was able to give an account whither you were gone. They told us that the discontent of Isdigestes for your departure was such, that he could not dissemble it, though afterwards he put a constraint upon himself, lest his sadness might discourage the Soldiery. Nor was he willing to discredit his own reputation, should he give over an enterprize that had made such a noise over all the East, which would not permit him to hesitate any longer: so that he entred Bactriana at the head of sixscore thousand men. Resaces an illustrious Prince of your blood, conducted the right wing of that Army, and the left was commanded by Megalases, a Soldier of high repute among the Persians. Nor will it be necessary to tell you more, than that the two Kings gave a thousand proofs of their courage and experience, that Resaces signaliz'd himself, and that Megalases perform'd exploits worthy of eternal remembrance. However, Fortune was not favourable to the Persians, but on the contrary visibly declared her self for our party, so that the Scythians had no reason to complain of the success of that day.

Here Varanez interrupted the King of the Sarmatians, not enduring that his modesty should pass over many circumstances so much to his honour. Sir, said he, you think you have concealed by your silence, the great actions which you performed at that time, but renown has sufficiently spread the report thereof. I know we have lost six and thirty thousand men in that battel, and that the Scythians being Masters of the field, confess, that it was to your valour alone that they were beholding for the victory. I also understand that you took Megalases, that you wounded Resaces, and that you saved the life of the King my Father, when it was in your power to have slain him, or made him a prisoner to the Scythians.

I grant, replied Agathyrus, since you will have it so, that I might have had advantages considerable enough, and that Isdigestes was convinced of it, as you will find by the sequel of this discourse. The King of the Scythians also bestowed upon me many marks of his acknowledgment; nor did I at any time perceive, that he ever preserv'd any resentment for those actions which perhaps would not have been approved by a Prince less generous. The Queen and the Princess received me with an extraordinary affection, and were as joyful for my return, as if I had been the young Acarus's Prince of Scythia, had he been in a condition to have serv'd in the war, and had obtained so great a victory. But during our publick rejoycings, they told me that Megalases was fallen into an extraordinary fit of melancholy: and in regard I knew his chains were not very uneasy, I conjectured that disease proceeded not so much from his stay at Issedon, as from his absence from Persopolis. Thereupon I took pity of him, and obtained his liberty, and gave order that he should be provided of all things necessary for his return according to his Quality. Never did person appear so sensible of obligations as Megalases, for the kindnesses I had shewed him. He would have thrown himself at my feet, in testimony of his acknowledgment. And he gave me to understand, that his life would have been far more insupportable to him than death it self, had he been constrained to have stayed any longer at Issedon: Not, Sir, added he, that I have had any reason to complain of the usage I have received here; or because I am forced to be absent from a Court which is so gallant and magnificent. But, Sir, it is because I am in love, because the charms of that person I adore have caused me a thousand Rivals, and I am still afraid lest my absence may prove fatal to me. Go then, Megalases, replied I, be gone, reestablish your own happiness by your return, and deliver me from the trouble it would be to me, should I be the cause of the prejudice which you fear.

Thereupon the enamoured Persian went his ways, so soon as he had return'd thanks to the King of the Scythians. And some few days after we understood that Gobrius, a very considerable person among the Persians, was coming in the quality of an Embassadour from Isdigestes for the dispatch of several weighty affairs. And it was indeed to put an end to that famous War which had been as ancient between us as the two Monarchies, and that since Cyrus and Tomiris had been but too often renewed with dreadful losses on both sides: But, Sir, you shall see how far the King your Father abounded in that acknowledgment which he thought was due to me, and what an opinion he had conceived of Agathyrus: He gave order that a peace should be concluded upon such conditions as I should think fit to impose: and he gave such absolute command to that purpose, that his orders were fulfilled, whatever reasons I could give against my being Umpire in an affair of such importance. Thereupon the Treaty was concluded, yet so that the King of Persia had no cause to repent; for besides that we did him no injustice either in reference to his interests, or to his honour, he had very suddenly an occasion for our Army to march against the Partians, who were revolted from him. Then was I so taken with the proceeding of Isdigestes, that I resolv'd to serve him in person, but with an intention to keep my self disguised, to free my self from any more marks of his obliging disposition. To that purpose I took very few along with me, and changing my name, I called my self Phradates: but before I set forward for Persia, as I was in discourse with Sidemiris, I told her I would suddenly let her know whether the Princess Artaxira were so fair as she had perswaded me to believe her: If it be so, added I, and that I feel by experience the force of that wherewith you have threatened me so often, I will not fail of the promise I have made you, being resolv'd so soon as Artaxira shall have laden me with her Fetters, to betray Varanez into your chains. I will dispense with you for putting your self to that trouble, replied the smiling, and provided you do not make good your freedom against a Princess whose charms, as I have said, you have no power to resist, I will discharge you of all the rest.

Thus, Sir, I took my leave of Sidemiris; and having afterwards kissed the King and Queen's hands, I left Issedon, and rode toward the Province of the Massagetes, where I entered the Dominions of the King your Father, I was no sooner arriv'd at Persopolis, but I was inform'd of the effects which your absence had produced. It was reported that the Partians had taken Arms against a Prince whose Successor they dreaded. On the other side, Resaces acting as presumptive Heir of the Crown, seem'd to be puff'd up with a new pride, and openly spoke of his pretensions to the Princess Artaxira, and the Scepter which he was ere long to wield. Isdigestes was constrain'd to give way to the Season; he saw the Persians would rather chuse to obey a Prince of their own Nation, than to fall under the Dominions of Strangers: and for his part, if it should be his misfortune never to hear of you again, he found it more consolation to leave the Empire to Araxius, than to provide for her any other way. Thereupon Resces desirous to shew himself worthy those glorious hopes which he had conceived, besought the King for the command of the Army which was to march against the Partians, a request that was presently granted him; and thereupon Megalases, who was his Lieutenant General, with all speed marched directly toward the Banks of Etymander, whither it was reported that the Rebels were advanced, having made themselves Masters of all the considerable places in Drangiana.

Now in regard it was not possible for me to conceal my self long from Megalases, whether I intended to stay in the Camp or visit the Court, I discovered my self to him, believing that the confidence which I reposed in him would oblige him to be the more conformable to my intentions. To which purpose I gave him a visit, and having obtained a particular audience for a strange Knight, I went into his Closet and discovered my face. He no sooner knew me again, but he shewed himself more than extraordinarily joyful; he would have thrown himself at my feet, he would have advertised the King; but having opposed all his resolutions which he had only taken up in haste, I conjured him not to make known my real quality: I told him I had reasons wherefore I would not make my self known; and that he could not suspect a Prince that was so far from being an Enemy of Isdigestes, that he came on purpose to serve him: 'Tis not, Sir, answered he, 'tis not that he has any reason to suspect your manner of acting, your Generosity sufficiently assures him of that. But, Sir, does it become me to see my Benefactor in Persia, nay, my Prince's Benefactor too, without yielding him all the acknowledgments that are due to him? It must be so, my dear Megalases, replied I, for if I obtain not that which I desire you to grant, you will disoblige me more sensibly than you can think to do me kindnesses in bestowing honours upon me, which will only serve to perplex and entangle my designs: suffer me therefore to live at my own freedom I conjure you: if you will be so kind to me, I may stay a while in Persia, otherwise I must be gone again presently, to seek out other Countries where I may be at liberty to live as I think most convenient for me. And therefore if you desire to detain me here, you must only treat me as a certain Knight called Phradates, that is come to see the most flourishing Kingdom in the world.

At length, Sir, I over-perswaded Megalases in such a manner, that he consented to my request: so that it was no difficult thing for me to conceal my self under the name of Phradates. For Gobrias, who knew me as well, not being able to overtake either the Army, or the King, was retired to a House of his own, some seven or eight miles distant from Persepolis.

Isdigestes advanced with some part of his Household as far as Marasium, which, as you know, is a fair and great City upon the Frontiers of the Rebels Country which he was going to subdue: but in regard I was not willing they should present me to that Prince, till I had done him some considerable service, I went and offered my self: and I was so fortunate in the first Battel, that the principal among the Persians perswaded the King that he owed the advantages which his Army had obtained, to me. Resces also confessed that I had disengaged him from his Enemies, and that I had slain the General of the Partians. He would also have made me a very considerable present; but Phradates, being Agathyrsius, had no need of his gifts. The same day they brought me a Sword from the King, the Hilt whereof was enriched with precious Stones of a great value, which I accepted with that return of thanks that it became me. But I could not forbear to give the Officer of Isdigestes, a Diamond, of which the Persians so well knew the value, that they were surpris'd at my liberality: so that the King imagining that a person who used that kind of prodigalities, could not be of a mean extraction, was not contented to bestow extraordinary Caresses upon me, but he gave me honours little different from those which I might have expected, had my real condition been known. Thereupon he urged me several times to discover my self more precisely than I had done before: so that not having the power to speak against my own thoughts; nor yet to declare that I was that Agathyrsius to whom he thought himself beholding, I besought him only to believe that I had sufficient cause to conceal my name, in regard I was to travel into Countries far remote from Persia; But, interrupted Isdigestes, is there no way to make our Court the bounds of your travels? and to give you that content that you shall have no cause to wish your self in that Country which you quitted for the sake of ours? I know 'tis not wealth that will stay you with us. But if the lustre of some great employment can move you, and that you have not a heart altogether insensible, I will find in my Court, and that of the Princess, wherewith to give you double satisfaction.

As it was impossible for me to oblige my self to his service, he was surpris'd at my refusal: how respectfully soever I might behave my self, so that he was extremely perplexed out-of the desire he had to detain me in his Kingdom. Nor was it any more than he testified upon an opportunity, that presented it self a little while after: For besides that he gave me the government of a most considerable City, and the Country under its jurisdiction, he made choice of me among the small number of personages of quality, which he took along with him to see the Princess, who was advanced as far as Marasium. Upon the appearance of the divine Artaxira, those eyes of hers strook mine with a most dazzling lustre. I will not say the Princess appeared that day more lovely than ever you beheld her, she was in a riding habit, which as magnificent as it was yet was very fashionable, and corresponded exactly well, with that air which is remarkable in Artaxira's stature. And yet the freedom of her carriage was maintained by so many marks of grandeur, with a Majesty so conformable to the rank of that illustrious Princess, that it was easie to judge of the height of her extraction. In short, I found Artaxira such as it behoved her to be, to raise that trouble in my heart which had never perplex'd it before. She triumphed over a liberty which I had preserved till then, whereby it seem'd that destiny had taken care to engage me in those chains long before, as you may perceive by what I have already told you. The King discoursed with Artaxira a while, after that he presented Resaces to her, and in regard he did it with commendations, I was so far from hearing his praises with delight, that I felt an aversion from that time forward in my heart, for the Prince on whom they were bestow'd. True it is, that afterwards I received some kind of consolation, taking notice that the Princess, at the reception of Resaces, betrayed a certain blush that seem'd no way advantageous to that ambitious Lover. At which if my Rival were inwardly nettled, his despite could not but increase in a strange manner, if when he beheld me so favourably treated by Artaxira, he had known the passion which I then had for her. In short, Isdigestes addressing himself to his incomparable daughter, after a most obliging manner in my behalf, Princess, said he, if we have overcome the Rebels, and that my authority be again acknowledged by the fiercest Nation in the world, 'tis to the valiant Phradates that I am beholding for the greatest share of my success. But in regard his Soul is above all Benefits which his merit can expect from the King of Persia, I have little hopes to give him the recompence of his services, if I did not believe he would be more sensible of the marks of Artaxira's acknowledgmen, than he has been hitherto of the presents offer'd him by Idigestes. Therefore I leave with you this generous Stranger to deal with him in such manner, that he may not repent him of having expos'd his life for your service. And if there be in this accomplished Court, (pursued he, casting his eyes upon the fair Ladies that accompanied the Princess) ere a lovely person whose charms are able to retain Phradates among us, I should be more beholding to her for such a noble purchase, than to any of my Captains that should add a large Province to my Dominions.

Isdigestes had no sooner made an end of speaking, but that taking Resaces along with him, and all those other Persians that attended him, he left me alone with the divine Artaxira. But there I stay'd, not having either the power to behold her, so much did the lustre of her beauty dazle me, nor confidence to speak, my Soul was so surpris'd with joy, love, and admiration.

The Princess was not a little at a stand, when she perceived those changes which she observed in my countenance, and not believing that I was one of those as she confess'd afterwards, that was to be put out of countenance by the splendour of the Court, she thought that what the King had spoken in my commendation, had cast me into that confusion: Inso-much that beginning to speak in a most obliging manner, "For ought I see, generous Phradates, said she, you are less willing to hear the praises which have been bestow'd upon you, than you were forward to perform those noble actions that have gain'd your applause. But that modesty is so far from imposing silence upon us, that it affords us new matter of discourse.

To those words I could not dispense with an answer, but having recovered my self, "Great Princess, answered I with a respectful Air, though it were true that the little I have done for the Persians, had not altogether been for their disadvantage, I should be the most presumptuous person in the world, to think I deserved the recompence I have received. "But Madam, (added I transported with that boldness which growing love inspires) it may be one day I may render my self less unworthy. For I perceive that if I meet with more opportunities to serve the great King of Persia, my zeal will carry me so far that he shall have no reason to repent him of the favours he has done me.

We continued this discourse so much to the joy of the ever happy Phradates, that I could not part from the Princess but with an inward delight, with which the heart never fails to be moved, when at the beginning of love it foresees not the obstacles that may cross its passions.

No sooner was I retired into my Chamber, but I made a reflection upon the condition of my fortune, and upon all that the Princess of the Scythians and I had discoursed together, before I left Iffedon: So that having found a pleasing concurrency between the discourses which I had had in Scythia, and the adventures which had befallen me in Persia, I resolv'd to send Sydemiris an account thereof, which I did in the following Lines, with an Air conformable to the gayety of my humour at that time.

Prince Agathyrsus to the Princess Sydemiris.

AT length Madam, I have seen the divine Artaxira, and I must confess I no sooner saw, but that I passionately loved: So that you are not at all deceived in your conjectures, and for my part I have given you an account thereof, according to my promise. But Madam, to be punctual in all things to my word, I have a design in my head in reference to Varanez, that I am sure will take according to your wishes. It will cost that Prince his freedom, and therefore you must not refuse me your assistance in an enterprise, which I am about to proceed in. Consider that it no less concerns the honour of your charms, than the interest of my passion. For if I may stand in need of the protection of Varanez, the heart of so illustrious a Prince cannot be a Conquest unworthy of the most incomparable Sydemiris.

Thus Sir, I wrote to the Princess of the Scythians, in the mean time I continued my visits to the Persian Princess, and that with so much diligence that the zeal which I had for her concerns was soon perceived. It was observed that I particularly apply'd my self to attend her, and that when I either spoke or acted for her interest, I did it with that vehement eagerness which was easily remarkable. On the other side, the Princess being willing to treat favourably a person who was recommended to her by the King her Father, openly shewed an esteem for Phradates, which she had never testified for any person before. After that, finding insensibly both in my conversation, and the little services which I was always ready to render her, something that no way displeas'd her, she accus'd her self in her speech and converse with me, to use a confidence which altogether charm'd me. She forbore not to tell me how much she was perplex'd with the passion of Resaces, and believing that I shar'd in every thing that concern'd her, she took it not amiss, but innocently afford'd me new testimonies of her good will.

Thus transported with a joy which I could not moderate, I was about a hundred times to have cast my self at her feet, and discovering my name to have made known the passion which I had for her, to the end I might free her from the persecutions of Resaces. But the profound respect which the Majesty of Artaxira had imprinted in my soul still restrain'd me, and far from believing that Phradates happiness could extend to Agathyrsus, I was afraid lest the Princess should look with scorn upon the fallacy which I had put upon her. I thought she might nourish a resentment against me, when she found that my disguise had made her act with Phradates, in another manner than she would have carried her self toward the Prince of Sarmatia. Besides as Phradates, who was entirely devoted to her, I durst not discover the design I had laid to revenge her upon Resaces, so much I feared to offend her moderation. However I resolv'd to go on with the resolution I had taken, and if I did not put it presently in execution, it was only to stay till I could meet with an opportunity to do it without giving the least suspicion to the Princess, for whose sake I had undertaken the enterprise.

The discontent which proceeded from my impatience, that I could not find an occasion to fight my Rival, was the only trouble which then afflicted me, being favourably treated as well by Isdigestes as Artaxira. And then it was that I received from Sydemiris an answer, of which it is necessary that I should make you a recital, in regard it contained the following Lines:

The Princess Sydemiris to Prince Agathyrsus.

I Am glad you have found the Princess of Persia so lovely as I described her, and I must confess for my predictions sake, that I am nothing troubled that you were not able to resist the power of her charms. But Prince, can you not love the Sister without disturbing the Brothers repose? For my part I am of Varanez's side, for I cannot consent to the design you have against him: For besides that it is not generous to nourish an evil intention, against a Prince that never offended you, 'tis certain you may meet with obstacles, of which you dream'd not, in the execution of your purpose.

You see, Sir, that Sydemiris answered me with a gayety which was usual betwixt us, and yet her Letter produced a strange effect, as you will know by and by. You must know then that Resaces continued his importunities to Artaxira, and that the Princess carried her self toward Resaces after such a manner, as was no way pleasing to him. Inasmuch that he being naturally fiery and impatient, resolv'd to unfold his mind as a Lover, whose pretensions were authoriz'd as well by the consent of Isdigestes, as by the general desire of all the Persians.

Thereupon he came to Artaxira, and being received by her with her wonted coldness, "What Madam, said he, will you always retain this cold indifference for me? will you never open your eyes to see whether a scorn of this nature be to be endured by a person of my quality? To a person of your quality, answered she, tender, Resaces, tender to mine that which you know it is your duty to do, and I shall then consider how to carry my self toward you. You have no reason I think, replied he, in justice to complain of my behaviour, for you cannot but have a thousand times observed, that I have always respected you as my Sovereign Mistress. However you are mistaken, briskly replied she, and it would be the greatest trouble to me in the world to be so. But Resaces, I am the daughter of Isdigestes who is your King, and I am the Sister of a Prince, who is to be your Sovereign after his decease. "Varanez, replied he, is supposed to be dead, and you cannot but know that by his death, nay by his very absence, I am the presumptive Heir to the Crown. How Heir of the Crown, answered she fiercely interrupting him, no, no, Resaces, that will never be as long as I live: And know that if Heaven take from us both Isdigestes and Varanez, Artaxira will make you submit to her laws, and impose a Master upon you when she pleases.

Concluding the last words she could not but blush, and Resaces replying with a laudable moderation, "As for your laws, Madam, said he, you know that I was always very submissive to them, and am still as willing to them, how severe soever I may find them to be. But for imposing a Master upon me, I cannot tell whether you can so easily do it, and whether the Persians will so readily incline to submit to the dominion of a Stranger. Nevertheless, since you threaten us with a misfortune which we had always reason to fear, you would bring upon us, you must not think it strange that Resaces and the principal Peers of the Kingdom, take a course to prevent it by opposing a design, so prejudicial to the honour of the Nation.

Having so said he took his leave of the Princess, and no sooner was he got to the Palace, but he sent for the most considerable of his party, and gave them to understand what had been his conversation with Artaxira, and then vehemently pursuing his discourse, "You see, said he, that we have no time to lose, Artaxira has declared her self, there is no news of Varanez, so that the death of Isdigestes which through age and sorrow may happen on a sudden, will bring us into a miserable condition, if we prevent not the storm that threatens us. But I make no question but your own generosity, and the affection which you have for me, will preserve you firm to my interest, if there be any Persians so treacherous as to comply with a Princess, that goes about to subject them to some Barbarian, whom in a humour she shall prefer before the blood of your Lawful Kings. Let us consider then how to act at such a perillous conjuncture, and for heavens sake let us take such a course, that we may not be forced to a shameful submission, and be laughed at for having less conduct than an unexperienc'd Princess.

Upon those words Resaces and his friends entering into a deliberation what they had to do, resolv'd at length to go all together to the King, and to admonish him how far Artaxira's ira's resolution might tend to the ruin of the Monarchy of Persia.

To this purpose they immediately went to Isdigestes who received them kindly, and gave them as favourable an answer as they could desire, for besides that Isdigestes was desirous to remove all occasions of disturbance out of his Kingdom, he had a great respect for Resaces looking upon him as a Prince to whom he might be one day constrained, to leave the possession both of his Crown and Artaxira together. Thereupon he promised to send me to the fair Princess, to signify to her in his name, that it was his desire she should carry her self in a different manner, to one of the first Princes of the blood. He would have spoken himself to Artaxira, but that he was afraid as a Father, to hear the reasons of her own justification: And therefore looking upon me as a more proper person, he called me into his Closet, and addressing his speech to me in a most obliging manner, "You are not to question, "Phradates, said he, but that I have been very much pleased in taking notice, that the Princess has a kindness for you, and in regard I have also observed that you interest your self "in whatever concerns her: I know not whom to pitch upon better than your self to signify "my pleasure to her, and to desire her in my name to comply more suitably with the "times than she has hitherto done. You are not ignorant that the absence of Varanez, renders Resaces very considerable in my Empire, so that it behoves Artaxira to carry her self "toward Resaces, not only as a Prince of my blood, but as a person that I design for her husband, if heaven do not restore me Varanez.

Upon those cruel words I was so little the Master of my grief and my surprize, that I changed colour, which Isdigestes perceiving; "Can it be possible, added he, that you should "be so unwilling to receive a message, which I thought you would have so gladly accepted? Sir, answered I transported with the violence of many passions, were it to sacrifice my life "for the service of your Majesty, you could not cast your eyes upon any person that would "do it more readily than Phradates. But in regard it does not behove me to deceive your "Majesty or to disguise my own thoughts, there is no person so improper as my self for this "employment.

The astonished King beheld me very earnestly, then resuming his speech, "I cannot apprehend, said he, the reason of a denial which I so little expected. "'Tis not, answered I, but that the commission with which you would entrust me is very important, but Sir, "would it be just for Phradates, in an affair that only concerns the Empire, to dispute against the resolutions of so great a Princess, to whom he owes a particular respect and acknowledgment? How can I pretend to receive a favourable answer, when there are so "many Persians, who have more right than a stranger to speak their minds where the quiet and honour of the Nation is concern'd.

To these I added so many other arguments, that the King changed his mind, and he dismissed me, very sorry that he had put me upon an errand so displeasing: But then I, instead of leaving the King, immediately was about to have thrown my self at his feet, and to have spoken in the Princess's behalf, so much was I transported by the violence of my passion: Yet fearing he might dive into the true cause of such an extraordinary zeal, I forbore what I intended, deeming the consequences thereof so dangerous, as well to my self as to Artaxira. Thereupon I thought it sufficient to advertise that incomparable Princess, of the King her Fathers intentions, to the end she might be prepared with an answer, and that she might take notice of Phradates's readiness to serve her. Artaxira return'd me thanks for the care I had of her interests, and directing her speech to me with a courtesie altogether charming, "I assure you, said she with a pensive Air, I should be very much discontented, should the King persevere in the thoughts which he has for Resaces. For in "short, Phradates, I am resolved to obey his orders, though I were sure to dye for "grief.

At those words through a capricious fancy of my love, I was very much afflicted, observing a serious melancholy in the fair eyes of Artaxira, yet at the same time was I entranc'd with an unexpressible joy, seeing how the fair Princess still defended her heart against my Rival, but on a sudden fearing again that Resaces misfortune proceeded only from the insensibility of Artaxira, and that it might be also my own ill fate: I was seized by such a disturbance, that the Princess taking notice thereof, pleasingly demanded of me, if I had embraced the Courtiers humour, to shew my self more a friend of Resaces that day, than I had accustomed to do. "Madam, answered I, I need not justify my self in that particular, for "you may well conjecture me to be a person very incapable, to take part with one who obeys not you with a submission never to be cast off.

Upon those words the Princess looked upon me, as if she expected I should tell her the real cause of my grief, inso much that I was in a strange perplexity, till having calm'd the troubles troubles of my countenance, with all the confidence I could use before the person I adored, Madam, said I, if you espouse not the most considerable among the Persians, who is there out of Persia that may pretend to the felicity which you refuse Resaces? Theodotus is wedded to Athenais; the Prince of Scythia is not in a condition to wear your chains; nor do I believe you have any thoughts upon Pharamond, Balamir or Viridomar, who besides their remoteness have seen those charms which already have enthrall'd their hearts. I am of opinion, courteously answered she, that you did not refuse the commands of my Father laid upon you, since you take that care which I never expected at your hands.

Those words put me to a plunge, and believing my expressions had displeas'd her, I testified so much sorrow, that the Princess interrupting me in a most obliging manner, Phradates, said she, you are not well acquainted with my humour, if you think there was any thing in your discourse that has displeas'd me, rather I find your zeal extends very far for my sake, since it travels even into Germany for a match for Artaxira. Alas, replied I with more freedom of thoughts, I need not go about to disunite the hearts of those illustrious Princes from their beloved Princesses: for without doing them any injustice, I know where to subject a Prince to your Empire, that never yet acknowledged other Laws.

Upon those words I blush'd, not being able to explain my self any farther, but immediately recollecting my self out of a desire to know how the Princess stood affect'd toward me, Madam, said I, I make no question but you took notice that I held my tongue when I had yet more to say, and I must needs tell your Highness, with that liberty which you are pleas'd sometimes to allow me, that there is a curiosity still remaining, of which I would fain be satisfied. I would fain know, continued I, whether if Agathyrus had been so rash as to aspire to the same honour, he should have met with the same ill fate as Resaces. Were it lawful for me to give you a serious answer to such a question, replied Artaxira, I should make a great difference between one of my Father's Subjects, and the Heir to one of the greatest Monarchies in the world. But, Madam, replied I, that Prince has serv'd the Scythians against the Persians. I grant it; answered she, but he us'd his victory so generously, that we have no Allies to whom we are more oblig'd.

I was so charm'd with this conversation, that I was much troubled when I heard that Isdigesler was coming to her Apartment. The fair Princess also blush'd so soon as she had notice of it; and understanding that the King came on purpose to speak in favour of Resaces, I left the Room with a redoubled aversion against a Rival, that so many several ways persecut'd the Princess whom I adored. In the mean time, Resaces, who neither knew me to be Agathyrus, nor a Lover of Artaxira, no sooner understood that I had been so long with the Princess, but he made no question but I had acquitted my self of a commission which he thought I had very joyfully accepted: so that out of an impatience to hear Artaxira's answer, he went into the King's Garden, and whisper'd me in the ear, that he expected me in such a walk. I fail'd not to be with him with all the speed I could, not so much to assail him, as to give him an occasion to quarrel with me: when we were alone, Phradates, said he, have you been happy in your mediation? Have you seen the Princess? Have you spoken to her in my behalf? Has she given you that favourable answer which I ought to expect? Sir, answered I with an air not usual with persons that were wont to speak to him, I did not think my self engag'd to the King to speak to Artaxira in your behalf; not only believing that it became not Phradates to dispute the sentiments of so great a Princess, but that it was a piece of injustice in all others that sought to constrain her will. When her will, briskly replied he, may prove to be of dangerous consequence, we are not bound to be obedient to it: but it is not for me to dispute with a Stranger upon the most weighty affairs of the Empire. However, replied I, a stranger, and such a stranger as Phradates, may take the liberty to tell you, that the Persians will never presume to take your part: and therefore give me leave to tell you that—— And therefore give me leave to tell you, fiercely cry'd he, interrupting me, I will make you know that you owe me respect: and if you give me not that which is my due; know, said he, laying his hand upon his Sword, that I have wherewithal to command it in such a manner, that if I am not deceiv'd, you will get no advantages by your obstinacy. Tell you have seen me Master of such, replied I without any passion at all, that you have no reason to believe your menaces can fright me. No more, cry'd he, interrupting me again, transport'd with choler, such an impudence shall never go unpunish'd.

Upon that he drew and made at me with an impetuous fury, and I being in a posture to receive him, the combat grew obstinate and vigorous, insomuch that the blood stream'd down our Cloaths in a short time. At length the desire I had to deliver the Princess from his persecutions redoubling my strength, I gave my Rival three large cuts, receiving only a slight wound, so that Resaces fury giving place to paleness and faintness, he stagger'd and was just ready to fall, when his servants drawn thither by the clashing of our Swords, and seeing what condition their Master was in, some ran to help him, others advanced toward me to revenge their Masters quarrel. I looked upon my self as a lost man, considering the number of my enemies, but resolving to sell my life at a dear rate, and beholding them with a threatening Air, Come on Cowards, cried I, against a person all alone, and whom you durst not otherwise assail. Those fiery words caused some confusion among them, and one above the rest addressing his speech to his companions, Let me alone, cried he, to chastise this haughty Stranger.

So saying he raised his Cymiter Arm, but I prevented him from doing any more harm, for I cut him so fully into the head, that he fell at my feet without any appearance of life.

Two other of his friends taking his place had the same fate, insomuch that then the whole croud transported with revenge and rage, came powdering all upon me with an intention to sacrifice me to their fury. I had set my back against a Tree, to keep my self from being surrounded, but their number was so great, that notwithstanding all the resistance I could make, I had been run thorow and thorow in a thousand places, had not Megalases, coming into the Garden to walk, made hast to the Throng where he saw so many Swords drawn.

He no sooner knew me, but he applyed himself to moderate the fury of my enemies, Hold, said he, kill not Phradates before you hear him speak for himself: He durst not being a Stranger have made such an attempt as this, but that he has other accomplices to back him. No, no, friends, let us first discover the conspirators and then punish him. Those words and the authority of the person that pronounced them, wrought that effect upon the Persians, that they surceased their fury. Thereupon Megalases to appease them all together, turning to me, Phradates, cryed he, yield thy Sword to Megalases, who demands it of thee in the Kings name. I yield it then to Idigettes, replied I to Megalases, and though a Stranger that might have died with his Sword in his hand, I am willing to teach the Subjects of so great a Monarch, how readily they ought to obey his orders. While I was thus speaking another croud surrounded me, and presently they brought me a Chariot, to carry me where the Prisoners of State are kept. So soon as I was confin'd, they found that Resaces's wounds were not mortal, and the tempest that threatned my life being overblown, they were content to wait the Kings justice, for their revenge which was otherwise contrary to Law.

Soon after Megalases sent me Chirurgeons to search and dress my wounds, which were not very dangerous. When they were gone, my generous friend that took care of me came to my bed-side, and addressing his speech to me, You see Sir, said he, what I have been constrained to do to save your life, but now you must of necessity discover who you are. for I cannot think of any other way speedily to deliver you out of this place, though I am resolved to use all my industry to obtain your liberty. In short, Sir, though your enemies be not dead, they will punish in your person the attempt of Phradates, which will not be thought otherwise than a quarrel between Resaces and Agathyrus, when your quality is once known. Ah Megalases, cryed I, be not so hasty I beseech you, rather before you tell who I am, consider the consequences which I dread, if you discover a secret which is to me of so great importance. What would the King say, what would all Persia say, if they knew that the Prince of Sarmatia had been so long disguised at Persepolis? That he has often visited Artaxira, and fought Resaces the Lover of that incomparable Princess? Will they not have reason to believe that Artaxira was not ignorant that Phradates was Agathyrus, that the Princess has a kindness for me which is the true reason of her aversion to Resaces? They will imagine that the fair and innocent Artaxira, has kept a correspondence with me, that it was she that incensed me against a Prince of the blood, and shall I consent that they should have such an opinion of my Princess, by discovering my self to be the Prince of Sarmatia? Let Agathyrus perish first a thousand times, before he exposes the person whom he loves, to such an apparent injustice.

Megalases however would not give over so, and therefore as he was going about to shew me how well the Princess might plead in her own justification; Never deceive your self, said I interrupting him, For there would remain that impression in the heart of the King and the people, which it would be never possible absolutely to rase out. Therefore, Megalases, take heed of being transported out of an excess of zeal, for I protest to you by all that I understand of sacred, that if after all that I have told you, you cease to be true to me, instead of saving the life of a friend, you will put him to that tormenting death, which Resaces himself would never adjudge him to, either as an Enemy or a Rival.

In short, Sir, my eyes and my countenance so well confirm'd the reality of my thoughts, that Megalases consented to my request, notwithstanding the reluctance which he had testified before. But while I was so cautious to keep Phradates from being known to be Agathyrus, Agathyrus, the servants that took off my cloaths forgot not to pry into the crime of which they thought me guilty; so that having rifled my pockets, and found certain Letters sumptuously written, they thought themselves very well satisfied, and failed not to carry them to Isdigestes. By them the King came to understand to his sorrow all that happened, and walked up and down in his Chamber with an air that shewed how much he was troubled in his mind: and as he had for me a great esteem and a real kindness, he could not consent to my destruction, though he found himself constrained to do justice to his blood, to the kindred of Resaces, and to all the Persians. He was extremely discontented what course to take upon such an accident, when he was plunged into such an extraordinary surprize, casting his eyes upon certain Letters, the superscription whereof was from the Princess Sydemiris to Prince Agathyrus. But his astonishment redoubled after a strange manner, when reading the answer which I had received from the Princess of the Scythians; he saw those words which I have already recited:

But, Prince, cannot you love the Sister unless you disturb the quiet of the Brother; for my part, I am clearly of Varanez's side, and cannot consent upon the design which you have upon him: for besides, that there is nothing of Generosity in having so ill an intencion against a Prince that never offended you; 'tis most certain you will meet with those obstacles which you dream not of in the execution of your design.

Isdigestes being hardly able to believe his eyes, read the same words over and over again; and having made several reflections thereupon, he called to mind all the circumstances that might confirm the suspicions he had conceived. He called to mind the frequent conversations which I had had with Artaxira, the Princess's aversion for Resaces, and the reluctance which I had to speak in his behalf, and at length the duel with my Rival: "What cried he in a chafe, does Artaxira hold a secret correspondence with Agathyrus, and as if it were not enough to love him without my consent, is she so prepossessed with her passions, to seek to put the Diadem of Persia upon the head of Agathyrus by the ruine of Varanez? Who knows but that I my self may be sacrificed to the ambition of Agathyrus, and the unnatural Artaxira?"

Then examinining the conduct, the moderation and the virtues of that Prince, "Have I not abused my self, cried he, and is there not some mystery concealed under the expressions of Sydemiris, which I do not apprehend? No, no, replied he to himself, after he had paused a while, I must not flatter my self with such vanities, since I find they are now upon the execution of their designs. The death, or at least the fatal wounds of Resaces open my eyes. That Prince is become the first victime, which the love and ambition of Artaxira had required from Phradates, and Phradates is without question Agathyrus himself, or an Agent whom Agathyrus maintains near the person of the Princess whom he loves. But Agathyrus, canst thou in this manner envenome the kind offices with which thou hast honoured Isdigestes? Couldst not thou have obtained Artaxira by fair means, and is not Sarmatia large enough for a Prince, who ought to be as reasonable in his ambition, as thou hast seemed to be in all thy passed actions. Yet there are so many charms and so much Lustre in the Monarchy of Persia, that might well tempt a Princess who by the absence of Varanez finds her self to be the only Heir. Nevertheless let us examine Artaxira, let us see whether Phradates be not Agathyrus, and let us dive into the mystery of a Letter and a Duel, which so strangely perplex me.

Then spurred on by his own impatience, instead of sending for Artaxira he would needs go himself to her Apartment, whither he was no sooner come but he caused the Room to be cleared, and beholding the Princess with that heat of anger, which he had never manifested to her before, Artaxira, said he, I must advertise you before hand, that it is a vain thing for you to seek excuses for a crime, of which you stand convicted already, as well by the duel of Phradates, as by this Letter which you may read if you please.

Concluding those word he gave Sydemiris's Letter to the astonished Artaxira, who having cast her eyes upon it with a fear which her eyes could not dissemble, no sooner saw the superscription, but as one that thought her self no way concern'd in it, Sir, said she, I know not what part I ought to take,——I have already given you to understand, cried Isdigestes interrupting her, that your affected Surprises would nothing prevail with me. Read therefore, read, and then we shall see how you can justifie your self, as to that secret and precious Correspondence which you keep with Prince Agathyrus. "I Sir, replied she with an astonishment that would not suffer her to say more. "Yes you, answered Isdigestes, and when you have read the Billet which I gave into your hands, you will find that I had in my own keeping, a “ conviction in language that needs no interpretation. Thereupon the Princess opened Sydemiris's Letters, but when she found what the Princess had said of her Beauty, and the passion of Agathyrus, she blushed and stood amazed. The King believing that effect of surprize and modesty to be a mark of shame, “ Go on, go on, said he, I mind not the first words ; for the Prince of the Sarmatians may love the Princess of Persia, without fearing to be contradicted by Isdigestes. But was it so necessary, that his love, which I would never have disapproved, should be kept so secret from me, that Agathyrus should come disguised to Persopolis, that he should kill Resaces, and design the destruction of Varanez ? “ I know you will omit no argument to persuade me that you are not guilty of these crimes : but I know as well, that it is impossible you should be innocent. In the mean time, in regard it behoves me to be exemplary in the revenge of my own blood which has been spilt from the wounds of Resaces, I charge you not to stir out of your own Apartment, till you hear farther from me.

Having so said, he flung out of Artaxira's Chamber, while the fair Princess was strangely troubled to see her Father provoked, though she were sensible how unjustly he had accused her. True it is, that she had no sooner read Sydemiris Letter, but she saw there was some kind of intimation of some design laid against Varanez by Agathyrus. But she was always of this belief, that there was a concealed meaning in the words of Sydemiris. While they were thus searching into the obscurity of strange accidents above their reach, the King caused Megalases to be arrested, because he was said to have taken great care of Phradates. He also sent Gobrias to find out whether Phradates were Agathyrus or no ; what was the reason of his quarrel with Resaces, and what was his design against Varanez. Gobrias went first to Artaxira, and after he had discoursed her in reference to the commission he had received : “ Tell my Father, said she, that I know not whether Phradates be Agathyrus or no : but withal make him this protestation in my behalf, that neither Phradates nor Agathyrus ever opened their mouths to me in reference to the least tittle what the Scythian Princess has written : but, Gobrias, 'tis for Isdigestes's Honour, and the honour of the whole Nation, not so slightly to accuse a Prince to whom all Persia is so much beholding ; or to lay a crime to his charge of which he cannot be guilty, if you consider his virtues. In brief, Gobrias, 'tis very improbable that Agathyrus should give Isdigestes his life and liberty, if he had any design against Varanez. “ Nevertheless, Madam, replied Gobrias, if Phradates be Agathyrus, and that he have yielded his Arms to our Princess, the King, in my opinion, may answer your reasons how strong soever they seem to be : for Agathyrus may be generous in Scythia, yet prove ambitious in Persia. And having beheld the divine beauties of Artaxira, and the magnificence of our Court, 'tis very probable, that such temptations may kindle in the heart of a young and courageous Prince, not only an ambition to enjoy our Princess, but to usurp our Empire. For my part, replied Artaxira, blushing out of meer modesty, I cannot apprehend why the Prince of Sarmatia having an intention to court the Princess of Persia, should chuse to conceal himself under the name of Phradates, rather than to act openly, as persons of his degree are wont to do. “ Madam, I believe, replied Gobrias, that at first Agathyrus might come into Persia for no other end than to satisfy his curiosity, and that he might disguise himself to live with more freedom among us : but that afterwards he laid this design of which you are speaking. “ But, replied she, what should move Agathyrus to plot against the life of Varanez, who is God knows where, rather than of Isdigestes, whom he sees every day at Persopolis. “ Because, answered Gobrias, 'tis more easie to kill a Prince that travels alone, and helpless, than a King in the midst of his Court and Armies. Besides Isdigestes may be more useful to Phradates to authorise his actions, and raise a Faction against himself. “ But what is this enterprize, answered she, what are those Cabals which he has contrived. “ Then, Madam, replied the Persian, you look upon Phradates Combat with Resaces, and the strict friendship of a Stranger with Megalases one of the most potent Princes in Persia, next to those of the Blood, as nothing. “ As for what concerns the quarrel, replied Artaxira, 'tis very probable that a person of courage, no way obliged in this Country, might be provoked to draw his Sword against Resaces, as not willing to receive an injury from a Prince so apt as he is to give it. As for Megalases I should very much wonder if he had not that kindness for Phradates, whether he looked upon him as a Prince to whom we know he is obliged, or as a person who has served us faithfully in the Parthian Rebellion. And if there had been any conspiracy between them, think you Megalases would have been so earnest to have saved the life of a person that might prove his accuser ? “ I confess, Madam, replied he, there is a great deal of reason in what you say : and I wish to Heaven you may not be deceived in your conjectures.

"I should be extremely joyful, as well for the King's, yours, and the satisfaction of Megalases, as for the Stranger's sake, whose reputation stands so fair among us.

Having so said, Gobrias took his leave of Artaxira, and went to Megalases, and having declared to him the intention of his coming, the generous Persian preparing to speak with an air that manifested his resolution, "Tell the King, said he, that neither the Princess nor Phradates are guilty, and that in all that has passed, there has been nothing done to the prejudice of his Crown; and so without failing in my fidelity, it was not unlawful for me to shew some small kindnesses to a person who is only unhappy because he could not stoop to Resaces's pride. "Let us not talk at present either of Resaces or Phradates, answered Gobrias, but as the Prince of Sarmatia has conspired against the Prince of Persia, will not you tell us——" "How, cried Megalases, interrupting him with a kind of amazement, do you believe the generous Agathysus capable to act so foul a crime? "But suppose we shew you some evidences of his conspiracy, replied Gobrias, what will Megalases then say in justification of the Prince that he excuses? "He will say, stoutly replied he, that the evidences are false; and shall never persuade me to the prejudice of a virtue wherewith I am so well acquainted, and of which I have had so fair an experience. Thus Gobrias finding he could pick out nothing out of Megalases's words, he left him and came to me.

He no sooner entered my Chamber, but though he had already suspected Phradates to be Agathysus, he was strangely surpris'd when he cast his eyes upon me. "How, Sir, cried he, is it fitting that so great a Prince, to whom all Persia is beholding, should be a prisoner at Persepolis?

- I was vexed to perceive that my face was known, and to find that it was not possible for me to obtain that favour from Gobrias, who came from the King, which Megalases had granted me. But being forced to moderate my discontent; "Yes, Gobrias, answered I, I am a prisoner, though I have no reason to complain of the Persians, who could not do any otherwise toward a Stranger that had drawn his Sword against the Blood of Isdigester. "However, as Agathysus could cease to be Phradates upon some occasions, you must not wonder that I acted after such a manner as might render Phradates more criminal than perhaps the Prince of the Sarmatians is. "I must confess, replied he, I cannot think Prince Agathysus to have committed any such great crime, either in fighting Resaces, or in loving the Princess: but——" "In loving the Princess, cried I, interrupting him, and blushing, who dares to say that Agathysus ever durst presume to cast his eyes upon the divine Artaxira. "They have dared to say more than that, replied Gobrias, having made publick the conspiracy which you intended against Varanez. I conspire against Varanez? cried I, interrupting him with more surpris'e than before. Then not being able to apprehend upon what ground they raised such an accusation, If the Friends of Resaces, continued I, are so eager after my ruine, they must invent some crime more probable than that which they have laid to my charge. "As it was not Resaces's Friends that you trusted with your most weighty secrets, replied Gobrias, you may be sure 'tis not from them the King has received those informations which are so obscure to his apprehension. "Let me see his evidence, impatiently cried I. "He has sufficient, replied he, but it is in the Princess's hands. "Does the Princess then, replied I, accuse the unfortunate Agathysus? "Quite contrary, answered Gobrias, she always speaks in your justification, though at present she be confined to her Lodgings for your sake, and the King very much incens'd against her, notwithstanding his indulgent affection toward her. "How, cried I in a rapture of despair, am I so unhappy to have contributed to the sufferings of the divine Artaxira? Ah, Gobrias! if that be true let them sacrifice me to the interests of my Enemies.

In short, Sir, I was so sensible of Artaxira's misfortune, that I offered my life a thousand times for her liberty. In the mean time, not being able to apprehend what that strange accusation should be, I besought Gobrias with so much vehemence, that immediately he went to the King for leave to bring me Sydemiris's Letters. He was no sooner gone, but word was brought me, that there was a Scythian come to Town, who had a Letter for me, and that Resaces's Friends sought to arrest him. After that Gobrias returning with the Letter, the sense whereof they had so much mistaken, I was well enough satisfied, seeing the hand of Sydemiris; and thereupon turning toward the Persian, "Is it possible, said I, that my Enemies should have so much power over the King, as to persuade him so easily to the truth of what they interpret to my ruine? "However, you see, Sir, answered he, that the Scythian Princess speaks very positively of a plot which you have laid against Varanez. "I grant it, replied I, but in regard that Sydemiris does not so positively declare the nature of the plot, methinks the very jocular stile of the whole Billet might have produced a more gentle exposition. Then

Then continuing my discourse more for Artaxira's sake than my own justification, I gave Gobrias an account not only of my converse with Sydemiris, but of the Letter to which he had shewed me the answer, and so convinced him of the truth of what I said, that Gobrias fully satisfied, promised to make Isdigestes a faithful recital of my justification. But though he kept his word exactly my condition was nothing better'd, for all Resaces kindred redoubled their solicitations against me, being more afraid of Agathyrsus than Phradates. Not that they durst mention the putting me to death, but in regard my presence was a great obstacle to the pretensions of my Rival, they pressed the King to send me away, telling him it was not convenient for him to suffer a person in his Court, that would not have disguis'd himself had his intentions been sincere.

Isdigestes having considered upon their reasons, resolv'd to send me out of his Territories, and to remove Artaxira to some remote place for a time, the news whereof, when Gobrias told it me, I received as the sentence of my death. Then pondering upon the Prince's misfortune and my own unhappiness, "No, no, cryed I transported with many passions, I will never forsake Artaxira: my enemies shall sooner make me renounce my life, than the company of that divine Princess. But Gobrias, added I, wherefore am I hunted hence? wherefore are they incens'd against the fairest and wisest person in the world. Is she guilty of the crime which I committed in presuming to cast my eyes upon her? And is that so great a crime that the Prince of Persia cannot expiate it with the loss of his blood? Might I not have an innocent curiositiy to see one of the greatest Courts of the world? and for the more commodiousness of travel, might I not have the liberty to leave that Train behind, which ought to have attended upon Agathyrsus? "You know Sir, answered Gobrias, that it is not usual for such a Prince as you, to enter the Dominions of another without notice first given and appearing openly. But Gobrias, cryed I, tell me, good now, upon what does Isdigestes ground his suspicion, that Artaxira knows that I adore her? When you give me reasons strong enough to convince him to the contrary, replied Gobrias, I will labour to put him out of that conceit, which at present seems so probable. Is it possible, replied I, that such an interpretation should be put upon my bare obedience to Artaxira? Isdigestes presents a Stranger to her who had served him, signifies his pleasure to her, on purpose to stay him in Persopolis: who now can blame Artaxira for her complacency to Phradates: and if the daughter of the greatest King of the world, condescends by her Father's command to be familiar with a person, that seems to be but an ordinary Gentleman, is that a blemish to her virtue? But Sir, replied he, who can say that the Princess took you only for Phradates? And who dares to say, cryed I impatiently interrupting him, that she knew me to be Agathyrsus, for there is nothing but the Letter from Sydemiris which has been the cause of this mischief. But Gobrias, I beg of you to tell the King, that if he will but vouchsafe to send to Issedon, we shall not fail to clear out this mystery fully to his satisfaction: Or I will write thither my self, and if I disguise any thing or, the truth, as he has me in custody let him either put me to death, or banish me for ever from the sight of Artaxira.

Gobrias failed not to make this proposal to Isdigestes, but the friends of Resaces whose interest it was to remove me, told the King that there was no credit to be given, to what Sydemiris should say, in regard he might be sure she would take Artaxira's part. On the contrary, they pressed him to arrest the Scythian that had brought me a Letter, from whence he might be sure to make a truer discovery, as well by reading the contents as by examination of the party. In short, they acted so cunningly and so artificially perswaded the King, that Artaxira knew who I was, that he commanded me without farther delay to be gone in three days. When Gobrias brought me this order, "For Heavens sake, replied I sighing, tell the King that I freely submit my self to punishment, if he thinks me to be guilty. But if he cannot prove me to be an offender, he has no reason to deprive me of my liberty. We know Sir, 'tis no such crime for the Prince of Sarmatia to love the Princess of Persia, but to speak ingenuously, though the King has no reason to complain of the passion of Agathyrsus, he may be offended at the behaviour of Artaxira. "Who can say, said I interrupting him, that Artaxira knew how far my passion extended? "I confess, replied the Persian, that we have no other discovery, than what we gather from the Prince of Persia's Letter, but in regard there is nothing mention'd of Artaxira's ignorance of your thoughts, and that in all probability she will never write, but upon particular desire which is never intended, I think it Sir, for my part your best way to be gone. "No, no, very earnestly replied I, I shall never forsake the Princess: For I had rather dye in Persia before the completing of my Rivals happiness, than undergo in Sarmatia a torment more cruel, by understanding that Resaces should be possessed of the divine Artaxira.

I was about to have continued such a kind of discourse as my grief should have inspired into me, when I was interrupted by a great noise, of which I was forced to demand of Gobrias the cause. He was inform'd that they were carrying to the Tower a Courier from the Princess of Scythia, who was sent to the Court upon business of great concernment. And presently after I understood that they had carried to Isdigestes, the Letter which was directed to me from Sydemiris. But Sir, we must here admire the conduct of Providence, while my enemies thought to have been absolutely Masters of my Life and fortune, observe what Isdigestes found in the Paper which came to his hands.

The Princess Sydemiris to the Prince of Sarmatia.

WE understand that Prince Varancz is not far from Cologne in the Camp of the Cimbrians, and I was willing to send you such tidings with all the speed I could, knowing how gladly you would receive them, and how acceptable they would be to the King of Persia and the Princess Artaxira. But Prince, do not you believe I give you this intelligence for my own interest, for if Varancz be detained in Germany, 'tis only by the charms of the Bohemian Queen. So that you see there is nothing for me to hope, and that your design against the Prince of Persia is come to nothing, since as you cannot attack a liberty which he has already lost, it is not for Sydemiris to bereave Rosamond of the Conquest she has made.

But Sir, as if the Princess of Scythia had not thought it sufficient to have spoken for me in her Letter, the Postscript seemed to have been written on purpose for Artaxira.

Will you never let your Princess know the thoughts which you have for her? For Heavens sake resume the person of Agathyrsus. For the Prince of the Sarmatians may be allowed to speak where Phradates ought to hold his tongue.

Isdigestes overjoyed at such a particular information, that so clearly justified two persons for whom he had so high an esteem, was extremely sorrowful that he had been so severe to Artaxira, and that he had been so easily led away to favour the contrivances of my enemies, to whom the King was now so far from listening that he sent for the Princess, Megalases, and the Courier that came from Sydemiris. And receiving Artaxira with all the testimonies of affection, which he was wont formerly to express, he shewed her that which had brought all things to light, and satisfied his suspicions. That sudden change no way displeased the Princess, and yet she behaved her self with that moderation, as not to shew the least resentment against the friends of Resaces, not so much as speaking a word of me, though Isdigestes had given her opportunities enough in the communication he had with her. Which the King taking notice of, yet being desirous to know what her thoughts were concerning me, he took an occasion to speak of Phradates and Agathyrsus, to whom the Princess having recovered her self out of that discomposure which the Kings words had caused, "Sir," said she, as it was only by your order that I shewed so many marks of kindness to Phradates, you may as well be sure that only your will shall govern my behaviour, to the Prince of Sarmatia.

Isdigestes observing the countenance of the Princess, made no question but that she spake as she meant, and understanding by Gobrias that I was passionately in love with Artaxira, he never stood to consider, but immediately preferred me in his thoughts before Resaces. However he kept himself very reserved, declaring his mind only to Megalases who was my friend. All this while Resaces party murmured extremely, that Isdigestes would suffer himself to be guided in the most important affair of the Empire, by a bare Letter of Sydemiris. But he overruled them by his own authority, promising for their farther satisfaction, that I should not marry the Princess until your return into Persia. He received also the same day a packet from Mitrans which confirm'd the news which concern'd your self. And it was no looner assured that you were in the Army of the Cimbrians safe and well, but that all the Persians that loved Isdigestes, highly embraced my interest. As for Megalases, he came to fetch me out of Prison, and brought me to Isdigestes by whom I was received with all the marks of kindness that I could possibly expect. The King failed not to excuse himself, by alledging his ignorance of my quality, and treated me so obligingly, that I was then more sensible of the kindness which I received, than I was before of the sufferings I had undergone. But the pleasures of Lovers never continuing long undisturbed, I thought of a sudden that it was impollible but that Artaxira must conceive some disgust against me. This fear suddenly appeared in my looks, which Isdigestes taking notice of, he beheld me without speaking a word, intimating to me by his silence, that I should tell him the cause of such a sudden alteration. I could not determine at first what to do; but the desire I had to see Artaxira, and to preserve her kindness, carrying me above all other considerations, rais'd up all the confidence I had to return him an answer: Sir, said I, I make no question but Gobrias has given you an account of all the particular reasons I had to justify my disguise, and that he has told you withal what moved the Princess Sydemiris to write to me in that manner: and therefore I must only make you this protestation, that the liberty which you have given me will be of no value to me, unless I make use of it to let the Princess understand that I was most certainly by mistake the innocent cause of her misfortune. I have been unhappy, yet no way in fault: I privately adored her, and my passion was accompanied with so profound a respect, that perhaps I should never have made it known to the divine Artaxira her self. However, Sir, as it was you that presented me to that most incomparable Princess, whose Fetters I am bound to wear as long as I live; as it was you that provoked her against me, by giving her the knowledge of those thoughts which I should never have discovered to her: will not you, Sir, also—— Upon those words I blushed, and made a stop, when the obliging Isdigestes interrupting me, I understand you, Sir, said he, I will make your peace with Artaxira: or to speak more justly, since she has no reason of complaint, I will let her know how glad I am that you have that kindness for her which she might have deemed a fault in Phradates.

He gave me a thousand testimonies of his affection, and that he should not be only glad of an alliance with me upon your return into Persia, but also to see the peace which I had made between the two Kings, confirm'd by your marriage with Sydemiris. Such language as this, so sincerely spoken, redoubling my satisfaction, I made answer to Isdigestes, that Adamarses would be overjoyed to hear me make such a proposal: and I promised at the same time to take all the care imaginable to bring it to pass. The King highly satisfied with my offers, gave me new marks of his affection and acknowledgment; and then led me himself to Artaxira's Apartment: Princess, said he, here is the illustrious Prince of Sarmatia, you know how signally we are obliged to him. Respect him then, and esteem him according to his Quality, his Virtues, and the obligations he has laid upon us. Megalases, who is a Friend to both, will tell you the full of my mind, nor do I believe the resolution I have taken will be displeasing to either.

Artaxira blushed at those words, with a modesty intermixed with certain marks of submission to her Father's will. When Isdigestes was retired, Divine Princess, said I, condemn not I beseech you the inconsiderate Agathyrsus: but consider that if he had the boldness to wear your Fetters, his respect was more than to let them be seen. But, Madam, may I presume to ask of you whether fortune was kind to me or no, when she declared to you, that the first of your glances triumphed over my liberty.

After those words I held my peace in expectation of an answer that was to be the sentence of my life or death, while my eyes spoke in their turns, and interpreted the language of my love and fear, Artaxira importun'd by my silence and my looks; Sir, answered she, you know with what acknowledgment the King of Persia looks upon the Prince of Sarmatia: and I believe you need not question Artaxira's compliance with Idigestes's judgment. But, Madam, replied I, find you no reluctancy to obey your Father's pleasure? If Phradates, answered she, had no cause to complain, I do not think Prince Agathyrsus will have any. I confess, replied I, that Phradates received favours, which were infinitely above his Services. However, Madam, you were not aware of his boldness, but Agathyrsus you find to be one of the most presumptuous among men.

The Princess believing she had said enough, made no farther answer till upon my importunity she told me there might be those privileges allowed to Agathyrsus, which were not to be pardoned, had they been claimed by Phradates. In regard she concluded those words with a blush, and for that I perceived the force she had put upon her humour for my sake, I durst not presume to urge her farther, but took my leave, to give Megalases time to explain the King's mind, and speak in my behalf. And indeed he did both with so much zeal and success, that from that time I was admitted as a Lover, whose pretensions were authorized by Isdigestes, and no way disapproved by Artaxira.

But these pleasures that gave so fair hopes, were soon intermix'd with crosses the most bitter bitter in the world. There was a necessity for me to absent my self from that which I adored, and that my absence should be of a long continuance. For my happiness depends upon your return, nor could I trust any other person to bring about a thing of such importance, but my self. I was also to pass through Scythia to propose the match, which Isdigestes so much desired to see concluded, and through Sarmatia I must pass to obtain my Fathers consent, without which I could not enjoy the felicity which I expected. Heaven knows how unwillingly, and with what reluctance I undertook this journey, though so absolutely necessary. The Princess her self perceived the disturbance of my countenance, and understanding the cause, she afforded me the pleasure of reading in her fair eyes, that my absence was not a thing indifferent to her, and that my Rival should reap no advantage by it.

This was all I could obtain at present from that severe Lady, as for Isdigestes his caresses were beyond expression: He besought me over and over again, to dispatch the alliance which I had promised to make in Scythia, and Megalases gave me his word to take care of all things that concern'd the passion prevailing in my heart. Thus I parted from Persepolis, having Artaxira always in my thoughts, and being arrived at Issedon, I was received by the King, the Queen, and the Princess of Snevia, after such a manner, as gave me no small hopes of the success of my negotiation. I lost no time, I spake to Adamarfes, told him how much it was for his interest to have peace with Isdigestes, which could not be effected, but by restoring what the Scythians had usurped from the Persians.

Adamarfes was at first surpris'd at this proposal, and though he had a more than ordinary kindness for me, most certain it was that he was not well pleas'd to renounce the dominion of many fair Provinces. 'Tis very hard, said he, that I should give that to purchase a peace, which perhaps I should never lose by war. But, I replied, that lawful restitution was no gift, to which I add'd so many other reasons, that finding him to be somewhat shaken in his resolution, "Sir, said I, if you will not give those Territories to the King of the Persians, bestow them upon the Princess of the Scythians. The immense tract of ground on both sides the Imans will satisfy your successors, nor will Lycarsis have reason to complain "if to make his Sister Queen of one of the most flourishing Kingdoms of the world, you only give to the Persians such provinces to which you have no certain claim. And therefore "for Heavens sake, unite the fortunes of the incomparable Sydemiris and the illustrious Varnez, and strengthen Lycarsis with the alliance of a formidable Neighbour.

Adamarfes was very unwilling to yield at first, and made all the reflections that such an important affair required. But in regard he loved Sydemiris with a tender affection, and for that the Queen desired peace and the match which I had propos'd, he came to a positive resolution, and with all the testimonies of acknowledgement, readily granted me, whatever I required in the name of Isdigestes. As for Sydemiris, she was the most submissive person in the world to the will of her Parents: and therefore knowing that the Queen had a most excellent portraiture of the Princess, I besought her to give it me that I might have wherewithal to justify the Beauty of her Daughter.

The King, the Queen, and the Princess had thus yielded to whatever I could desire, in order to the happy success of my negotiation, I departed from Issedon to travel in search of you into these Countries. But I had not gone above four days journey, when I received the afflicting news of my fathers death. That Sarmatia was divided into two factions, and that the Prince of the Venedians and the Princess of the Igylions headed them, inspir'd by their ambition only. In my return to Sarmatia I heard that Gilismene was fallen ill, that Harmaxes had secretly convey'd her away, and having confin'd her under the power of certain of his own trusty confidants, he caus'd it to be reported abroad that she was dead; and order'd a woman of Tamiraque, that died at that time, to be buried among the Kings of Sarmatia, pretending her to be Gilismene. But the cheat which he put upon the people, he could not long time put upon Dorcira, who being in love with the King of the Lombards, most exactly pry'd into whatever concern'd her Rival so that her quick-sighted jealousy had soon found out the truth, notwithstanding all the pretences and policies of Harmaxes. Thereupon looking upon him as a person that had betray'd her in saving Gilismene, she had held out a war against Harmaxes to the ruine of my Kingdom, had not my return put an end to it, by the reunion of both parties. For upon my appearance Harmaxes and Dorcira fled into the Countries allotted them for their several portions, where Dorcira is fallen into an incurable distemper. And as for Harmaxes you know how, and where he was but lately slain.

After I had deliver'd Gilismene, with all the testimonies of a Brother who loved her so tenderly as I did, I minded nothing but to satisfy the passion which reigned in my heart.

Thereupon

Thereupon I determined to leave Sarmatia, and a Sister whom I had so lately restored to life; and if any thing troubled me at my departure, it was only whether I should bring you any reinforcement of men, or whether I should travel alone, that I might make that haste which was conformable to the eagerness of my desire. But while I was thus in doubt, I received intelligence, that Theodosius had sent you a considerable recruit. Thereupon I resolved to accompany that Army, attended only by five Sarmatian Knights, being received by the Officers of Theodosius with all the honour they could have done me in my own Dominions. They had also that reverence for me, that they offered to lend me a party sufficient for an expedition, the particulars whereof are worth your attention.

When we had passed the Vistula, and were marching toward the Ormanimes, a Saxon, Esquire to Prince Aldemar, came riding toward us with all speed, and addressing his speech to me, half out of breath, he desired some assistance to divert a misfortune wherewith his Master was threatened. Ah, Sir, cryed he, for Heaven's sake deliver the most incomparable Melasinthia out of the hands of Sinibald, who having stolen her from the victorious Aldemar carries her away against her will, and perhaps with some criminal intent.

The Saxon had no sooner done speaking, but I promised him all the assistance I could from an Army that was not under my command; and having by the General's order obtained a thousand Horse, I marched my self toward the place where he told me I should have the opportunity to deliver Melasinthia. Nor was Gilmond, so was the Saxon named, deceived in his relation: for I met with Sinibald according to his information. The Danish Prince was surpris'd to see such a Body of Horse advancing toward him, and in regard he was in a Country where he had less to hope than fear, he put his men in order, and began to march with an intention to defend himself as well as he could. Before I charged him I sent to him to grant me a parley, which he consented to. Coming together, I conjured him not to constrain Melasinthia's will, but to send back the Princess of Jutland to the King her Father, but he rejected my proposal with so much obstinacy, that I was compelled to fight him, justice made fortune favourable; for Sinibald was beaten, Melasinthia set at liberty; and two days after I restored her into the hands of Aldemar her Lover, who made a restless pursuit after her.

After this I returned to Theodosius's Camp, and Aldemar conducted the Princess to Hispalia, where the two Kings of the Saxons and Jutlanders were met, and had put an end to that mortal hatred which was between them with a most perfect amity. But though they both equally desired a consummation of the alliance by the Nuptials of Aldemar and Melasinthia, there was a necessity for some time to defer the happiness of those two illustrious persons, in regard that the two Kings lay wounded at the same time. So that while the Saxons and Jutlanders were marching home under the commands of Gilmond and Gilimer, Aldemar out of Gratitude, and partly at Melasinthia's persuasions, resolved to accompany me; to which end he met me in Sicambria, and so we came both together into this Camp.

This is the Story which I had to tell you, said the King of the Sarmatians; and then presenting Varanex a Box all over beset with precious Stones: All that remains on my part, said he, is only to desire you to accept this present, and to wish, that for the good of many Nations, that Portraiture may as sensibly move your heart, as it has once already touched by the light of Rosamond's Picture.

The End of the Third Book of the Twelfth and last Part.

PHARAMOND.

BOOK IV.

VAranez taking the King of the Sarmatians's present, cast his eyes upon the countenance of the Princess Sydemiris; at the first sight thereof he blushed, and then set himself to behold it more earnestly, believing it to be a remedy to cure the distemper of his present affection. Agathyrus joyfully observed it, and so soon as he thought it seasonable to speak, Sir, said he, can that Prince be said to be unfortunate, that may pretend to the possession of so fair a Princess?

Varanez returning no answer at first, cast his eyes again upon a Picture wherewith he seem'd to be charm'd; and in regard the heat of his temper made him quickly capable of a sudden passion, Ab, Sir, said he, turning toward the King of the Sarmatians, how fortunate should Varanez be, could he pretend to those glorious hopes wherewith you fill his fancy? Though I could do a thing so ugly, replied Agathyrus, as to speak contrary to my own thoughts, you have no reason to believe that I should do it now: for what Prince in all the world can Sydemiris prefer before the Prince of Persia? I would to Heaven, continued he, that Agathyrus were as worthy of the divine Artaxira, as Varanez to merit the affections of Sydemiris. How, cryed Varanez, interrupting him, can you question Artaxira's love? can you believe she can be insensible of the person and services of Agathyrus? No, Sir, 'tis a thing impossible: nor do I find by the Relation you have made, that you have any reason to complain of her acknowledgment. But for Varanez, added he with a strange commotion, I know not whether he can have the boldness to present himself before so great a Princess, to whom he can only offer a heart that has already loved Athenais and Rosamond with so little success? the Princess Sydemiris cannot be ignorant of it: so that——— I confess, said Agathyrus interrupting him, she may perhaps have heard thereof; yet at the same time no question but she was also inform'd, that Varanez refused to marry the Daughter of the Philosopher Leontin: and that on the other side, the Cimbric Queen had as much esteem and respect for him, as he could in reason expect from a Princess already prepossessed in favour of the King of the Franks. However, if after this declaration which I have made, if still you continue a Captive to Rosamond, Sydemiris will have no great reason to commend your proceedings; and perhaps it might produce a resentment which Varanez himself could not condemn. Shake off then those Fetters, Sir, which you have worn thus long; and since the Kings of Scythia and Persia have resolv'd to unite Varanez and Sydemiris together, and that Sydemiris her self has so obligingly consented, can you refuse what you should be overjoyed to grant to the desires of Ildigettes, to the charms of Sydemiris, the merit of Pharamond, the request of Rosamond, and your own particular Generosity? Ob, Sir, impatiently replied he, never entreat from me any more what the eyes of Sydemiris have already exacted from the heart of Varanez, rather be afraid, as I am, lest the divine Princess should alter her mind, and repent of the favour for which I am only beholding to the courtship of the Sarmatian King. Nevertheless, added he, in regard it will not become me to forsake a party which I have embraced with so much vigour, I only beg of you so much necessary time as to consider what course to take in an affair of this importance. There are so many acts of injustice in this league, replied Agathyrus, which persons of our rank and humour ought not to endure, that we need not be so cautious in abandoning this party, when we may so well justify our proceedings before all the world, and indeed you have but this to do, either to procure peace, to so many harrassed Nations, to set the Princeesses at liberty, and discharge the Prisoners on both sides, or to declare against that Army which shall reject your oppositions, for a general accommodation.

Thus ended the communication between those two Princes, but the Persian keeping the portraiture of Sydemiris in his own hands, retired to his Quarters with all the conveniency he could, and there abandoned himself wholly to the pleasure of beholding a beauty, which to him appeared to be altogether divine, and of which he was so fairly promised the possession. He fix'd his sight upon the countenance of that Princess which he already adored. He examined her complexion, her eyes, her features, and all those inexpressible charms, which were diffused through every part. Then pondering upon the hopes which the King of the Sarmatians had given him, Is it possible, cryed he transported with joy, that I have a priviledge to pretend, or does Agathyrus incite me to aspire. If that be true let us not delay our departure for Iffedon, let us flee to the embraces of fortune, that desires to be reconciled to us, and offers us a happiness far more sweet, than all the mischiefs we have endured have hitherto been painful.

Concluding those words he made a reflection upon the difference of the fetters he had worn, and believing that it was by the decree of heaven, that he had missed of Athenais and Rosamond, he was no less confident that the same destiny had ordered Sydemiris for Varanez. While his fancy was thus contentedly busied, Martian came to give him an account of the condition of both Armies, and to impart to him certain intelligence that he had received from the Court of Theodosius. I cannot tell Sir, said he, whether you have been inform'd that Aldemar, Balamir, Arderic and Godegefile were wounded, that we have lost thirty thousand men and the two Forts which were rais'd for the defence of the Bridge, but on the other side the report runs, that besides many other losses which the Franks have received, Sunnon and Thralimond are prisoners in Cologne. And yet I am very much deceived, if Pharamoud have not obtained in this Battel, all the advantages which he could in reason desire, since you your self in having yielded him what the fortune of war has given, cannot but in acknowledgment forsake those interests which are contrary to his. But Sir, to enter upon a subject of a far different nature, I must tell you there is a most unhappy Rupture between Theodosius and Athenais——“ How, cryed Varanez surprised and interrupting him, is it possible that Theodosius, the enamoured Theodosius, should quarrel with the charming Athenais, whom he had rais'd to the most splendid Throne in the world? “ Yes Sir, replied Martian, 'tis most certain that Theodosius and Athenais are parted, and for ought I know are never to come together again. They write also that there is great probability, that Eudoxia will remove at a great distance from the Court, to which purpose she intends for Palestine, though the pretence be given out, that it is only to visit those places which are so highly in veneration, among those of our religion.

After those words, Martian went on with the story of that fatal Apple, which had caused so famous a disorder in that Court. “ For you must know Sir, said he, that there was an Apple presented to Theodosius, who admiring its beauty carried it to the Empress, with that kindness which he was always wont to shew the fair Athenais. Eudoxia admired the present that appeared so rare, and because there is nothing so delightful to the eyes of the sick, as the sight of fair fruit, she sent the lovely Apple to one Paulinus a great Courtier, who lay very ill, but of whom Theodosius was extremely jealous at that time. This unlucky accident coming to the ears of the Emperour, encreased his suspicion to that height, that immediately he caused this separation, which posterity cannot read of but with amazement. But Sir, I must presume to tell you, that the trouble of mind wherewith this accident has afflicted me, has been accustomed with a joy which I am not able to express. For I am called home by my Princess, who has also signified in her Letter to me, that upon my return I shall have no reason to complain, either of her acknowledgment or the Emperours kindness. For this reason, and for what the Prince of the Sarmatians is able to inform you, be you your self judge, whether it does not concern us to put an end to the differences that stays us here in Germany.

When Martian had done speaking, Varanez obligingly testified how great a share he took in his satisfaction, being as much concerned therein, as it was possible for a real friend to be. Then after he had given him to understand how much he was grieved at the jealousy of Honorius and the misfortune of Athenais, as one that was wholly possessed with a new passion, and had no other thoughts but of seeing the Princess of Scythia, “ I confess, said he, that we spend our time very discontentedly upon the Banks of the Rhine, but this is my comfort, that there is nothing can hinder us from a sudden and honourable departure. Let us send therefore “ therefore to desire a truce for three days, do you in the mean time consult with Constance for a general peace, and if the King of Suevia and the Rivals of Pharamond, shall obstinately continue in their injustice, let us take the Franks side, and then we shall see whether Cologne can long hold out against our united force.

Martian overjoyed at the Prince's resolution, quitted Varanez to begin the management of a design, so much for the good of so many Nations: But while they are assembled in the Camp to consider of propositions for an accommodation, the King of Suevia was projecting quite the contrary. He could not endure that the Franks should keep the two Forts, and was therefore resolved to make a sally out upon them, either instigated by the violence of his courage, or else to gain the affection of the inhabitants of Cologne, when they should see how ready he was to expose his person, to gain two such posts so necessary for their defence. Briomer inform'd of the Kings resolution, was much dismayed, and hasten'd to him to persuade him to change his mind. What Sir, said he, are you so mistak'd as to sally out in person, or rather are you so weak as to surrender up at once a power, which you have had so much trouble to establish, and which is not yet so well fixed, but that it may be as suddenly ruin'd, so soon as you leave the City? The King of the Huns whom you have reason sufficient to suspect, is highly honoured in Agrippina. The Princesses are in great esteem, and where you are only fear'd, you will soon be slighted in your absence. After all Sir, added he more earnestly, will you expose your self to the hazard of being taken by your enemies, and to be reserved alive to see Viridomar in the possession of Polixena?

At those words the King changed colour, and Briomer knowing that his mind was alter'd, Sir, continued he, is it not better for me to make the sally, and for Gondemar also to be put upon the same duty, who is not of an age to be confin'd in a City environ'd with enemies? Besides that, as I am inform'd by some of his own servants, he has not the same affection for the Princess of Suevia, as he had before the Battel where he was taken Prisoner. And therefore Sir, 'tis but common prudence to remove him with the Soldiers under his command, from the charge you have confer'd upon him, and to place Suevians in the stead of those Burgundians that followed him, whereby you will become the sole Master of the destiny of the Princesses.

The King of Suevia pondered upon his advice, with as much consideration as his troubles would permit him, and then embracing the Cimbrian, “ You speak reason Briomer, said he, I now foresee all that might have happen'd, through the fault which I had like to have committed, and since I find your counsel so good, I promise you never to undertake any enterprise without it. Let us take no farther care then, but only to defend a City where we have wherewithal to render our selves happy, if fortune favours our courage, and where if she prove unkind, we are in a capacity to render our Victors more miserable than our selves.” But Sir, replied Briomer transported by the violence of his active humour, will it not be necessary for me to make a sally, to let the inhabitants of Cologne see, that it is not only in their City that I am able to do them service? No, no, Briomer, cryed the King impatiently interrupting him, never hazard the falling under your enemies power, but stay with me, where we will make them tremble in the midst of their victories.

Then the ill natur'd Cimbrian reflecting upon what the King had said, and foreseeing the danger to which he expos'd himself, trembled to think of it not so much out of a fear of death, as out of a mortal apprehension that he should be no longer able to mischieve Pharamond or Theobald, should he be either slain or lose his liberty. So that having consented to the desires of a Prince, whose inclinations were so conformable to his own. Sir, said he with a bold and fierce look, such as he was wont to put on when he had any pernicious plot in his head, I will not only not forsake your Majesty nor the Princesses, but I also solemnly protest before that Prince, whom I reverence above all the Princes in the world, that however fortune deals by us, Pharamond whom I will hate to the last gasp shall never be happy, if it be true that he is a Lover of Rosamond. For in short Sir, Rosamond and Bellariva shall perish if we lose Agrippina, and I will involve Polixena in the same destiny, if she will not consent to submit to your Majesty.

Briomer made these detestable protestations, when news was brought of the resolution which had been taken, to demand a truce for three days. The King of Suevia was nothing surpris'd at first, that they had desired that time, thinking it had only been to bury their dead, and to require time to repair the damages that had been received in both the Camps, but his suspicious humour rendering all things doubtful, he examin'd the Messenger that came from the Army, by whom he found that it was Varanez, that had not only propounded the suspension of Arms, but also had thought it reasonable that Martian should confer with Constance about putting an end to a war, of which they knew he was grown weary. The violent King was strangely disturb'd to hear of this same change in Varanez, he dreaded a peace that would certainly ruine his expectations, and settle the prosperity of Ibrasmond and Viridomar. For he so well understood the haughty humour of that Prince that he would have a concession to his demands, or else withdraw himself and his Friends from the league; being desirous to impart his conjectures to the cruel Cimbrian. Briomer, said he, now it is that we stand in need of that constancy which we have shewed upon so many dangerous accounts.

And having so said, he declared to him what he thought of the Prince. Briomer agreed that Varanez had taken off his affections from Rosamond: but, Sir, said he to the King, if we intend to reduce a Spirit so haughty as his, we must go along with him for a time, that we may insensibly divert him from the course he pursues. But if he will be obstinate, and that there be no way to retain him with us, let us endeavour to make sure of Prince Aldemar, that we may have the Saxons and Jutlanders to our Friends, instead of of those Forces which the other will be sure to draw along with him. I have the same design, replied the King, and it may be I have thought of a way to bring it to pass.

He was about to have expressed himself more at large, when he was inform'd that Martian was arrived, not only to make certain propositions on the General's behalf, but to visit Ibrasmond, whose discontents of mind were more to be feared than the wounds that he had received in the last Conflict. The Suevian King was vexed to the Soul, to hear that Martian was come to Cologne: and while he was consulting Briomer which way to oppose the peace, without provoking the Captains, which they intended to preserve in the league, Martian alighted at Ibrasmond's Quarters, saw him, and endeavoured to comfort him up, but told him nothing of the news which he had received, only what he thought would not be any way offensive to him. But being gone to visit Sannon in another Apartment, certain Officers came to Ibrasmond out of respect: and by them that Prince, whose mind ran only upon Eudoxia, inform'd himself of all the particulars that concern'd that Princess. Ibrasmond, who was well acquainted with Eudoxia's disposition, knowing what the effects of her grief must be, was pierced with such a lively and violent sorrow, that no Thunderclap could have prov'd more terrible than the fatal tidings that he had heard. He beheld the Officer without speaking a word, but with eyes wherein the trouble and wildness of his looks spoke much more than his tongue could express. At length, "Cruel Fortune, cryed he with more vehemency than was seasonable for his strength at that time, was it not enough for thee to hate Ibrasmond, but that thou must persecute the incomparable Athenais? Spare, unjust and cruel Divinity, spare the greatest Beauty upon earth; and acknowledge that virtue at length whose brightness might be enough to clear the blindness of thy sight.

He could say no more, in regard his strength began to fail him: Martian, the Physicians and several others halted to his relief; but all their endeavours prov'd in vain for a person that desired nothing but death: when he had recovered a little strength, he made use of it only to bemoan himself; and rather making answer to his own thoughts, than to the people that spoke to him, "Fair Athenais, dolefully cryed he, incomparable Eudoxia, is it possible they should raise suspicions against you, more offensive to a person of your humour, than the gift of that Empire where I have seen you reign with so much glory? Divine Princess, did they crown you only as a victim which they intended to sacrifice? And thou prejudicated Prince, blind Theodosius, that Heaven should bestow upon thee the possession of a treasure, of which thou knowest not the value! Cast thy eyes upon the unfortunate Ibrasmond, and consider, that if he dies because he could not move Eudoxia's heart, there is little probability, that Paulinus, who so disturbs thy fancy with ill grounded suspicions, could ever triumph over Athenais, or enter into a heart prepossessed by Theodosius, and where he still reigns as ungrateful and unjust as thou art.

Ibrasmond accompanied those words with a deep sigh; and at length tears trickled down from his eyes in such abundance, as melted all the beholders into compallion: Martian, more sensibly afflicted, used all his endeavours to comfort his Friend. But the Prince beholding him with a languishment that moved all the standers by, "My dear Martian, said he, and will you oppose the only felicity that Ibrasmond can pretend to? He is about to terminate a life which he cannot endure but as a continual torment: and can he more gloriously end it, than in sacrificing it to the divine Athenais? Yes, Martian, I will sacrifice it, and the sacrifice which I offer to the divine Athenais will not be unprofitable to her reputation, when all the world shall see that Paulinus could have but little hopes, where nothing but despair proved so fatal to the Brother of Gunderic.

He would have said more, but the unfortunate Athenais presenting her self to his fancy, overpressed his soul with grief, that he could proceed no farther. Martian still desirous to save his life, did not stick to breath into him a desire and a probability of seeing Eudoxia again, so soon as she should be disengaged from the Court. But Thrasimond perceiving the intention of his Friend, Ab, Martian, cryed he, why should you propose that which you could never approve? Without question you know how scrupulous and nice Athenais is, and you desire to make me hated by that incomparable person, at a time when I may move her compassion, and perhaps her acknowledgment.

After those words he paused a while, but having recovered a little strength, My dear Martian, said he again, nothing grieves me more but that I must leave you before I see you united to that Princess whom you so entirely love. But, Martian, I conjure you by that friendship which I have always faithfully preserved for you, to publish in the Court of Theodosius how Thrasimond came by his end, and to let the incomparable Athenais——

He would have made a conclusion, but he pronounced the name of Athenais with such a redoublement of love and grief, that his Body being extremely weakened by the tediousness of his sufferings, and a great loss of blood, yielded to a violent agitation, which his soul was no longer able to resist.

Thus died the illustrious and unfortunate Thrasimond, a Prince whom a thousand noble qualities had rendered more worthy of a better fate. All the standers by bemoaned a destiny so deplorable; and Martian yet more afflicted, had not constancy enough to conceal his grief. And after he had shed sufficient testimonies upon his Herse, he took order that the Body should be sent to the Camp of the Franks, to the end, that Gidiscles returning into Spain might carry it to Gunderic. But as it was impossible they could bestow their moans and funeral Ceremonies upon him without a noise, Sunnon perceived that Thrasimond was dead, and laying his death as sorrowfully to heart as his present sufferings would permit, Ab, poor Prince, cryed he, is this then the end of thy virtuous life? We have lost thee Thrasimond, but thou art gone but a few days before Sunnon; for I find too well the fatal passion that reigns in my heart, will have no better success than that which thou hast experienced.

Then the serious protestation of Amalazontha so cruelly seized his imagination, that the disconsolate Lover, abandoning himself to his discontents, was suddenly reduced to a most miserable condition. Every one was grieved at it in Cologne, except the King of Suevia and Briomer. And the Princesses no sooner heard the news, together with the death of Thrasimond, but they were most sensibly afflicted as well for the one as the other. As for Sunnon, Rosamond and Albisinda highly esteemed him, not only for his own merit, but for Pharamond and Marcomire's sake. Yet durst not Rosamond speak for him, not being willing to address her self to a Princess who looked upon her as the cause of her own misfortunes; but Albisinda went to the Queen of the Turingiens, and finding the Princess of the Franks with her, she not only spoke, but was by her seconded with all the vehemency that could be expected from her friendship. Polyxena conjured Amalazontha with tears in her eyes, to have compassion upon the Prince her Brother, a Brother for whom she had a particular affection from her very cradle. The Queen of the Turingiens sigh'd, instead of returning an answer, and by the languishment which was observed in her eyes and her countenance, it might be easily conjectured that she was no better treated by fortune than those whose miseries made the loudest noise. For if Rosamond, Polyxena and Albisinda were cruelly separated from their dearest Brothers, and illustrious Lovers, yet they had some hopes to be relieved by their valour; even Hunnimonda her self, that had lost her Kingdom and her Parents, believed she should recover much more in the person of her beloved Theobald, than she had lost. But Amalazontha endured those mischiefs without any expectation of comfort or redress: she loved a Prince whose heart she knew was preengaged; she loved him in despite of her own reason, and against her own will; and whatever resolutions she took, she could not forbear loving what all the world admired as amiable. Nevertheless, she vigorously opposed the progress of that tyrannous passion; and as she was obliged to be just to Sunnon, and generous to Rosamond, she made those reproaches to her self, which redoubled the violence of her discontents. In this sad condition she beheld Polyxena and Albisinda with tears in her eyes, and in words that shewed the troubles of her mind, Fair Princess, answered she, I cannot tell whether I have not spoken to my self for Prince Sunnon all that you your selves have spoken in his behalf; and whether I have not a thousand times considered, that it is enough for Ambiomer to accuse me of ingratitude, without giving Sunnon reason to make the same complaint. But after all this, I have not yet overcome the malignity of my destiny; however, I despair not altogether to shake off the yoke of my misfortune, and to do justice to a Prince who merits a better fortune than—— That Prince, said Polyxena, interrupting him, knows very well the value of your affections. But, Madam, I am to let you understand, that he is reduced to so deplorable an extremity, that I fear the kindness you begin to have for him, will be altogether ineffectual, if he receive not quickly some testimony from you, either by word if mouth, or under your hand. I should never refuse, replied the Turlingien Queen, to give Prince Sunnon a visit in your company, had I that command over my self which I ought to have. But, Madam, what can I answer to a Prince who says I render him unhappy, should he press me to declare my self, when I am not in a condition to do it to his advantage. Be satisfied therefore I beseech you with a Letter; I will write my real thoughts, and perhaps he shall have no reason to complain.

Polyxena mollified by the looks and language of Amalazontba, was contented that a Letter should suffice at present, to mitigate Sunnon's despair. Thereupon Amalazontba wrote the following lines to a Prince whose misfortunes she did not look upon with that indifferency with which he had taxed her.

The Queen of the Turlingiens to Prince Sunnon.

I cannot tell whether the Gods be mov'd at our misfortunes or no; but this I know, that I perceive such a Combat in my heart in your behalf, that I never felt the like before. Perhaps my reason will not always give ground, which in regard it is of your side, and pleads altogether in your behalf; there is some probability that you will not always have cause to complain of my injustice. The hope of this change ought to mitigate some part of your pains. Then mind your health, Prince, 'tis Amalazontba begs it of you and commands you by all that power which you desire she should have over your heart.

She had no sooner wrote this Letter, but she sent it away by one of her servants to Sunnon. Presently after, Polyxena waiting upon her, with an intention to have carried it herself: I have already, Madam, said she, sent away what you come for; deeming it convenient that my letter should precede your visit, to the end you might find the Prince in a better condition, if it be a truth that he has such a respect for me. The impatient Polyxena interrupting her, return'd her those thanks which she thought were her due; and immediately went to see her Brother that was so dear to her. She was no sooner come to his bedside, but she cast her eyes upon his Countenance; and perceiving an apparent mitigation of those sorrows that were imprinted in his looks before. "Well Brother, said she, will you not expel from your thoughts that despair which has hitherto oppress'd your spirits? And will you not agree, that you have now less cause to complain of Amalazontba, than you believed you had? I must acknowledge, dear sister, answered he, that that Divine Princess has done those things in my behalf, from whence I have received a more than ordinary Consolation. And I dare assure you, that if that kindness which she has begun to shew me, could but overcome at length that reluctancy which has always oppos'd my good fortune, I should not only recover and live, but I should also be the happiest man in the world.

He had no sooner concluded, but a pleasing phantasm of love causing him to ponder upon Polyxena's words, perswaded him that he was beholding to that Princess for the letter he had received; which, in regard it produced a suddain dejection of mind: "But, dear sister, added he, did not your entreaties, rather than Sunnon's sufferings, move Amalazontba to this compassion? "If you go about, answered she, to seek new ways to torment your

“ your self, you may believe that the Queen of the Turingiens only flatters you, to continue your sorrows by prolonging your life : but if you knew her humour, and would judge according to equity, you would see that Amalazontba is no dissembler, and that no consideration of friendship could make her write contrary to her own thoughts. Therefore, since she forbids you to despair, you have reason to hope : nor need you to question but that she is very much concerned for your preservation. “ Well, sister, answered he, my life and death are in the fair hands of the Turingien Queen ; for which reason I beg of you not to omit any thing which may be effectual to render her favourable and kind to my sufferings ; and to act for me with that affection which you have always testified upon occasions less important.

While Sunnon and Polyxena thus entertained each other, the King of Suevia was more differently perplexed ; not knowing what answer to give to the proposals that Marcian had made him : For as he hated the very thoughts of peace, yet durst not provoke those persons that desired an end of the War, he bent his mind by what stratagem he might disengage himself out of these intricacies. After he had considered of a thousand ways, at length he fixed upon one resolution ; at what time Martian came to attend him: Sir, said he to the King, I cannot tell whether the Forces of your League are weary or no of the labours and dangers which they have so long undergone : but this I am sure of, that most of the chief Captains are clearly for a general Accommodation ; and to terminate the differences that keep so many Nations in Arms, one against another.

Though the King knew what Martian came about, however, at first he would needs seem to be surprized, and indeed, to be very much vexed at it : and therefore, after a very smart manner ; “ Sir, said he, either I am deceived, or few of our Generals are of that opinion which you declare : For can you believe so many great Princes, passionately in love with Rosamond, will so easily renounce their hopes, to establish Pharamond’s felicity ? “ However, replied Martian, I must tell you, that the King of the Franks has fewer Rivals than you are aware of ; and there is one great Soldier in our Camp so far from fighting for Rosamond, that his only aims are to contribute to the delivery of that fair Princess, and to a general peace. “ I understand you, replied the King of Suevia, with a visible discomposure ; you mean Varanez without doubt : but though that Prince be so unconstant in his humour, there are Kings among us, that will more vigorously defend us, should you your self deprive us of your Recruits. Martian, after he had justified Varanez upon the change of his mind, with which the King of Suevia taxed him ; “ I am apt to believe, added he, that the assistance you speak of is not very necessary ; yet the manner of losing of it, for ought I know, may put you to more trouble than you are aware of. The King of Suevia apprehended too well Martian’s meaning ; and though he mortally dreaded, lest the Army of Theodosius should joyn with Pharamond’s, yet with his wonted natural fierceness : “ I understand your meaning, Sir, said he ; but let us speak and act more plainly. “ For your part, resolve as you please, either to stay with us, or joyn with Pharamond. “ For my part, the world shall know I am not so much afraid of my life, to fear any accident that can threaten it. Nay, it will be less advantageous to Pharamond to receive a large recruit, than to keep that equality of number that might ballance Fortune. For though she should bring me down to the lowest depth of despair, I will neither desire nor grant any favour ; but burying my self under the ruins of Cologne, I will involve in my destiny those persons whose loss will make my enemies repent of being Victors.

He pronounced those words with an air so conformable to his language, that Martian, who had all the reason in the world to suspect the violence of his humour, took his leave for fear of provoking him any farther, and went to consult with the King of the Huns what course to take to moderate a fury, whose menaces might prove so tragical.

But the politick King of the Suevians had no other desire than to hinder the Greeks, that were about to leave him, from joyning with the Franks, and to gain him time for the Saxons to come to the league before the truce were expired. To bring about his design, it behoved him to remove Theodosius’s Army, and to prolong Martian’s Negotiation : and therefore he would by no means presently hear of an accommodation, as well to spin out the time, as to take away all suspicion, should he appear too condescending to that from which all the world believed him so averse. However, he thought that Martian would not be easily put off at the beginning of an enterprise of so much importance, and that the greater reason he had to fear the consequences of the war, the more he would endeavour for a conclusion of it. Nor was he deceived in his conjectures : for while he was thus reasoning with himself, the King of the Huns came to him, and laid before him that it was now high time to calm the Tempest that had shaken all Europe. Nor do I believe your condition

dition to be so desperate, added he, to infuse into you these resolutions, of which Martian has given some intimation: But on the contrary that it will be much more for your advantage to make a peace and consent to the welfare of Pharamond. In short, you must resolve quickly upon the one or the other, before the departure of the Greeks, upon whom there is a necessity of leaving Germany.

He used so many other strong and pressing Arguments, that the King of Suevia after he had paused a while, and made as if he had had a great conflict with himself, thus began, Sir, said he, I find at length that there is a necessity for me to discover my very heart, and to speak to you with that confidence which the conformity of our age and quality requires that we should have the one in the other. I must tell you then that I am obstinately set upon war, not out of the hatred which I bear to Pharamond, for that is not so violent to hinder me from consenting to a peace, could I but reconcile my self to my enemies, without the absolute ruine of my own affairs: For if I consent to surrender Rosamond to Pharamond, I deare against me the Burgundians, Hercules, Gepides and Alains, and this only in favour of a Prince who believes he may forsake me without being ingrateful. And therefore before the treaty begin, I think it will be my best way to secure my self from the scandals that Gondioch, Arderic, and Godegefile will throw upon me, and that I also endeavour to have some security from Pharamond himself.

The King of the Huns overjoyed to find the Suevian King so well disposed, I am glad, answered he, that you are so well inclined to take that part, which it most concerns you to adhere to. Let us consider then how to deal with the Kings of the Gepides and Alains, for as for the King of the Franks, he is too much obliging and too much in love, to be ingrateful to the deliverer of Rosamond. Truly I think, replied the King of the Suevians, that I may rely upon Pharamond's generosity, and that I shall have less trouble to unite my interests with his, than to preserve the alliance of his Rivals. But Sir, added he all of a sudden, I believe I have found out a way, not only to let you see that I have no reluctancy against peace, but also to oblige Gondioch, Arderic, and Godegefile to submit to the accommodation which you desire. To which purpose we must resolve to weaken our selves, by dismissing the forces of Ibeodossus, provided we may be assured that Pharamond will not insist upon more severe terms than he now demands. Were you well acquainted with that Prince, replied the King of the Huns, questionless you would have no cause either of fear or suspicion, and I dare be confident his acknowledgment would grant you your own conditions, provided you would deliver Rosamond to the King of the Cimbrians. Well then Sir, replied the Suevian King, let us put an end to the differences wherein we have interested so many Nations: Let us dismiss Varanez and Martian with their forces, and for my part I protest that I will endeavour to facilitate the success of the negotiation to the utmost of my power.

The King of the Huns fully satisfied with these expressions, failed not to fortifie the Suevian King in his good intentions, with all the arguments imaginable, as also to advertise Martian of all that had passed. Martian having joyfully received the news, immediately attended both the Princes, and in that last conference it was resolved upon, that that very day orders should be given for the departure of the Greeks, and for meeting of the Commissioners on both sides in reference to the treaty. Martian thereupon took leave of the two Kings, and as he was going the Suevian stedfastly beholding him, Pardon me Sir, said he, if I make you a small request, which I cannot forbear to desire though I believe it to be inconsiderable. It is only this, that you would not give the least cause of suspicion to Gondioch, Arderic or Godegefile, that I consented to the departure of your Troops. For then those Princes will look upon the loss of which we have been the cause, as the original of all those other misfortunes, wherewith they are threatned. I think it also necessary for me to send one of my Officers to the Camp, to conjure the Rivals of Pharamond not to oppose the march of your Army, lest they should draw out the Franks to your relief, and give you thereby good cause to joyn with our enemies. Martian cheerfully agreeing to the King of Suevia's proposal, the King called for the Captain of his Guards, and having instructed him in a few words, he commanded him to follow Martian, and discharge himself of the Commission wherewith he had entrusted him.

While they are thus resolving, and that nothing but surprize and admiration alarm'd the Camp near Cologne, to hear that the Greeks were about to leave them, honour and renown resplendently shines in every part of the victorious Army of Pharamond. And yet there was a kind of gloomy melancholy clouded their joy, while every one grieved for the death of Ibrahimond, and the sad condition of Sunnon. Every one bewailed the Brother of Gunderic, every one longed to see the Brother of Pharamond, and if that lover of Amalazouba would have left the City where the fair Queen resided, the important offices which the King of the Franks sent for his Ransome, would have soon freed that valiant Prince, from that Captivity which had befallen him, only to moderate the heat of his courage. But he not finding himself in a condition to fight for the Princess, was easily induced to stay in Arippina, till heaven and Amalazontha should dispose of his future fortune. However after he had received the Queens letter, he was much more at ease than before, and patiently endured those applications which were used for his recovery. The news of that change being spread in the Camp of the Franks, caused an extraordinary joy, and the same day as much to their content there appeared upon the Rhine a great number of boats and vessels, which Flavian and Dinox had built with a celerity equal to their fidelity and experience. Then the impatience of those illustrious Lovers that longed for the taking of Cologne, visibly appeared as well in their countenances as in their actions, and the whole Army having an awful respect to their Commanders, had no sooner received all necessary orders, but they set themselves to the building of the Bridge, with all the alacrity and expedition imaginable.

While so many thousand men were thus diligently employed, there arrived in the Camp a Soldier whose presence and train shewed him to be a person of no mean quality. Nor was it long ere he appeared to be Sinibald the Brother of the Danish King. But Pharamond, because he had heard several stories of his Adventurcs, and believed that he came to the Camp of the Franks, only because his Rival had declared for the Saevian, did him but the bare honours which he thought due to him, not testifying that acknowledgment which he used to do to other Princes, that came to fight for his interest. But afterwards in a much more obliging manner, he received two other extraordinary persons, who came to the Army the same day. Those were Theon and Melufina, who were desirous to impart to the King of the Franks and his illustrious friends, the observations they had made in the solitudes to which they had retired. The Queen of the Visigoths took Melufina into her own Apartment, Theon being lodged by Pharamond's peculiar order: And in regard the world was highly perswaded of their great knowledge and foresight of future things, some there were who that very evening were importunate to understand, what would be the success of the war and the siege of Cologne. And in regard that Theodolinda was the first that put the question, as having a brother and a father in the City, "Madam, answered Melufina, there is such a chain of accidents in the order of the universe, that they seem to depend one upon another, so that we cannot think it probable that Heaven has brought to light the King of the Cimbrians, to deny us that which we expect from so strange a discovery. From thence it is, that Rosamond has the liberty to bestow her affections upon the King of the Franks. From thence it is, that the felicity of Pharamond overturning the pretences of his Rivals, shall quench that evil desire in them, of continuing the war to no purpose. "I think Madam, replied the Princess of the Nemetians, you might maintain our hopes by better reason than those you bring, and instead of observing the events of this lower world, you must look up and see in heaven, that which is not yet happened upon earth. "I confess, replied Melufina, that I have made some observations upon the success of this war, and would not stick to impart them did I not see here a more learned man, who can better satisfy your curiosity. "Then 'tis you prudent Theon, said the Queen of Albion, addressing her self to the famous Greek, that keeps us between hope and tear in reference to the siege of Cologne. For heavens sake, added Placidia, help us out of this cruel uncertainty wherein we live, and tell us as much as in you lies, what will be the end of these differences that divide almost all the world.

Thereupon Theon addressing himself to the Queen of the Visigoths, "Great Princess, said he, I make no question but we are now very near an happy end of those strange calamities, which perhaps have made Nations murmur against the providence that permitted them: Yet thereby has that providence shewed it self favourable to that virtue which it seemed to abandon, while it suffered it to undergo the toyls of war, that it might vanquish: and we may averr that vertue had been less renowned, had it been more at quiet. There was a necessity for a Briomer to oppose Pharamond, and for every one of you to have your particular persecutors, and heaven had in vain bestowed on you those heroick qualities which you possess, had it not delivered you over to the assaults of adverse fortune. Though I am deceived in the observations I have made, if you have now long time to suffer.

The whole Court retired very well satisfied with his predictions, and that which confirm'd their hopes was, that the next day came intelligence that Theodosius Army had left the confederate Prince, and had begun their march for Constantinople, and that Martian desired to confer with Constance between the two Armies, in order to the putting an end to a war, which had lasted too long already. This news spread such a lively and universal joy, through the whole Camp of Pharamond, that it seemed to have passed through the hearts of the Captains into the countenances of the meanest Soldiers: nor did it stop there, but more and more augmented, upon the interview of the two Lieutenant Generals of both the Emperours, which produced so great a probability of coming to a general accommodation. The passionate Pharamond and the enamoured Theobald were transported with a real joy, when they understood in what a fair way they were to their real happiness. But Vitidomar and Marcomire, whose destinies depended absolutely upon the King of Suevia, they could not admit those hopes into their Breasts which others had conceived. Constance, Wallis, Constantine and Taxander testified no less impatience in behalf of their Friends, than for themselves; and though they had every hour the company of their Princesses, and that they were assured of their happiness, they could not but earnestly desire the liberty of Resamond, Bellamira, Polyxena and their fair and generous companions.

In the mean while, Martian was no sooner parted from Constance, but he return'd to give an account to the King of Suevia, who after he had seemed to be well enough satisfied with what had passed at the first Conference: You must give me leave, Sir, said he, to be as careful of my Allies, as mindful of the peace, and Pharamond's advantages. It will be necessary then that the Province of Senonois be added to the Burgundians, and that Gondioch be settled therein, not only by the permission of Honorius, but by the consent of Pharamond to whom all Gallia has submitted.

Martian had no sooner testified that he made no question of obtaining whatever the King of Suevia could pretend to; but the politick Prince, to prolong the Treaty, resolv'd to demand several Provinces in Germany for the Alans, Gepides, Herules and Bastarnes. Then being informed that Sinibald was in the Camp of the Franks, so soon as Martian was return'd to the Camp, he sent for the Prince of the Saxons to come to Cologne, to which Aldemar readily consented. The politick King having received him with all the honour, and all the marks of affection which he could expect from a Prince of his disposition, Sir, said he, I know that Sinibald is in the Camp of our Enemies, and that Pharamond has promised him all the assistance he shall stand in need of, as well to repair his losses, as to recover Melanitha. But, Sir, I will let you see how highly I value such a Confederate as you are; for either Pharamond shall fore-go the interests of your Rival, and consent that you may be happy with the Princess, who is already yours by promise, or else he shall feel the war hotter than ever; and I will perish, together with all my friends, in the support of your pretensions. Aldemar, who understood that Sinibald was really in the Army of Pharamond, testified his acknowledgment for such obliging protestations; but declared withal, that he would singly decide the difference which he had with Sinibald, without engaging many nations in a particular quarrel, who had undergone too many hardships and dangers already. Nevertheless, in regard the King of the Sarmatians was about to abandon the League in a few days, Aldemar thought it convenient to offer the Suevian, finding it so seasonable, the same courtesie that he had offered to him; which he did with an incomparable grace, yet not so much out of inclination, as out of acknowledgment.

The King of Suevia overjoyed that he had engaged in the League the Saxons and Jutlanders, minded nothing more than to gain time, till such a considerable recruit could come to the Camp. But when Gilmond and Gilimer were arrived with the forces under their Command, he put off his Vizer: so that when Martian came to Cologne the next time, their conference ended in a manner far different from the civilities they used to shew at other times. The Lieutenant of Theodosius accepting him with all the marks of a true satisfaction in his looks: I protest, Sir, said he, all the Princes whom you call your enemies, are very generous; they have readily consented to what you demanded for the King of the Burgundians; and they will use all their endeavours to satisfy Humbert, Arderic, and Godegesile. I am very glad of it, replied he: but after I have spoken in behalf of my friends, I think it will not be improper, to desire security from Pharamond for my self. You shall have it in as ample and firm a manner as you can expect, replied Martian: You shall not only have the liberty to ally your Family to the King of the Franks, by the marriage of Vitidomar with——

How! cryed he, interrupting him with a strange fury, and transported with choler, would you that a perfidious wretch, that revolted to the Franks, only to sacrifice me to his ambition, that an unnatural monster that seeks my life, should strengthen himself by an alliance with Pharamond, and with my consent too? First let the men which you would save by a peace so tragical to me, perish a thousand times in the most bloody war that ever was waged upon the earth. But, Sir, replied Martian, how can you else so solidly reconcile your self to the King of the Franks, as you desire? I intend, replied he, to espouse Polyxena my self. Is it possible, answered Martian, that you should speak as you mean? Do you believe the Princess of the Franks will prefer you before Viridomar, or that Marcian dares make a proposal—— Let him let it alone. cryed he, interrupting him, and transported with his wonted fury: And I also declare, that Pharamond shall enjoy neither peace nor happiness as long as I live: and now do as you think fitting, take my Enemies part, assail Cologne, take the Town, but never expect that Pharamond shall get any advantage by a victory which I can render tragical and fatal when I please. “Yes, Sir, briskly replied the Lieutenant of Honorius, we will take Pharamond’s party, and beat up your Quarters with an Army so formidable, that the Ramparts of Agrippina shall not protect you from the Fire and Sword wherewith they intend to complete the quarrel of their great King.

Upon those words he flung out of the Room, and the furious Prince, instead of returning an answer, began to consider whether it were not his best way to seize his person. But thinking himself in a condition to resist Pharamond, not without some flattering hopes of victory, he would not commit an act of violence that might provoke Varanez, Agathyrus and Agelmond, and cause them to march back their several Forces upon him. He also feared the loss of Aldemar; but more lest the Inhabitants of Cologne should take Arms in the defence of an illustrious person so highly affronted, only for endeavouring to restore peace to their Gates. As for the Rupture, he was unwilling to be accounted the author of it himself, and therefore he sent for the Magistrates of Cologne to make his excuse; telling them that it was not his fault that the Treaty did not go on with that success as they expected. “I gave my consent, said he, to whatever might facilitate the accommodation; but when I had submitted to all that concern’d the general interest, they would invade the particular interests of my Family, they would dispose of Viridomar and Albisinda, and compel me to reward a Rebel that has born Arms against me.

Then to persuade them how moderate a person he was, “That the world may know, pursued he, how far I am from using those acts of violence of which my Enemies accuse me, I give free liberty to all persons that will leave our party to depart out of Agrippina, though it be to the Army of the Franks.

While by these politick insinuations he strives to preserve his own authority in a City where all his hopes were enclosed, Varanez, Martian, Agathyrus and Agelmond resolve to joyn with the Camp of the Franks. As for the King of the Huns and Prince Balamir, they had too great an aversion against the injustice of the league, too high an esteem of the noble qualities of Pharamond, and were too amicably linked to the interests of the King of the Lombards, not to embrace the same party. Agelmond at his departure from Cologne, proposed it to his Sister to go along with him, but the generous Agione besought him to let her stay with her illustrious companions, and to run the same fortune with them, rather than to shelter herself in the Camp of Pharamond. The magnanimous King of the Lombards could not disprove her answer, and the enamoured Balamir, who never parted from his charming Princess but with a most sensible sorrow, was so far from contesting with her resolution, that he not only admired it, but was overjoyed to hear it, notwithstanding the discontents it might cause him to suffer. As for Aldemar, they perceived him insupportably melancholy, by reason of the word which he had passed to the King of Suevia, whom he began to suspect to have spoken ill of Pharamond; but Agathyrus restored his mind to its former tranquillity, by telling him the reality of things. He inform’d him after what manner Pharamond had received Sinibald; and after he had justified that Prince, “Sir, said he, ’tis most true that the most just of the two parties would receive a most considerable reinforcement both from your own valour, and the courage of your Soldiers, yet I dare say, if you stay in this league, you may act more friendly in Pharamond’s behalf, than if you turn to his assistance with all your Forces. You cannot think, added he with a smile, that I speak in this manner to injure the virtue of Prince Aldemar, but rather to testify the reliance we have in your Generosity. Stay then where I see there is none else that can oppose the violences of the Suevian King, for the interest of the Princesses. For though the King of the Gepides, and the Prince of the Burgundians are noble in their inclinations, yet fortune will have it that Ardaric loves Rosamond, and that Gondemar has no power but under a Rival of Pharamond.

Aldemar having consented to whatever the King of the Sarmatians requested, promised to keep in Cologne with a good Body of Saxons, and in serving the league, at the same time to serve those most incomparable persons that were so tyrannically treated. Then continuing his discourse full of acknowledgment, “I will tell you more, said he, to avoid being ingrateful, and worsted in fight, that is, that I may avoid engaging with the preserver of Melanthia, I will only seek out Sinibald; Sinibald shall be the only enemy that I will have in your Army.

Agathyrfus having return'd him an answer, with a generosity little different from Aldemar's, the two Princes embraced as they took their leaves, and the King of the Sarmatians together with his illustrious friends, departed to joyn with the Franks, as was vehemently suspected in the League. But though their arrival produced an extraordinary joy in those places where their valour was so well known, yet the enamour'd Pharamond who trembled every moment for his Rosamond, was constrained to strive with himself to conceal his grief at the reception of those Princes, to whom notwithstanding his inward disquiet of mind, he gave those due honours with which they were very well satisfied.

Afterwards as his affliction was accompanied with a vehement desire of taking Cologne, for the delivery of his Princess, he consulted the same day with the King of the Huns, Theobald, Varanez, Constance, Viridomar, Agathyrfus, Wallia, and those other Princes and great Commanders in the Army, about the quick execution of so important an enterprize. Presently it was resolv'd that they should finish the Bridge, so that after they had taken a view of the materials provided for that purpose, Pharamond, Viridomar, the Prince of Persia, Martian, Agathyrfus, Agelmond, and Balamir, marched courageously and in good order, toward the Trenches of the Enemy, to repel such forces as should oppose the designs of the Franks. Constance, the Kings of the Cimbrians, and Tongres, the Prince of the Danes and Gepides, who commanded the Vandals, marched toward the two forts to succour Telansr and Valerius, if the enemy should fall upon them.

The King of the Britains, Marcomire, and Artabure embark'd in that little Fleet which was appointed to assist the workmen at the Bridge, as also to keep off with their shottwenty thousand Suedes, that lay on the other side of the River. Constantine besides his ordinary valour, made it appear how much experience he had learn'd, as well upon the Loire as upon the Thames. Nor were Marcomire and Artabure, though less experienced in Sea fights, wanting to signalize themselves by a thousand noble exploits. All this while there was no considerable sally made, either from the Town or from the Camp: For they thought it not convenient to hinder the making of a bridge, which would but serve to divide Pharamond's forces. But the next day the impatient Varanez, by the consent of the passionate King of the Franks, the enamour'd Theobald and the sorrowful Viridomar, sent to tell the enemy, that they wondred after they had refused the peace so kindly offer'd them, that they were so unwilling to come to a battel. That a deciding Battel would be less dangerous to the Soldiers, than the continuance of toyl and labour. That the Franks, the Cimbrians, and their allies gave them their choice, either to fight with all their forces united together, or to divide them by passing the River by consent, that both parties might have the more room to engage with less confusion. The general opinion of the League was to accept the latter proposition, and not to make any delay for fear that Varanez and Martian should recal the Greeks, and that Agelmond should bring up his Lombards, who were not far off in Germany.

The fiery Godegesle and the young King of the Basternes, were for marching with all speed, without putting themselves to the trouble of passing part of the Army over the River. But the King of Suevia was of a contrary opinion, for knowing the humour of Theobald and Pharamond, he was in hopes they would leave the bridge of Cologne free for those forces that should be appointed to pass the River. The King of the Burgundians, the King of the Gepides and the Saxon Prince, followed the last advice. Thereupon by consent of both parties, the Franks drew their forces out of the two forts which they had taken, and the Suedes permitted them to finish the bridge unmolested so that on Pharamond's side, the Franks, one part of the Gaules, the Romans and the Cimbrians, passed over into the Country of the Ubians, led by Pharamond, Theobald and Constance. The remainder of the Gaules, the Britains, the Visigoths and Tongres stayed in the Camp commanded by Viridomar, who was unwilling to pass the River, that he might avoid fighting with the Suedes, by the King of Armorica, the King of the Tongres, by Prince Wallia who had joyn'd his Troops to Constantine's, and by Sinibald. As for Varanez with his illustrious friends, together with Marcomire and Artabure, they marched with the King of the Franks. Constance stayed before Cologne with Artabure and Gidsicles, the Town being defended by the King of Suevia, Gondemar and Briomer. Pharamond, Theobald, and those illustrious Generals that were come over to him, embattel'd themselves to advance against the Burgundians and Herules, commanded by their own Kings. On the other side of the Rhine, the Gaules, the Britains, Tongres and Visigoths, were to give battel to the Alsins, Gepides, Basternes and Saxons. The valiant Aldemar was at the head of his Saxons, for in regard Cologne was not straitned, and that the Princesses had no need of his assistance, he rather chose to fight in the field, than to be shut up in the City.

The night preceding so memorable a Battel, was spent in giving rest to the Soldiers, while the Captains employed part thereof in mutual consultations, or in providing all things necessary for next days action. But no sooner had the Sun dispel'd the darknets of the night, but the sound of a thousand warlike instruments having awakened the Soldiers, and excited their courage, every one prepared to signalize himself in the most important Battel that was ever fought. Every one stood to his Standard or to his colours, nor did the Generals omit any thing which concern'd their duty. After every Nation had perform'd the ceremonies of the religion which they profess'd, Pharamond and Theobald rode from Rank to Rank, with their Vipers up to shew themselves to the Soldiers, by whom they were truly honoured. Some they encouraged with the hopes of honour, to others they promised rewards, not failing to speak and act in such a manner, as was most proper to excite their valour. Friends, said they, Remember that the Army which we are going to encounter, have refused the peace we offer'd them, but remember withal that you have overcome them already more than once: So that it behoves you to resolve to dye honourably with your Swords in your hands, rather than to fall into their hands. For what usage can you expect from an enemy so irreconcilable? what favour can you expect from a League, so barbarous to the fairest Princesses in the world?

They spoke these words with so much vehemence, and there shone such a Heroick Vigour in their countenances, that the Soldiers animated by their language, and by the confidence they had in their valour, by their shouts and acclamations testified the fiery impatience that transported them, and called impatiently to be led on to the Combat. The Princes overjoyed to observe so noble a resolution in their Soldiers, advanced toward their enemies in good order, and full of those hopes which appeared in their eyes. The King of the Franks led the right wing, with the Prince of Persia and the King of the Sarmatians, Theobald led the left accompanied by Martian and Agelmond, and the King of the Huns led the battel, assisted by the valiant Balamir and Prince Marcomire. On the other side, the fierce Godegesile and the King of the Burgundians having ranged their men, like experienc'd Captains, adding the Fire of jealousy to that of their courage, mov'd toward their Rivals with countenances both bold and martial.

So soon as the Armies came within their Arrows flight of one another, they challenged each other with a menacing hollow, and then discharged a shower of arrows that darkned the sky. Now in regard that Gondioc was oppos'd to Pharamond, and the King of the Herules to the Cimbrians, they met more than once, but more than once they were enraged to see themselves parted, without any hopes of meeting again. However, Gondioc's misfortune brought him once more to engage the King of the Franks, and the combat which began with a redoubled fury, was ended to the advantage of the invincible Pharamond. Not but that Gondioc resisted with a valour, which would have attracted admiration, had it not been oppos'd against the King of the Franks. For as he was lifting up his hand to strike his adversary, Pharamond made a thrust at him so nimbly, with so much vigour and so fortunately, that his Sword finding a defect in his Cuirass, ran up to the Hilt in Gondioc's body, who falling at his horses feet without any appearance of life, the generous Pharamond commanded Cleomer to cause him to be carried off, and to give him such relief as he was capable to receive.

He pursued his victory with little resistance, for the Burgundians terrified as well by his valour as by the loss of their own King, soon betook themselves to flight, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Guntran to rally them again. Cologne opened her gates to them, as well as to the Herulians who followed them soon after, pursued by Theobald, who had obtained the same advantage over Godegesile, as Pharamond had obtained over Gondioc.

How many noble actions should we have so described, were we to give a particular relation of the exploits of those two Princes, or to set down the wonderful acts of the Prince of Persia, Martian, the King of the Sarmatians, Agelmond, Balamir, Marcomire, and the King of the Huns. But as they are too long to recite, let us see how far valour and courage displayed themselves in the Army commanded by Constance, Viridomar, Constantine, Wallia, and the King of the Tongres. The King of the Basternes at the beginning challenged the Prince of Suevia, and there was a fierce and obstinate encounter between them, wherein the enamoured Humberz manifested the eager desire he had, to please the father of his Princess. But the unfortunate Lover was forced to yield, for Viridomar having wounded and taken him prisoner, put all the Basternes to the rout. Constantine, Wallia, Taxander, and on the other side, Arderic and Aldemar outdid themselves, and the two Lovers of Melafintha having fought each other out, met at length with that animosity and fury, which only ended ended in the death of Sinibald. After that Aldemar and Ardaric retreated in pretty good order, and regained their own Trenches; by which means, and by the coming on of the night, they saved themselves from the pursuit of the Enemy.

But if these terrible Warriours had surpassed the hopes that was conceived of their valour, you may easily conjecture that the famous Constance, seconded by Artabure and Gidifcles, had won no less honour: for having pursued the Forces that sallied out upon him, to the Walls of Cologne, he had made use of his advantage with such an undaunted courage, and a perfect experience, that he had lodged himself in a readiness to attack the Counterscarp, notwithstanding all the resistance that Gondemar could make. But while he left the place to oppose the Captain that pressed so vigorously upon him, Briomer got possession of the Cittadel by the help of the King of Suevia, whereby the wickedest person became Master of the lives and destinies of the fairest persons in the world.

In the mean time, Pharamond, Theobald, Varanez, and their illustrious Friends, though most of them wounded, advanced toward Cologne, not losing a moment of time, with an intention to carry the City with a celerity becoming their love and valour. They advanced toward the Walls with aspects enough to have terrified the Defenders; and the fierceness of their looks was soon supported by actions that caused a far greater dread. Aldemar was then in Agrippina, where he consulted sometimes with Gondemar: but though those two Princes were just in themselves, and that they had the same resolutions to serve those incomparable persons that were shut up in the Castle of Cologne: however, they did all they could in defence of the cause wherein they had engaged. The King of Suevia, having now no more than these two valiant persons to oppose against so many that assailed him, with a horrible discomposure stood studying what resolution to take: for his despair was enough to have killed him for very grief, had it not found a consolation suitable to his humour, and the violent passions that turmoiled him, in the consideration of those calamities to which he was able to reduce Pharamond and Viridomar. This active and impetuous humour carrying him at length to make a sally, he prepared himself for the encounter, having first sent word to Briomer, that he should be sure to remember his promise. But being opposed to the assaults of Constance, he found more resistance than he foresaw; and indeed he had lost his life, had not the generous Artabure looked upon him as the Father of Viridomar and Albifinda, and had he not had a respect to that Dignity to which all the world submits with reverence. At the same time news came to Pharamond and Theobald, that Gondioch and Godegesile were still alive, and that their wounds were not mortal, whereupon the magnanimous Princes gave strict command that they should be looked to with all the care imaginable. Their Officers failed not to obey their orders exactly; but though the King of the Burgundians had something of moderation in him, the King of the Herules less patient, could not endure to outlive his misfortune: so that he died soon after through the violence of his lorrors, having torn the plaisters from his wounds.

The next day Guntran and Gilmond got into Cologne, and Gidifcles with his Vandals relieved Artabure, with order to make some attempt to draw out the Enemy. For at the same time, though on the opposite side, the King of the Franks, the Cimbrians, the Sarmatians, the Lombards, Martian, the Prince of Persia, the Prince of the Huns, Marcomire, Meroveus and Genebaud, having prepared long Ladders, were about to fill up the Ditch with a resolution to scale the Walls, whatever danger they met with. The news of that enterprise coming to the old Camp on the other side of the Rhine, Viridomar was resolv'd to share in the honour of such a bold Adventure, and to that intent pass'd the Bridge with the Prince of the Visigoths. As for the Kings of the Britains and Tongres, though they were near their Princesses, they were sorry they could not joyn with their illustrious Friends, but being to keep Ardaric in Play, they resolv'd to put an end to the war on their side.

The invincible Pharamond, the undaunted King of the Cimbrians, the valiant Viridomar, the fierce Varanez, and all the other renowned Soldiers whom we have named, boldly advanced toward the Walls of Agrippina, notwithstanding the showers of Arrows, Stones and combustible matter which fell from the Walls. There they lost six thousand Soldiers, and a great number of Officers; Prince Meroveus was slain, and Agelmond was run through the Arm with a Javelin, Varanez received so ponderous a blow upon his Helmet, that he was beaten down almost senseless at the feet of Agnibarsus: but notwithstanding the terror of so much danger, they began to mount. Viridomar, Theobald and Pharamond himself were wounded. But at length, notwithstanding all the resistance of Aldemar, Gondemar and Guntran, the transported Lovers got up to the Battlements, of which they took hold with one hand, while the terrible blows of the other removed all opposition out of their way. The Princes, who had defended that Post so vigorously, were forced soon after to be carried off, by reason of their wounds, the news whereof coming to the King of Suevia's ears, he resolv'd to retire back into the City, either to repel the Enemy, or die with honour. But Gidifcles, who besides the violence of his humour, was puffed up with the honour of commanding his own Country men, thought himself oblig'd to make sure of his victory, and pursuing the King of Suevia, wounded him dangerously, and fain would have killed him before he could get into Cologne. The fierce Prince, notwithstanding his wounds, his age and his faintness, was resolv'd to run where the danger was greatest, and encouraging the Troop that environed him, Come on, my Friends, said he, let us go and tumble from the Walls these rash fools, whom we shall easily vanquish, and send to seek their Graves in our Ditches.

He would have said more, but his strength failing him, they were forced to carry him to his Lodging, and to give him such relief as he stood in need of. At the same time there was a great noise that the Town was taken: and indeed Pharamond, Theobald and Viridomar were got down, followed by Agathysus, Martian, Balamir, Waliala, Marcomire and Genebaud, while Constance and Artabure had entred at another part, after they had lost Gidifcles and more than four thousand Soldiers.

The Victors immediately caus'd the heat of slaughter and plundering to cease, and sent to summon Briomer to yield up the Princesses. The King of the Franks went to Sannon; Agathysus took care of Aldemar, Marcomire of Gondemar, and the Prince of Suevia halted to be serviceable himself to his Father. But upon the hearing of his name, the furious King gave such a look upon the Officer that brought him word, as sufficiently declar'd his mind; and understanding that Viridomar and Pharamond were in Agrippina, he trembled for madness, and a short while after he was all over of a cold sweat. His assistants did not believe then he had long to live, when the King putting his strength to the utmost stress, call'd to one of his Esquires next his Bed-side, and demand'd of him what news of Briomer. So soon as he understood that he was alive, and Master of the Cittadel, resuming his speech, I die satisfied, cry'd he, since there yet remains alive so courageous a person, and faithful to me, in such a condition to mischieve my Enemies.

With a consolation of this nature expired a Prince whose end was answerable to his life. Viridomar was much concern'd for his loss, how unjust soever his Father had been. And while the Suevians throng'd to acknowledge their Sovereign, news was brought that Briomer demand'd three days to set his own particular affairs in order, as also to capitulate for those that adhered to him. The passionate Lovers, who after so many crosses and sufferings saw their happinesses so near approaching, thought the time to be insupportable, so that they were more than once resolv'd to storm the Castle: but the frantick humour of the Cimbrian being more dreadful to them than a million of armed men, they determin'd to yield to that person who made them tremble in the midst of their triumphs: not but that they sometimes flatter'd themselves with hopes, that Briomer, thinking to reap some great advantages to himself, might at length prefer a considerable advancement before the pleasure of acting a crime which he could not commit without running the hazard of his life. Nevertheless, those thoughts, though ground'd upon strong probabilities, could not assure them, when they reflect'd upon the wickedness of the person that still alarm'd their quiet; which made them undergo disturbances hardly to be express'd, though they had business sufficient at such a time as that. In short, besides that they were wounded, it behov'd them to pacifie the present Tumults, and to receive Placidia, the Queen of Albion, Theodolinda, the Princess of the Nemetians, and the famous Melufina; who were arriv'd under the safe conduct of the Kings of Armorica, and the Tongres; being attended by a great number of Officers, by Theon, Dinox and Flavian. Constantine and Taxander had brought the Enemy's Army on their side, to accept of Conditions of peace; so that the Kings of the Gepides and Basterns removed from the banks of the Rhine, because they would not be witnesses of their Rival's happiness. Varanez and Agelmond, whose wounds were neither dangerous nor painful, entred also that day into Agrippina. And at the same time Aldemar, Contran, Gondemar and Sannon began to rise, and resolve to go abroad the next day: So that all things began to tend to the revolution which was desired. Nevertheless, the Princesses not being yet at liberty, they durst not open their hearts to admit those joys, which seem'd to crave entrance. On the contrary, the enamour'd Pharamond, the King of the Cimbrians, the King of the Suevians, the Prince of the Huns, Marcomire, Gondemar, Sannon, and Contran, were possess'd with a deep languishment, that stifled their publick rejoicing: and whatever could be said for their consolation, they were always in fear for the sake of those persons whom they lov'd; and that fear was incompatible with all other pleasing passions. The Queen of the Visigoths, to whom Melufina had declar'd what whatever concerned the fortune of Pharamond, laboured to fill that Prince with hopes; and assured him that he should not only be suddenly happy with Rosamond, but that there was not any Monarch in the world, to whom the Heavens had promised a more numerous, or more glorious train of Successors. Though the King of the Franks had too great a soul to entertain a slight belief, yet he could not chuse but hearken to Placidia with great attention: for in regard she quoted two Authors, whose knowledge he could not despise, after so many pregnant proofs of their experience, no question but the discourse of the Queen of the Visigoths made some impression in his mind. In so much, that Placidia taking notice thereof, and being desirous wholly to convince the Prince, desired Theon the same day to truit her with those observations which he had made, concerning the most remarkable accidents, that should befall the Monarchy of France. You may very well think, Madam, answered he, that I shall never be backward to yield you all obedience; yet, with your Majesty's permission, I should be very unwilling that any other than Pharamond should see what I have done for his sake: for there are many Kings at present in Cologne, whose Kingdom one day shall be all reduced under the Dominion of the French; and there is no necessity for me to give them the trouble of knowing so much.

Concluding those words, he presented several papers to Placidia; who gladly receiving them, delivered them into the hands of the King of the Franks, when he came to visit her in the evening, and to know of her whether the Emperor Honorius would be pleased to come to Cologne. It was his pleasure, answered she, that I should come hither; and that I should leave him, as sick as he is, to accompany those fair Princesses with whom you find me. But, Sir, added she, I believe you will see him here in a few days; for his reason, and his gratitude to the King of the Cimbrians, have made a fair progress toward the subduing a passion, which we have observed to have been very violent formerly. After they had a while continued this discourse, Pharamond retired to the place prepared for him: and in regard he did not believe that any thing could be said concerning his fortune, without mentioning his Princess, so soon as he came into his chamber he opened the papers which he had received, and there he read the words which Theon had written, after he had compared his Observations with Melusina.

FRANKS.

Whether the Rules of a Science, which has never failed me hitherto, are false and uncertain, or Cologne shall be taken in a few days; and in a few days after, the King of the Franks shall be happy with the Queen of the Cimbrians.

Their felicity shall be too great to be of a short continuance; they shall enjoy it as long as they live: and it shall descend to a numerous Train of Illustrious Successors: And shall be in a manner Hereditary to the flourishing Monarchy which they have founded.

However, I must acknowledge, that the Empire of the Franks, according to the common-fate of Kingdoms, shall not be free from Troubles, and disturbing Revolutions; but it shall remain immoveable in the midst of the most violent flogs of Fortune : And beginning with Pharamond, shall endure to the end of the World.

The Bounds thereof shall extend according to the difference of Princes, to whom it shall owe Subjection ; but the usual Bounds thereof shall be the two Seas, the Alps, the Pyreneans, and the great River which we see.

Among the number of the Kings that shall succeed to Pharamond, there shall be many of high Renown : But not having leisure to mention them all, I will not detain you, till I come to two great Monarchs, that shall be the Glory of their Age, as well as of their Nation.

The first, in order of time, shall enlarge his Conquests into Germany, into Italy, into Spain ; shall subdue many Nations, succour others. He shall assume the Title of Great. He shall pull down a Monarchy, and raise an Empire.

France shall wish a long time after for the other, and at length Heaven shall send him into the world ; and shall send him so accomplished, that his People shall believe Heaven was all the while creating him for their satisfaction.

There shall appear in his Person, and all his Actions that Character of Grandeur, that shall distinguish him from all other men.

He shall excell all his Subjects in Prefence, in Aspect, in Wit, and Grandeur of Courage, to the same degree that his Birth has exalted him as their Sovereign Master. Yet, at that time shall his Subjects excel all other Nations.

He shall be just. He shall make those Laws, which he shall exactly observe himself. He shall suppress Luxury, establish Commerce. He shall cherish Arts and Sciences by his Liberality. And in a word, he shall be endued with all the Vertues of a great Prince, and all the Qualities of a real honest man.

He shall be as Magnificent as the ancient Kings of Persia, and as Valiant as the famous Macedonian, that destroyed their Empire.

Honour he shall passionately love. He shall forsake Pleasures, to encounter Dangers. He shall be at the head of his Army, when the most indefatigable Warriors are glad to be at rest in Cities.

He shall subdue Provinces in as little time as others travel through them.

His Subjects shall live at their full repose, free from the fear of their Neighbours, to the admiration of all the World.

He shall make a Voyage no less magnificent than the Triumphs of the Ancient Romans; but which shall much surpass them in Glory and Pomp, while the eyes of the Spectators shall be dazzled at the Lustre of that great Prince's Court.
of

This Pompous Festival shall be attended—

P*haramond*, whose Soul was infinitely fraught with Generosity, was so far from envying so great a King, that he was overjoyed at the number of his Successors; so that if any pensiveness intermixed it self with his satisfaction, it was because the Learned Theon had not completed his observations in reference to a Monarch that was one day to be so eminently renowned. But while his thoughts were set upon this Hero, Briomer loses no time, labouring to put an end to his days in such a manner as was conformable to his natural Genius; and worthy to crown all his crimes. In the first place he resolves to die, and upon that resolution he grounds all those others, which he took up against the most illustrious persons in the world. He believes it not enough to kill the Princesses, they must die a strange death, Pharamond must also partake of their sad fate; and if he can, he will involve all the other Lovers in his ruine. The more easily to execute this execrable design, he puts out of the Cittadel all those Soldiers whom he suspects; and he considers whether he shall not expel two Saxons that were sent to him some few days before: his suspicious humour resolves it; but certain reflections made him wave it. He considers that those two persons, having no obligations to the Sueves that remained with him, might have an eye upon them, and inform him of whatever they might undertake against him: he sees no likelihood that Aldemar, unknown to him, and who knew none of the Princesses, should have any reason to make any party in the Castle more than Balsmir or Gondemar, nor can he imagine that he himself should be thought capable of the last crime which he intended to commit, it not being probable, that a person in a condition to make a good capitulation, would forgo it, and renounce his life only for the destruction of those from whom he might be in hopes of a considerable fortune: so that he prepares himself with more boldness to the execution of his abominable design; and that he might not breed any suspicion among the Soldiers to make a rãutiny, he tells them, that he intended to make a shew of exposing the Princesses to some eminent danger, only to create a fear in the Victors, and to obtain the better conditions. He sends also to Rosamond, Bellmira, Polyxena and the rest of their illustrious companions, to tell them, that they might go to a place where he gave them liberty to walk, having made choice of it as most fit to his purpose. This place was a pleasant Gallery, though the windows were barred with Iron, but being supported with wooden Pillars: mark how he had laid his plot. The Princesses were no sooner entred, but he locks three or four doors upon them, he either removes, or employs the Soldiers upon several occasions; after that, he goes down, and lays combustible matter about the Pillars, he lights a Torch and sets in a corner of the Room, and then draws his Dagger with an intention to kill himself, should he be in any danger of falling alive into the hands of those Princes whom he called his Enemies. Then did his Soul swim in all the joy to which he had aspired; but considering that he should not see Pharamond involved in the mischief which he was about to execute, he wanted something to complete his content. Therefore to accomplish his satisfaction, he resolved to feed his eyes with the affliction of that Prince; to which end, he sends for him out of a desire to have some conference with him. He promises him that he should find him alone without offensive Arms at a window which looked out into a little Courte which he appointed, provided the King would come in the same posture, and that the door after him so soon as he was entred, Though these precautions were persuasive enough, that a person so wary was not over hasty to die, yet the King of the Franks's Friends would not yield that he should expose himself upon the word of a person whose humour and perfidiousness was so well known. But the enamoured Prince was so far from listening to their advice, that he would omit nothing which he thought might tend to the liberty of his Princess: so that without any more ado he went to the place where Briomer had appointed, and where the Cimbrian soon after came in the same posture as he had promised. So soon as he perceived the passionate King of the Franks, he cast a terrible look upon him, and addressing his speech to him in a most dreadful tone, Pharamond, cryed he, thou knowest what I have done to advance my Son to the Throne, that Son who was the object of my cares, and whom I loved as much as I hate thee. Nevertheless, thou knowest that it was thou that slewest this Son of mine, that was my only hope and consolation. Thinkest thou then that Briomer, whose humour thou art so well acquainted withal, can ever be reconciled to thee? Thinkest thou that he can suffer thee to be happy with Rosamond? No, no, he will never be guilty of so mean a spirit; he will have the pleasure to sacrifice to his revenge that which thou lovest above all the world; and it shall be his comfort to his death, that he has rendred thee as miserable as thou hast rendred him unfortunate. After those words he was about to return, when the terrified Pharamond, Hold, hold, cryed he, spare the noblest blood in the world; and if thou seekest for victims, take the life of Pharamond, which is so detested by thee. I will attempt that life which thou offerest, replied he, after the most tragical way I can think of, that is, by the destruction of Rosamond. How! cryed the disconsolate Pharamond, is there no way to soften thy cruelty? no way to save the life of my Princess? Take my life, take my Dominions—— I require nothing, replied the inhumane Villain, since I have preserved my hatred to this hour, and that I see my self in a condition to second it. He had no sooner pronounced those words, but without expecting Pharamond's answer, he turns about, goes where his rage carries him, and sets fire to the combustible matter.

Then the two Saxons who had laid their design declared themselves, and taking arms how weak soever their party might be, Fellow Soldiers, cryed one of the two addressing himself to the Suedes, you are lost if you save not the lives of the Princesses, you have only this way to obtain your pardon, do you believe that a desperate person who runs headlong to his own destruction, takes any care of your interests?

He could say no more the time was so short, and the Suevians perswaded by his words, and the extremity to which they were reduced, presently took the Saxons part: So that the one half endeavoured to force open the doors, the other descends to put out a fire, that had daunted the courages of the most undaunted hearts. Pharamond, Theobald, Viridomar, and all the other lovers were mortally afflicted, but instead of standing to bemoan themselves, they brought their battering engines, made a breach, ascend the Gallery, and finding the Princesses already escaped by means of the succour which the Soldiers had afforded them, every one flew to her that ruled his affections. Upon this occasion it was easie to observe, how far love surpasses friendship, for Pharamond ran toward the Princess of the Cimbrians, without any more ado, in a place where Polixena was in danger. Theobald and Viridomar ran to Henrimonda and Polixena, Marcomire took Albifinda, and Sannon the Queen of the Turingiens who was very ill at that time: Balamir the Princess of the Lombards, Gondemar the Princess of the Tongres, and Gumtran Blefinda, a noble Lady of the Royal blood of Pharamond.

These happy Lovers every one carried away what was most dear to them, and feeling these inward transpartations of joy which are not to be expressed, and the precious burdens which they carried in their Arms, being too charming to be troublesome, they flew through the flames with that swiftness which they could not have done, had it not been to save their Princesses. No sooner had they got them out of danger, but they threw themselves at their feet, not having the power to speak a word, so much were they transported with their several passions, and only gave those incomparable persons to understand by their looks full of love and joy, that which they could not otherwise express. The Princesses at another time would not have suffered such illustrious and renowned Hero's to have kneel'd so long before them, but then they were so little Mistresses of their own thoughts, that they hardly knew what they did. They could return no answer but as the others had spoke to them, their eyes were their interpreters, but it was no difficult thing to observe that the tenderness which rests in the soul of a lovely person, is far beyond the most ardent and tumultuous affection in the most passionate of lovers. However they were about to have fallen into other discourse, when the Queens of the Britains and Visigoths, Theodolinda and Adelaisada came at the same time as well to embrace their friends and rejoyce with them as to admire the most incomparable Rosamond, who had filled the world with the fame of her her charms, as also to see the Queen of the Turingiens, and the lovely Princesses of Suevia and Lombardy.

While these most admired persons are bestowing upon one another the testimonies of their esteem and affection which they mutually merited : The inhumane miscreant had no sooner lighted the fire, from whence he expected such dreadful consequences, but he retired into his Chamber to behold the ensuing desolation. But hearing the Saxons speak, and finding the Suevians overperswaded, he stabbed himself with the dagger which he had ready provided for that purpose, and was fallen upon the floor without any appearance of life. When they found him in that condition, several persons ran to behold so famous a criminal, and a Frank Officer approaching to his help, Briomer, said he, fear nothing, the King my Master is more generous than thou hast been wicked. How, cried he interrupting him with a strange surprize, is not Pharamond destroyed with Rosamond in the Flames? No, no, replied the Frank, Pharamond and Rosamond are likely to live together, with more felicity than thou hadst design'd them misfortune. If it be so, replied the despairing Briomer, thinkest thou I will receive help from a person that brings me the most dreadful tydings that ever could have pierced my ears? Go, cruel, go, mayest thou perish as miserably as I, and mayest thou live to be another Briomer to this Pharamond, whom I have the pleasure to hate to my last gasp.

Upon those words he laid his hand upon the wound to have torn it wider, but his weakness which would not permit him, soon accomplished that which his fury could not execute. So dyed, but too late, the most famous villain that ever was, who as he expired, preserved that tell aspect in his face, which the paleness of death could not sweeten.

The Princesses as well by the will of those persons who had the disposal of them, as from their own inclinations, and out of the acknowledgment due to their illustrious Lovers, had now remitted that severity which decency did not now oblige them to continue, at such a Jubilee as that. So that love and joy displayed themselves in Cologne, more splendidly than had been seen before in any City of the world. The Queen of the Turingiens was fallen into a distemper, caused by those violent Conflicts in her heart that had been of so long continuance. Her reason, her generosity, her friendship for Rosamond, and her gratitude toward Sunnon perswaded her to extirpate out of her heart a passion which was the enemy of her repose : and yet that passion, proceeding from a natural inclination, and supported by a vast merit, had held out against all the assaults she could make upon it. But a war so rude could not continue in so delicate a place, without a sensible devastation. Amalazontha's distemper increased through the happiness of the Cimbrian Princess, whatever the unfortunate Queen could do to resist it ; Is it possible, said she, with tears in her eyes, that my destiny should be so spiteful, to make me guilty of those unjust actions which I myself condemn, and fain would not commit? Why should I love the person that cannot love me? Wherefore can I not look upon Rosamond, rather as my friend, than as my Rivalless? And wherefore should I not bestow all my affections upon a Prince, upon whom I ought to have bestowed them long since? These vehement complaints, the effects of the King of the Franks's presence, and the secret reproaches which the sight of Sunnon taxed her with, soon reduced that fair and unfortunate Princess into a condition sufficient to have moved the compassion of persons less sensible. All the whole company went to see her, but she desired them to forbear frequent visits, requesting only the society of Sunnon and Polyxena. By the conversation of these two persons it was, that the passion which she had for so long time endeavoured to cherish, began to take root in the heart of Amalazontha. For while Sunnon continued near her, transported with love ; and that she could not chuse but believe that Pharamond at the same time, neglectful of her, surrendered up all his affection to Rosamond, she redoubled her endeavours in favour of a Prince that had so well deserved her love. Thereupon she yielded to Sunnon that heart, of which he had so passionately desired the possession. But the Prince enjoyed it so small a while, that he hardly had time to know whether he had obtained it or no. For Amalazontha's malady increased with so much violence, that her life began to be despaired of, so that there was not any person of any Quality in Cologne, that did not bewail the condition of these two unfortunate Lovers. Sunnon observed the symptoms that happened to Amalazontha, and all the while his lips were open to nothing but his sighs ; and his eyes served to no other use, but to behold the person he loved, and to shed tears for the pains she endured. The Queen of the Turingiens endeavoured to comfort the afflicted Sunnon, she concealed for some time the greatest part of her sufferings ; but when she had no longer power to continue her kindness, and that Sunnon perceived what she endured ; sadly lamenting, Ab Madam, added he, how kind would you be, and happy would be my fate, were it but united to yours. My dear Princess, added Polyxena, with tears in in her fair eyes, I beseech you in the name of friendship, grant that favour to a Prince, whom you—— No, no, my dear Princess, answered the Queen of the Turingiens, interrupting her, I will never grant that to the entreaties of the Sister, which I ought to grant to the merit and affection of the Brother. Yes, Sir, pursued she, giving her hand to her passionate lover, Amalazontha will be yours, and will die yours; she declares that she is the Wife of Prince Sunnon; and that nothing grieves her, but that she has been so long ungrateful. Having so said, she felt her self so faint, that after Sunnon had returned her thanks, she bid adieu to Rosamond with a real tenderness. She spake afterwards but very little to Bellamira, Placidia, and all the other Princesses, to several of the Princes, and even to Pharamond himself. This last constraint which she put upon her spirits, contrary to the advice of the Physicians, hastened her without doubt to her end. For no sooner had she turned her self towards the King her Spouse, to address her last words to him, but she fetched her last gasp; manifesting thereby, that all her tenderness was for that Prince to whom it was due. But oh, the wonderful effects of love! no sooner had she yielded up her last breath, but the passionate Prince expired at the same moment: So truly we may aver, that the soul of a Lover is in the person beloved, rather than in the body which it enlivens: Thus did Amalazontha and Sunnon end their lives, who at the same time had submitted to different fetters under an unlucky Planet.

The Princes and Princesses in Cologne were extremely afflicted at their death; and for some days there was nothing but a gloomy sadness, where before there appeared nothing but mirth and joy. But as if these sorrows had been necessary to set off the publick rejoicings that succeeded, we may safely say, that there was never any thing so magnificent as those Festivals, at the Marriages of the most illustrious Heroes and Heroesses in all the world at that time. Nevertheless, there was nothing in all that pomp, which equalled the charms which those illustrious Lovers found in their mutual conversations, more sweet and pleasing than ever they had been before.

But instead of making a rehearsal, which would be too large, I will conclude with a discourse conformable to their impatience; only giving this account, that the enjoyment of the fairest Beauties upon earth was at length the reward of those Princes, who in all the world best deserved them. Pharamond espoused the incomparable Rosamond, and was declared King of the Gauls. Theobald reigned in Bohemia with the most adraired Bellamira, to whom the King of the Huns restored all the Dominions of the King his Father. Viridomar went into Suevia with the Princess of the Franks. Honorius, who came to Cologne, took Constance to be his Associate in the Empire, and gave him the fair Placidia for his Empress: he also granted Aquitain to Wallia, who espoused Theodolinda, and added Catalonia to his Territories, Sigeric being slain by his own people. Constantine by his marriage with Octavia united both the Britains under his Dominion. Balamir with Agione possessed the upper and lower Hungary. And Martian some time after espoused Pulcheria, and was Emperour of the East. Varanez changed no more, but all his life long loved the Princess Sydemiris, whom he espoused at Iffedon. The King of the Lombards had Gilismene for his reward. Marcomire with Albisinda reigned in Franconia and Turingia. And Aldemar, to whom they were all beholding, was happy in his beloved Melasimba. In a word, all the Lovers that were at Cologne attained the felicity to which they had aspired. For as for Gondioch, he would not come near a City where Pharamond enjoyed that happiness which he had always envied him.
